Our government's inattention has allowed North Korea to establish a new and dangerous threat to the Asia-Pacific region. It is probably too late to reverse that damage, but serious attention to this problem can still limit the extent of the damage.

Poisoning The Water's Edge (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 11, 2006

North Korea's apparent test Sunday of a nuclear device raises large questions with which the United States and the world must now grapple in the months and years ahead. But it may also have finally settled the question of how much time this and future Administrations will have available to deal with genuine foreign policy crises before they become merely political. The answer, it seems, can be measured in milliseconds.

Sen. Bob Menendez was not formerly known as an expert on nuclear proliferation or the politics of Northeast Asia. But there was the New Jersey Democrat on Monday delivering the view that Kim Jong-Il's latest demonstration of aggressive intent "illustrates just how much the Bush Administration's incompetence has endangered our nation." Not to be outdone, Majority Leader-in-waiting Harry Reid insisted the Administration appoint a "senior official to conduct a full review of [its] failed North Korea policy." Mr. Reid performed the rare feat of making Nancy Pelosi sound statesmanlike. Ms. Pelosi at least acknowledged that countries such as China might have played a negative role here.

As best as we can tell, the critique of the Bush Administration boils down to three points. First, as former Sen. Sam Nunn told the New York Times, "we started at the wrong end of the 'axis of evil,'" his point being the Administration should have somehow "dealt with" Pyongyang first and Baghdad later.

Next, say the critics, the Bush Administration has wrongly tried to engage North Korea diplomatically through the "six party" framework, when only the bilateral talks demanded by Kim Jong-Il will do. "Bush aided and abetted the outsourcing of American jobs," says Democratic Party chairman Howard Dean in one of his cheaper jabs, "and now he's outsourced our diplomacy as well." Finally, the President is said to have actually provoked North Korea into building a bomb by naming it to the axis of evil.

But since when does the Democratic Party, to say nothing of Dr. Dean, advocate U.S. unilateralism when unending multilateral approaches are available? And how does Mr. Nunn's suggestion that President Bush should have dealt with North Korea first among the axis of evil square with the idea that it was terribly bad form to describe such an "axis" in the first place?

In fact, the more closely one examines these claims the more disingenuous they become. The CIA strongly suspected North Korea had developed nuclear weapons as far back as the early 1990s. Gordon Corera, the security correspondent for BBC News, has amassed significant evidence that North Korea may have already tested a nuclear device -- in 1998, as the sixth in a set of Pakistani tests that year.

As for the idea that direct talks between Washington and Pyongyang might open the way toward a settlement, this flatly ignores North Korea's cheating on the last such settlement, the so-called "Yongbyong Agreed Framework" of 1994. American diplomats have never lacked for opportunities to talk to the North Koreans, formally or privately. What they lack are interlocutors who can be trusted to honor their commitments or cajoled into abandoning their weapons.

It is not necessary to defend every jot and tittle of the Administration's North Korean diplomacy. But the Democrats' instant, soundbite criticism is unserious to the point that it calls into question their sincerity in contributing to a solution. Are Messrs. Reid, Dean, Menendez et al. concerned about nuclear weapons getting into terrorist hands and U.S. ports? They tell us they are. Then perhaps they might publicly call on China and Russia to join the Proliferation Security Initiative, the most successful effort yet to interdict the transfer of illicit weapons.

Are they seriously interested in bringing about North Korea's internal collapse? It would be good to see the kind of rhetorical energy the Democrats invested in Darfur go into publicizing the plight of North Korean refugees. Would they like to see the U.N. contribute positively to managing the crisis? Then send a message of solidarity to our adversaries by confirming as U.N. ambassador John Bolton, one of the world's leading experts on proliferation.

None of these steps alone is going to resolve a crisis in which U.S. options are limited or problematic. But it would help if just once public discourse on the subject did not instantly degrade into an exercise in cynical political point-scoring. Fat chance.

Republicans Couldn't Change The Subject — But Korea Did It For Them (HILL)

The Hill, October 11, 2006

In one deadly moment, North Korea has succeeded in doing what no amount of backtracking by Speaker Dennis Hastert or his beleaguered Republicans could do: It has changed the subject of the national debate. With nuclear weapons in the hands of the most deranged regime in the world, e-mails to pages will have to fade from the forefront of the public's attention.

DOJ_NMG_0079331

Will Bush be able to deal with the North Korean crisis? This is truly the moment for a test of his leadership. If he is able to lead a strong global effort to face down the renegade nation and can set in motion a demonstrable process that could lead to a reversal of Pyongyang's nuclear ambitions, he will have pulled off a coup akin to JFK's in the Cuban missile crisis and rescued his party from midterm election defeat in 2006 as surely as Kennedy saved it in 1962.

The key, of course, is China. Can Beijing be made to take the crisis seriously enough to turn off the spigot of fuel and food that permits the North Korean regime to survive from day to day?

China has one major fear: a regional nuclear competition with Japan. With Japanese technological prowess and the mangled history between the two nations, Beijing cannot react impassively to the nuclear arming of Tokyo.

Do we dare encourage our World War II rival to acquire nuclear weapons? We must. It is really only the "Japan card" that can bring China to heel and force her to ratchet up the pressure on North Korea.

Let's not allow nuclear nonproliferation to become an international equivalent of gun control, a system that seems to keep weapons out of the hands of the innocent while allowing the guilty, who break the law anyway, to have all the weapons they need. If North Korea has defied the world and acquired nuclear weapons, why should we not permit peace-loving countries like Japan and South Korea to develop nuclear weapons to defend themselves?

Ultimately, the case of arming Japan with atomic weapons is as good as that for France developing its own bomb. French leader Charles de Gaulle always asked whether an American president was willing to trade New York for Paris. Would a Soviet attack that leveled the French capital lead to American retaliation that would doubtless provoke a Soviet response against major U.S. cities? And so Abe, the new Japanese Prime Minister, is entitled to ask if an American president is willing to trade Tokyo for New York.

In the grim logic of nuclear deterrent, only weapons in the hands of the nation actually under potential threat can constitute a real deterrence to aggression, particularly on a peninsula that has already seen one major war.

There is nothing like a national security crisis to force Americans to realize the consequences of paralyzing a presidency by sending to Washington a Congress with which he cannot work. We fell into just that trap in the final years of the Clinton presidency and we would do so now at our peril.

But Bush has to produce and has to do it in the next five weeks. Just like JFK did in 1962.

Morris, a former political adviser to Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.) and President Bill Clinton, is the author of "Condi vs. Hillary: The Next Great Presidential Race."

Solving The Korean Stalemate, One Step At A Time (NYT)

By Jimmy Carter

The New York Times, October 11, 2006

ATLANTA

IN 1994 the North Koreans expelled inspectors of the International Atomic Energy Agency and were threatening to process spent nuclear fuel into plutonium, giving them the ability to produce nuclear weapons.

With the risk of war on the Korean Peninsula, there was a consensus that the forces of South Korea and the United States could overwhelmingly defeat North Korea. But it was also known that North Korea could quickly launch more than 20,000 shells and missiles into nearby Seoul. The American commander in South Korea, Gen. Gary Luck, estimated that total casualties would far exceed those of the Korean War.

Responding to an invitation from President Kim Il-sung of North Korea, and with the approval of President Bill Clinton, I went to Pyongyang and negotiated an agreement under which North Korea would cease its nuclear program at Yongbyon and permit inspectors from the atomic agency to return to the site to assure that the spent fuel was not reprocessed. It was also agreed that direct talks would be held between the two Koreas.

The spent fuel (estimated to be adequate for a half-dozen bombs) continued to be monitored, and extensive bilateral discussions were held. The United States assured the North Koreans that there would be no military threat to them, that it would supply fuel oil to replace the lost nuclear power and that it would help build two modern atomic power plants, with their fuel rods and operation to be monitored by international inspectors. The summit talks resulted in South Korean President Kim Dae-jung earning the 2000 Nobel Peace Prize for his successful efforts to ease tensions on the peninsula.

But beginning in 2002, the United States branded North Korea as part of an axis of evil, threatened military action, ended the shipments of fuel oil and the construction of nuclear power plants and refused to consider further bilateral talks. In their discussions with me at this time, North Korean spokesmen seemed convinced that the American positions posed a serious danger to their country and to its political regime.

Responding in its ill-advised but predictable way, Pyongyang withdrew from the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty, expelled atomic energy agency inspectors, resumed processing fuel rods and began developing nuclear explosive devices.

DOJ_NMG_0079332

Six-nation talks finally concluded in an agreement last September that called for North Korea to abandon all nuclear weapons and existing nuclear programs and for the United States and North Korea to respect each other's sovereignty, exist peacefully together and take steps to normalize relations. Each side subsequently claimed that the other had violated the agreement. The United States imposed severe financial sanctions and Pyongyang adopted the deeply troubling nuclear option.

The current military situation is similar but worse than it was a decade ago: we can still destroy North Korea's army, but if we do it is likely to result in many more than a million South Korean and American casualties.

If and when it is confirmed that the recent explosion in North Korea was nuclear, the international community will once again be faced with difficult choices.

One option, the most likely one, is to try to force Pyongyang's leaders to abandon their nuclear program with military threats and a further tightening of the embargoes, increasing the suffering of its already starving people. Two important facts must be faced: Kim Jong-il and his military leaders have proven themselves almost impervious to outside pressure, and both China and South Korea have shown that they are reluctant to destabilize the regime. This approach is also more likely to stimulate further nuclear weapons activity.

The other option is to make an effort to put into effect the September denuclearization agreement, which the North Koreans still maintain is feasible. The simple framework for a step-by-step agreement exists, with the United States giving a firm and direct statement of no hostile intent, and moving toward normal relations if North Korea forgoes any further nuclear weapons program and remains at peace with its neighbors. Each element would have to be confirmed by mutual actions combined with unimpeded international inspections.

Although a small nuclear test is a far cry from even a crude deliverable bomb, this second option has become even more difficult now, but it is unlikely that the North Koreans will back down unless the United States meets this basic demand. Washington's pledge of no direct talks could be finessed through secret discussions with a trusted emissary like former Secretary of State Jim Baker, who earlier this week said, "It's not appeasement to talk to your enemies."

What must be avoided is to leave a beleaguered nuclear nation convinced that it is permanently excluded from the international community, its existence threatened, its people suffering horrible deprivation and its hard-liners in total control of military and political policy.

6-nation Meeting Set On Iran Sanctions (AP)

By Barry Schweid

AP, October 11, 2006

Senior officials of the United States and five other nations plan to confer Wednesday on possible U.N. sanctions against Iran for processing uranium as part of its disputed nuclear program.

Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns and his counterparts in Britain, France, Germany, Russia and China will confer by video about what should be on a U.N. sanctions list, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said Tuesday.

The U.N. Security Council is giving precedence to considering sanctions against North Korea, which announced Monday that it had detonated a nuclear device. That resolution "would almost certainly move at a quicker pace than the Iran resolution," McCormack said.

Russia has suggested the best approach to the standoff with Iran is more diplomacy. The United States is leading the move for sanctions, arguing that they are part of diplomacy and the council had already warned Iran of the consequences when it did not observe an Aug. 31 edict to stop enriching uranium.

Adoption of U.N. Security Council sanctions can be blocked by a veto cast by any of the five permanent council members, the United States, Russia, China, Britain or France.

To get unanimity, the first round of sanctions is likely to be mild, such as imposing restrictions on trade in technology that could be used in an Iranian weapons program.

Olmert: Syria Peace Overtures Are A Ploy (AP)

By Ravi Nessman

AP, October 11, 2006

Israel has brushed off the Syrian president's recent calls to restart peace talks as a ploy by Bashar Assad to deflect international pressure from his increasingly isolated regime. But some in Israel say Prime Minister Ehud Olmert may be making a major mistake in ignoring even a slim chance to pursue peace with one of his country's most implacable enemies.

"Olmert could have gone down in history as Menachem Begin, who gave Sinai back to Egypt," journalist Tom Segev wrote in the Haaretz daily Tuesday. "Instead, he is reacting to Syria's offers of peace with contempt, loathing and threats."

Israeli Vice Premier Shimon Peres, meanwhile, invited the Syrian leader to come to Jerusalem.

DOJ_NMG_0079333

"What would happen if Assad said he is coming to the Knesset (the Israeli parliament)?" Peres said. "He must get up and say, 'I want to talk peace directly with Israel.' That's all," Peres told Israel TV in an interview aired Tuesday.

Israeli-Syrian peace talks broke down in 2000, with Syria demanding assurances it would get back all of the Golan Heights, which Israel captured in the 1967 Mideast War and later annexed. Israel wanted slight modifications to the pre-1967 line, conforming to the international frontier, and insisted that issues of security and normalization be spelled out first.

Assad has sporadically called for new talks, but his appeals grew more intense following this summer's war between Israel and Lebanon's Hezbollah guerrillas, which Syria backed. The fighting increased international criticism of Assad's regime, already hit by accusations it was involved in the murder of former Lebanese Prime Minister Rafik Hariri and was letting militants use Syria as a transit point into neighboring Iraq.

"We want to make peace — peace with Israel," Assad told the German magazine Der Spiegel last month. In an interview with the British Broadcasting Corp. broadcast Monday, Assad said it remained to be seen whether Israel had the will to make peace.

Olmert has rejected talks with Syria, accusing it of harboring terrorists and saying he will not relinquish the Golan.

"As long as I am prime minister, the Golan Heights will remain in our hands," he was quoted as telling the ultra-Orthodox weekly Mishpaha last month.

Syria's support for Hezbollah and its refusal to force top Palestinian militants to close their offices in Damascus has also angered Israel.

Assad has hoped to use those issues to strengthen his position in future peace talks, but Olmert's spokeswoman Miri Eisin said Tuesday that they are obstacles to even starting those talks.

"Israel would love to start peace talks with a Syrian government that doesn't arm Hezbollah, that doesn't have a foreign minister who sides with Hezbollah, with a government that doesn't promote and provide a sanctuary for the head terrorists of Hamas and Islamic Jihad and others," she said.

Israeli analysts say Assad is using the possibility of peace with Israel to blunt international criticism.

"He is isolated. He is beleaguered. He is controversial, internationally speaking. He hopes to reap dividends from adopting a peaceful posture," said Itamar Rabinovich, Israel's former chief negotiator with Syria.

Those imputed motives wouldn't mean that Assad is not serious about pursuing new talks to get back the Golan — a perennial Syrian demand that would strengthen Assad domestically — in exchange for a peace deal that would benefit him internationally, Israeli analysts said.

But Olmert has less incentive to head into negotiations.

He is already under fire for his government's conduct of the Lebanon war, and talks with Syria would fan the flames, adding the media savvy Israelis living in the Golan to his list of critics.

"I think that Olmert either doesn't want to pay the price — and the price is known to everyone, the price is the Golan Heights — or he thinks that he is too weak to pay the price," said Shlomo Brom, a Syria expert at Tel Aviv University.

Gilad Sher, a former Israeli peace negotiator, said Syria's continuing support of terrorism should not close off diplomatic channels to solving the conflict.

"Israel must not reject Assad's hints outright, but rather it must begin a cautious, measured and pragmatic process in which Assad's willingness is analyzed," he wrote in the Yediot Ahronot daily. "If it is all merely a ruse, we will know as much very quickly. If not, and negotiations over a peace arrangement are begun, that will do nothing to detract from Israel's power of deterrence."

"After all, one can always say, 'no,'" he wrote.

A New Fence Is Added To A Border Town Already Split (NYT)

By Hassan M. Fattah

The New York Times, October 11, 2006

THE FENCE AT GHAJAR, Lebanon, Oct. 9 — Little more than a week after Israeli troops withdrew from Lebanon, the shiny new fence around the northern portion of this village is a reminder of the possible flash points that remain as Lebanon and Israel continue working to quell tensions across their border.

To the Lebanese, the fence, erected over the past several weeks to separate the northern side of the village from the rest of Lebanon, amounts to a new occupation of their territory, potentially worsening tensions over the disputed Shabaa Farms area nearby. To Israel, which says the fence is only temporary, it is a means of ensuring that Hezbollah fighters do not enter the village, which straddles the border, and attack Israelis.

[On Tuesday, the United Nations continued trying to broker an agreement ensuring that Israel would withdraw its troops from the northern section of the village and place it under United Nations control. But even if that happens, the fence itself might remain for some time, said a United Nations official who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak with reporters.]

DOJ_NMG_0079334

With its pastel-colored homes and scenic views, Ghajar is an old problem sprung from the often complex calculus of the Middle East. In 1932 the residents of Ghajar, most of them from the Alawite sect, were given the option of choosing their nationality and overwhelmingly chose to be a part of Syria, which has a sizable Alawite minority.

When Israel conquered the Golan Heights in the Arab-Israeli war of 1967, the town fell under Israeli control. Many residents were given permits to work in Israel and were eventually granted Israeli citizenship. When Israel invaded Lebanon in 1978, the town began growing northward into Lebanese territory.

The town's future grew more complicated when Israel withdrew from southern Lebanon in 2000, leaving two-fifths of the town in Israel and the rest on Lebanese soil, across the so-called Blue Line demarcating the borders between the countries.

Each side sought to keep the village whole, said Amin Hotait, a retired Lebanese Army general and the leader of a committee that helped confirm Israel's pullout in 2000.

Neither side, however, could agree on who would maintain control over the village. So after weeks of wrangling, they agreed to divide the town into a northern Lebanese side and a southern Israeli side.

"We did not accept that the whole village be under the occupation, and they did not accept that it be liberated," General Hotait said. "The only result we could arrive at was to split the town in two."

As a result, a fence was built dividing the village, which has about 2,500 residents, with crossing points in between for residents to get back and forth. Although there were Israeli guards posted on the southern side of the fence at the gates, passing from one side to the other was relatively easy. The Israelis were there to guard against Hezbollah fighters.

Yet the village has also been center of confrontations between Israel and Hezbollah. Most recently, in 2005, Hezbollah guerrillas launched a rocket attack on the village and infiltrated it, but were repelled by the Israelis and withdrew.

The latest fence separating the village from Lebanon was put up this summer, after the cease-fire. The Israelis have now posted troops within the northern section of the village.

Lebanese officials say the continued presence of Israeli soldiers on Lebanese soil is a violation of United Nations Resolution 1701, which settled this summer's conflict.

"Whether they're occupying one meter or 2,000, it is still Lebanese land, and we want to free our land," said Fawzi Salloukh, Lebanon's foreign minister. "This is a time bomb that is ticking."

A reporter who traveled to the fence at the northern section of the village tried to speak to residents through the fence, but none would respond. However, United Nations officials in the area said the villagers have sought to be a part of Israel. The dispute appears to be limited to one between countries.

Lebanese officials have said that if the villagers want to be Israelis, they should move to the other side of the border. Residents of the Lebanese villages surrounding Ghajar, still struggling to rebuild their lives after the war, say they fear that the fence may become a recipe for further violence between Israel and Hezbollah.

"This is certainly going to be a big problem, and you shouldn't expect anything less," said Ahmed al-Muhammad, the mayor of the town of Al Wazzan, near Ghajar. "They must have bad intentions for this area, or they would have pulled out completely."

He said his town had had almost no contact with Ghajar's villagers for years. He said the people of Ghajar were mainly interested in their contacts with Israel. The town's growing affluence compared with that of its neighbors is evident in the ongoing construction and modern finished architecture.

Hezbollah officials, who have held up Israel's occupation of Shebaa Farms as a reason to not disarm, have remained mute on the issue of Ghajar, opting to allow the government to negotiate a diplomatic solution. Still, one Hezbollah representative noted, patience is growing thin.

"Like Shabaa Farms, this proves there is an ongoing Israeli occupation and it must leave," said the representative, Hussein Haj Hassan. "We will be patient with the negotiations, but will not wait very long."

Hamas Rejects Plan For Unity Government (USAT)

USA Today, October 11, 2006

Qatar's attempt to mediate a growing crisis in the Palestinian territories took a blow Tuesday when Hamas rejected demands that it recognize Israel and renounce violence as a prerequisite for forming a unity government with the Fatah Party.

It was the latest setback in efforts to moderate the Islamic militant group Hamas and restore much-needed international aid to the Palestinians. Fatah declared the Qatari initiative for a coalition government a failure and blamed Hamas for the breakdown in negotiations.

Ghazi Hamad, spokesman for the Hamas-led government, said the group differentiates between armed "resistance (to Israel) and terrorism," He said Hamas is ready to continue talks: "The way is not blocked."

DOJ_NMG_0079335

Six people killed whenbomb blasts hit Philippines

At least six people were killed and more than 30 wounded when two bombs exploded in the insurgency-torn southern Philippines. One blast occurred in a stall selling alcohol during a festival in the town of Makilala on Mindanao island, North Cotabato provincial Police Chief Federico Dulay said. Six people were killed and at least 29 were injured. The town was celebrating its 52nd anniversary.

“Clearly this is a terrorist act,” Dulay said.

The second bomb went off in a market in Tacurong city in another part of the island, wounding five people, army Col. Felipe Tabas said.

The U.S., Australian and British embassies issued warnings against travel to Mindanao and said the threat of imminent attacks or kidnappings is high across the archipelago, specifically in places frequented by foreigners.

The Philippines, a largely Catholic nation, is fighting Muslim and communist insurgencies on its southern islands.

Latest ban on child labortakes effect in India

India's new ban on hiring children under age 14 as servants in homes or as workers in restaurants, tea shops, hotels and spas took effect Tuesday. “This will be a bad blow. I really don't know what I'll do,” said Dinesh Kumar, 12, who has been doing odd jobs in New Delhi for three years.

The children of India's tens of millions of poor families are expected to work, and in many cases they are the sole breadwinners. The law is intended to take them out of the workplace and put them in school.

Prime Minister Manmohan Singh vowed firm enforcement. Employers who violate the law face up to a year in prison and a $217 fine. It already is illegal to use children in hazardous industries such as glassmaking.

Protesters disrupt Taiwanleader's National Day talk

Taiwanese President Chen Shui-bian called for unity as an opposition lawmaker scuffled with security guards while trying to confront the leader during a National Day speech in Taipei.

Chen spoke as protesters gathered outside the Presidential Office building, demanding that he step down over alleged corruption. Police estimated there were 125,000 protesters.

Security men scuffled with lawmaker Lee Ching-hua of the opposition Nationalist Party after Lee attempted to break through a partition separating Chen from guests on a makeshift stage.

Chen has been on the defensive against allegations that his family and members of his inner circle used their proximity to him for personal financial gain. Chen says he is innocent and will complete his remaining 19 months in office.

Intransigent Hamas (WP)

The Washington Post, October 11, 2006

STIRRING BUT thoughtless appeals for a Middle East peace settlement continue to ring out around the world. Just last week a new one appeared, signed by 135 "global leaders," that called for "a new international conference, ideally held as soon as possible." Most of the sponsoring statesmen live far from the region -- in Europe, Latin America, Africa, Australia. Their statement asserted that "the injection of new political will" from "the international community" was what is needed to break the impasse between Israel and the Palestinians.

In fact, the problem is a lot more specific, and a lot tougher. That's why it was helpful that the foreign minister of Egypt decided to publicly speak his mind on the subject the other day. Ahmed Aboul Gheit -- who has spent the past several months immersed in a failing effort to restore the broken connections between the Palestinian Authority and its international donors, as well as Israel -- placed the blame exactly where it belongs: on the Palestinian political leadership. "The Palestinian situation is marred by sharp divisions and battling; it is a misery and shameful for any Arab and any Palestinian," the minister told the government newspaper al-Ahram.

The Egyptian frustration is understandable. Negotiations between the Palestinians and Israel, and Western aid to the Palestinian government, can't go forward because the governing Hamas movement refuses to recognize Israel or previous Israeli-Palestinian accords. It also won't renounce the use of violence against Israeli soldiers or civilians, or release the soldier its militants abducted from inside Israel in June. Egyptian negotiators have won Israeli agreement to release up to 1,000 Palestinian prisoners in exchange for the hostage, but Hamas won't go along.

Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, from the competing Fatah movement, has tried repeatedly to win Hamas's agreement on a new unity government that would indirectly recognize Israel, a half-step that might lure back some desperately needed European aid. No deal. This week the government of Qatar intervened, sending its foreign minister shuttling around Gaza with a six-point plan under which Hamas and Fatah would unite on the platform of a two-state solution. Once again Hamas said no.

DOJ_NMG_0079336

In case there was any doubt, Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh spelled out Hamas's position at a rally last weekend: "I tell you with all honesty, we will not recognize Israel, we will not recognize Israel, we will not recognize Israel." Mr. Abbas responded by threatening, as he has before, to dissolve the Palestinian government or order a referendum. But he lacks the legal authority either to remove Hamas from power or to schedule a vote of any kind.

It's easy enough for global leaders to issue flowery appeals for action on the Middle East or to imply that progress would be possible if only the United States used its leverage with Israel. The stubborn reality is that there can be no movement toward peace until a Palestinian leadership appears that is ready to accept a two-state solution. That's why there need to be fewer manifestos and more frank messages such as the one delivered by Mr. Aboul Gheit: "Those leaders and the Palestinian people will find out that they are losing a chance."

Bush Assures Peru's President He Will Work On Passing Free Trade Accord (AP)

AP, October 11, 2006

WASHINGTON President George W. Bush on Tuesday assured Peruvian President Alan Garcia that he would work with U.S. lawmakers to try to quickly push through a free trade agreement between the two countries.

"The central issue facing us right now is the passage of a free trade agreement," Bush told reporters after his meeting with Garcia. "I assured the president that I will work with Congress as soon as possible to get this agreement passed."

Garcia expressed satisfaction with Bush's assurance. A successful free trade accord, he said, would ease poverty and social divisions and help achieve stronger democratic institutions in Peru.

Peru is pushing for ratification of the agreement by the U.S. Congress before the end of the year, when trade preferences created to help counter the cocaine trade are set to expire.

"We are looking for an agreement that does not just focus on the most modern or the most significant economic groups in the country," Garcia said through an interpreter. "We are also looking to have a free trade agreement that is focused internally and that will benefit our entire population, all our productive sectors, including the less advantaged sectors, so that they may export to the world and to the United States in particular."

The two leaders also discussed the need to fight the illegal drug trade.

Garcia's visit here is occurring t just 10 weeks after his inauguration. The White House invitation is a demonstration of administration support for the moderate policies Garcia espouses in contrast to leftist sentiment evident elsewhere on the continent.

American officials were relieved when Garcia prevailed in a June runoff election over Ollanta Humala, who had the backing of Venezuela's radical president, Hugo Chavez.

Garcia had served as president from 1985-90, a period marked by hyperinflation and an upsurge in violence by left-wing guerrillas. He says he learned a lot from his first-term mistakes.

After his meeting with Bush, Garcia addressed the pro-free trade International Institute of Economics.

He said free trade policies traditionally have benefited the elites while bypassing the 80 percent poor population in developing countries.

His policy of "free trade inside Peru," he said, would knock down barriers to the country's internal markets in much the same way that international free trade does with respect to cross-border commerce.

He said legal reforms are essential to level Peru's playing field internally. "The rich have succeeded because they have access to the legal system," Garcia said. That right should be extended to all Peruvians," he said.

Peru's Path To Prosperity (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, October 11, 2006

NEARLY HALF A CENTURY AGO, President Kennedy launched one of this country's more ambitious foreign-aid experiments, a program to develop Latin America called the Alliance for Progress. Like most aid efforts during the Cold War, it was less an attack on poverty than on communism, though the one was seen as a precursor to the other. Although the United States spent more than $20 billion, the effort fizzled out with few accomplishments.

The program is seldom mentioned anymore in this country, but its name was invoked Tuesday by Peruvian President Alan Garcia during a news conference at the White House with President Bush.

"What could have been done almost 50 years ago with the Alliance for Progress is something that we can do now," Garcia said. His point was that the things the aid program failed to do in the 1960s, free trade could do today.

Garcia is anxious over a free-trade pact that both the U.S. and Peru have signed but that has yet to be ratified by Congress. An existing trade agreement between the U.S. and four Andean nations expires at the end of the year, and if the new pact isn't in place by then, thousands of Peruvian products will lose duty-free access to the U.S. market, which accounts for about 30% of Peru's exports.

DOJ_NMG_0079337

Ratifying the agreement shouldn't be a tough decision by Congress, yet leaders have held up a vote until after the Nov. 7 election. Democrats fret that its labor provisions are too weak, ignoring the fact that an end to Peru's preferential trade status would render a large number of impoverished Peruvians jobless. Meanwhile, Republicans from textile states fear that it will hurt the domestic industry — a quaint notion in an era of globalized competition.

A failure to seal the trade deal would be a disaster on many fronts. The original Andean agreement was intended to help build diversified economies in the region so that the four countries — Peru, Ecuador, Bolivia and Colombia — could lessen their reliance on coca, the raw material for cocaine. Letting it expire with nothing else in place would deal a heavy blow to the U.S. war on drugs. If Congress turns its back on these Andean countries, it will be playing into the hands of Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez and others trying to encourage the spread of anti-Americanism in the region.

The Alliance for Progress was a bust for a lot of reasons; U.S. planners underestimated the amount of money it would take to develop an entire continent, and Latin American governments didn't impose necessary reforms. Today, Peru's economy is growing 5% annually, but half its people still live on $2 or less a day. Engagement with the global economy, as neighboring Chile has shown, is the best path to prosperity, and American consumers also benefit from a lowering of barriers. Election-year politics should not be allowed to hijack this important trade deal.

Fed Task Force To Enforce Cuba Sanctions (AP)

By Curt Anderson

AP-Yahoo, October 11, 2006

The federal government on Tuesday announced the formation of a new law enforcement task force that will aggressively pursue violators of the U.S. trade and travel sanctions that have been in effect against Cuba for more than four decades.

Miami-based U.S. Attorney R. Alexander Acosta said the task force will focus on prosecuting violators of laws governing such things as commercial business with Cuba, currency reporting requirements, money laundering and travel to the island.

The task force's formation comes about a month before U.S. elections in which Cuban-American voters in South Florida — most of them fervently anti-Castro — form an important Republican Party constituency.

It also comes as Cuba faces political uncertainty due to the illness of President Fidel Castro, who in July temporarily ceded power to his brother, Raul.

Acosta, however, would say only this is "an appropriate time" to announce the task force to put people on notice that "we intend to enforce these laws aggressively."

"The purpose of the sanctions is to isolate the Castro regime economically and deprive the Castro regime of the U.S. dollars it so desperately seeks," Acosta told reporters.

The task force includes the Treasury Department, FBI, and departments of Homeland Security and Commerce.

The group, to be coordinated by two senior prosecutors in Acosta's office, will bring greater emphasis to existing Cuba sanction enforcement efforts that are scattered among several federal agencies, he said.

It is the latest move by the Bush administration to tighten restrictions that were first imposed in the early 1960s and expanded frequently since. In 2004, for example, President Bush limited family travel to Cuba to once every three years instead of annually and imposed new limits on the flow of currency to the island.

Violators of the Cuba sanctions can face up to 10 years in prison, $1 million in corporate fines and $250,000 in individual fines. The government can also seek up to $55,000 per violation in civil penalties.

Under U.S. law, the sanctions will remain in place until multiparty Cuban elections are planned, political prisoners are released and both Castro brothers are out of power.

U.S. Treasury Aide On China Resigns (WSJ)

By Michael M. Phillips

The Wall Street Journal, October 11, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson's top China hand quit just a month after coming aboard to run the Bush administration's new economic dialogue with Beijing.

Deborah Lehr, a former National Security Council official, resigned for "personal reasons," not because of any disagreement over how the U.S. should approach China, according to a Treasury spokeswoman.

Her departure leaves a hole in Mr. Paulson's team. The secretary -- a former Goldman Sachs chief executive -- arrived at Treasury in July and quickly took charge of the administration's China economic policy.

DOJ_NMG_0079338

During his first official trip to China last month, Mr. Paulson announced a "strategic dialogue" to help improve U.S.-Chinese economic relations, which have frayed in recent years over issues such as exchange rates and copyright piracy. He designated Ms. Lehr -- one of his advisers at Goldman Sachs -- as his special envoy to help organize and set the agenda for the twice-yearly meetings.

When Mr. Paulson met with top Chinese officials, he had Ms. Lehr close by his side as a signal of her stature at Treasury and in the new two-way financial diplomacy. "The key to working with the Chinese is being able to get access to all the right people at whatever level," Mr. Paulson said at the time.

After Ms. Lehr presented her letter of resignation last week, Treasury officials informed their Chinese counterparts of her departure.

Mr. Paulson will still travel to China before the end of the year for the first round of talks, the Treasury spokeswoman said.

With Ms. Lehr's departure, the task of organizing the strategic dialogue falls to Undersecretary for International Affairs Timothy Adams, who had been running Treasury's China policy before Mr. Paulson's arrival, and to former State Department aide Taiya Smith, the secretary's deputy chief of staff, according to a Treasury official.

"There are plenty of capable people to carry on," said John Frisbie, president of the U.S.-China Business Council, an association representing more than 250 American companies that do business with China.

Ms. Lehr is married to John F.W. Rogers, chief of staff at Goldman Sachs. They have two young children, and people familiar with Ms. Lehr's thinking said the long hours and extensive travel required for the position played a definitive role in her decision to quit.

Write to Michael M. Phillips at michael.phillips@wsj.com1

U.S. Group Reaches Deal To Provide Laptops To All Libyan Schoolchildren (NYT)

By John Markoff

The New York Times, October 11, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO, Oct. 10 — The government of Libya reached an agreement on Tuesday with One Laptop Per Child, a nonprofit United States group developing an inexpensive, educational laptop computer, with the goal of supplying machines to all 1.2 million Libyan schoolchildren by June of 2008.

The project, which is intended to supply computers broadly to children in developing nations, was conceived in 2005 by a computer researcher at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Nicholas Negroponte. His goal is to design a wireless-connected laptop that will cost about $100 after the machines go into mass production next year.

To date, Mr. Negroponte, the brother of the United States intelligence director, John D. Negroponte, has reached tentative purchase agreements with Brazil, Argentina, Nigeria and Thailand, and has struck a manufacturing deal with Quanta Computer Inc., a Taiwanese computer maker.

Mr. Negroponte, who was in Tripoli this week to meet with Libyan officials, said he discussed the project extensively with the Libyan leader, Col. Muammar el-Qaddafi, in August.

“When I met with Qaddafi, it had all the mystique and trimmings expected: middle of the desert, in a tent, 50 degrees C. etc.,” Mr. Negroponte, who was traveling to Asia on Tuesday, wrote in an e-mail message. “It took him very little time to find O.L.P.C. appealing as an idea.”

The idea appealed to the Libyan leader, according to Mr. Negroponte, because it fit into his political agenda of creating a more open Libya and becoming an African leader. The two men also discussed the possibility of Libya’s financing the purchase of laptops for a group of poorer African nations like Chad, Niger and Rwanda.

It is possible, Mr. Negroponte said, that Libya will become the first nation in the world where all school-age children are connected to the Internet through educational computers. “The U.S. and Singapore are not even close,” he said.

To date, One Laptop Per Child has received mixed support from the American computer industry. Test units currently use a low-power microprocessor manufactured by Advanced Micro Devices. However, both Intel and Microsoft have been publicly skeptical about the idea and have proposed competing low-cost educational computer projects. At the World Economic Forum in Davos, Switzerland, in January, Bill Gates, Microsoft’s chairman, suggested that the next generation of cellphones might be a better way to reach across the so-called digital divide.

Mr. Negroponte said Microsoft refused to sell its Windows software to the project at a price that would make it possible to include in his system. As a result, his laptops will come with the freely available Linux operating system, which is becoming increasingly popular in the developing world.

The idea of a laptop for every schoolchild grew out of Mr. Negroponte’s experience in giving children Internet-connected laptops in rural Cambodia. He said the first English word out of the mouths of the Cambodian students was “Google.”

DOJ_NMG_0079339

Discussions between the One Laptop project and the Libyan government began as part of work being done by the Monitor Group, an international consulting firm co-founded by the economist Michael E. Porter, which is now helping the Libyans develop a national economic plan.

Diplomatic relations between the United States and Libya have warmed recently, since Tripoli settled the Pan Am 103 bombing case and agreed to renounce its pursuit of nuclear weapons. Washington lifted a trade embargo two years ago, and the State Department rescinded Libya's designation as a state sponsor of terrorism last June.

For its $250 million investment, Libya will receive 1.2 million computers, one server per school, a team of technical advisers to help set up the system, satellite internet service and other infrastructure.

The first test models will be distributed to the five participating countries companies at the end of this November, according to Mr. Negroponte, and mass production is planned for June or July of 2007.

The computers come with a wireless connection, a built-in video camera, an eight-hour battery and a hand crank for recharging batteries. They will initially be priced below $150, and the price is expected to decline when they are manufactured in large numbers.

Uganda's Plight Pressed On Capitol Hill (WP)

By Nora Boustany

The Washington Post, October 11, 2006

Activists Call for U.S. Role in Negotiating Peace for Nation's War-Torn North

Donning yellow and orange T-shirts, 700 activists from across the country pressed legislators and Capitol Hill staffers yesterday on the need for high-level American involvement to bring peace to northern Uganda, a region that has experienced wartime atrocities, abductions of children and widespread displacement for more than 20 years.

Among the participants was Grace Akallo, 25, a former Ugandan child soldier, kidnapped from her dormitory by rebels along with 139 other girls 10 years ago. Yesterday, she recalled her ordeal.

"They crashed the dorm windows with rifle butts and threatened to hurl a bomb at us," she said. "We first hid under our beds, pretending not to be there. They could see us, they said, and forced their way in with their guns. Tied together with rope, the girls marched all night."

Akallo said she was held for seven months by the followers of Joseph Kony, the messianic and charismatic founder of the Lord's Resistance Army. During that time, she was forced to walk for miles, subsisting on leaves and sorghum. At a rebel base in southern Sudan, she was trained to handle guns and was ordered to steal food at gunpoint. "We were raped, all of us," she said. Five of her friends were killed and two are still there, she said, adding, "I don't know if they are alive."

Akallo escaped when Ugandan troops attacked, and she returned home the following April. She went on to study at a university in Kampala and then transferred last year to Gordon College, in Wenham, Mass., as a communications senior.

"As a major donor country, the U.S. has a responsibility to take part in the peace talks so the signatories of any agreement are held responsible," Akallo said of a fragile truce negotiated in July, followed by talks involving the rebels and the Sudanese and Ugandan governments. "If left alone, I am not so sure they will honor the agreement," she said.

A number of nonprofit civic groups participated in the two-day gathering in Washington, which included a symposium Monday. The participants included Physicians for Human Rights, Africa Faith and World Vision, as well as policy experts from the International Crisis Group, mediation specialists from the Carter Center, and policy advisers from Oxfam America, Refugees International, the International Rescue Committee, the Brookings Institution and Mercy Corps.

"The peace process is held by a very thin thread," said Julian Atim, 26, a physician working on health care in northern Uganda.

"The United States is a house of power. The warring sides keep threatening to quit the talks and keep holding up conditions," she said. "The rebels have caused suffering. We are sick of them," added Atim, who lost both parents to AIDS.

She said she returned to the 100-bed hospital in Anaka, which she had first visited as a student, because of what she saw there -- patients forced to walk for a day to reach medical care, others dying in refugee camps, and a facility with intermittent water and electricity that lacked basic equipment.

"I think a deal is possible, but it won't happen unless the U.S. engages," said John Prendergast, a senior adviser to the International Crisis Group who has served in past U.S. administrations. "It is very important to send an envoy to Juba to bring U.S. leverage to the process," he said, referring to the town in southern Sudan where the talks are being held. He said Ugandan President Yoweri Museveni "needs a partner for peace and the only partner he finds desirable is the United States."

"The absence of the Bush administration from the talks is condemning millions of northern Ugandans to a fate little better than death in the endless IDP [internally displaced persons] camps," Prendergast said. "For a few pennies and a little diplomatic energy, the Bush administration could help bring peace to northern Uganda."

DOJ_NMG_0079340

Rep. Christopher H. Smith (R-N.J.) said he was going to call Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice to ask her to send an envoy to the Uganda peace talks. Smith has also introduced legislation that would impose sanctions against governments and rebel groups that use child soldiers. It also would provide more psychological services for children recovering from forced soldiering.

Kony and four of his top lieutenants are wanted by the International Criminal Court in The Hague. They are charged with war crimes and crimes against humanity committed during a dark and vicious 20-year conflict in which rebels hacked off the lips, ears and breasts of their victims. About 25,000 children were abducted and forced to become child soldiers or sex slaves, while 2 million people remain displaced.

On Monday, speaking on his country's 44th anniversary of independence from the British, Museveni charged that Kony and his lieutenants were dragging their feet in the peace process talks in Juba to avoid the war crimes tribunal. Earlier this year, the tribunal urged Uganda, Sudan and Congo to turn over rebel suspects.

Across Europe, Worries On Islam Spread To Center (NYT)

By Dan Bilefsky And Ian Fisher

The New York Times, October 11, 2006

BRUSSELS, Oct. 10 — Europe appears to be crossing an invisible line regarding its Muslim minorities: more people in the political mainstream are arguing that Islam cannot be reconciled with European values.

"You saw what happened with the pope," said Patrick Gonman, 43, the owner of Raga, a funky wine bar in downtown Antwerp, 25 miles from here. "He said Islam is an aggressive religion. And the next day they kill a nun somewhere and make his point.

"Rationality is gone."

Mr. Gonman is hardly an extremist. In fact, he organized a protest last week in which 20 bars and restaurants closed on the night when a far-right party with an anti-Muslim message held a rally nearby.

His worry is shared by centrists across Europe angry at terror attacks in the name of religion on a continent that has largely abandoned it, and disturbed that any criticism of Islam or Muslim immigration provokes threats of violence.

For years those who raised their voices were mostly on the far right. Now those normally seen as moderates — ordinary people as well as politicians — are asking whether once unquestioned values of tolerance and multiculturalism should have limits.

Former Foreign Secretary Jack Straw of Britain, a prominent Labor politician, seemed to sum up the moment when he wrote last week that he felt uncomfortable addressing women whose faces were covered with a veil. The veil, he wrote, is a "visible statement of separation and difference."

When Pope Benedict XVI made the speech last month that included a quotation calling aspects of Islam "evil and inhuman," it seemed to unleash such feelings. Muslims berated him for stigmatizing their culture, while non-Muslims applauded him for bravely speaking a hard truth.

The line between open criticism of another group or religion and bigotry can be a thin one, and many Muslims worry that it is being crossed more and more.

Whatever the motivations, "the reality is that views on both sides are becoming more extreme," said Imam Wahid Pedersen, a prominent Dane who is a convert to Islam. "It has become politically correct to attack Islam, and this is making it hard for moderates on both sides to remain reasonable." Mr. Pedersen fears that onetime moderates are baiting Muslims, the very people they say should integrate into Europe.

The worries about extremism are real. The Belgian far-right party, Vlaams Belang, took 20.5 percent of the vote in city elections last Sunday, five percentage points higher than in 2000. In Antwerp, its base, though, its performance improved barely, suggesting to some experts that its power might be peaking.

In Austria this month, right-wing parties also polled well, on a campaign promise that had rarely been made openly: that Austria should start to deport its immigrants. Vlaams Belang, too, has suggested "repatriation" for immigrants who do not made greater efforts to integrate.

The idea is unthinkable to mainstream leaders, but many Muslims still fear that the day — or at least a debate on the topic — may be a terror attack away.

"I think the time will come," said Amir Shafe, 34, a Pakistani who earns a good living selling clothes at a market in Antwerp. He deplores terrorism and said he himself did not sense hostility in Belgium. But he said, "We are now thinking of going back to our country, before that time comes."

Many experts note that there is a deep and troubled history between Islam and Europe, with the Crusaders and the Ottoman Empire jostling each other for centuries and bloodily defining the boundaries of Christianity and Islam. A sense of guilt over Europe's colonial past and then World War II, when intolerance exploded into mass murder, allowed a large migration to occur without any uncomfortable debates over the real differences between migrant and host.

DOJ_NMG_0079341

Then the terror attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, jolted Europe into new awareness and worry.

The subsequent bombings in Madrid and London, and the murder of the Dutch filmmaker Theo van Gogh by a Dutch-born Moroccan stand as examples of the extreme. But many Europeans — even those who generally support immigration — have begun talking more bluntly about cultural differences, specifically about Muslims' deep religious beliefs and social values, which are far more conservative than those of most Europeans on issues like women's rights and homosexuality.

"A lot of people, progressive ones — we are not talking about nationalists or the extreme right — are saying, 'Now we have this religion, it plays a role and it challenges our assumptions about what we learned in the 60's and 70's,' " said Joost Lagendik, a Dutch member of the European Parliament for the Green Left Party, who is active on Muslim issues.

"So there is this fear," he said, "that we are being transported back in a time machine where we have to explain to our immigrants that there is equality between men and women, and gays should be treated properly. Now there is the idea we have to do it again."

Now Europeans are discussing the limits of tolerance, the right with increasing stridency and the left with trepidation.

Austrians in their recent election complained about public schools in Vienna being nearly full with Muslim students and blamed the successive governments that allowed it to happen.

Some Dutch Muslims have expressed support for insurgents in Iraq over Dutch peacekeepers there, on the theory that their prime loyalty is to a Muslim country under invasion.

So strong is the fear that Dutch values of tolerance are under siege that the government last winter introduced a primer on those values for prospective newcomers to Dutch life: a DVD briefly showing topless women and two men kissing. The film does not explicitly mention Muslims, but its target audience is as clear as its message: embrace our culture or leave.

Perhaps most wrenching has been the issue of free speech and expression, and the growing fear that any criticism of Islam could provoke violence.

In France last month, a high school teacher went into hiding after receiving death threats for writing an article calling the Prophet Muhammad "a merciless warlord, a looter, a mass murderer of Jews and a polygamist." In Germany a Mozart opera with a scene of Muhammad's severed head was canceled because of security fears.

With each incident, mainstream leaders are speaking more plainly. "Self-censorship does not help us against people who want to practice violence in the name of Islam," Chancellor Angela Merkel of Germany said in criticizing the opera's cancellation. "It makes no sense to retreat."

The backlash is revealing itself in other ways. Last month the British home secretary, John Reid, called on Muslim parents to keep a close watch on their children. "There's no nice way of saying this," he told a Muslim group in East London. "These fanatics are looking to groom and brainwash children, including your children, for suicide bombing, grooming them to kill themselves to murder others."

Many Muslims say this new mood is suddenly imposing expectations that never existed before that Muslims be exactly like their European hosts.

Dyab Abou Jahjah, a Lebanese-born activist here in Belgium, said that for years Europeans had emphasized "citizenship and human rights," the notion that Muslim immigrants had the responsibility to obey the law but could otherwise live with their traditions.

Then someone comes and says it's different than that," said Mr. Jahjah, who opposes assimilation. "You have to dump your culture and religion. It's a different deal now."

Lianne Duinberke, 34, who works at a market in the racially mixed northern section of Antwerp, said: "Before I was very eager to tell people I was married to a Muslim. Now I hesitate." She has been with her husband, a Tunisian, for 12 years, and they have three children.

Many Europeans, she said, have not been accepting of Muslims, especially since 9/11. On the other hand, she said, Muslims truly are different culturally: No amount of explanation about free speech could convince her husband that the publication of cartoons lampooning Muhammad in a Danish newspaper was in any way justified.

When asked if she was optimistic or pessimistic about the future of Muslim immigration in Europe , she found it hard to answer. She finally gave a defeated smile. "I am trying to be optimistic," she said. "But if you see the global problems before the people, then you really can't be."

News To Bridge The Divide (USAT)

By Souheila Al-jadda

USA Today, October 11, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0079342

Many Arab TV news media criticized Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's visit last week to the Middle East, questioning her intentions and recent U.S. policies in the region.

Perhaps Rice's latest diplomatic overtures were met with suspicion from Arab readers and viewers as well. Still fresh in their minds are the images of the tragic Lebanese-Israeli conflict, which unfolded right before their eyes on Arab satellite TV with scenes of death and destruction. These poignant images coupled with adroit news writing are shaping Arab public opinion, which has become increasingly anti-American and anti-Western in recent years.

On a recent visit to Syria, I saw the wide array of satellite TV news broadcasts offered in the Middle East. Most people seem to watch Al-Jazeera (mainly Qatar-funded), Al-Arabiya (Saudi-backed) or Al-Manar (Hezbollah-supported).

But a new trend is emerging, with Western and Middle East news outlets planning to reach out to the other side and build bridges of understanding between their nations and people.

In Europe alone, several countries are launching Arabic-language satellite news broadcasts:

·The British Broadcasting Corporation World Service is creating a $35 million, Arabic version of its channel.

·France is launching all-news Arabic programming next year.

·Deutsch Welle, a German public broadcast company, airs three hours of Arabic programming, which will expand to 24 hours next year.

In turn, Al-Jazeera, the most influential Arab network, plans to launch an English-language channel later this year to give Western audiences the Arab point of view. Al-Jazeera is primarily funded by Qatar, a U.S. ally. Yet some U.S. officials accuse Al-Jazeera of inciting violence by airing videos from terrorists. Shortly after the9/11 terrorist attacks, Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld said Al-Jazeera "has a pattern of putting out al-Qaeda propaganda." Al-Qaeda often first airs messages via Al-Jazeera.

Are U.S. networks that aired the same footage guilty of inciting violence, too? Whether the news comes from Al-Jazeera or Fox News, people should hear different sides of a story and engage in an honest discussion.

But there is a fine line between news coverage and propaganda. In February 2004, Washington started broadcasting the Arabic-language Alhurra (Arabic for "The Free One"), to tell "the people in the Middle East the truth about the values and the policies of the United States," according to President Bush. It turned out to be a multimillion-dollar failure. A Zogby International poll last year revealed that 45% of viewers in five Arab countries watched Al-Jazeera and less than 1% watched Alhurra.

As Marwan Bishara, a political analyst for Abu Dhabi TV, explained in an op-ed piece in the International Herald Tribune, "People will not trust the message if they don't trust the messenger." To avoid being perceived as government propaganda, European stations will need to emphasize their reputations for being truly independent news organizations.

Five years have passed since 9/11, and many Americans are still asking, "Why do they hate us?" But people in the Middle East don't hate us; in fact, most like our Western culture and its values. What they hate is our foreign policy.

Arab respondents to a 2004 University of Maryland/Zogby International poll were asked whether their attitudes toward the USA were "based more on American values or on U.S. policy in the Middle East." A majority cited U.S. policy. To win the confidence of people in the Arab world and have them accept Western values, U.S. foreign policy must reflect these values.

Palestinians held historic parliamentary elections this year at the behest of Western nations, voting the Islamic movement Hamas into power. But because the European Union, Israel and the United States designate Hamas as a terrorist organization for targeting Israeli civilians, they punished the Palestinians with sanctions. Little consideration was given to the Arab view that Hamas was a legitimate movement, defending against Israeli occupation and attacks on Palestinian civilians.

Arabs daily see the tragic results of the Iraq war. They've seen images of prisoner abuse in Abu Ghraib, heard tales of slaughter and are now witnessing a budding civil war.

During talks to end the Israeli-Lebanese conflict this summer, the United States delayed a United Nations cease-fire resolution with the aim of creating a democratic "new Middle East." Washington, in effect, gave Tel Aviv the green light to continue bombing. Over 34 days, the world watched U.S. policy in action as at least 800 civilians were killed and Lebanon's infrastructure and economy were left in shambles. If this is what U.S. democracy looks like, it would be understandable if Arabs reject it.

To spare future generations further conflicts and wars, the world must support these modest attempts to bring differing opinions to new audiences. Ultimately, though, the will to engage in a global dialogue must be backed by a will to understand and a desire to change.

Souheila Al-Jadda is associate producer of a Peabody award-winning show, Mosaic: World News from the Middle East, on Link TV, and a member of USA TODAY's board of contributors.

Support Freedom In The Arab World (WP)

By Radwan A. Masmoudi And Amr Hamzawy

The Washington Post, October 11, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0079343

As Arab and Muslim intellectuals and activists concerned about the promotion of democracy in our region, we call on America and its president to reaffirm -- in words and actions -- its commitment to sustained democratic reform in the Arab world.

We have been heartened by the strong commitment to liberty that President Bush expressed in his November 2003 speech at the National Endowment for Democracy and then in his second inaugural address, when he said: "All who live in tyranny and hopelessness can know: The United States will not ignore your oppression or excuse your oppressors. When you stand for your liberty, we will stand with you."

Despite some initial skepticism, those statements nurtured hope in our region. We realize that democracy is not easily attained and must ultimately come from within. But it can receive encouragement and support, both of which it badly needs today in Arab countries.

We know that some in the United States, worried by recent Islamist gains among voters in Palestine and Egypt, are having doubts about the wisdom of pushing for freedom and democracy in the Middle East. These worries are exploited by despots in the region to perpetuate the untenable status quo. But there is no way to advance liberty without inclusion of all elements that are willing to abide by democratic rules and reject violence.

Democratic participation is the only way to combat extremism and pressure all groups, including Islamists, to moderate their stance in order to maximize their share of the vote. The United States should continue to press for an end to repression by governing regimes of democratically minded liberal and Islamist groups, and it should emphatically distance itself from such repression and condemn it in the strongest terms whenever and wherever it occurs. We are confident that if Arab citizens are able to have their choice, they will choose democracy, freedom, peace and progress.

Perhaps emboldened by the impression that America is wavering in its support for democracy, some autocrats have recently intensified repression. This makes the need for sustained U.S. and international support and pressure more urgent than ever. The region needs to hear again that the course of freedom and democracy is the only course that America, guided by both interest and principle, will support.

To mention but one case where U.S. influence might do much good: Egypt has experienced a regime crackdown lately on opposition activists. In February the government postponed municipal elections and renewed the emergency law. The regime has not even spared Egypt's venerable judiciary, which has steadfastly proclaimed its independence in recent months. And liberal opposition politician Ayman Nour, who was allowed to run in last year's presidential election and won 8 percent of the popular vote, behind only President Hosni Mubarak, was arrested and sentenced in a murky process to five years in jail.

The health of Ayman Nour, a dear friend and colleague of many of us, continues to deteriorate. We pray that President Bush will take Nour's case to heart and tell the Egyptian regime of his concerns. Hundreds of other activists (including doctors, university professors, journalists and those in civil society) whose only crime was to express their desire for freedom continue to languish in jail and suffer torture and police brutality.

We entreat America to do all it can to ensure that a small number of authoritarian rulers will not control the future of more than 300 million Arabs, more than half of whom are not yet 20 years old. Freedom and democracy are the only ways to build a world where violence is replaced by peaceful public debate and political participation, and despair is replaced by hope, tolerance and dignity.

This article is adapted from an open letter to President Bush signed by 103 other Arab and Muslim activists and thinkers in Arab countries, Europe, the United States and elsewhere who have worked in support of democracy (see www.islam-democracy.org).

An Impossible Job (NYT)

The New York Times, October 11, 2006

It is heartening, and a little surprising, that the race to succeed Kofi Annan as United Nations secretary general was so hard fought. The job is grueling, requiring an extraordinary combination of public advocacy, tough management and tireless crisis diplomacy — and it can often feel thankless.

This week the Security Council picked Foreign Minister Ban Ki-moon of South Korea. Mr. Ban got a quick taste of his life to come, when the news of his selection was upstaged by North Korea's announcement that it had tested a nuclear weapon.

We wish Mr. Ban well. The United Nations is an essential organization for promoting American foreign policy goals and for achieving a fairer and more peaceful world. Yet the past few years have done serious damage. The problems range from the Security Council's bitter divisions over Iraq to the scandalous behavior of corrupt officials and sexually predatory peacekeepers to the General Assembly's watering down of essential reforms.

But the single most ominous problem has been the sometimes hostile, sometimes aloof, but never constructively supportive attitude of the Bush administration. The United States isn't just the world's only superpower, the U.N.'s biggest contributor and its New York host. It championed the organization's creation and shaped its universalist values.

DOJ_NMG_0079344

The next secretary general cannot succeed without Washington's active cooperation, or without pushing through the reforms that fell short in the current term. What's needed is a human rights council uncompromised by the inclusion of human rights abusers, and a secretary general with the authority to control spending and demand the highest performance of personnel. The organization also must have a General Assembly prepared to cut back on obsolete study missions, layers of duplicative committees and sinecure staff positions that have piled up over decades without serious review.

The United States strongly backed Mr. Ban's candidacy. If it supports Mr. Ban in doing his job, it would increase his chances for success.

To Grow Or Not To Grow (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 11, 2006

The first country in Latin America that institutes a flat-tax regime is going to make history for that region, just as history is being made by such pro-growth flat-tax regimes as Slovakia, Georgia and Estonia across Eastern Europe. The man who made it happen in Estonia is giving Costa Rica that chance. So far, they are proving they're not up to it.

Former Estonian Prime Minister Mart Laar went to Costa Rica last month to explain the groundbreaking structural change in his own country that sparked a free-market revolution all over Eastern Europe. According to press reports, his message hit home with Costa Rican business and opinion makers. Amazingly, the Costa Rican government is already trying to close the door on Mr. Laar's ideas. It's hard to understand why.

Costa Rica is not the poorest country in Latin America but it's hardly meeting its potential. Steep personal income-tax rates are the cause of a government-estimated tax evasion rate of 70%. A 30% corporate tax rate discourages investment.

Costa Rica was considered a model welfare state 20 years ago. Today, 80% of government revenues are dedicated to wages, pensions, debt service and higher education. Most of the region now takes for granted technology such as portable email devices; in Costa Rica such modern conveniences remain a dream.

Mr. Laar faced bigger challenges in post-Soviet-Estonia. In 1992 his country was running 1,000% annualized inflation and the economy had contracted 30% over two years. Today, with its zero corporate tax rate on reinvested profits, single tax rate for individuals and a fully deregulated economy, Estonia is running ahead of the European pack, attracting human and financial capital. Real GDP growth in 2006-2007 is forecast at more than 8% per year.

During three days of meetings with the government of President Oscar Arias, members of congress, economists, businessmen and opinion makers, Mr. Laar argued that Costa Rica could undergo a similar transformation if only the government would "just do it." He emphasized the importance of privatization, accession to Cafta and, of course, the flat tax.

He explained that the single rate, with an exemption for the poor, "could be applied in any country, and in most countries where it has been applied, it has shown satisfactory results." He said, "In Estonia, which has a large population of farmers, it has reduced inequality, created more income for the government and lowered the poverty rate."

The Arias government promised to "analyze" the idea. On Sept. 28 Finance Minister Guillermo Zúñiga announced, "We have analyzed it [the flat tax] and we have ruled it out." Its attraction is that it's simple, "but for Costa Rica it would have to be moderated." That, he explained, would "complicate it and reduce its attractiveness." The government is promising an alternate plan that, if Mr. Arias's rhetoric is any guide, will almost certainly raise taxes.

Costa Ricans may not back off so easily. The opposition in congress may not cooperate with tax increases. What's more, the Costa Rican press has been editorializing in favor of the flat tax. La Nación led off an editorial: "Estonia managed, in a few years, that which many countries, including Costa Rica, have sought laboriously for a long time. Why doesn't our government, instead of wasting its time on a complicated fiscal plan, follow a good example?"

Good question. Costa Rica has a chance to transform the region. It should take it.

DOJ_NMG_0079345

Miller, Charles S

From: Miller, Charles S
Sent: Wednesday, October 11, 2006 10:47 AM
To: Agarwal, Asheesh (CRT); Ames, Andrew; Baxter, Felix (CIV); Beckner, Rick (CIV); Blomquist, Kathleen M; Branda, Joyce (CIV); Brody, Stephen (CIV); Bucholtz, Jeffrey (CIV); Bukvics, Jennifer (CIV); Claterbos, Barbara (CIV); Cohen, David M. (CIV); Cohn, Jonathan (CIV); Davidson, Jeanne (CIV); Davis, Dan (CIV); Fargo, John (CIV); Fielding, Gabrielle (CIV); Flentje, August (CIV); Frost, Peter (CIV); Garren, Timothy (CIV); Glynn, J.Patrick (CIV); Gorsuch, Neil M; Hertz, Michael (CIV); Hollis, Robert (CIV); Hunt, Jody (CIV); Hussey, Thom (CIV); Jeweler, James (CIV); Katsas, Gregory; Keisler, Peter D (CIV); Kohn, Chris (CIV); Kopp, Robert (CIV); Letter, Douglas (CIV); Levine, Larry (EOIR); Lindemann, Michael (CIV); Magnuson, Cynthia; McCallum, Robert (SMO); McMahon, Linda M (CIV); Miller, Charles S; Nichols, Carl (CIV); Nowacki, John; Osborn, Tara (CIV); Pyles, Phyllis (CIV); Rivera, Jennifer (CIV); Roehrkasse, Brian; Schiffer, Stuart (CIV); Scolinos, Tasia; Seidel, Rebecca; Senger, Jeffrey M; Spellberg, Dianne (CIV); Swenson, Lily F; Thirolf, Eugene; Wilson, Karen L; Zwick, Ken (CIV)
Subject: 10/11/06 Civil Division News

Officials challenge AIDS funding ruling

Oracle to pay $98.5M to settle suit

Home health care provider pleads guilty for Medicare fraud

Supreme Court Rejects Gay Marriage, Abortion Cases

Guardsmen filing suit for compensation

Drugs Slip Through FDA Cracks, Sell Unapproved by the Millions

AP

Oct. 11, 2006

Officials challenge AIDS funding ruling

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Bush administration sought Tuesday to overturn a court decision that lets nonprofit AIDS groups apply for federal funding without signing a pledge opposing prostitution and sex trafficking.

At least one of the groups, DKT International Inc., has refused to sign the pledge because it helps distribute condoms to prostitutes and other sex workers in Vietnam.

DKT last year sued the U.S. Agency for International Development, contending their free speech rights were violated by a 2003 law requiring that they explicitly oppose prostitution and sex trafficking to qualify for part of a $15 billion AIDS program.

In May, U.S. District Judge Emmet G. Sullivan sided with DKT, saying the funding conditions insist that groups "parrot" the U.S. government's position on prostitution.

But the Justice Department, in its appeal Tuesday, called the funding condition "highly germane" to the overall goal of fighting the spread of AIDS and HIV.

"Congress could reasonably determine that the government's efforts to stamp out prostitution and sex trafficking would be most successful if HIV/AIDS services are provided by organizations that affirmatively oppose two underlying causes of the disease," the government said.

The case now heads to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia. A date for arguments has not yet been set.

END

Baltimore Examiner

Oct. 11, 2006

Oracle to pay $98.5M to settle suit

Luke Broadwater, The Examiner

BALTIMORE - The Oracle Corp., whose CEO Larry Ellison is one of the world's richest men, agreed Tuesday to pay $98.5 million to the U.S. government to settle a false claims lawsuit, after a company it owns was accused of ripping off the government in a contract.

This is the largest contract fraud settlement ever reached by the U.S. government in Maryland.

"I am proud that Maryland is part of this national initiative," said Maryland U.S. Attorney Rod Rosenstein, who was among several federal officials who announced the settlement Tuesday.

PeopleSoft, a company that merged with Oracle last year, entered into a federal contract in March 1997 to sell software products and maintenance services. The contract resulted in about $127 million of software sales and $77 million in maintenance sales until it ended in 2005, Rosenstein said.

But government officials learned the company might have been ripping them off after a former PeopleSoft employee James A. Hicks filed suit against his old bosses under the federal False Claims Act.

Hicks' suit alleged PeopleSoft misrepresented its software discounting practices to the government when negotiating its contract — and did not reveal that it offered lower prices to customers who purchased in bulk, causing the government to pay higher amounts of taxpayer money than necessary, officials said.

To settle the claims, Oracle agreed Tuesday to pay the U.S. government $98.5 million and Hicks $17.7 million within the next two weeks.

PeopleSoft's federal sales office was in the Bethesda. It merged into Oracle in March 2005.

According to the settlement, Oracle continues to deny that it's liable for the claims alleged in the suit. A Oracle spokeswoman did not immediately respond to a request for comment.

END

AP

October 11, 2006

Home health care provider pleads guilty for Medicare fraud

LOS ANGELES_The owner of California's two largest home health care businesses has pleaded guilty to health care fraud that cost Medicare $40 million.

Lourdes "Lulu" Perez, 53, of San Diego entered the plea Tuesday in federal court as part of a settlement in which she, her husband and her two businesses repaid $33.9 million to the government, prosecutors said.

Perez is scheduled to be sentenced Oct. 16 by U.S. District Judge Stephen Wilson. Prosecutors have recommended that she be sentenced to 46 months in prison, but she could get up to 59 years in prison.

Perez was the owner of Los Angeles-based Provident Home Health Care and San Dimas-based Tri-Regional Home Health Care, which billed Medicare for work that was never performed.

The companies were "the epicenter of home health care fraud in Southern California," U.S. Attorney Debra Wong Yang said Tuesday.

Perez came under federal investigation after a payroll clerk at Provident filed a whistleblower lawsuit in 2003. The government intervened in the case and got one of her coconspirators to agree to plead guilty.

Margaret Tan, 29, a former director of nursing at Provident, was cooperating with prosecutors in the ongoing investigation of others involved in the elaborate fraud scheme. Tan was scheduled to enter a plea Oct. 23, prosecutors said.

"The cooperation we have obtained from key figures in this fraud has assisted us in recovering a particularly large amount of fraudulently obtained proceeds," Yang said.

END

The Associated Press
10-11-2006

Supreme Court Rejects Gay Marriage, Abortion Cases

The Supreme Court refused to intervene Tuesday in a legal fight over same-sex marriage, declining an appeal from a gay California couple who were denied a license to wed.

The justices declined without comment to take the case of Arthur Smelt and Christopher Hammer of Mission Viejo, Calif. The men had sought a marriage license in southern California's Orange County in 2004 and, after they were turned down, filed a federal lawsuit that challenged federal and state laws against same-sex marriage.

A U.S. District judge said the federal Defense of Marriage Act was constitutional but declined to rule on the state ban because a separate legal challenge is making its way through California state courts.

The 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals agreed in May that the couple should await the outcome of the state court challenge.

Last week, a California appeals court upheld the state ban on same-sex weddings. That case appears headed for the California Supreme Court.

A trial judge in San Francisco last year declared the state marriage ban invalid because it violated the civil rights of gays and lesbians.

Major civil rights groups opposed the federal lawsuit, preferring to fight for recognition of gay marriage in several states before the Supreme Court is asked to weigh in.

The case is Smelt v. Orange County, 06-5742.

COURT REJECTS COMPANION CASE TO 'ROE V. WADE'

The Supreme Court on Tuesday turned aside the case of Sandra Cano, one of the women behind the legalization of abortion, who had sought to reverse the victory she won 33 years ago.

Cano says she never wanted an abortion and that her difficult early life resulted in her becoming the anonymous plaintiff in Doe v. Bolton, the lesser-known case which the justices ruled on the same day in 1973 as the landmark Roe v. Wade.

"We're very disappointed that the Supreme Court has not decided to protect women and children from the harm of abortion," said Allan Parker, one of Cano's attorneys. "The court has aborted the normal regulation of medicine in this area."

Cano says she was a 22-year-old victim of an abusive husband and that her children were in foster care when she sought legal assistance in getting a divorce and in getting her children back.

She said an aggressive attorney pushed her into the abortion case.

"What I received was something I never requested -- the legal right to abort my child," Cano said in an affidavit six years ago.

Her current lawyers' legal brief says that despite advances in medicine, science and technology, the justices have "frozen abortion law based on obsolete 1973 assumptions and prevented the normal regulation of the practice of medicine."

The 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ruled in January that neither it nor a U.S. District Court had the authority to reverse the Supreme Court's decisions in Doe v. Bolton or Roe v. Wade.

END

Springfield, MA Republican

October 11, 2006

Guardsmen filing suit for compensation

By MARLA A. GOLDBER

SPRINGFIELD - After the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, some Massachusetts National Guard soldiers activated to protect Quabbin Reservoir and other resources traveled 100-plus miles daily and slept in their cars, because they weren't given money for lodging, a lawyer said yesterday.

Four men have filed suit in U.S. District Court, seeking compensation from the National Guard and federal and state governments.

Their lawyer, John R. Shek, said at a hearing in Springfield yesterday that many soldiers weren't paid for out-of-pocket expenses including gas and food, and built up major credit card debts. When soldiers inquired about compensation, they were told by commanding officers to "Shut up and like it," Shek said.

Shek argued before Judge Richard G. Stearns that the lawsuit should be certified as a class action. In an interview afterward, Shek said he believes roughly 1,200 Massachusetts National Guard soldiers are owed $40,000 to $50,000 each.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Mark T. Quinlivan said the soldiers haven't exhausted administrative solutions and argued that their case should be dismissed or transferred to the U.S. Court of Federal Claims.

Stearns took the case under advisement and said he hopes to rule within days.

The lawsuit was originally filed in January by Sgt. Steven M. Littlefield of Manomet; Sgt. Wayne R. Gutierrez of New Bedford; retired Capt. Louis P. Tortorella of Brookline, N.H.; and Spc. Joseph P. Murphy of Derry, N.H. Defendants include the United States, the Commonwealth of Massachusetts and the Massachusetts National Guard.

The four soldiers maintain they were treated differently from National Guard members in other states, in violation of equal protection rights. They also cite breaches of contract, financial duty and U.S. Army regulations and seek reimbursement, damages and lawyer's fees.

"Everybody who is entitled to money will get their money," said Maj. Anthony Sciaraffa, a U.S. Army lawyer, at a press conference after yesterday's hearing. Sciaraffa said the soldiers did receive annual salaries, which are based on rank, and total about $24,000 a year for a specialist or corporal.

Sciaraffa said the National Guard never intended to deny soldiers any daily or "per diem," compensation they deserved. Instead, there was a "quirk in the system," Sciaraffa said, adding that the activation scenario following Sept. 11, 2001, was unusual and didn't fit computerized templates for paying soldiers.

A soldier whose station is changed permanently, or for at least 179 days, can get an annual housing allowance of $18,500, Sciaraffa said. However, he acknowledged that some claim to have gotten repeated temporary assignments after the terrorist attacks.

At the hearing, there were frequent references to U.S. Supreme Court rulings, landmark cases and the Constitution, along with debate about whether governments are immune to such lawsuits.

The state should not have "to go into its own coffers to make good on these payments," said Rosemary Connolly, trial division chief for Massachusetts Attorney General Thomas F. Reilly. "They (the National Guard soldiers) were called up on federal orders, not state orders," she said.

The National Guard, Shek said in an interview, is an "ancient militia," which predates present government structure and answers to state and federal activation orders.

END

Bloomberg
October 11, 2006

Drugs Slip Through FDA Cracks, Sell Unapproved by the Millions

Oct. 11 (Bloomberg) -- Ballay Pharmaceuticals Inc. had a choice nine years ago: seek U.S. approval to sell a prescription decongestant or slip the drug on the market and hope regulators wouldn't order it off.

The company chose to market the medicine, Balamine DM, to doctors and pharmacies without the consent of the U.S. Food and Drug Administration, and the agency didn't stop Wimberley, Texas- based Ballay.

Almost 2 percent of U.S. prescriptions dispensed last year, or as many as 73 million, were for unapproved medicines such as Balamine, the FDA estimates. After years of paying little attention, the FDA now says it will step up efforts to get many of the drugs approved or taken off the market.

While some medications may be lawful because they are safe and effective, the FDA says the majority are illegal -- and some may be killing or injuring people.

``It's a tremendous risk, and the problem is that the public doesn't know about it,'' says Larry D. Sasich, a professor of pharmacy practice at Lake Erie College of Osteopathic Medicine in Erie, Pennsylvania. Sasich has written about the hazards of pharmaceuticals for Public Citizen, a Washington-based advocacy group.

The makers of unsanctioned medicines, often closely held companies with fewer than 500 employees, defend their practices as legal. The law allows companies to market drugs that are ``generally recognized'' as effective and safe.

Internet Ads

To gain explicit clearance, companies must submit studies proving that products work and are safe. Some companies do register drugs with the FDA when they market them, making the agency aware of the products while skipping the approval process.

Marketers promote unapproved drugs through the Internet, ads in journals and sales visits to doctors. The names and packaging of the products -- such as Cortane-B to treat ear infections -- don't reveal the unapproved status.

Cortane-B's maker, Blansett Pharmacal Co. in North Little Rock, Arkansas, says the product is safe and effective yet the company plans to seek FDA approval.

Physicians prescribe unapproved drugs and pharmacies sell them often without knowing their status. Insurance plans, including some tied to the U.S. Medicare program for the disabled and elderly, often pay for unapproved medicines -- sometimes knowingly. It is legal to prescribe, fill prescriptions for, and insure unapproved drugs.

FDA's `Renewed Emphasis'

The FDA hasn't developed a list of unapproved drugs and says it doesn't know whether the number -- which it estimates to be in the thousands -- is increasing.

The agency plans to place ``renewed emphasis'' on the drugs, says Deborah M. Autor, director of the office of compliance at the FDA. ``We are committed to ensuring that all drugs in the U.S. meet safety and effectiveness standards,'' she says.

As of April, Balamine and more than 100 other unapproved medicines contained an ingredient associated with the deaths of 21 children under 2 years old during the past 23 years, according to the FDA. The substance is carbinoxamine, an antihistamine.

While ``it is not clear that the carbinoxamine caused these deaths,'' the FDA said in a June statement, the agency ordered companies to stop making unapproved drugs with the compound.

Ingredient Removed

Ballay and other drugmakers say they stopped production of carbinoxamine-containing medicines or removed the ingredient after the FDA's statement. The products had been on the market for years and supplies may still be in pharmacies, as the FDA didn't demand the manufacturers recall the products.

Balamine met a medical need, says Terry Ballay, president of Ballay, which is closely held and has fewer than 20 employees.

``I'm not a villain,'' he says. ``I'm really not. I think I help society on the whole.''

Ballay paid for a listing for Balamine and another drug in this year's ``Physicians' Desk Reference,'' an annual directory used by many doctors to research drugs. Companies listing products in the book aren't required to demonstrate that the drugs have been approved by the FDA, says Kyle Christensen, a spokesman for the publisher, a unit of Thomson Corp.

According to Ballay's entry, Balamine drops can be used in children as young as 1 month and Balamine syrup in infants at least 18 months old.

Dosage at Issue

The appropriate dose of carbinoxamine for children under 2 years hasn't been established, the FDA says.

Ballay declines to explain why he didn't apply for FDA approval to sell Balamine before he put it on the market in 1997.

``We sold a lot of it, and the doctors loved it,'' he says, refusing to divulge figures. He says he knows of no injuries caused by the drug.

Like Balamine, other unapproved drugs often contain mixtures of ingredients that were included in medications that had previously gained U.S. clearance. New doses, combinations and prescribing instructions found in the unapproved versions may pose risks, according to the FDA and independent specialists.

``You just don't know what contaminant might be lurking in one of these compounds or whether there's a new safety risk in one of these combinations,'' says Lee Vermeulen, a professor at the University of Wisconsin-Madison School of Pharmacy.

Drugs lacking an FDA imprimatur have come to public attention before. In 1984, the FDA linked 38 infant deaths to an unapproved intravenous vitamin E solution used to treat premature babies. The drug was withdrawn.

FDA Actions

The FDA says it has taken ``numerous'' actions during the past two decades to spur compliance with the law. Officials haven't responded to requests for details.

The agency posts on its Web site some warning letters that cite companies for making unapproved drugs. None of the 20 largest drugmakers, ranked by U.S. sales, is among those named in the selected enforcement actions on the FDA Web site.

One letter was sent to Neil Laboratories Inc. of East Windsor, New Jersey, in May. The FDA accused Neil of selling eight unapproved drugs containing compounds such as guaifenesin, used to treat coughs. Bharat Patel, chief executive officer of Neil, didn't return phone calls seeking comment.

The FDA on Oct. 5 said it had negotiated an agreement with Syntho Pharmaceuticals Inc. and Intermax Pharmaceuticals Inc. to stop making unapproved drugs, including cough medicines. The companies, based in Farmingdale, New York, share the same president, Muhammed Malik. He didn't return phone calls seeking comment.

Felony Charges

Officials at companies that illegally put a drug on the market could face misdemeanor or felony charges, says William Vodra, a former FDA lawyer. The U.S. also could seek to seize drugs or impose other penalties, says Vodra, who now is in private practice in Washington, representing drugmakers.

The regulators say they will focus on unapproved medications that pose safety risks, lack evidence of effectiveness and make deceptive claims.

``We have had to prioritize our enforcement efforts and exercise enforcement discretion,'' in part because resources are limited, the FDA says on its Web site.

Some unapproved drugs, such as phenobarbital, used to control seizures, are ``very important therapies'' and appear to help patients, according to the FDA, which says it may not act against beneficial drugs for which alternatives aren't available.

Oversight Shortage

A shortage of money and workers has prevented the FDA from doing much about unapproved medicine, says Sasich, the pharmacy professor and co-author of `Worst Pills, Best Pills: A Consumer's Guide to Avoiding Drug-Induced Death or Illness.'' Because of a lack of oversight, companies ``very likely'' could get prescription drugs on the market that prove harmful, he says.

``You always find people that want to go around regulatory standards for their own gain,'' Sasich says. ``I don't believe that the Food and Drug Administration has the resources to prevent that from happening.''

The FDA had a $1.88 billion budget for the fiscal year ended Sept. 30, and the administration of President George W. Bush has requested $71 million more for fiscal 2007. The FDA needs ``a large boost in funding and staffing,'' the Washington-based Institute of Medicine, which advises the federal government, said in a Sept. 22 report.

Physicians, pharmacists and health insurers that pay for prescription medicines say they assume that medications being sold have the government's blessing.

Until the FDA decides that drugs need to be removed from the market, the medicines are candidates for insurance reimbursement, says Jeffrey Kelman, chief medical officer for Medicare's Center for Beneficiary Choices.

FDA Responsibility

FDA officials, not physicians, bear the responsibility for verifying that drugs are approved, says Edward Langston, chairman-elect of the Chicago-based American Medical Association, the nation's largest doctors' group.

``They need to enforce their rules and regulations and not allow these medications to be distributed,'' says Langston, a physician in Lafayette, Indiana.

Dozens of drugs not listed in the FDA's database of approved medicines can be found on drugmakers' Web sites and in pharmaceutical directories.

Pamlab LLC of Covington, Louisiana, lists several products on its Web site that lack clearance, including Pancof decongestant.

``History has shown that, in general, the products have been safe and effective, or else physicians wouldn't prescribe them,'' says Barry LeBlanc, the company's president and chief operating officer.

Some companies' unapproved drugs contain ingredients that were evaluated by the FDA.

Unapproved Version

That's what happened with carbinoxamine, the antihistamine. The FDA approved a version of the drug in 1953, called Clistin. Fifteen years later, an unapproved allergy drug named Rondec, which contained carbinoxamine and other ingredients, appeared.

Cypress Pharmaceutical Inc. of Madison, Mississippi, says it copied Rondec. ``The brand was out there, and had been for many decades at the point where ours came to market,'' also without FDA clearance, says Max Draughn, CEO of Cypress.

Makers of unapproved drugs aren't trying to hide from the FDA, says Larry Blansett, CEO of Blansett Pharmacal. The company makes several unapproved medicines, including Cortane-B, which combines an anesthetic, steroid and antibacterial agent to treat ear infections.

Blansett and other drugmakers say they have filed required paperwork alerting the FDA of product introductions even for unapproved drugs.

Each registered medicine, whether approved or not, carries a 10-digit National Drug Code number, created by the drugmakers and the FDA. The numbers are used by pharmacies to place orders and track inventory.

No Secret Ops

``It's not as if these are clandestine operations working under the wire,'' Blansett says.

Blansett says he doesn't have to seek approval for drugs with ingredients generally recognized as safe and effective, as he says is the case with Cortane-B, which contains pramoxine, hydrocortisone and chloroxylenol. He nonetheless will do so for that product rather than risk that the government will order it off the market, he says.

The approval process may cost the company at least $250,000 and perhaps as much as $20 million, depending on the FDA's demands, the executive says. The FDA may take three to five years to consider the application, he says. In the meantime, he will continue selling the drug.

``Unless the FDA contacts us and tells us it requires anything different, it's OK to market as it is,'' he says.

END

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Thursday, October 12, 2006 8:22 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Department of Justice News Clips for Thursday, October 12, 2006
Attachments:	dojclips061012.pdf; dojclips061012.doc

This morning's Department of Justice News Clips is attached.

Website: You can also read today's briefing, including searchable archive of past editions, at http://www.BulletinNews.com/justice.

Full-text Links: Clicking the hypertext links in our write-ups will take you to the newspapers' original full-text articles.

Interactive Table of Contents: Clicking a page number on the table of contents page will take you directly to that story.

Contractual Obligations and Copyright: This copyrighted material is for the internal use of US Department of Justice employees only and, by contract, may not be redistributed without BulletinNewsâ€™ express written consent.

Contact Information: Please contact us any time at 703-749-0040 or Justice-Editors@BulletinNews.com. Use of this email address will automatically result in your message being delivered to everyone involved with your service, including senior management. Thank you.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: THURSDAY, OCTOBER 12, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

SoCal Man Indicted On Federal Charges Of Aiding Al Qaeda (LAT) 5
American In Videos Charged With Treason (USAT) 6
Treason Charge For California Man Seen In Al Qaeda Videos (CHIT) 7
American In Qaeda Tapes Accused Of Treason (NYT) 7
U.S. Supporter Of Al-Qaeda Is Indicted On Treason Charge (WP) 8
American In Al Qaeda Charged With Treason (WT) 10
U.S. Indicts American In Al-Qaida Video (AP) 10
American Al-Qaeda Member Gadahn Charged With Treason (Update1) (BLOOM) 11
Al-Qaida Spokesman Indicted For Treason (UPI) 12
US Files First Treason Charges In 50 Years Against Accused Al-Qaida Member (VOA) 12
Terror Funding Trial Set To Begin (CHIT) 12
German Court To Weigh Whether To Retry Moroccan On Terror Charges (MCT) 14
Texas Man Sentenced For Dealings With Terrorist (FINDLAW/AP) 16

Homeland Response:

An Anthrax Blackout (RC) 16
7-year Term For Trying To Make Ricin (AZREP) 19
Bioweapon Charge Gets Man 7 Years (AP) 19
The ACLU's Man From The FBI (WP) 19
Small Plane Strikes New York High-Rise (LAT) 20
Small Plane Hits High-Rise In N.Y. (WP) 22
Yankee Killed When Plane Hit N.Y. Building (WT) 24
Crash Exposes Limits Of Post-9/11 Security Steps (WSJ) 25
Manhattan Plane Crash Kills Yankee Pitcher (NYT) 26
NYC Tragedy Echoes 9/11, Raises Small-plane Questions (USAT) 29
Small Planes Aren't Big Risk (USAT) 29
Report: Few Cities Prepared For Evacuation Procedures (USAT) 30
Strategizing On Disaster Relief (USAT) 30
TSA Secrecy Rules Eased (WP) 32
Insurers Get An Earful From Senator (NYT) 33

War News:

Bush Open To Change In Tactics (LAT) 34
Bush Stands Firm On Policies (WP) 35
For Bush, Many Questions On Iraq And North Korea (NYT) 37
Bush Rejects Direct Talks With North Korea (USAT) 38
Bush Hits Democrats On N. Korea Talks (WT) 39
Army Plans Same Troop Levels In Iraq Until 2010 (USAT) 40
Pentagon To Maintain Troop Levels In Iraq (FT) 41
Army: Troops To Stay In Iraq Until 2010 (AP-Y) 41
Army Plans To Maintain Current Troop Levels In Iraq (MCT) 42
Kerry Defends Troop Withdrawal Proposal In Las Vegas (BOS) 44
Sacrifice Of The Few (NYT) 44
Top U.S. Officer In Iraq Sees Spike In Violence (NYT) 45
'Tough' Time In Iraq To Continue, Casey Says (WP) 46
'All-time High' In Baghdad Violence (USAT) 47
2,660 Iraq Civilians Killed In September (AP) 48
Insurgents Cause Ammo Explosions (LAT) 49
Iraq Death Toll Study Has Mixed Reaction (AP) 50
Iraq Disputes Claim Of 600,000 War Dead (LAT) 51
In Victory For Shiite Leader, Iraqi Parliament Approves Creating Autonomous Regions (NYT) 53
Parliament Approves Measure Allowing Autonomous Regions (WP) 54
U.S. Agency Cites Flaws In Another Iraqi Construction Project (NYT) 55
Afghanistan Five Years Later: Charting The Reconstruction (CSM) 56

Corporate Scandals:

Options Scandal Snares Tech Chiefs (FT) 57
2 More Executives Resign Over Options (NYT) 57
As Companies Probe Backdating, More Top Officials Take A Fall (WSJ) 59
Two Tech Companies Shake Up Leadership (USAT) 61
Scandal Grows Over Backdating Of Options (WP) 61
McAfee, Cnet Chiefs Leave As Options Scandal Deepens (Update2) (BLOOM) 63
CEOs Swept Out By Stock Options Scandal (FINDLAW/AP) . 64
Stock-option Probes Lead To Exit Of Top Execs At McAfee, CNet (MERCN) 66
CNET General Counsel Steps Down Over Stock Options Probe (LAW) 66
Court Denies United Request To Stop State's Options Probe (MINNST) 67
Backdating To The Future (WSJ) 68
Enron's Skilling Asks To Remain Free On Bail During His Appeal (WP) 69
Filings Illuminate IPO's Bumpy Ride (WP) 69
Money Rules Behind Soaring Executive Pay, Decades Of Failed Restraints (WSJ) 71

Criminal Law:

Blagojevich Friend Faces Fraud Charges (SLPD) 76
Top Aide To Illinois Governor Is Indicted In Kickback Inquiry (NYT) 77
Top Blagojevich Adviser Indicted (CHIT) 78
Gov's Pal Indicted In Kickback Scheme (CHIST) 80
Illinois Governor's Aide Indicted (LAT) 81
As The Foley Case Unfolds, Hastert Gets A More Enthusiastic Nod From Bush (NYT) 82
Hastert Aides Interest Ethics Panel (WP) 83
Ethics Panel Questions Page Supervisors (AP-Y) 85
Boehner Asked By Ethics To Testify On Foley (RC) 86
Page: Foley Touched Page On House Floor (MDAy) 87
Scandal Sidelines Hastert, Reynolds (WP) 88
Polls: GOP Put Politics Ahead Of Pages (AP-Y) 89
National GOP Fights To Keep Foley Seat (NSDY/AP) 90
Foley Case Snags Incumbent In Ohio Race For House Seat (NYT) 90
Foley Scandal Exposes The GOP's Gay Identity Crisis (USAT) 92
FBI Seeks Help In Wales Case (SEAPI) 93
Five Years Later, FBI Still After Wales' Killer (SEATIMES) 95
FBI Seeks Help Identifying Man (OREG) 96
FBI: Strange Man Was Reported In Wales' Neighborhood Before Death (AP) 96
How To Make US Schools Safer (CSM) 97
Code Blue At Schools Rattles Nerves (WP) 98
Fake Threat Puts Schools On Alert (WT) 100
Seven Search Warrants Issued In School Shooting Investigation (AP) 101
Man Accused Of Call That Closed Schools (WP) 101
Arrest Made In Culpeper Bomb Threat (CULCIT) 102
Former Middletown Twp. Mayor Gets 43 Months For Bribery (NSL) 103
Former Mayor Of A Monmouth County Town Is Sentenced In A Corruption Case (NYT) 104
Menendez Denies Kean's Subpoena Claim (AP) 105
Question Of Victim Buttons Comes Before Supreme Court (LAT) 105
Court Weighs Effect Of Victim's Image On Trial (USAT) 106
Buttons' Influence On Jury At Issue For Justices (WP) 107
Justices Ponder Relationship Of Federal And State Courts (NYT) 107
Plea Deal Ends Federal Trial For Hells Angels Accused In Deadly Brawl At Vegas Casino (AP) 109
Republicans Call For Inquiry In Documents Case (NYT/AP) 110
Lawmakers Seek Probe Of Berger's Theft (WT) 110
Prosecutor: Rove Didn't Sway Spam Probe (AP-Y) 111
Ex-fugitives Plead Guilty In $31 Million Investor Scam (VAPILOT) 111
Why Farm Belt Sees Rising Crime Wave (CSM) 112
DOJ Eyes Donor Reimbursement (RC) 113
Mosque Suit Says Manager Embezzled $300,000 (WP) 115
Florida Judge Wants To See 'Bully' In Court (WP) 116
Deal In Brooklyn Corruption Case (NYT) 117
British Court Ruling Gives Boost To Serious Journalism (WSJ) 117
High Court In Britain Loosens Strict Libel Law (NYT) 119
A Libel Landmark (WSJ) 120
Two U.S. Pilots Criticized In Brazil (WP) 121
O.C. Man Gets 50 Years To Life For Molesting Relative On Videotape (LAT) 122

Civil Law:

Medicare Saves $2 Bln By Fighting Fraud In U.S. Health Programs (BLOOM) 123
GSA Asks Court To Rethink Ruling On FedBizOpps.gov (GCN) 123
RJR Douses Flavored Smokes Criticized As A Lure For Teens (WSJ) 124

DOJ_NMG_0079357

Civil Rights:

States Are Growing More Lenient In Allowing Felons To Vote (NYT) 125
Manassas Irate That Inquiry Is Escalated (WP) 126
3 Charged In Hate Crimes; Brooklyn Victim Is In A Coma (NYT) 127
Black Employees' Foundation Sues LOC (RC) 128
9th Circuit: UPS Can't Refuse To Consider Hearing-Impaired Drivers (LAW) 129
South Dakota's Stark Abortion Choice (CSM) 130
Report: 5 U.S. States Use Dogs To Control Inmates In Cells (FINDLAW/AP) 132

Antitrust:

Justice Department Criticized For Approving Big AT&T Deal (WSJ) 132
AT&T Deal Wins A Key Go-Ahead (WP) 133
BellSouth Deal Faces FCC Fight (USAT) 135
Justice Department Approves AT&T-BellSouth Merger Plan (AP) 135
BellSouth's Final Call; AT&T Set To Take Over (AJC) 137
AT&T-BellSouth Deal Delayed As FCC Postpones Vote (Update1) (BLOOM) 139
Justice Department Clears AT&T Takeover Of BellSouth (AFP-Y) 139
Will Approved AT&T-BellSouth Deal Help Company Against Cable Providers? (AP) 140
FTC Ramps Up Actions Against Real Estate (INMAN) 141
Healthways To Buy Axia Health For $450M (AP-YBIZ) 142
Antitrust Law's Delicate Dance (WSJ) 143
Transmeta Sues Intel Over Chip Patents (WSJ) 144
Citigroup Purchase Rocks Legg Mason (WP/BLOOM) 144
Firms Sweeten Offer For Harrah's, But Bid May Not Be Rich Enough (WSJ) 145
MAN Buys At Least 5% Of Scania (WSJ) 146

Environment:

Lawyer In BP Case Ordered To Turn Over Evidence (HC) ..146
BP CEO Ordered To Give Deposition (AP) 147
Renewable Energy Meeting Kicks Off With Ethanol Criticism (DJ) 148
Execs Tout Renewable Fuels At Conference (AP) 149
Talkin' Energy At The Energy Conference (SLPD) 150
Big Oil Fine With Ethanol As Additive (FWST) 151
Emboldened States Take Charge Of Energy Issues (WSJ) .152
US Pandemic Flu Plan: Hole Up At Home (AP) 153
Mulch Madness (opinion) (NYT) 155
Maryland's Environment (WP) 155
Foolish Vaccine Exemptions (NYT) 156
Bad Salad (WP) 156
Doubting Inhofe (NYT) 157

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Ex-ATF Chief Had Staff Give Homework Aid (AP-Y) 157
Audit Critical Of Former ATF Director's Expenditures (USAT) 158
Report Criticizes Ex-ATF Chief (WP) 159
Ex-ATF Director Blamed For Unnecessary Upgrades (WT) 161
Federal Cases Land Four In Jail _ Foil Murder Plot (AP) 162
Arrests Foil Murder Plot, Feds Say (NOTP) 162
Hearing Set On Suit Over Plants Destroyed As Marijuana (AP) 163
Inside The Beltway (WT) 164
Doctor Will Remain In Prison Until Retrial (WP) 165
U.S. Cuts Economic Aid For Colombia Area (AP) 166
County Offers Reward In Accokeek Arson Inquiry (WP) 167
Proposal Urges Citizens To Arm For City Growth (NYT) 168

Immigration:

President Bush Reaffirms Support For A Fence On The Mexican Border (MCT) 169
Bush Vows To Build Fence (WT) 170

Congress-Administration:

Bush Proclaims Deficit Halved, Three Years Early (WT) 171
Federal Deficit Now Lowest In 4 Years (AP-Y) 172
President Sees Signs Favoring G.O.P. Victory (NYT) 173
U.S. Deficit Is Smallest In Four Years (LAT) 174
GOP Promotes News Of Lower Budget Deficit (USAT) 175
Bush Claims Victory Over Debt Reduction (FT) 176
Budget Deficit Shrinks On Strong Tax Receipts (WSJ) 176
Declining Debt (WSJ) 177
What Not To Wear In Front Of Bush (LAT) 178
Tony Snow Knows How To Work More Than One Room (WP) 178
AP Exclusive: Reid Got $1M In Land Sale (AP-Y) 180
Reid Got $1.1 Million In Land Sale (WT/AP) 183
Reid Land Deal Under Scrutiny (WP) 185
Senator Offers To Amend Financial Forms (NYT) 185
Speaker Duped By Evangelist? (RC) 186
Former Justice Descends Judicial Ladder, To Lower Court (NYT) 187
Medicare To Reassign Some Californians' Drug Plans (LAT) 188
Democrats Should Build On Bush's Drug Plan, Not Wreck It (RC) 190

DOJ_NMG_0079358

Scholarship Fund Gets A Big Check For Its 20th Birthday (WP) 191
America's Population Set To Top 300 Million (WP) 192
Robert D. Novak: Key Republicans Remain Addicted To Pork Barrel Gluttony (ULC) 194

Other News:

Fed Minutes: Unease About Inflation Lurks (USAT) 195
Fed Minutes Offer Little To Suggest Imminent Rate Cut (WSJ) 195
No Hurry To Cut Rates At The Fed (NYT) 196
Wall Street Down On Earnings Fears (FT) 197
Stocks Retreat Despite Drop In Oil Futures (WSJ) 198
OPEC Vows Output Cut, But Market Is Skeptical (WSJ) 198
First Lady Launches Four-state Campaign Swing (AP) 199
NRA Backs Both Sides Of Aisle (WSJ) 200
House GOP Revamps TV Ad Campaign Plans (NOVR) 201
The Fight For Congress: I've Seen This Movie Before (RC) 203
Will Voters Pull The Trigger? (WP) 204
Around Pentagon, Referendum On War (WP) 205
Talent, McCaskill Put Contrasts On Display During Debate (SLPD) 207
McCaskill Casts Self As Truman; Talent Claims She's Weak (KCS) 208
Big Sky Country Gets Smaller (WSJ) 209
2008: The Prequel (NYT) 210
A Gilded Path To Political Stardom, With Detours (NYT) 211
Governor Gets 'Tonight' Slot, So Rival Seeks Equal Time (NYT) 215
From Schwarzenegger, A Veto For Voters' Good (WP) 216
Judges Can Solicit Election Funds, Court Rules (NYT) 217
No Solo Talks With N. Korea, Bush Insists (LAT) 218
Retreating To Small Talk When The News Isn't So Good (WP) 220
Bush Focuses On Diplomacy With North Korea (MCT) 221
Bush Calls For Action On N. Korea (CHIT) 223
Powers Are Split Over How To Punish Pyongyang (WSJ) 224
China Says It Will Back Sanctions On N. Korea (WP) 225
U.S. Aims To Pass Resolution On N. Korea (AP) 227
Sanctions Would Focus On Blocking Weapons Exports (LAT) 228
China Still Values The Survival Of Communist Regime In North Korea (MCT) 229
Seoul Will Take Its Time Crafting A Response (WSJ) 230
UN Struggles To Agree On N Korea (FT) 231
Bush Faults Clinton Policy, But The Debate Is Complex (WP) 232
Japan Imposes Sanctions On N Korea (FT) 233
Japan Slaps Pyongyang With Trade Sanctions (WT) 234
Japanese Back Prime Minister In Handling Of Nuclear Crisis (NYT) 235
North Korea Warns Of More Nuclear Tests (NYT) 237
N. Korea's No. 2 Official Warns Of Further Tests (WP) 238
North Korea Threatens More Nuclear Tests (AP-Y) 239
Rice Says U.S. Will Not Invade N. Korea (AP-Y) 240
International Pressure Key To Pressure North Korea: Rumsfeld (AFP-Y) 242
Intelligence Failure Cited In Korean Crisis (WT) 242
Kim Jong-il's Suicide Watch (NYT) 243
The Squeeze On North Korea (WP) 244
A $2-Trillion Fiscal Hole (WSJ) 245
U.N. Disagrees On Sanctions Against Iran (AP) 246
U.S. To Let Spare Parts Be Sent To Iran (AP-Y) 247
U.S. To Sell Tehran Jet Parts (WT) 248
Overflights By Israel Said To Violate Truce (WP) 248
Rice: Palestinians Deserve Better Life (AP) 249
U.N. Notes Increase In Israel Roadblocks (AP) 250
US, Dominican Presidents To Discuss Stalled Free Trade Deal (AP) 251
U.S. Cuts Economic Aid For Colombia Area (AP) 251
China Makes Commitment To Social Harmony (NYT) 252
China's Party Leadership Declares New Priority: 'Harmonious Society' (WP) 254
Suffrage Timetable Left For Later (WP) 255
China Vs. My Husband (WP) 256
Rising Son For Chinese Tycoon, Solar Power Fuels Overnight Wealth (WSJ) 257
Europe Faces Threat Of Power Shortages (FT) 260
French Police Face Muslim 'Intifada' (WT) 260
Lawmakers Urge Denial To Mexico Of Bounty Hunter (WT) 261
Unprovoked Onslaught (WSJ) 262
The Age Of Impunity (NYT) 263
Reform Run Amok (WP) 264
Armies Of Children (NYT) 265

TERRORISM NEWS:

DOJ_NMG_0079359

SoCal Man Indicted On Federal Charges Of Aiding Al Qaeda (LAT)

By Greg Krikorian

The Los Angeles Times, October 12, 2006

A Southern California convert to Islam who has appeared in five incendiary Al Qaeda videos became the first American since the World War II era to be charged with treason, law enforcement sources said today.

In a federal grand jury indictment handed down in Orange County, Adam Yahiye Gadahn, 28, also was charged with providing material support for a terrorist group.

Gadahn, who is believed to be overseas, has emerged in recent months as the most significant American convert to radical Islam. Although he showed up on an Al Qaeda video in October 2004, it is his recent appearances with the terrorist organization's second-in-command, Ayman Al-Zawahiri, that has cemented his reputation as a significant new propagandist for terrorism.

As one senior U.S. official told The Times in recent days: "It is not some masked guy with a rifle saying, 'Death to America.' It is an American. And his target audience is the U.S."

In May 1997, Gadahn was arrested for allegedly attacking a well-known leader at the Islamic Society of Orange County in Garden Grove. He later pleaded guilty to a misdemeanor count of assault and battery.

By then, records and interviews show, Gadahn had become close to two radical Muslims who were followers of the radical cleric Sheik Omar Abdel Rahman, the so-called blind sheik who is serving a life sentence in federal prison for his role in the 1993 bombing at the World Trade Center.

Though FBI counterterrorism officials were aware of Gadahn for years, his name did not surface publicly until May 2004, when it was announced that they were seeking information on his whereabouts and considered him armed and dangerous. At the time, they said they believed that he had attended an Al Qaeda training camp in Afghanistan and worked as a translator for several of the organization's leaders, including senior lieutenant Abu Zebeida.

Months after the FBI announced its search for Gadahn, the CIA said it believed he was the menacing, masked figure making threats against the U.S. in a October 2004 videotaped message from Al Qaeda.

In that hourlong tape, released just before the U.S. presidential election, a young man hidden behind a head scarf identified himself as "Azzam the American" and said that American "streets will run red with blood."

"When his face was covered up, it initially worried people in the intelligence community," said the high-ranking U.S. law enforcement official. "Because we knew who it was and we figured he knew that ... so the question was whether it was a martyrdom tape."

That concern evaporated when Gadahn appeared in another video in September 2005 on the eve of the anniversary of the 9/11 attacks.

In that tape, he invoked the name of the most infamous Sept. 11 attacker, Mohammed Atta, and warned about new attacks in the U.S. and Australia.

"Yesterday, London and Madrid," he said, referring to two cities that had recently been bombed by terrorists. "Tomorrow, Los Angeles and Melbourne."

This past July, Gadahn appeared in a third video that also carried statements from Zawahiri and Al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden. In that video, Gadahn referred to the recent capture of two American servicemen in Iraq and said, among other things: "So after all the atrocities committed by America ... why should we target their military only?"

In the two most recent videos broadcast last month, Gadahn urged U.S. soldiers to "escape from the unbelieving Army and join the winning side." He later referred to the U.S. as "enemy soil."

"Adam Gadahn is a U.S. citizen who made a choice to join and act as a propagandist for Al Qaeda, an enemy of this country responsible for the horrific deaths of thousands of innocent Americans on Sept. 11, 2001," Deputy Atty. Gen. Paul J. McNulty said in a statement after the indictment was announced.

"The war on terror is a fight for hearts and minds, and Gadahn gave himself to our enemies in Al Qaeda for the purpose of being a central part of their propaganda machine. By making this choice, we believe Gadahn committed treason - perhaps the most serious offense for which any person can be tried under our Constitution."

DOJ_NMG_0079360

FBI Executive Assistant Director Willie Hulon of the National Security Branch added that Gadahn "represents a new breed of homegrown extremist, who has chosen to betray the country of his birth, and align with the Al Qaeda terrorist network."

U.S. Atty. Debra Wong Yang, whose Los Angeles office prosecuted the case, said: "By aligning himself with Al Qaeda, by moving overseas to be closer to Al Qaeda's base and leadership, and by joining in advocating Al Qaeda's terrorist agenda, an agenda that includes the overthrow of the United States government and the murder of American citizens, Adam Gadahn has committed treason against the United States of America.

She added: "The charges returned today by a federal grand jury demonstrate that the criminal justice system will not sit passively by while a United States citizen engages in such activities." Raised on a goat farm in rural Riverside County, Gadahn is the grandson of a Jewish doctor, Carl Pearlman. His father, Phillip, changed the family name to Gadahn before Adam was born.

In a November 1995 Web posting, the then 17-year-old Gadahn wrote that his father grew up agnostic or atheist but "became a believer in one God when he picked up a Bible left on the beach." He also said his father was a butcher, who slaughtered animals according to Islamic dietary practices and sold the meat to an Islamic food mart in downtown Los Angeles.

Gadahn said that his mother was raised Catholic and leaned toward Christianity and that he and his siblings were schooled at home. After exposure to various religions and a period where he was admittedly "obsessed" with demonic music, Gadahn said in the 1995 Web posting that his spiritual quest ended with his conversion to Islam.

"Having been around Muslims in my formative years," he wrote as convert Yahiye Adam Gadahn, "I knew well that they were not the bloodthirsty, barbaric terrorists that the news media and the televangelists paint them to be."

Within two years of that statement, Gadahn had gone from a pious Muslim to an unabashed extremist. It was a transformation that propelled him onto the list of the FBI's most wanted terrorists.

The Justice Department said that a treason charge carries penalties ranging from five years in prison to the death sentence. The charge of providing material support to a designated foreign terrorist organization is punishable by up to 15 years in prison.

American In Videos Charged With Treason (USAT)

By Kevin Johnson

USA Today, October 12, 2006

WASHINGTON — A 28-year-old American who has appeared in a series of propaganda videos linked to al-Qaeda was indicted Wednesday on terror-related charges, including treason. It marked the first time the U.S. government has brought such a treason case in more than 50 years, the Justice Department said.

Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty said Adam Gadahn, introduced in a 2004 al-Qaeda video as “Azzam the American,” betrayed the USA and faces a possible death sentence for allegedly joining Osama bin Laden's network.

The announcement was the latest chapter in Gadahn's journey from a Southern California convert to Islam to one of the world's most wanted terrorism suspects. Gadahn, who McNulty said is believed to be hiding in Pakistan, is accused of encouraging attacks against the USA in at least five al-Qaeda videotapes, beginning in October 2004.

In the first video, court papers say, Gadahn declared allegiance to al-Qaeda and warned that America would “have to pay for its crimes. … The magnitude and ferocity of what is coming your way will make you forget all about Sept. 11. The streets of America shall run red with blood … and the next wave of attacks may come at any moment.”

McNulty suggested that the increasingly significant role Gadahn has appeared to play in encouraging attacks and recruiting for al-Qaeda warranted the treason charge. The government rarely pursues treason charges, in part because they are difficult to prove.

Under U.S. law, proving treason requires the testimony of two witnesses who saw the accused perform an “overt act” of treason, or a confession by the accused in court. It's unclear how prosecutors would prove treason in Gadahn's case, if he is caught and tried. However, McNulty suggested the videos offer compelling evidence.

“A charge of treason is exceptionally severe,” he said during a briefing. “It is not done lightly. This is the right case.”

DOJ_NMG_0079361

In the most recent al-Qaeda video featuring Gadahn, released last month, he called the USA "enemy soil" and praised the 9/11 suicide hijackers. In a separate video earlier in September, Ayman al-Zawahiri, bin Laden's top aide, called Gadahn "our brother Azzam the American," court papers say.

McNulty said the government had no evidence that Gadahn had helped to plan or carry out any attacks. However, FBI Executive Assistant Director Willie Hulon said Gadahn represents a threat "as a communicator for al-Qaeda."

Gadahn is one of the FBI's most wanted terrorism suspects. There is a $1 million reward for information resulting in his capture.

The Justice Department said Gadahn, who also faces charges of providing material support to a terrorist organization, was the first U.S. citizen to be charged with treason since Tomoya Kawakita in 1952. Kawakita was sentenced to death for helping the Japanese and abusing U.S. prisoners of war during World War II. His sentence later was commuted, and he was deported to Japan.

Treason Charge For California Man Seen In Al Qaeda Videos (CHIT)

By Andrew Zajac

Chicago Tribune, October 12, 2006

WASHINGTON -- A 28-year-old California man who has appeared in five Al Qaeda propaganda videos was charged with treason Wednesday, becoming the first U.S. citizen charged with the offense since World War II.

Adam Gadahn, also known as Azzam al-Amriki or Azzam the American, "gave Al Qaeda aid and comfort…with intent to betray the United States" through his appearances in the videos, including two released last month by the terror network, according to an indictment handed up by a grand jury in Orange County, Calif.

Gadahn, who could face the death penalty if convicted, is at large and believed to be in Pakistan. As a result of the charges, which also include providing material support to the terrorist group, Gadahn's name was added to the FBI's terrorist most wanted list and a $1 million bounty was offered for his capture.

Deputy Atty. Gen. Paul McNulty, who announced the indictment at the Justice Department, acknowledged that Gadahn is not charged with planning to attack the U.S., but solely with serving as a propagandist.

"This is a very significant piece of the way the enemy does business: to demoralize the troops, to encourage the spread of fear," McNulty said.

Gadahn originally had been charged in a sealed indictment in October 2005.

An American-born convert to Islam, Gadahn has been publicly linked to Al Qaeda by the FBI since mid-2004.

The decision to publicly detail a new set of charges against Gadahn resulted from stronger evidence against him gleaned from the three videos he made this year, and a desire "to discourage anybody else who might be tempted…to join Al Qaeda," McNulty said.

Asked to address skeptics who might view the timing of the indictment as intended to influence the Nov. 7 congressional elections, McNulty said it was driven by the evidence and was "in the best interests of the American people."

The U.S. has rarely brought treason charges, in part because the Constitution requires two witnesses to corroborate it, said Jonathan Hafetz, of New York's Brennan Center for Law and Justice.

"It's difficult to prove, and there are other statutes that can be used against alleged terrorists," said Hafetz, who represents terror war detainees at the Guantanamo Bay Naval Station in Cuba.

One of the last treason cases involved Iva Toguri, an American who in 1949 was convicted on what proved to be coerced evidence of being a voice of the Japanese government's "Tokyo Rose" during World War II.

After reporters unearthed the coercion, President Gerald Ford pardoned Toguri in 1977. She died last month in Chicago.

American In Qaeda Tapes Accused Of Treason (NYT)

By Eric Lichtblau

The New York Times, October 12, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0079362

WASHINGTON, Oct. 11 — The Justice Department on Wednesday charged an American with treason for the first time in more than a half-century, accusing a former Southern California man of giving "aid and comfort" to Al Qaeda by appearing in a series of highly publicized videotapes urging violence against the United States.

At the same time, the State Department posted a $1 million reward for information leading to the capture of the man, Adam Yahiye Gadahn, 28. A convert to Islam who left the United States in the late 1990's, Mr. Gadahn is the leading American fugitive linked to Al Qaeda.

The Federal Bureau of Investigation has been looking for Mr. Gadahn, who is believed to be in hiding in Pakistan, since 2004.

American officials said he has appeared in three Qaeda videos since July, and five total. In the most recent, a tape released on the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11 attacks, he praised the hijackers and declared the United States "enemy soil." In a videotape released last month that was apparently taped in Pakistan, Mr. Gadahn was introduced by Ayman al-Zawahri, the second-in-command of Al Qaeda.

"Escape from the unbelieving army and join the winning side," Mr. Gadahn said. "Time is running out, so make the right choice before it's too late and you meet the dismal fate of thousands before you."

American officials said that Mr. Gadahn had become an important propagandist for Al Qaeda.

The young man "chose to join our enemy and to provide it with aid and comfort by acting as a propagandist for Al Qaeda," said Paul J. McNulty, the deputy attorney general, in announcing the charges.

Mr. Gadahn was secretly charged some months ago in a sealed indictment in a federal court in Southern California, and a grand jury returned a superseding indictment on Wednesday. Mr. McNulty said the decision to bring new charges and announce them publicly was driven not by election-year politics but by the frequency and stridence of the recent videotapes.

"It's time now to get the message out to get this person in our custody," he said.

Officials said they had no indication that Mr. Gadahn had taken part in the actual planning or execution of terrorist attacks. A charge of treason, which carries a possible death sentence, requires the testimony of two witnesses, a standard of proof so high, officials said, that no treason charges have been brought since the World War II era.

The last treason charges on record, Justice Department officials said, were brought against Tomoya Kawakita, an American-born man convicted in 1952 of moving to Japan and aiding the Japanese war effort. Hans Haupt, the father of a German saboteur, was convicted of treason in 1943, and Anthony Cramer was accused of aiding a German saboteur in 1945. While Mr. Kawakita's treason conviction was upheld, the cases against Mr. Haupt and Mr. Cramer were overturned on appeal by the Supreme Court.

With Mr. Gadahn, "there's a real issue here as to whether they have met the two witnesses requirement," said Peter S. Margulies, a law professor at Roger Williams University who studies terrorism prosecutions. "You need witnesses who are actually familiar with the terms of cooperation of the person charged — whether they were coerced, whether they were paid — and that seems to be lacking here in this case."

Mr. Gadahn grew up in a rural part of Southern California in Riverside County, the son of a goat farmer who slaughtered animals according to Muslim religious practices so he could sell the meat in an Arabic market in Los Angeles.

Mr. Gadahn, then an avowed pacifist, converted to Islam in the mid-1990's and worked in a mosque in Orange County, south of Los Angeles. In an essay posted on the Internet while he was apparently still living in the United States, he wrote: "Having been around Muslims in my formative years, I knew well that they were not the bloodthirsty, barbaric terrorists that the news media and the televangelists paint them to be."

But in the late 1990's, he left the United States for Pakistan to study and work among Muslims, and American officials say his views became more radical. By 2004, he was making public videotapes for Al Qaeda, officials say, and declaring that "the streets of America shall run red with blood."

U.S. Supporter Of Al-Qaeda Is Indicted On Treason Charge (WP)

By Dan Eggen And Karen Deyoung

The Washington Post, October 12, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0079363

A California native who has appeared in al-Qaeda propaganda videos has been indicted for treason, making him the first American to be charged with that crime in half a century, the Justice Department announced yesterday.

Adam Gadahn, a 28-year-old fugitive believed to be living in Pakistan, could be sentenced to death if convicted of treason, which has been alleged only about 30 times in U.S. history and has not been used since the aftermath of World War II.

Gadahn, allegedly "gave al Qaeda aid and comfort . . . with intent to betray the United States" by appearing in videos calling for attacks on U.S. targets, according to the indictment, which was handed up by a federal grand jury in Santa Ana, Calif. Gadahn is also charged with providing material support to terrorists, which carries a penalty of up to 15 years in prison.

Gadahn was also added to the FBI's official list of "Most Wanted Terrorists," officials said.

In a Washington news conference announcing the charges, Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty said that the treason charge "is not one that we bring lightly" but that "this is the right case for this charge."

"Adam Gadahn is an American citizen who made a choice -- he chose to join our enemy and to provide it with aid and comfort by acting as a propagandist for al-Qaeda," McNulty said, adding later: "Today's indictment should serve as notice that the United States will protect itself against all enemies, foreign and domestic. . . . Betrayal of our country will bring severe consequences."

McNulty said the government had no information indicating that Gadahn was directly involved in planning or carrying out terrorist attacks.

The treatment of Gadahn is notably different from the Justice Department's approach to other U.S. citizens accused of working on behalf of al-Qaeda since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, who have been charged with lesser crimes than treason or have been designated as enemy combatants outside the normal criminal justice system.

California native John Walker Lindh, for example, was sentenced to 20 years in prison for providing support to al-Qaeda and aiding the Taliban in Afghanistan. Former Chicago gang member Jose Padilla was held as an enemy combatant for years and now faces charges in Miami of participating in a North American terrorist cell and traveling to the Middle East for military training.

McNulty dismissed questions from reporters about the timing of the indictment, which comes as the Bush administration and other Republicans are seeking to focus attention on national security issues for the midterm elections. McNulty said that authorities are concerned over the growing number of videos from Gadahn and hope to use publicity to capture him. He added that the latest video finally provided enough evidence for him to be indicted. A previous indictment against Gadahn, without the treason charge, had been sealed.

One of the offenses alleged in the new indictment occurred "on or about Sept. 11, 2006," when Gadahn appeared in an al-Qaeda video montage released to mark the fifth anniversary of the attacks. He had made a far longer and more substantive appearance on Sept. 2, in a production titled "An Invitation to Islam," which made a direct appeal to American soldiers and citizens to turn against their government.

Gadahn publicly emerged as a terrorism suspect in May 2004, when FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III and then-Attorney General John Ashcroft named him in a press conference as one of seven alleged al-Qaeda agents planning imminent attacks on the United States. Relatives in Southern California's Riverside County expressed astonishment that the young man named Adam Pearlman, who had converted to Islam in 1995 and moved to Pakistan in 1998, was the same person who appeared in a terrorism video that month with his face wrapped in a kaffiyeh, and who provided English-language voice-over for Osama bin Laden.

Gadahn was born in Northern California and moved south with his parents at a young age to a wooden cabin in rural Riverside, southeast of Los Angeles, where the family operated a goat farm. According to relatives interviewed in 2004, he grew into a teenager enamored of heavy-metal music and, eventually, Islam.

In addition to his May 2004 video debut, he appeared in a video on the eve of the fourth anniversary of the Sept. 11 attacks. This time, his face was only partially covered, and he was identified on the tape as "Azzam the American." The American people, he said, could expect "unpleasant consequences" if they continued to support their government.

DOJ_NMG_0079364

The last person convicted of treason was Tomoya Kawakita, a Japanese American sentenced to death in 1952 for tormenting American prisoners of war during World War II; President Dwight D. Eisenhower commuted his sentence to life imprisonment.

The Gadahn case bears at least surface similarities to the prosecution of "Tokyo Rose," the Japanese propagandist convicted of treason in 1949. It later emerged, however, that she had secretly plotted against Japan, prompting President Gerald R. Ford to pardon her.

American In Al Qaeda Charged With Treason (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, October 12, 2006

A federal grand jury in Los Angeles yesterday indicted a self-proclaimed American jihadist and al Qaeda operative on charges of treason and aiding terrorists.

Adam Yehiye Gadahn, 28, who has become an English-language spokesman for al Qaeda and has appeared in terrorist propaganda films, has been sought by the FBI since 2004. He is thought to be in Pakistan, where authorities think he attended al Qaeda training camps.

Gadahn has become known by his nom de guerre, Azzam al-Amriki, or "Azzam the American."

In May 2004, Attorney General John Ashcroft described Gadahn as one of seven al Qaeda members who were planning to strike new targets in this country during the summer and fall.

Citing "credible intelligence from multiple sources," Mr. Ashcroft said the seven operatives -- some of whom were thought to be in this country -- intended to "hit the United States hard." He said they "posed a clear and present danger to America."

In a 48-minute al Qaeda video released last month, Gadahn called on non-Muslims -- especially those in the United States -- to convert to Islam.

"To Americans and the rest of Christendom, we say either repent misguided ways and enter into the light of truth or keep your poison to yourself and suffer the consequences in this world and the next," he said in English while dressed in a white turban and seated in front of a computer and books.

Al Qaeda's second-in-command, Ayman al-Zawahri, made a brief statement at the beginning of the tape, urging viewers to listen carefully to the message, which was titled "An Invitation to Islam."

It was the second time that Gadahn has appeared in a video with al-Zawahri. In a July 7 video marking the first anniversary of the terror attack on London commuters, Gadahn appeared briefly, saying no Muslim should "shed tears" for Westerners killed in al Qaeda attacks.

Gadahn -- who was raised on a Riverside, Calif., goat farm and is of Jewish descent -- also is thought to be the masked man in two videos not officially from al Qaeda. One was given to ABC television in 2004, and the network received another a few days before the fourth anniversary of the September 11 attacks.

Authorities said that after the ABC broadcast, a member of Gadahn's mosque in California told the FBI that he thought the man in the video was Gadahn. In the 2005 video, the American identified by U.S. intelligence officials as Gadahn criticized U.S. foreign policy and military activity, particularly in Iraq and Afghanistan, and said there could be more al Qaeda attacks.

"Yesterday, London and Madrid. Tomorrow, Los Angeles and Melbourne, God willing. At this time, don't count on us demonstrating restraint or compassion," the man said.

Authorities said Gadahn converted to Islam and worshipped at the Islamic Society of Orange County in 1997 before being expelled for attacking one of its leaders. In 2004, he was added to the FBI's "Seeking Information -- War on Terrorism list," on which he remains.

They said Gadahn is the son of musician Phil Pearlman, who changed his surname before Adam's birth. His grandfather, Carl Pearlman, was a prominent surgeon and on the board of directors of the Anti-Defamation League.

U.S. Indicts American In Al-Qaida Video (AP)

By Jeremiah Marquez, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 12, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0079365

The charge of treason was used for the first time in the United States' war on terrorism Wednesday, filed against a California man who appeared in propaganda videos for al-Qaida.

Adam Yehiye Gadahn, 28, could be sentenced to death if convicted of the charge, which has been used only a few dozen times in U.S. history and not at all since the World War II era. He also was indicted on a charge of providing material support to terrorists.

Gadahn "knowingly adhered to an enemy of the United States, namely, al-Qaida, and gave al-Qaida aid and comfort ... with intent to betray the United States," according to the indictment, handed up by an Orange County grand jury.

The suspected al-Qaida operative has been sought by the FBI since 2004. Based on the indictment, the FBI added Gadahn to its list of most wanted terrorists and offered a $1 million reward for information leading to his arrest or conviction.

Gadahn, who is believed to be in or near Pakistan, is suspected of having attended the terrorist group's training camps in Pakistan and serving as one of its translators. He has become known by his nom de guerre, Azzam al-Amriki, or "Azzam the American."

Gadahn appeared last month in a 48-minute video along with al-Qaida's No. 2 leader, Ayman al-Zawahri, calling on his countrymen to convert to Islam and for U.S. soldiers to switch sides in the Iraq and Afghan wars.

It was the second time he appeared in the same video with al-Zawahri. In a July 7 video marking the one-year anniversary of the terror attack on London commuters, Gadahn appeared briefly, saying no Muslim should "shed tears" for Westerners killed by al-Qaida attacks.

Beyond that, authorities believe he is the masked figure who appeared in two previous videos from al-Qaida, one given to ABC television in 2004 and another a few days before the fourth anniversary of the Sept. 11 attacks.

According to the indictment, Gadahn announced in the 2004 video that he had joined al-Qaida, "a movement waging war on America and killing large numbers of Americans."

"Fighting and defeating America is our first priority," he said, according to the indictment. "... The streets of America shall run red with blood."

The treason charge carries penalties ranging from a five-year prison sentence to the death penalty, while the charge of providing material support to a designated foreign terrorist organization carries a possible 15-year sentence.

Raised in Southern California on a Riverside goat farm, Gadahn converted to Islam and worshipped at the Islamic Society of Orange County in 1997 before being expelled for attacking one of its leaders.

His mother last spoke to him by phone in March 2001. At the time he was in Pakistan, working at a newspaper, and his wife was getting ready to have a child.

Gadahn's aunt, Nancy Pearlman, declined to comment.

Associated Press writer Lara Jakes Jordan contributed to this story from Washington.

American Al-Qaeda Member Gadahn Charged With Treason (Update1) (BLOOM)

By Robert Schmidt

Bloomberg, October 12, 2006

Oct. 11 (Bloomberg) -- Adam Gadahn, a U.S.-born member of the al-Qaeda terrorist group, was indicted on a treason charge by a federal grand jury in Santa Ana, California.

Gadahn, whose last known address was in Orange County, California, is considered a fugitive and is believed to be living in Pakistan, the Justice Department said. He is the first American to be charged with treason since the World War II era, the department said.

``A charge of treason is exceptionally severe and it is not one we bring lightly," said Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty at a news conference in Washington. ``But this is the right case for this charge."

Gadahn, 28, has appeared in five videotapes distributed by al-Qaeda, including two last month, making threats against the U.S., according to the indictment. He calls himself ``Azzam the American."

DOJ_NMG_0079366

In the first video in 2004, Gadahn said he had joined al- Qaeda and pledged that ``the streets of America shall run red with blood." His most recent message was timed to coincide with the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11 attacks, prosecutors said. On the tape, Gadahn praised the pilots involved and called the U.S. ``enemy soil."

Authorities announced a $1 million reward for information leading to Gadahn's arrest or conviction. The Federal Bureau of Investigation also placed him on its list of most wanted terrorists.

The indictment, which supersedes previous charges filed under seal, also accuses Gadahn of providing material support to terrorists. The charge of treason carries a maximum penalty of death.

Al-Qaida Spokesman Indicted For Treason (UPI)

UPI, October 12, 2006

A U.S. citizen believed to be a fugitive in Pakistan was indicted in California Wednesday on charges of treason and aiding al-Qaida.

The U.S. Justice Department said Adam Gadahn, 28, is the first U.S. citizen charged with treason since the World War II era. A conviction on treason carries penalties up to the death penalty.

Gadahn, a former Orange County, Calif., resident, is also known as Azzam al-Amriki or Azzam the American. Of Jewish-American ancestry, he converted to Islam as a teenager. He has been out of the country since 1998.

He appeared in several videotapes broadcast between October 2004 and Sept. 11 of this year, the department said. In the first tape, Gadahn said he had joined al-Qaida, and that "the streets of America shall run red with blood."

Al-Qaida has taken responsibility for the Sept. 11, 2006, terror attacks on the World Trade Center in New York and the Pentagon near Washington.

In September 2005, Gadahn called the attacks "the blessed raids," referred to other attacks and said, "Tomorrow, Los Angeles and Melbourne, Allah willing."

Earlier this summer, Gadahn appeared in another videotape that also contained statements from Osama bin Laden and Ayman al-Zawahiri.

The indictment was handed down in Santa Ana, Calif.

US Files First Treason Charges In 50 Years Against Accused Al-Qaida Member (VOA)

Voice of America, October 12, 2006

U.S. prosecutors have filed treason charges against an American citizen for the first time in 50 years.

Justice Department accuses 28-year-old alleged al-Qaida member Adam Gadahn of treason, which carries a maximum penalty of death. He also is charged with providing material support to a terrorist group.

Prosecutors say Gadahn is a California-born convert to Islam who appears in several al-Qaida propaganda videos. Some of those videos have threatened attacks against the United States and have contained messages from top al-Qaida official Ayman al-Zawahri.

Gadahn is believed to be living in Pakistan and has been sought by the FBI for questioning since May 2004. His parents say he converted in Islam in his late teens in the 1990s and later moved to Pakistan.

Terror Funding Trial Set To Begin (CHIT)

By Rudolph Bush, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, October 12, 2006

After winning a series of key pretrial battles, federal prosecutors say they will lay out a "crush of evidence" against a Bridgeview businessman accused of funding terrorism as a member of the militant Islamic Palestinian group Hamas.

Attorneys for Muhammad Salah, meanwhile, argue that the government—which has dropped a key charge and decided not to call its main witness—is left with a gutted case hinged on a coerced confession.

The trial of Salah and his co-defendant Abdelhaleem Ashqar begins Thursday with jury selection. A conviction would be a significant win for the Bush administration, which in 2004 announced the men's indictment as a legal battle in the war on terror.

DOJ_NMG_0079367

The prosecution has withstood several challenges to its case by Salah's lawyers and won two major victories. The defense has had to accept that jurors will see details of a 1993 confession Salah provided to Israeli agents. And the trial will involve the testimony of disguised and anonymous Israeli agents in a closed courtroom.

Similar terrorism cases involving the funding of foreign extremist groups have caused trouble for prosecutors and the courts, experts say. At this point, U.S. law isn't fully equipped to deal with the unusual circumstances of such cases, said Karen Greenberg, executive director at the Center on Law and Security at New York University Law School.

"Since [the terrorist attacks of] 9/11, the need to coordinate court systems globally is of paramount importance, and what this case is doing is trying to make that happen," said Greenberg.

In 1993, when Salah was arrested in Israel and confessed to authorities there, coercive interrogation tactics were a legal practice. Salah's lawyers argued unsuccessfully that the confession should not be permitted in a U.S. court.

How jurors interpret what happened to Salah while he was in Israeli custody could well spell the difference between conviction and acquittal.

Although prosecutors have suffered some widely publicized setbacks in similar cases, they have achieved considerable success, said Bobby Chesney, a law professor at Wake Forest University Law School in North Carolina and an expert in terror cases.

"Numerically speaking, the government is winning far more often than it is losing," he said.

For example, the case of Florida professor Sami Al-Arian— widely reported as a loss when a jury hung on many of the charges—actually ended in prosecutors' favor when he pleaded guilty to lesser charges and was ordered deported from the U.S., Chesney said.

Among defendants in terrorism trials, however, Salah is unique. He is both a U.S. citizen and a "specially designated terrorist," according to the U.S. government.

From 1993 to 1997, Salah was jailed in Israel after he was convicted in a military court of being a Hamas leader who carried funds to the occupied territories. He was allowed to return to Bridgeview in 1997, already dubbed a terrorist by the U.S. and lived freely, albeit under investigation, until his arrest in 2004.

The U.S. alleges that since 1988, Salah and Ashqar conspired to aid Hamas and obstructed justice. Salah is accused of being a top Hamas leader, an "outside" member who used his U.S. citizenship to travel the globe and deliver money to Hamas operatives for the purchase of weapons.

Ashqar is accused of being an archivist for the group who collected key documents and helped staged a 1993 "convention" of Hamas leaders in the U.S. A third man, Mousa Mohammed Marzook, is also accused in the case of supplying aid to Hamas while in the U.S. during the 1980s and 1990s.

The head of Hamas' political bureau and one the group's highest-ranking members, Marzook is a fugitive living in Syria, where Hamas is headquartered. The group has controlled the Palestinian government since February.

Unlike Marzook and Ashqar, Salah has been the subject of considerable publicity since his arrest by Israeli authorities at a checkpoint in the Gaza Strip in 1993.

Born in a suburb of Jerusalem in 1953, Salah moved to the U.S. in 1971 "for many reasons," according to his wife, Maryam.

He became a citizen in the mid-1970s, married his wife, a native of Iran, and over the years became involved in a number of businesses, including a grocery and a car dealership.

The father of five children and a deeply religious man, Salah has been a longtime active member of the Bridgeview Mosque, located not far from his home.

Prosecutors charge it was at the mosque where a religious leader recruited Salah into Hamas. He joined the group in 1988, the year it was formed with a charter that espoused violence and embraced the destruction of Israel, prosecutors allege.

According to the charges, beginning in 1989, Salah began traveling between the United States, England and the Palestinian territories to deliver money to Hamas operatives.

His last trip, in January 1993, led to his arrest. According to an FBI affidavit, he was carrying $97,000 in cash.

DOJ_NMG_0079368

Salah's attorneys have argued that he was not providing funds to support violence. They have also pointed out that, at the time of his arrest, it was not illegal in the U.S. to provide funds to Hamas. The U.S. government did not designate the group a terrorist organization until 1995.

After nearly two months in custody and under regular interrogation, Salah provided a detailed confession to Israeli agents acknowledging he was a leader of Hamas who provided money to militants.

His confession is replete with names of other Hamas operatives and details of their activities. Journalist Judith Miller also viewed a portion of his interrogation and wrote about it in the New York Times and a book about militancy in the Middle East.

Salah's attorney, Michael Deutsch, fought earlier this year to keep the confession out of the trial, arguing it was coerced.

But U.S. District Judge Amy St. Eve decided to let jurors see it after she heard testimony from two anonymous Israeli agents in a courtroom closed to the public.

Deutsch intends to convince jurors that Salah provided statements to Israeli agents after he was deprived of sleep, forced to sit in painful positions and put under other extreme stress.

He is also expected to call into question whether Salah provided all of the information in his confession. Some of the statements he signed were in Hebrew, a language he does not speak or write, Deutsch argued.

While Salah is accused of supporting Hamas through the time of his arrest in 2004, much of the evidence in the trial is likely to date to the early 1990s and late 1980s, when prosecutors allege Salah personally transferred funds from his bank account in the U.S. to Hamas.

The fight over Salah's innocence or guilt has already reached a fever pitch with the defense accusing prosecutors of misconduct and prosecutors responding that the defense is desperate to cast attention away from their client's deeds.

Maryam Salah, meanwhile, wrote in a brief note to the Tribune that she and her husband are preparing for trial by seeking to protect their children from its impact.

"The truth will eventually prevail—my hope is that it is in my lifetime," she wrote.

rrbush@tribune.com

German Court To Weigh Whether To Retry Moroccan On Terror Charges (MCT)

By Matthew Schofield

McClatchy Newspapers, October 12, 2006

HAMBURG, Germany - There's no dispute that Mounir el Motassadeq was close to the men who carried out the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks on the Pentagon and the World Trade Center.

He spent three months at an al-Qaida training camp in Afghanistan. He lived near lead hijacker Mohammed Atta in Hamburg, Germany, and signed as the witness to Atta's will. He held power of attorney over the bank account of another hijacker, Marwan al Shehhi. He transferred $2,500 to plotter Ramzi Binalshib. He even sent money to the United States used to help finance the hijackers' pilot training.

German authorities charged him with 3,066 counts of accessory to murder, and in February 2003, he was convicted - the first person to stand trial for the Sept. 11 attacks.

But that conviction was overturned by a German appeals court in 2004. Earlier this year, he was ordered released pending resolution of the appeals.

Now Motassadeq, who is free on bond, is about to learn whether U.S. security policy will help him walk away from criminal charges in the worst terrorist attack in American history.

A German court on Thursday will begin a hearing into whether the accessory to murder charges should be restored. The German government is seeking a third trial in the matter. Among the issues is whether the United States will allow German attorneys to question two key figures in the Sept. 11 plot - alleged mastermind Khalid Sheikh Mohammed and co-conspirator Ramzi Binalshib.

At the time of Motassadeq's trials and appeals, Mohammed and Binalshib were being held in secret at an undisclosed location by the Central Intelligence Agency. Despite two visits to the United States by the German prosecutor, U.S. officials declined to make the two men available for questioning.

DOJ_NMG_0079369

But in September, Mohammed and Binalshib were transferred to U.S. military custody and are now being held openly with other terrorist suspects at the U.S. naval station at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

Representatives of the International Committee of the Red Cross have traveled there to talk to the men, and U.S. military attorneys will soon be appointed to represent them under a just-passed law authorizing the Bush administration to try them and other terror suspects before military tribunals.

It's unclear, however, whether the military will make Mohammed and Binalshib available to assist in Motassadeq's case. The German prosecutor's office won't comment on whether it will renew efforts to question them - German law forbids prosecutors from commenting outside of court - and spokesmen for both the U.S. Justice Department and the Pentagon said they had no information on the subject.

German prosecutors, however, say they'll ask the court to reinstate the accessory to murder charges. They'll argue that even though Motassedeq may not have known precisely when and what Atta and his companions were planning, he knew enough to be found guilty of helping them.

"We have reason to come back to the accessory to murder charges dismissed in the previous trial," said one prosecutor on condition of anonymity. "What needs to be clarified is to what degree is someone involved who may not have known the venue, time and dimension of the planned crime, but was aware of the plan being made."

Whether testimony from Mohammed and Binalshib would help prosecutors convict Motassadeq is unclear - one of the issues in this case is that he claims it would clear him.

Mohammed is believed to have first suggested the hijacking plan to Osama bin Laden. Binalshib, who roomed with Atta in Hamburg, is suspected of becoming the plot's principal logistician after the U.S. refused him a visa, eliminating him as a potential hijacker.

Motassadeq says their testimony will show that he knew little of the plot. His first trial statements that the CIA delivered to the prosecutors appeared to confirm this.

Even so, the court refused to accept the statements after Motassadeq's attorney suggested they might have been the result of torture. U.S. officials declined then to discuss the conditions under which the two men were questioned, and an FBI agent, Matthew Walsh, didn't help the case when he was dispatched to testify.

At the time, the judge expressed frustration that Walsh "was not particularly helpful" as he primarily testified that information sought in the case was "not available" or that he was "not authorized to answer such questions."

Any future German questioning of Mohammed and Binalshib would be likely also to focus on how they were treated during the years they were held by the CIA. In announcing their transfer to military custody, President Bush acknowledged that both had been subjected to harsh interrogation practices. The United States has insisted that the interrogation techniques did not amount to torture, but Bush administration officials have refused to say what those techniques were.

Meanwhile, the former German prosecutor, Kay Nehm, who twice flew to the United States in an effort to win U.S. cooperation in prosecuting Motassadeq, has expressed frustration at the U.S. attitude.

"You have to differentiate between justice and secret services," he recently told Der Spiegel magazine, referring to the CIA. "Apparently, the secret services' interests have priority there. They were not primarily interested in the judicial investigation of the terror attacks."

And Motassadeq's attorney is predicting that in a relatively short period of time his client will be free of all charges - either in Germany or more likely in his native country, Morocco.

Gerhard Strate, whose office walls are covered by photo-realist cityscapes of New York, said he expects his client's conviction on charges of membership in a terrorist organization will stand ("The case has been very well made," he explained.)

That conviction came in a second trial after the first case was overturned where prosecutors showed that Motassadeq had ties to both Atta, who was at the controls of American Airlines Flight 11 when it crashed into the World Trade Center's north tower, and Shehhi, who was piloting United Flight 175 when it struck the south tower moments later.

In addition, prosecutors presented evidence that Motassadeq trained at an al-Qaida camp in 2000 and that he arrived in Germany to study engineering in 1993 - the same year Atta enrolled at the Technical University of Hamburg-Harburg.

DOJ_NMG_0079370

But Strate, one of Germany's best known defense attorneys, said none of that proves that his client was involved in the Sept. 11 plot, though he stops short of saying that his client should be declared innocent. "Let's say, rather, that they do not have sufficient evidence in this matter," he said.

Without better evidence tying him to knowledge of the plot, Strate predicts that at worst his client will serve a few years of the seven-year sentence he was given on the membership conviction and then be expelled from Germany for overstaying his expired student visa. Because of this, while Motassadeq is free in Hamburg, he is not able to work or study. Strate said that he is limited to waiting for the final decision in this case.

"It is possible he will have to spend time in prison here, on the existing sentence, before he is expelled," he said. "But the accessory to murder charge still appears to lack the necessary evidence."

As for the German prosecutors who have pursued this case, this is expected to be their last chance to make the Sept. 11 charges stick.

Texas Man Sentenced For Dealings With Terrorist (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, October 12, 2006

(AP) - DALLAS-The former chief executive of a computer company was sentenced Wednesday to seven years in prison for funneling money to an official of the militant Palestinian group Hamas.

Bayan Elashi and two of his brothers were convicted last year in federal district court of financial dealings with a terrorist.

Prosecutors said the men tried to hide a $250,000 (â‚¬200,000) investment in their Richardson computer company by the Hamas official, Mousa Abu Marzook, by making it look like his wife's money.

Judge Sam A. Lindsay is scheduled to sentence Ghassan Elashi on Thursday. A jury found Ghassan and Bayan Elashi guilty on 21 counts of conspiracy, money laundering and dealing in property of a terrorist.

Basman Elashi, who was found guilty on three conspiracy counts, was scheduled for sentencing Friday.

Lawyers for the Elashis argued during the trial that the transactions were business deals with Marzook, who was married to the Elashis' cousin.

Marzook and his wife were also indicted but never captured. Marzook was deported from the United States in 1995, when the federal government named him a terrorist. He is believed to be living in Syria.

The Elashis were active in the Holy Land Foundation for Relief and Development, a Muslim charity that was shut down in 2001 after the government accused it of funneling more than $12 million (â‚¬9.6 million) to Hamas. Holy Land and several of its officials, including Ghassan Elashi, are scheduled to go on trial in February in federal court in Dallas.

The Elashis and two of their brothers also were convicted in 2004 of conspiring to ship technology to countries that the U.S. government considers supporters of terrorism.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

An Anthrax Blackout (RC)

By Paul Kane

Roll Call, October 12, 2006

The FBI has completely shut Congress out of its now five-year investigation into anthrax attacks on Capitol Hill and around the nation, with accusations flying up and down Pennsylvania Avenue about the probe into the worst biochemical attacks in U.S. history.

The FBI and Justice Department have not briefed two key players in the attacks — former Sen. Tom Daschle (D-S.D.) and Sen. Patrick Leahy (D-Vt.), the Senators who were targeted by anthrax-laden letters — in at least two and a half years. Other Members involved in the attacks, such as Rep. Rush Holt (D-N.J.), whose district was home to the postal box where the letters originated, have gone three and a half years without receiving any briefings or updates.

DOJ_NMG_0079371

And Senate Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), who took over the panel in 2005 after the FBI began withholding information from the Hill, has never been briefed about the status of the investigation into terrorist attacks that left five people dead and dozens of others injured or facing lengthy courses of dangerous drug therapy.

Late last month, in a letter to Holt, the bureau officially stated that it has been withholding all information about the attacks from Congress because of alleged leaks to the media following briefings on the Hill. The FBI laid the blame for the blackout squarely at the feet of current and former Members and their staffs from briefings that apparently occurred in 2003.

"After sensitive information about the investigation citing Congressional sources was reported in the media, the Department of Justice and the FBI agreed that no additional briefings to Congress would be provided," wrote Eleni Kalisch, assistant FBI director for Congressional affairs, to Holt in what appears to have been the first official recognition of leak allegations.

This briefing shutdown has left some Members furious with the FBI, leading them to publicly and privately conclude that the investigation clearly has stalled.

"I would like to think that they know a lot more than they did five years ago, but I have no basis to make that judgement," said Daschle, the Majority Leader at the time of the attacks, in a recent interview. "From what little they have shared with us, I can only assume that things haven't gone well in the investigation these past five years."

In addition, Sen. Chuck Grassley (R-Iowa), a senior member of Judiciary and sometime critic of the bureau, is preparing a letter to the FBI in which he will formally request that agents provide a briefing on the attacks, which paralyzed the Capitol for weeks.

The FBI currently has 17 special agents working on the case, according to the "Amerithrax" page on the bureau's Web site, and two more agents are joining the probe this month. The agents have conducted more than 9,100 interviews, issued more than 6,000 subpoenas and executed 67 searches across the globe.

"There's a lot of good to be said about the investigation," said Debra Weierman, spokeswoman for the FBI's Washington, D.C., field office. "We have made progress, and it's an incredibly active and productive investigation."

For now, however, an extraordinary situation remains, in which Congress is not receiving any information about an investigation in which its own Members were among the handful of principal targets of the attacks.

By the time the anthrax attacks officially hit Capitol Hill — Oct. 15, 2001, a Monday morning when an intern in Daschle's Hart Building office partially opened a letter containing the deadly chemical — one death had already occurred in relation to the biological agent, a photographer in the offices of the parent company of the National Enquirer. In addition, then-NBC News anchor Tom Brokaw and the New York Post had already received letters that proved to be laced with anthrax, mailed the same day, Sept. 18, with the same Trenton, N.J., postmark.

In the wake of the Sept. 11 attacks, Congressional offices had begun preparing for the possibility that they might be next, with Leahy's office having gone so far as to stop receiving any mail at all. The previous week, Daschle's office had briefed interns and staff assistants who performed the tedious task on opening mail on how to manage a suspicious package.

Once the Daschle letter was discovered, it set off a firestorm of reaction on Capitol Hill. After rounds of "nasal swabbing" for exposure to the deadly agent, 28 people tested positive, including 20 Daschle aides, a few Capitol Police officers and several aides to Sen. Russ Feingold (D-Wis.), whose office neighbored Daschle's on the fifth floor of Hart.

The Leahy letter wouldn't be uncovered for several more weeks by investigators perusing all federal mail, because it was mistakenly delivered to the State Department.

Fortunately, no staffer or Capitol Police officer who responded to the initial call was seriously injured, as they were put on at least 60-day rounds of the antibiotic Cipro, and most also eventually received an anthrax vaccine.

But the deadly ripple effects were felt up and down the East Coast, as a pair of postal workers in the Brentwood facility in Washington, where the Daschle and Leahy letters were processed, died from developing the worst form of full-blown inhalation anthrax. And a pair of women — one a New York City hospital worker whose office was in a former mail room, and an elderly Connecticut woman with no obvious connection to anthrax — died in the following month from inhalation exposure to the agent.

The FBI took the lead in the "Amerithrax" investigation. Thousands of agents initially fanned across the nation interviewing high-level scientists who had some form of expertise with anthrax or other deadly biochemical agents. The initial days and weeks were confusing even to the investigators themselves, as reports varied as to the quality of anthrax that had been sent, with some calling it "weapons-grade" and others using the phrase "militarized" — meaning that it had been purified to increase its deadliness.

DOJ_NMG_0079372

Reports continued to conflict over the years about the level of toxicity of the anthrax in the Daschle and Leahy letters, which were postmarked the same day, Oct. 9, 2001, from the same post office as the Brokaw and New York Post letters. Two months ago, however, an FBI scientist, writing in the obscure journal Applied and Environmental Microbiology, definitively stated that the anthrax involved was not as complex as originally suspected, meaning the attacker did not necessarily have to have access to U.S. or Soviet weapons plants.

That discovery produced an angry reaction on Capitol Hill, where Grassley raised the question of whether the investigation had gone "cold" because of an investigative fixation on people like Steven Hatfill, a former U.S. military germ expert who was described as a "person of interest" in the probe by then-Attorney General John Ashcroft in August 2002.

"It appears the FBI has done little to investigate theories beyond a select few of what happened during the anthrax attacks," Grassley said in a statement. "I'm concerned that the FBI spent too much time on one theory, and after five years, maybe it's time they go back and take a serious look at other areas they may have dismissed too quickly."

Ashcroft's aides agreed seven weeks ago to a lengthy interview with Roll Call about the anthrax attacks and the investigation. The interview was canceled, with aides citing a busy book tour. The cancellation happened on Sept. 25, before the publication of his book and the same day that The Washington Post reported on the science journal story.

But the FBI maintains that the perception of the "militarized" anthrax was something that was created in the media, according to Kalisch, the FBI's Congressional affairs aide, saying the bureau has "never been under any misconceptions about the character of the anthrax used in the attacks."

Throughout 2001, 2002 and 2003, agents from the FBI and Justice Department provided regular briefings. According to sources familiar with Daschle's office, he received at least three personal, detailed briefings on the investigation, and there were at least four staff-level briefings, which often included Leahy aides and sometimes GOP aides from senior Judiciary Committee members.

However, in late 2003, former Washington Post reporter Gary Matsumoto wrote a story about the investigation in the journal Science, which, according to an administration source, contained highly sensitive information.

At that point, briefings were halted. Daschle, in his recent interview, said they were not given specific information about why they were refused in requests for further briefings. "We were told that they felt sharing information with us could jeopardize, in some way, their legal standing," he said.

Daschle recently asked for another briefing from the FBI after media reports last month about the FBI scientist's declaration in the scientific journal about the quality of anthrax involved, but was denied.

Leahy, who has been chairman and ranking member of Judiciary throughout the probe, declined to comment for this story. Aides confirmed his most recent briefing was around the time of Daschle's last update.

Weierman, the FBI spokeswoman, refused to comment about the nature of the 2003 leak, saying to do so would further endanger the investigation. However, the Kalisch letter to Holt clearly cited reports that were based on "Congressional sources."

Hatfill has filed suit against Ashcroft, the Justice Department and the FBI, citing what his lawyers allege were a series of leaks that invaded his privacy and ruined his life.

"Leaks that embarrass the DOJ are treated seriously and lead to criminal referrals ... while leaks the DOJ and FBI view as helpful (by placing the organizations in a good light) are ignored," the Hatfill suit alleges.

In early 2004, Daschle said he received his final update from the FBI, what a former aide described as an informal talk with FBI Director Robert Mueller after a different Senators-only briefing on anti-terror efforts.

At one of his final two briefings in late 2003 or early 2004 — he's not sure which — Daschle asked FBI officials point blank about the investigation's probability of success.

"I was becoming more concerned about this investigation going cold," he recalled saying. "So I asked them what their estimation for the success of this investigation was, and they boldly pronounced 100 percent.

"So I'm still waiting."

DOJ_NMG_0079373

7-year Term For Trying To Make Ricin (AZREP)

By Dennis Wagner

Arizona Republic, October 12, 2006

A Phoenix man who was convicted of trying to manufacture the deadly biological toxin known as ricin was sentenced Monday to more than seven years in prison.

Denys Ray Hughes, 59, was convicted by a federal jury in June on the ricin charge and possession of explosives and a silencer.

Hughes was arrested in July 2005 after investigators found castor beans and chemicals in his Wisconsin cabin.

A search of his Phoenix apartment uncovered a pipe bomb, silencer, nine castor plants, thousands of beans and numerous chemicals.

Ricin, derived from the castor bean, is so poisonous that injecting an amount that would fit on the head of a pin would kill an adult.

Hughes, who worked at a Valley steakhouse, had no known terrorist affiliation, and investigators never uncovered a specific plot.

U.S. District Judge Earl Carroll, who sentenced Hughes to 87 months in prison, said the case was among the most serious he had ever tried, according to prosecutors.

U.S. Attorney Paul Charlton described the defendant as "a home-grown threat," adding, "We may never know his motive, but his intent was clear."

Bioweapon Charge Gets Man 7 Years (AP)

AP, October 12, 2006

A Phoenix man convicted of attempting to produce a biological weapon was sentenced Monday to more than seven years in prison.

Denys Ray Hughes, 59, was arrested in July 2005 after police found a large number of castor bean plants, which can be used to make ricin, in his Phoenix apartment. Ricin is a poisonous protein that can be used as a biological weapon.

Hughes also was convicted last June in federal court on charges of possessing a pipe bomb and illegal gun silencers.

The ACLU's Man From The FBI (WP)

By Judy Sarasohn

The Washington Post, October 12, 2006

The American Civil Liberties Union, often viewed as a bastion of liberalism, has not been reluctant to work with conservatives and libertarians or take up controversial causes. So how odd is it for the ACLU to hire a former FBI agent as a policy counsel?

In the case of Michael German , probably not as strange as one might think.

German is the FBI agent -- an undercover specialist who once infiltrated a white supremacist group of skinheads -- who resigned in 2004 after charging that the agency retaliated against him for complaining about a botched anti-terrorism investigation. The Justice Department's inspector general later basically substantiated his claim.

"I am convinced that they are on the right side of all the issues that are important now for national security," German said in an interview about joining the ACLU.

He said Bush administration policies allowing warrantless wiretapping and internments without trials, as well as the use of torture in interrogations of terrorism suspects, are ineffective and can worsen national security.

"As an FBI agent, I was sworn to protect the Constitution, and I still am," German said.

Caroline Fredrickson , director of the ACLU's Washington legislative office, said German will be important because he "has real inside knowledge of how the FBI operates" and "what actually works to find a terrorist." His expertise, she said, will "help balance the claims of people who want to limit the right of privacy."

DOJ_NMG_0079374

She noted that the ACLU has worked with former House member Robert L. Barr Jr. (R-Ga.) on privacy issues and changes in the USA Patriot Act, as well as with others on the right.

"We are principled, not partisan," she said.Lobby Firm Boosts Education Expertise

Education practices are among the hot lobbying and consulting specialties in town, and the pending reauthorization next year of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act, which includes President Bush's signature No Child Left Behind legislation, has some shops bulking up their education expertise.

One such company is B&D Consulting , the lobbying and consulting affiliate of Baker & Daniels law firm. B&D Consulting has hired two senior education specialists: Rene Islas , most recently chief of staff in the Office of Elementary and Secondary Education at the Department of Education, and Mary Jo Dare , assistant superintendent for academic affairs for Indianapolis public schools.

Islas and Dare will be involved in policy development, lobbying and advising school systems on compliance.

While the firm has had a solid higher-education practice for about 10 years, K-12 is a growth area because of No Child Left Behind and education disability issues, said David R. Zook , B&D Consulting's chief executive. "There's a lot of change going on," he said.

B&D Consulting's education specialists also include former congressman William F. Goodling (R-Pa.), who chaired the House Committee on Education and the Workforce. Clients include the Knowledge University, a private company involved in early education; Purdue University; and Indiana State University.DHS Bigwig Moves to Private Sector

The revolving door is spinning at the Department of Homeland Security this week, and will be stopping at the law firm of Preston Gates Ellis & Rouvelas Meeds .

Cresencio "Cris" Arcos , DHS assistant secretary for international affairs, is leaving the department Friday and starting Tuesday at Preston Gates as a counselor for government affairs. Government ethics rules will limit his lobbying capabilities for the next year.

Before joining the DHS in 2003, Arcos was managing director of international public affairs for Latin America and Canada at AT&T Corp. Earlier, he was a career foreign service officer whose postings included a stint as U.S. ambassador to Honduras. He retired in 1995 after 25 years.

Asked why he was leaving government, Arcos said: "It was about time."

At Preston Gates, he'll be working with Steve McCain , director of the defense and homeland security practice; Michael J. O'Neil , a former general counsel of the CIA; and former senator Slade Gorton (R-Wash.).Here and There

Also moving about town . . . Thomas B. Chapman is leaving Southwest Airlines, where he has been legislative counsel, for US Airways, where he will be vice president for congressional and federal affairs, effective Monday. He succeeds Rosemary G. Murray , who retired after 17 years.

Jeffrey Miller , former senior vice president for government and industry affairs for ACC Capital Holdings Corp., has joined McKenna Long & Aldridge as a managing director. Miller had worked for Rep. Bill Thomas (R-Calif.) and was chief financial officer of the California Republican Party. ACC Capital Holdings is the parent company of Ameriquest Mortgage Services.

Brooke McNally , former press secretary for Rep. John F. Tierney (D-Mass.), has joined Hoopes Strategies as a communications and political strategist.

Teresa D. Schofield , previously public affairs counsel at the Mortgage Bankers Association and a veteran of the Office of Legislative Affairs in the Clinton White House, has joined the Herald Group , a public affairs firm. She also was an aide to Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin (D-Md.).

Small Plane Strikes New York High-Rise (LAT)

By Thomas S. Mulligan And Ellen Barry

The Los Angeles Times, October 12, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0079375

NEW YORK — A small airplane carrying New York Yankees pitcher Cory Lidle and his flight instructor slammed into a luxury high-rise on Manhattan's Upper East Side on Wednesday afternoon, exploding in a fireball that killed both men and engulfed two floors of the building.

Authorities termed the 2:42 p.m. crash an accident, but it evoked emotional reactions from New Yorkers who vividly recall the terrorist attacks on the World Trade Center a little more than five years ago.

President Bush was alerted to the crash, and Air Force jets were scrambled over several cities as a precaution.

Residents of the 42-story, red-brick building were quickly evacuated, streaming down the stairwells into a crowd of fire and emergency crews trained for fast response after Sept. 11.

The impact at the 30th and 31st floors rained flaming debris down the north side of the Belaire building, at 72nd Street and York Avenue, overlooking the East River. The building is just down the block from Sotheby's, the famous auction house.

The bodies of both victims were found on the street, Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg said at a news conference. CNN, citing an FBI official, reported that Lidle's passport also was found on the street.

Eleven firefighters were treated for minor injuries. Two people escaped unharmed despite being inside a residential unit that was penetrated by parts of the aircraft. The two were "a little bit shaken," Bloomberg told reporters. "They were sitting there and they heard a noise, glass breaking, and they ran out the door and into the hall." He said the plane's engine was later found in one of the residences.

Lidle, 34, of West Covina, had earned his pilot's license less than a year ago. It was not clear whether he or the instructor, whose identity was not released, was at the controls. Lidle owned the plane, which was identified as a Cirrus SR20, a single-engine four-seat aircraft made of lightweight composite materials.

The plane is noteworthy for what its manufacturer, Cirrus Design Corp. of Duluth, Minn., calls "a final level of defense" — a parachute for the entire plane. It is not known whether any attempt was made to deploy the parachute before the crash.

Newsday reported that the SR20 had been involved in 20 accidents, accounting for at least 15 deaths, in the last seven years.

Bloomberg did not identify either of the passengers during his news conference, but he said the student pilot — presumably Lidle — had about 75 hours of flying time.

The two had taken off at 2:29 p.m. from Teterboro Airport, about 12 miles away in New Jersey, and had circled the Statue of Liberty before turning north up the East River, Bloomberg said. The weather was threatening but did not give way to rain until after the crash.

Federal Aviation Administration officials said the pilot didn't need to radio air traffic controllers in New York because Visual Flight Rules, under which he was flying, don't require such contact. Bloomberg said private aircraft were allowed to fly over the rivers but had to seek permission before crossing into Manhattan airspace.

A witness, identified as Zenel Perezic, told CNN that the airplane seemed to be in distress moments before the crash.

Joanne Hartlaub was on a stationary bike in the gym in the building opposite the Belaire when she saw something falling; it looked like metal, she said.

"I didn't see wings. I just saw a big engine." At that moment, she said, "I was insane with fear that we were being attacked."

She saw the plane "smash into the side of the building and blow out all the windows. Then all sorts of debris was falling down on the street." She looked down and saw that the fuel had splashed on the street and ignited. "There was fire all over the ground within seconds."

Three hours later, Hartlaub said, she was still shaking. "I've been shaking all day."

She was near the World Trade Center on Sept. 11, 2001, she said, and saw the first plane fly into one of the towers.

Former Bloomingdale's Chairman Marvin Traub and his wife, Lee, have lived on the top floor of the Belaire since the building went up in the early 1990s. He said he was at the office of his Manhattan consulting business when friends alerted him to the crash about 3 p.m.

"Mrs. Traub was in the building…. After she walked down, she knew I'd be concerned, so she called me," he said.

Elias Taveras, 13, was in his science class three blocks away when smoke started blowing in the windows. It felt as close, he said, "as if the fire was actually in our school."

DOJ_NMG_0079376

His classmates had a variety of responses, he said. "Some people got nervous, some people got excited."

Although most of the students dispersed, Elias wandered to the scene to take a look. "I was like, oh my God, it's like what happened at the world trade tower."

Scott M. Stringer, the Manhattan borough president, was at the scene. He said the initial reports had been chilling. "Every time you hear about an aircraft crashing into a building, [terrorism] is something you think about," he said.

Along the streets, in the minutes after the crash, people looked dazed, anxious and hurried. Many talked on cellphones, glancing over their shoulder at the plume of smoke while they described it. A few people ran down the sidewalk. One woman, several blocks south of the fire, was weeping while she tried to reach someone on her cellphone. Mothers pulled children along, and children looked worried. Approaching the scene, the smell was acrid and artificial. Half a dozen helicopters hovered in the air above the building.

A young woman in a pale blue trench coat was trying to force her way past a police officer, who was holding her back. She was crying and saying, "What can I do? My baby is there!" A neighbor reassured her that everyone on that floor had escaped the building, and the young woman suddenly fell silent, relief apparent on her face.

Department of Homeland Security officials learned of the crash about 2:50 p.m., and Secretary Michael Chertoff spoke with New York Gov. George E. Pataki minutes later to convey that the department had no information that suggested a credible threat, spokesman Russ Knocke said.

"At this time there's no indication of a terror nexus; all indications are this is a truly unfortunate accident," Knocke said.

The department had no plans to change the color-coded national terrorism alert level.

A spokeswoman for U.S. Northern Command, the military headquarters responsible for U.S. territory, said the Air Force scrambled fighters over several major American cities after the crash as a precaution. For security reasons the military did not disclose the number of jets deployed or which cities they flew to.

"While every indication is this is an accident, we see this as a prudent measure," said Navy Chief Petty Officer Susan Hammond, adding that the plane was never a "flight of interest" to officials tracking potential terrorist threats.

Lidle, a pitcher who played for several major league teams before joining the Yankees in late July, pitched his last game Saturday, when the Detroit Tigers eliminated New York from the American League playoffs.

One of his Yankees teammates, Jason Giambi, also played with Lidle at South Hills High School in West Covina. "Right now, I am really in a state of shock," Giambi said in a statement. "My thoughts are with Cory's relatives and the loved ones" of the other victim. "I have known Cory and his wife, Melanie, for over 18 years and watched his son grow up. We … have remained close throughout our careers. We were excited to be reunited in New York this year, and I am just devastated to hear this news."

Lidle had agreed to serve as a replacement player when major league players were on strike in spring 1995. The strike was settled before the replacements played any games, but he and other replacement players who went on to play in the big leagues were resented by some of their colleagues.

Lidle was also one of the few active ballplayers to criticize superstar Barry Bonds for his alleged use of steroids. "I don't want to see him break records," Lidle said in the spring.

A month ago, the New York Times ran an article about Lidle's love of flying. The team has worried about flying ever since the death of its catcher Thurman Munson, when the plane he was learning to fly crashed in 1979. But Lidle told the reporter he was safe in the air.

"The whole plane has a parachute on it," Lidle said. "If you're up in the air and something goes wrong, you pull that parachute, and the whole plane goes down slowly."

The article quoted Tyler Stanger, a flight instructor from Pomona who taught him in California. Stanger described Lidle as one of his best students.

Stanger would orchestrate tense maneuvers to see how Lidle responded, Stanger said. Lidle was a star in those situations, Stanger told the newspaper.

Small Plane Hits High-Rise In N.Y. (WP)

By Michael Powell And Sara Kehaulani Goo

DOJ_NMG_0079377

The Washington Post, October 12, 2006

NEW YORK, Oct. 11 -- A small plane carrying New York Yankees pitcher Cory Lidle and a flight instructor spun out of control on a blustery Wednesday afternoon and slammed into the side of a 50-story condominium tower on the Upper East Side, killing both people on board.

The airplane exploded into a fireball as it hit the building around the 30th floor, sparks and pieces of the wing and the plane's door raining down on the sidewalk below. The fire that raged afterward incinerated two apartments, although, remarkably, city officials reported no fatalities inside the luxury Belaire Condos on East 72nd Street, where apartments feature views of the East River and command $2 million and up.

The crash and fire and clouds of black smoke billowing from a high-rise tower evoked memories of Sept. 11, 2001, for New Yorkers. Many stood on the streets listening to radios, watching television sets in corner grocery stores and anxiously asking strangers for information. The East Side of Manhattan all but came to a standstill, as police cordoned off York and First avenues, two vast thoroughfares, and fire engines screamed across town.

North American Aerospace Defense Command fighter aircraft were scrambled minutes after the crash, and fighters and support aircraft remained airborne for hours over U.S. and Canadian cities. But city and federal officials concluded the crash had no connection to terrorism.

"There is nothing to suggest anything remotely like terrorism was involved," Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg (R) said at a news conference late in the afternoon. "We are just very lucky that it was not more than two people, although our prayers go out to them."

Sana Monayair, a mother of four, described standing on her 37th-floor balcony across 72nd Street about 2:40 p.m. She watched as the four-seat, single-engine Cirrus SR20 plane strayed inland from the East River, climbing briefly upward before lurching down into the building's cliff wall.

"I saw the plane fly directly into the building," Monayair said. "There was a big explosion. It was very scary, the bricks falling and people screaming."

Not far from her terrace, dozens of hard-hat workers stood along the metal skeleton of a high-rise under construction, screaming as the plane swooped over their heads. Inside the Belaire, where tall windows offer sweeping panoramas of the Queens waterfront, Patti Charles, a housekeeper on the 32nd floor, said the "place just lit up -- it shook the building, and I ran."

"We sort of felt that it was 9/11 happening all over again," said Sara Cohen, 32, a nurse who was walking down York Avenue when she heard the concussion and saw the fireball. "I was terrified."

Lidle, 34, was an experienced pitcher who had played for both New York teams. He arrived in the major leagues in 1997 with the Mets and pitched the latter part of this season with the Yankees. He had acquired his pilot's license within the past year; it is not known whether Lidle or the unidentified instructor was at the controls of the airplane at the time of the accident.

Yankees management, including owner George Steinbrenner, confirmed that Lidle died in the crash. Lidle's passport was found on the street below, along with two bodies, authorities report.

Lidle had a wife, Melanie, and a 6-year-old son, Christopher; they live in California.

The crash also summoned memories of the death of Thurman Munson, a star Yankees catcher who died in August 1979 when a jet he was piloting struck a tree during takeoff at an airport in Ohio.

Rick Peterson, the Mets' pitching coach, worked with Lidle when they were with the Oakland Athletics in 2000 and 2001. He remembered a husky kid who relished pitching under pressure.

"He was a very hard worker, very competitive," Peterson told reporters out at Shea Stadium. "I have no words; I just have very strong emotions --."

Cirrus targets a wealthy male audience of nonprofessional pilots, a market largely abandoned by other manufacturers.

"People are using them like a car," Cirrus spokeswoman Kate Dougherty said. "They have become very efficient business tools and also have the ability to give people an entirely different lifestyle, especially now that families are so spread out."

Cirrus aircraft are the only planes currently manufactured with parachutes as standard equipment. According to Cirrus, the parachutes have been deployed nine times and have saved 21 lives.

DOJ_NMG_0079378

The plane carrying Lidle took off at 2:29 p.m. from Teterboro Airport in New Jersey, where many small planes and corporate jets are housed. The plane flew south into New York Harbor and around the Statue of Liberty, then up the East River.

Federal Aviation Administration officials said the crash occurred at 2:45 p.m. near a corridor above the East River where helicopters and small planes can fly under 1,100 feet and are not required to remain in touch with air traffic controllers. The corridor runs up the river, over the Brooklyn, Manhattan, Williamsburg and 59th Street bridges that necklace the river. It is commonly used by sightseeing helicopters under "visual flight rules," which means pilots under 1,000 feet must steer clear of other airplanes and helicopters as well as buildings.

Air traffic controllers are examining radar tapes to see if the plane can be spotted, and a six-member team of national safety investigators was en route to the scene. The plane emitted a distress signal just before striking the building, city officials said.

"We can't exactly tell what the route was after it came up the East River and why it turned onto 72nd Street," Bloomberg said.

Yankee Killed When Plane Hit N.Y. Building (WT)

By Betsy Pisik

The Washington Times, October 12, 2006

NEW YORK - New York Yankees pitcher Cory Lidle and his flight instructor were killed yesterday after he crashed his Cirrus SR20 into a Manhattan high-rise yesterday, igniting a four-alarm fire in the 40-story building and sparking fears of a terrorist attack.

A National Transportation Safety Board (NTSB) spokeswoman said that the plane was owned by Mr. Lidle, 34, and that Mr. Lidle's passport was found on the street outside the building at 524 E. 72nd St. on the city's Upper East Side, about a half-block from the East River. Mr. Lidle's death was confirmed last night by the Yankees, and the second death was confirmed by New York Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg.

"This is a terrible and shocking tragedy that has stunned the entire Yankees organization," team owner George Steinbrenner said, offering condolences to Mr. Lidle's wife, Melanie, and 6-year-old son, Christopher.

"It's very tragic," said Mr. Bloomberg at a press conference at nearby Sotheby's Auction House.

The plane was traveling from Teterboro Airport in New Jersey over the East River at about 2:45 p.m. when it veered off course just 15 minutes after takeoff and crashed into the Belaire Condominiums at about the 30th floor. First-responders told CNN that they found the bodies of Mr. Lidle and his instructor outside the apartment building.

The building was evacuated. More than 20 people were hospitalized, most were among the nearly 200 firefighters who doused the blaze in about an hour.

An official from the Federal Aviation Administration (FAA) said the plane put out a distress call, but it was too early to determine what might have caused the crash.

But for a time yesteday afternoon, when details were sketchy, the crash reawakened fears of terrorism among New Yorkers and dredged up memories of September 11, 2001, when first reports said a small plane crashed into the World Trade Center, just five miles from yesterday's crash site.

A blond woman who did not give her name leaned on a parked car and sobbed into the rain: "Oh my God, it was just like September 11. It was so scary."

The skies over the Midtown neighborhood were filled with police, medevac and news helicopters, while the streets below were clogged with emergency responders, which have been reassessing their procedures since September 11.

"It was really loud; it sounded like a truck going over a steel plate bump, really loud," said a Fox News cameraman who was about three blocks away working on another story when the plane hit the building.

While flames leaped from two stories of the red-brick building that houses more than 180 luxury residences, witnesses turned to their cell phones. Most were describing memories of September 11 where they were on the day, how this revived that feeling of panic and how relieved they were that this was an accident.

One man yelled into his cellular phone: "They said this was an accident, but that's what they said about the World Trade Center, too."

DOJ_NMG_0079379

The scene was just about a mile from the United Nations, where delegates were debating their response to North Korea's claim to have conducted a nuclear test. Within minutes of the accident, U.N. security told the assembled diplomats that there had been an incident and that it was being monitored.

FAA spokeswoman Diane Spitaliere said the aircraft was traveling along an 8-mile corridor over the East River, where helicopters and fixed-wing aircraft are allowed to fly below 1,100 feet under visual flight rules meaning they are not required to file a flight plan or talk to air-traffic control.

"They should not be flying near buildings," Miss Spitaliere said. "And they should not be flying below a thousand feet."

"It's the pilots' responsibility to pilot the plane and to watch where he's going, to be cognizant of other aircraft in the area," Miss Spitaliere said.

The Belaire Condominiums is the tallest building in its immediate neighborhood.

Laura Brown, a second FAA spokeswoman, said that the skies were overcast but that conditions were generally good, with visibility at nine miles and wind coming from the east at 13 knots.

A California native and a pilot for only seven months, Mr. Lidle recently bought the 2002 four-seat airplane with less than 400 air hours on it for $187,000. In his 10-year Major League career, Mr. Lidle also played for the New York Mets, Tampa Bay Devil Rays, Oakland Athletics, Philadelphia Phillies, Cincinnati Reds and Toronto Blue Jays.

Mary Varela, Mr. Lidle's mother-in-law, told reporters that her daughter wasn't home and they weren't certain if she knew about the crash.

"This is a tragedy for everybody involved," she said through tears.

Kevin Lidle, Mr. Lidle's twin brother, said on CNN last night that he had spoken to their parents, who were "obviously having a tough time."

Federal officials worked furiously during the afternoon to determine whether the crash was terrorist-related, and the U.S. military scrambled fighter jets over major U.S. cities as a "prudent measure," Sgt. 1st Class Gail Braymen said.

"There is no nexus to terror," said William Knocke, Homeland Security spokesman. "All indications are that it was a terrible accident."

President Bush was notified of the crash and monitored reports from New York, but he was not moved to another location, a White House spokesman said.

Still, former NTSB director Jim Hall told the Associated Press in a telephone interview that he does not understand how a plane could get so close to a New York City high-rise building after September 11.

"We're under a high alert, and you would assume that if something like this happened, people would have known about it before it occurred, not after," he said.

Crash Exposes Limits Of Post-9/11 Security Steps (WSJ)

By Laura Meckler

The Wall Street Journal, October 12, 2006

Small Plane Hits Building In New York, Highlighting Concerns About U.S. Skies

The crash of a small plane into a high rise on Manhattan's Upper East Side, apparently an accident, offered a reminder that new security measures adopted after the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks can't prevent risks posed by aircraft in the busy airspace over the nation's cities.

The single-engine plane was flying along New York's East River in midafternoon when it veered and crashed into a condominium tower of about 50 stories located less than a block from the river. The crash sent black smoke soaring into the sky and jangled nerves still sensitive five years after two jetliners crashed into the World Trade Center.

Like a string of similar small-aircraft accidents, casualties were limited. The pilot and the one passenger aboard were killed, but those on the ground suffered only minor injuries, local officials said. Among the dead was the plane's owner, New York Yankees pitcher Cory Lidle, who had taken up flying in the past few years. It is unclear who was at the controls.

Officials said it was too early to determine the cause of the crash. The National Transportation Safety Board sent a team to New York to investigate.

DOJ_NMG_0079380

Early on, officials were fairly confident that the incident wasn't terrorism related, but federal authorities scrambled to implement a host of precautionary measures. Fighter jets patrolled the skies above New York and major U.S. cities, a standard emergency response in the post-9/11 era. The Federal Bureau of Investigation Joint Terrorism Task Force was on the scene, assisting with the on-ground investigation.

Still, the incident highlighted the vulnerabilities that are inherent in the nation's cities. Trucks and public transportation have been targeted or used in terrorist attacks in the U.S. and elsewhere. Air traffic presents its own challenges, given the number of aircraft regularly flying in close proximity to urban areas.

The plane in yesterday's crash was flying along the East River under rules that allow small aircraft to skirt Manhattan as long as they stay under 1,100 feet. A similar corridor along the Hudson River also allows for flights using "visual flight rules," where pilots use their eyes and ears, rather than instruments, to navigate their way.

Similarly, Federal Aviation Administration rules allow small aircraft to fly through major cities across the country, allowing the operation of planes that take off from small downtown airports and helicopters that land at convention centers, hospitals and heliports.

Flight restrictions have been in place in various places around the country for years, chiefly for security reasons, but were greatly expanded after 9/11. The largest restricted zone extends in a 15-mile radius around Washington, D.C. Flights in an even wider area beyond that are tightly controlled and monitored. Hundreds of small planes have violated the restricted airspace since it was expanded in February 2003. Notably, in May 2005, a Pennsylvania pilot and a student flew their Cessna 150 within three miles of the White House. The FAA later determined the pair was lost.

Airspace above the presidential retreat Camp David in western Maryland is also restricted, and temporary restrictions are put in place wherever the president travels.

There have been several incidents involving small planes crashing into buildings after 9/11, though they typically do relatively little damage. Overall, in 2005, there were 1,669 general aviation accidents including 321 fatal crashes, according to the NTSB. There are some 210,000 small-aircraft owners in the U.S., a number that has been falling due to aging pilots and rising maintenance costs, according to the Aircraft Owners and Pilots Association.

The plane involved in yesterday's crash wasn't required to file a flight plan and took off from Teterboro Airport in New Jersey to a hazy, cloudy sky at about 2:30 p.m. New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg said at a news conference that the plane flew to Manhattan, circled the Statue of Liberty and then headed north up the East River. About 2:45 p.m. it hit The Belaire, a red-brick tower about five miles north of the World Trade Center.

"In the beginning, there was screaming. People were very upset. They were like 'Oh, my God. It's 9/11 again,' " said Erasto Arenales, a cook at La Crosta Restaurant & Gourmet Pizzeria, on 72nd Street, less than half a block west of the crash site. People started to run, he said, but then they stopped "when they saw there was not so much danger." (Read more4.)

At the time of the crash, real-estate broker Donna Olshan was showing a three-bedroom apartment selling for $4.8 million on the building's 47th floor to a pair of brothers. "The floors were rocking. The walls were rocking. You knew that it was some kind of explosion but I wasn't sure what," she said. Ms. Olshan raced down 47 stories, through smoke that grew thicker as she descended through the building.

Manhattan Plane Crash Kills Yankee Pitcher (NYT)

By James Barron

The New York Times, October 12, 2006

A single-engine plane carrying the Yankees pitcher Cory Lidle smashed into a 42-story building on the Upper East Side yesterday, killing Mr. Lidle and his flight instructor, the authorities said.

The afternoon crash beneath overcast skies sent debris clattering hundreds of feet to the sidewalk and started a fire that destroyed several apartments and left a charred smudge on the face of the building.

Fourteen firefighters and four people in the building were injured, officials said, including a woman who had been in an apartment hit squarely by the plane and escaped the inferno, suffering burns.

DOJ_NMG_0079381

The plane, owned by Mr. Lidle, was a Cirrus SR20, a four-seat propeller plane that is popular for its performance and sleek looks. It has a fixed landing gear reminiscent of a stunt plane. With two sets of controls, officials said, either Mr. Lidle or his instructor could have been flying it.

It slammed into the center of a 501-foot building on East 72nd Street several hundred yards from the East River. New Yorkers with memories of the Sept. 11 attack on the World Trade Center watched smoke drifting toward the sky as firefighters clambered into another high-rise, and the North American Aerospace Defense Command scrambled military jets. Some worried that they had witnessed another terrorist attack, but officials quickly dismissed that notion.

Mr. Lidle, 34, a pilot for less than a year who was traded to the Yankees in the summer, had talked enthusiastically about flying to his home in California this week.

As he cleaned out his locker at Yankee Stadium on Sunday, the day after the Yankees' playoff hopes fizzled in a series loss in Detroit against the Tigers, he said that he planned to work on instrument training exercises yesterday before he left for California, and that his regular instructor, whom he identified as Tyler Stanger, was coming in to work with him. Officials said they believed that Mr. Stanger was the second victim.

The plane took off from Teterboro Airport in New Jersey about 2:30 p.m., according to a spokesman for the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey.

Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg said it circled the Statue of Liberty before heading north by the East River. Radar contact was lost around the Queensboro Bridge. He said it was not clear why the plane veered toward Manhattan, apparently after traveling farther north, and hit the building on the north side about 12 minutes after takeoff. The plane never got higher than 800 feet, according to Passur, a flight-tracking service.

Pilots describe that area of the East River as a particularly treacherous corridor that tends to be crowded with helicopters. Several witnesses said the plane appeared to be in trouble moments before it crashed. One investigator said initial reports indicated that the aircraft had radioed La Guardia Airport to say that it was running low on fuel.

The plane disintegrated as it hit the building, shaking bricks loose from the façade, and ended up as a smoking wreckage on the street. "The engine with the propeller was two feet inside the window," another investigator said, adding that much of the rest of the plane had fallen to the street outside the building, at 524 East 72nd Street.

The plane bore into an apartment on the 30th floor, which under the building's numbering system is Apt. 40ABG. Dr. Parviz Benhuri, who owns the apartment with his wife, Ilana, said she was at home when the plane blasted through the window and the apartment went up in flames.

"She told me she saw the window come out and the fire comes," he said. "She told me she saw the window coming out and she ran. She's in shock. She's lucky she made it. It's a miracle."

She ran down the stairs and went to the emergency room at NewYork-Presbyterian Hospital/Weill Cornell Medical Center a couple of blocks away.

Three other people walked down from lower floors and were treated for exhaustion, one city official said.

Other witnesses said that the sequence of events leading to the crash unfolded so quickly that they realized only later that noises they had heard must have come from Mr. Lidle's plane.

"It sounded like a truck gearing down," said Kim Quarterman, a doorman at a nearby building. "Then I saw a cloud of smoke."

Jeremy Chassen, a real estate developer who was in an apartment across the street, recognized the droning of an airplane engine — he has taken flight lessons himself.

Joanne Hartlaub, an actress and filmmaker who was working out in a gym across the street, heard explosions and a "loud whooshing noise, like something falling, very loud."

She said she saw "this large object falling from the sky; it was aluminum and it was smoking."

Inside the building that was struck, five construction workers going over renovation plans for an apartment on the 42nd floor looked out the window and the plane bearing down on them. One of the workers, Luis Gonzalez, 23, said it was so close that he could see the pilot's face.

"It was coming right at us," he said. "The whole building shook. Then we ran for the elevator."

DOJ_NMG_0079382

Fuel burned on the sidewalk as black smoke rose from the apartments above.

In the penthouse, a housekeeper, Ann Robert, was ironing clothes. "I heard a boom and saw smoke and ashes outside the kitchen window," she said, "and then the painter came running in frantically from working in the baby's room," Ms. Robert said.

Her 21-year-old daughter was also in the apartment, watching television and talking on the telephone. Within seconds, Ms. Robert had grabbed her purse and was hurrying her to get out. "Let's go. Let's go. Let's go," she shouted.

"Death was going through my mind," Ms. Robert said. "When I saw the smoke, I did not know if we would make it out alive." She added, "As I was coming down the stairs I thought that the whole building might come down and that me and my daughter might go at the same time. But once we got past the 30th floor, I said in my mind that maybe we were safe."

The building is a condominium with residents like Marvin R. Shanken, the publisher of Cigar Aficionado and other specialty magazines; Marvin S. Traub, the former head of Bloomingdale's; and Carol Higgins Clark, a mystery writer who is the daughter of Mary Higgins Clark. A dozen lower floors are used by the Hospital for Special Surgery for offices and guest rooms for patients' families.

The building remained closed to residents last night. While structurally sound, a spokeswoman for the Department of Buildings said that there had been extensive damage and, with only one elevator working, it was not suitable for people to return.

For the Yankees, Mr. Lidle's death stirred memories of another player who perished at the controls of his own plane, the catcher Thurman Munson, in 1979. But where Mr. Munson was the team captain, Mr. Lidle was still something of a newcomer.

A 5-foot-11 right-hander who rarely threw his fastball above 90 miles an hour, he was not drafted out of high school and played for three organizations in the minor leagues, including an independent team, before joining the Mets in 1997. He had also played for the Tampa Bay Devil Rays, the Oakland Athletics, the Toronto Blue Jays, the Cincinnati Reds and the Philadelphia Phillies before joining the Yankees.

"He was a good guy, a real competitor," said Brian Cashman, the Yankees' general manager. "He wasn't here long, but I saw him compete for years with different teams, and he had a lot of success. That's one of the reasons why we wanted him."

Mr. Lidle made one memorable start, a victory on Aug. 21 that concluded the Yankees' five-game sweep of the Red Sox in Boston's Fenway Park. He had a 4-3 record with a 5.16 earned run average for the Yankees and made a brief relief appearance in the team's final playoff game on Saturday.

For his career, Lidle was 82-72 with a 4.57 earned run average, pitching in 277 games. He was a free agent and was not expected to return to the Yankees, though he said on Sunday that he hoped to sign a two-year contract this winter.

Mr. Lidle, who was married with a 6-year-old son, lived in Glendora, Calif. He had earned his pilot's license during the last off-season. He said last month that the four-year-old plane had cost $187,000 and had "cool safety features."

"The whole plane has a parachute on it," he said. "Ninety-nine percent of pilots that go up never have engine failure, and the 1 percent that do usually land it. But if you're up in the air and something goes wrong, you pull that parachute, and the whole plane goes down slowly."

Shortly after his trade to New York from Philadelphia, he flew his plane from a small airport in southern New Jersey to Teterboro. Describing his itinerary in a September interview, he said: "I didn't fly around New York, but I flew straight up north. I don't like to go in the big boys' airspace."

But yesterday, he did. The plane left Teterboro, in Bergen County, at 2:29 p.m., officials said.

Police and fire officials applauded what they said was a fast and efficient response, noting that there were no fatalities beyond the two men in the plane. They said that they too had worried at first that the crash was a terrorist attack.

"We are concerned about the possibility of things being something more than an accident," Police Commissioner Raymond W. Kelly said. "But it seemed clear fairly early it was a small plane."

Gov. George E. Pataki issued a statement saying that the Federal Aviation Administration had issued a temporary flight restriction requiring all planes flying below 1,500 feet to be in communication with air traffic controllers. He said he was asking F.A.A. officials to leave the restrictions in effect while they and officials of the Department of Homeland Security review the rules that apply to private airplanes flying in the New York City area. "New York's airspace should enjoy the same kind of protections as our nation's capital," Mr. Pataki said.

DOJ_NMG_0079383

NYC Tragedy Echoes 9/11, Raises Small-plane Questions (USAT)

USA Today, October 12, 2006

For a few jittery moments Wednesday, the nation suffered a collective flashback to 9/11.

Cable and network TV news flashed a breaking story: A small plane had crashed into a New York high rise. Viewers could see fire and smoke spewing from a tall facade in Manhattan's skyline.

This time, thankfully, the plane was not a jetliner. It was a single-engine Cirrus SR20 that seats four.

This time, it was not terrorists in the cockpit. It was New York Yankees pitcher Cory Lidle and a passenger.

This time, it was not a history-changing attack. It was apparently an accident — a personal tragedy in which Lidle and the passenger died.

And this time, the military and emergency workers weren't caught off-guard. North American Aerospace Defense Command scrambled fighter jets quickly and, according to New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg, first responders reacted speedily and precisely.

For all the differences, however, the incident raises security concerns about the 220,000 small planes in the USA and the 5,500 airports that serve them. While 9/11 prompted a crackdown on commercial flying, many of the vulnerabilities of small planes have never been addressed.

In most areas, flight plans are not required from pilots flying small aircraft in clear weather, so air traffic controllers have a limited ability to monitor them or determine in a timely way whether they're headed somewhere potentially dangerous.

And though Congress mandated that pilots' licenses have photo identification, regulations haven't caught up with the law. Terrorists could easily use a stolen license.

More to the point of Wednesday's crash, small planes fly dangerously close to skyscrapers housing millions of residents and workers in Manhattan and, under some circumstances, within seconds of Washington's most treasured landmarks.

Crashes into high-rises are quite rare, but they do happen, both accidentally and, in one memorable case, by design. In January 2002, a 15-year-old pilot in an unrecognized plane violated restricted airspace around the U.S. Central Command and intentionally slammed into a Tampa office building.

The public saw Wednesday that a small aircraft crashing into a high-rise causes far less damage than a jetliner. But should a terrorist get hold of a plane and fill it with explosives or a biological weapon, the public also saw how little there is to stop him from flying into such New York icons as the United Nations headquarters and the Statute of Liberty, both of which Lidle flew past.

The FBI warned last year that as security improves for commercial aircraft, terrorists may find small planes a tempting weapon.

If any good can come from the tragic and untimely death of the 34-year-old Lidle, perhaps it's heightened scrutiny of unaddressed threats from the air.

Small Planes Aren't Big Risk (USAT)

By Phil Boyer

USA Today, October 12, 2006

Crashes like this one are rare, and they're a poor excuse to limit flying.

Wednesday's accident was tragic and highly regrettable. And it certainly stung the nerves of post-9/11 New Yorkers. But the fact is: It was an accident. For USA TODAY to pose a series of unsubstantiated “what-if” questions and concerns regarding small aircraft, their safety and security is uninformed and ill-conceived. It's also highly irresponsible because it needlessly stokes already-heightened public concerns.

USA TODAY has not waited for the facts behind this tragedy; determining the cause (and any possible remedies) of an accident like this is a process that can take months. Instead, USA TODAY is exploiting this extraordinarily rare occurrence, using it as the barest thread of justification to bolster its long-standing and indefensible bias against small aircraft.

The facts show that thousands of the small planes that make up general aviation fly safely over and near U.S. cities every day, just as cars and trucks drive on our highways and streets. That's especially true around New York City. So we ask: Does a single auto accident generate questions about whether cars should be on our roadways? Of course not.

DOJ_NMG_0079384

For USA TODAY to question the need for increased ground security ignores the fact that general aviation pilots know their passengers and cargo. And it ignores the fact that the federal agencies responsible for our security — the Transportation Security Administration and the Federal Aviation Administration — have looked hard at general aviation and said it does not pose a threat. Mayor Michael Bloomberg himself indicated that this event says "nothing" about security to New York City.

This accident is a sad event compounded by the loss of life, and our profound sympathies go out to the affected families. Like many things, flying involves a small measure of risk, but general aviation pilots work continuously to minimize those risks.

Pilots are passionate about the many joys of flying. Our freedom of travel is one of the great liberties we all enjoy in the USA. Challenging that through USA TODAY's unfounded questions — not honest and informed inquiry — has neither merit nor benefit.

Phil Boyer is the president of the 408,000-member Aircraft Owners and Pilots Association, the world's largest aviation group.

Report: Few Cities Prepared For Evacuation Procedures (USAT)

By Mimi Hall

USA Today, October 12, 2006

WASHINGTON — Most of the nation's largest cities got flunking grades on a report card released today that measures how well each city can evacuate its population before or after a major disaster.

Ten urban areas received grades of "B" or "C," six got a "D," and 20 got an "F" in the report by the American Highway Users Alliance. Only Kansas City, Mo., got an "A."

Among those that failed the test: New York City, Los Angeles, Chicago, San Diego, Miami, Philadelphia, Denver, Atlanta and Boston.

"The potential for terrorist attacks and last year's New Orleans flood destruction underscore the necessity for providing sufficient evacuation capacity from the nation's urban areas," according to the alliance, a non-profit organization that promotes highway safety and construction to reduce congestion.

The report follows the release in June of a review by the Homeland Security Department that examines the ability of all 56 states and territories and 75 urban areas to respond to catastrophes. "Significant weaknesses in evacuation planning are an area of profound concern," that review concluded.

The alliance's report blames several factors for cities' poor grades, including the number of major highways out of a city and whether the city is partially hemmed in by water or mountains. Other factors included how well internal roads are laid out; how densely populated the city is; and the percentage of residents who have cars.

Kansas City scored high because it's not densely populated, there are no geographical barriers on any side of the city and it has a good intra-city road system, said Greg Cohen, president of the highway users alliance. New York City ranked low because it's so densely populated, congested and surrounded by water, and it has a higher percentage than most cities of residents who rely on public transportation.

In Atlanta, planning an evacuation is complicated by the fact that two major highways converge in the middle of the city, says Alfred Moore, director of the Atlanta-Fulton County Emergency Management Agency. He says the city has a plan on paper, but "have we exercised the plan yet? Nope. Have we trained on the plan? Nope."

Among the recommendations made by the alliance:

•Building new highways leading out of cities, where possible.

•Putting timed lights and gates on highway entrance ramps to limit congestion during evacuations and keep traffic flowing.

•Developing more ways to get information to drivers about alternate routes and traffic conditions.

•Creating government programs to increase car ownership among low-income people.

Justin DeMello, director of Denver's Office of Emergency Management, said evacuation planning is the most difficult part of any emergency-preparedness effort.

"There are just so many factors that come into play," he said. "And there are no easy solutions."

Strategizing On Disaster Relief (USAT)

By Mindy Fetterman

DOJ_NMG_0079385

USA Today, October 12, 2006

WASHINGTON — Executives at Home Depot were watching the aftermath of the 9/11 terrorist attack in New York from the company's emergency command center in Atlanta — a room with banks of TVs and phone lines. They saw that rescue workers' boots were being sliced by the smoldering steel remains of the World Trade Center towers.

"We sent 40,000 pairs of work boots to New York right away," CEO Bob Nardelli says.

He's not looking for praise. In fact, he thinks the way Home Depot — and other U.S. corporations — got information about what they could do to help in that disaster, and during Hurricane Katrina four years later, was ridiculous.

"We saw it on CNN!" he says, exasperated.

Now, nearly 30 CEOs have teamed in an unprecedented effort to set up an "emergency protocol" with the U.S. government and charities so that Corporate America can better respond to the next natural or manmade disaster.

"We're starting to put our actions where our words are," says Bill McDermott, CEO of SAP Americas, part of the world's largest business software company.

That protocol includes everything from a 24/7 direct phone link to the Department of Homeland Security and a website that will have "real time" news about what the government needs from business, to "swat teams" of employees from competing firms. Those teams will fly into a disaster site within 24 hours, assess needs and report back to the government and business community.

The group says it "won't wait for the government" when the next disaster hits.

"We're not saying it in an arrogant or condescending way," says Nardelli, who is chairman of the Business Roundtable's disaster-response task force. "But some of our frustration even before Katrina was having to wait for a coordinated effort from government. We want to set up that cooperative effort now."

CEO members of the task force, the largest ever put together by the Business Roundtable, met for the first time last month in Washington. Frances Townsend, President Bush's point woman on Homeland Security, was at the meeting.

Nardelli called it "an old-fashioned workout," where all parties get into a room, air complaints and come up with solutions. (Nardelli, who used to be a top executive at General Electric, learned the "workout" discipline from then-chief Jack Welch.)

"We're past the venting," Townsend laughs. "Now it's a question of how we can do better. I told them: 'Tell me what I can do better.' "

The CEOs told her. They want in on the early planning. They want in on information during a disaster. And they want in on the emergency operations on the ground.

Townsend agreed. She's holding a meeting in November at the White House with the CEOs, officials from DHS and the Federal Emergency Management Agency, and emergency operations chiefs from some state and local governments.

"The idea is that this works better if the private sector is involved in planning on the front end," Townsend says. "There's a lot we can learn from business."

The tsunami that hit Indonesia in December 2004, was "a watershed event" for Corporate America, says Johanna Schneider, spokeswoman for the Roundtable. "Companies were stepping up as never before."

When Hurricane Katrina hit, that volunteer spirit kicked in again, but with only limited success. "There was a huge outpouring of support," Schneider says. "But we were unable to get people connected down there (in the Gulf Coast) in a way that could really make a difference."

The CEOs want to harness that spirit and set up better logistics for getting people and supplies to disaster sites quickly.

"We want to make sure they get food and water, and not television sets," says McDermott of SAP. "How do you logistically get things to people who need them at the time they need them? Business can help do that."

DHS is identifying equipment and supplies it would need in various emergency scenarios — a hurricane, a tornado, a terrorist attack.

"In certain disasters, we'll know what we'll need, like water, tarps, housing. And we're communicating that to business" so that contracts can be bid on and awarded before the next disaster, Townsend says. FEMA has contracted with six companies for $1.5 billion in temporary housing to avoid delays such as those seen during Katrina, she says.

DOJ_NMG_0079386

Government audits found hundreds of millions of dollars was wasted on no-bid contracts and fraud, from $300 million spent on 10,000 mobile homes that sat unused to $3 million for unused beds.

"There was legitimate concern after Katrina that the government's contracting was wasteful," Townsend says. "We think that if you precontract, you'll do it in a rational way."

In the next year, the CEO task force will assess what supplies and equipment are on hand at U.S. corporations, including companies that aren't members of the Roundtable. Who has the bottled water? Who has the satellite telephone equipment? The lumber and tarps? That way, the government can request and get supplies quickly.

During Hurricane Katrina, charities competed for donations. But companies that were giving millions of dollars felt it was unclear what a charity would handle: Emergency response? Rebuilding? Food and water? Housing?

CEOs saw "mission creep" as many charities were trying to do the same things. "There was a lot of carpetbagging going on" after Katrina, says Kevin Martinez, community affairs director for Home Depot, pointing to 400 new charities that were formed. "We're saying to charities: Don't work in a vacuum. Work with each other. What exactly are you fundraising for?"

Like governments, charities also were overwhelmed by Katrina.

The American Red Cross was sharply criticized in a Government Accountability Office report for being unprepared and slow to react. Since then, the Red Cross has spent about $80 million to triple its warehouse space for emergency supplies, triple its satellite phone availability, and add more volunteers and computer capacity.

"Our mission has been the same for a long time: mass care early," says Jack McGuire, interim CEO of the Red Cross. "But there's a huge problem relative to what people think our mission is. People were upset because they didn't see our helicopters with the Coast Guard out there rescuing people off rooftops. We don't do rescues. We don't build houses. We don't give loans. We don't run hospitals."

The Red Cross and other charities are beginning to work together to coordinate volunteer response, although efforts are in the early stages, McGuire says.

Katrina taught everyone, he says, that "these things are going to work better if it's a system of the many rather than the few."

TSA Secrecy Rules Eased (WP)

The Washington Post, October 12, 2006

Congress has ordered the Department of Homeland Security to ease secrecy rules at the Transportation Security Administration, helping families of victims of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks who have sued to unearth security practices before then.

A $34.8 billion homeland security spending bill signed by President Bush last week requires the department to release "security sensitive information" that is more than three years old and is not part of existing plans or certain categories, barring "a rational reason" cited by Secretary Michael Chertoff that it should remain secret.

Congress ordered that SSI-designated evidence be released in civil cases with some restrictions if required by a judge, unless such access "presents a risk of harm to the nation."

In a statement, Michael Low of Batesville, Ark., thanked Congress on behalf of 9/11 Families United to Bankrupt Terrorism "for telling TSA not to misuse the term 'national security' as an excuse to hide documents that are of no use to would-be terrorists but instead contain information embarrassing to our government and the airlines." Low is the father of Sara Low, a flight attendant on American Airlines Flight 11.

About 50 survivors' suits targeting airlines and security firms are before the U.S. Southern District of New York, as is a broader case against terrorist financing.

The White House opposed the change, which it said would impose "an ongoing, burdensome review process."

Steven Aftergood, director of the Federation of American Scientists' project on government secrecy, called the legislation "surprising" and a "welcome gesture by Congress to push back against expanding secrecy."

SSI includes airport security plans, vulnerability assessments and technical specifications of screening equipment, but TSA's definition is open-ended. The program has been invoked to withhold information about bomb scares at airports and to drop cases against screeners charged with stealing from passengers, for example.

DOJ_NMG_0079387

It has raised concerns that local law enforcement may not be able to issue reports about incidents at airports, or that passengers stopped by security officers may not learn why they were stopped.

Insurers Get An Earful From Senator (NYT)

By Joseph B. Treaster

The New York Times, October 12, 2006

Sometimes, political connections come in handy. Ask Senator Trent Lott of Mississippi.

Mr. Lott, a Republican and former majority leader, is one of thousands of homeowners on the Gulf Coast who have been fighting with their insurers over payments for damage in Hurricane Katrina. In an interview yesterday, he said he was angry about the insurers' "insensitivity and outright meanness" in rejecting many homeowners' claims.

He said he inserted a provision into legislation, signed by President Bush last week, directing the Department of Homeland Security to investigate potential fraud by the insurance industry. Mr. Lott said he was also drafting legislation to challenge the industry's exemptions from antitrust laws and had asked his staff to investigate the industry's tax rates.

"I am outraged," he said. "I'm concerned there are lots of abuses in the aftermath of the hurricane."

Mr. Lott's claim for the loss of his $400,000 house in Pascagoula was rejected by State Farm.

Industry executives and lawyers denied that the insurers had engaged in fraud and some questioned whether Mr. Lott was improperly using his position in Congress.

"Given that the senator has a personal dog in the fight, his actions have the appearance of an abuse of power," said Randy J. Maniloff, a lawyer in Philadelphia who represents insurance companies.

Mr. Lott said he was not acting solely out of personal motivation. "I've had my own experience, but a lot of people have had similar experiences," Mr. Lott said. "They have abused my people, my friends, the people I love."

Robert P. Hartwig, the chief economist for the Insurance Information Institute, a trade group in New York, said: "It's unfortunate that the scarce resources of the Department of Homeland Security are being diverted toward an unjustified investigation."

The industry executives also asserted that Mr. Lott, as a senator, had a duty to be impartial. They said he should follow the example of several judges in Mississippi whose homes were damaged in Katrina and who have recused themselves from cases involving the storm.

"I don't profess to be impartial," Mr. Lott said.

Mr. Lott said he was also planning to introduce legislation requiring the insurers to include in their policies a prominent listing in plain English of what they refuse to cover. He said home insurance policies contained "a bunch of subterfuges" difficult for laymen or lawyers to comprehend. "Don't tell me they don't do it on purpose," Mr. Lott said.

Insurance is mainly regulated by the states. But the federal government has authority on antitrust and tax issues. The insurers have been exempted from some antitrust laws since the 1940's. These exemptions permit them to share industrywide information on claims costs and project future costs.

The insurers say working with a larger pool of data than any single company could develop enables them to offer lower prices. J. Robert Hunter, an insurance expert at the Consumer Federation of America, said that without the antitrust exemption, insurance prices would probably be lower.

Mr. Lott told The National Underwriter, an insurance industry publication, that he spoke directly to Edward B. Rust Jr., the chief executive of State Farm. "He said he would look into my situation," Mr. Lott was quoted in January as saying. "I told him I didn't want any special consideration. I wanted them to do what was right for everybody."

State Farm and other insurers promise to pay for wind damage in hurricanes but they say their policies do not pay for flood damage. Federal flood insurance pays up to $250,000 in damage to a home and up to $100,000 for furnishings and clothing.

Mr. Lott and several thousand other Mississippi homeowners are suing State Farm and other insurers, arguing that the winds of Katrina pushed floodwaters across the beaches and that the policies they bought that promise coverage against wind damage should be honored.

DOJ_NMG_0079388

State Farm declined yesterday to discuss Mr. Lott's lawsuit. Insurers have paid $41 billion for damage to homes and businesses from Hurricane Katrina, $13.6 billion in Mississippi alone, resolving, they say, 95 percent of the state's 355,000 homeowner claims.

Mr. Lott said he bought flood insurance and received the maximum of $350,000 from the government. Industry executives say Mr. Lott clearly understood that flood insurance and private homeowners insurance provide separate coverage.

Mr. Lott's lawyer is Richard F. Scruggs, who made a fortune in litigation against tobacco companies. Mr. Scruggs, who is representing many Katrina victims, is Mr. Lott's brother-in-law and a neighbor in Pascagoula. Mr. Scruggs's home was heavily damaged. John Griffin Jones, a lawyer working with Mr. Scruggs on claims, said an insurer also denied Mr. Scruggs's claim.

In August, Judge L. T. Senter Jr. of Federal District Court in Gulfport ruled in the first trial over wind versus water damage that the insurers did not have to pay for flood damage. But he said language permitting them to refuse payment when damage results from a combination of wind and water was ambiguous.

Mr. Lott said he had sought the Homeland Security investigation because he believed that the insurers shifted the cost of many claims to the federal flood insurance program that they should have paid themselves.

Mr. Lott said he wanted Homeland Security to determine if the shifting of costs to the federal program "was just an occasional mistake or systematic."

"I think it was systematic," he said.

WAR NEWS:

Bush Open To Change In Tactics (LAT)

By Paul Richter And Doyle McManus

The Los Angeles Times, October 12, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush opened the door to possible changes in his approach to the Iraq war, declaring Wednesday that "we'll change tactics when we need to change tactics," amid pressure from Republicans about the unrelenting violence and the shortcomings of the government in Baghdad.

Bush said at a White House news conference that the description of his policy as a stay-the-course stance was only "about a quarter right."

"My attitude is, don't do what you're doing if it's not working — change," he said.

Bush did not specify what changes he would be willing to consider, and he said he remained committed to involvement in Iraq until the country was stable and democratic. And he continued to characterize opposing views as "cut-and-run."

Yet the comments were seen as a signal of a partial openness to a new direction in Iraq, at a time when allies and adversaries have been demanding one.

A congressionally chartered study group co-chaired by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III, a longtime Bush family ally, signaled this week that it was prepared to recommend changes. Last week, Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman John W. Warner (R-Va.), a reliable White House ally, said that a shift will be needed in coming months if violence continues and the 4-month-old Iraqi government does not assert control.

Even the administration's ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad, has said that the new government has only a few months to prove that its approach to the country's problems is workable.

Some political analysts said Bush's comments were tailored for the upcoming midterm elections. The president wants to avoid appearing too tied to an inflexible course, they said, and also wants to give cover to vulnerable Republican candidates who are trying to distance themselves from the policy.

Yet they said the language might also hint that changes will come after the elections, as some in Washington have been predicting.

"He's trying to avoid being stuck with 'stay the course,' but at the same time opening the door a little bit for the inevitable pressure that's going to come, including from Republicans, for a reevaluation of the strategy," said Marshall Wittmann, a former aide to Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), now with the moderate Progressive Policy Institute. "He was clearly walking a rhetorical tightrope between his view that he has to stay the course and the political reality, which is demanding some reassessment."

DOJ_NMG_0079389

Bush said he looked forward to the upcoming recommendations from Baker and his co-chairman, former U.S. Rep. Lee Hamilton, (D-Ind.), who once chaired the House's Foreign Affairs Committee.

Bush also said he "completely" agreed with Warner's comment that "if the plan is not now working, America needs to adjust."

"For those folks saying, you know, 'Make sure there's flexibility,' I couldn't agree more with you," Bush said.

Bush said he is open to suggestions for change from Army Gen. George W. Casey Jr., commander of U.S. forces in Iraq.

At the same time, Bush asserted that the government of Prime Minister Nouri Maliki was making progress in improving security, brokering political compromises among the country's ethnic and religious groups and strengthening the central government.

Speaking about internal strategy on condition of anonymity, one White House official said: "Are there things the administration is not trying? If an independent group like the Baker panel can come up with some good ideas, we're all for it."

There are signs that within some parts of the administration, officials are already reviewing options.

Marine Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, has asked several strategists to take a new look at the issue. These include Army Col. H.R. McMaster and Army Col. Pete Mansoor, who is director of the Army-Marine counterinsurgency school at Fort Leavenworth, Kan., according to a person close to the group who was not authorized to speak for it.

Senior State Department officials deny that there are plans in the works for a sudden change in direction in Iraq. But some officials have privately acknowledged their concern over the course of events, and have said officials are always weighing how they might improve their approach.

At a news conference with Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, Casey said the strategy in Iraq had been evolving. Casey cited his decision over the summer to scrap his plan to reduce the troop presence in Iraq and instead expand the number of American forces in Baghdad.

"We constantly review our strategy and review what's going on, and we adapt as we need to," he said.

"The broad strategy, where we are working to bring the levels of insurgency down as we bring Iraqi security forces up, I believe, is still a valid framework for what we're doing there in Iraq," Casey added.

"And we will continue to look tactically at what's happening on the ground, and my subordinate commanders will work to deal with that," he said.

At the same time, there were signs Wednesday that the military was at least preparing for the possibility of maintaining current troop levels for several years.

Army Chief of Staff Peter J. Schoomaker said the Army had drafted plans to keep its share of more than 140,000 troops in Iraq through 2010.

Schoomaker said those plans were part of prudent preparations and not a sign that things were better or worse.

"I have to have enough ammo in the magazine that I can continue to shoot as long as they want us to shoot," Schoomaker said.

Baker, in comments on his committee's work, has indicated that the group will urge a departure from what he described as the White House's "stay the course" approach.

Baker said on ABC that the White House should enter direct talks with countries such as Iran and Syria — a view that is counter to one of the administration's most strongly held principles.

Warner last week said that Iraq as a policy issue was "drifting sideways." Another Republican senator, Olympia J. Snowe of Maine, endorsed that view Tuesday, citing worsening conditions in Iraq.

"There must be no question among the administration, the Congress and the Iraqi unity government that staying the course is neither an option nor a plan," Snowe said.

Bush Stands Firm On Policies (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz, Washington Post Staff Writer

DOJ_NMG_0079390

The Washington Post, October 12, 2006

President Defends Strategies for Iraq, North Korea

Despite setbacks on North Korea and Iraq, President Bush vowed yesterday to stick with his policies on both crises, praising Chinese condemnation of North Korea's apparent nuclear test and citing progress in helping the fledgling Iraqi government stand on its own.

Even as he rejected calls to hold bilateral talks with Pyongyang, Bush said during a Rose Garden news conference that diplomacy is beginning to unite the world against North Korea's nuclear efforts. He called it hopeful that China is helping North Korea "understand it's not just the United States speaking to them," and he reassured South Korea and Japan that the United States "reserves all options" to protect its allies in the region against threats from the communist state.

At the same time, Bush addressed the recent doubts expressed by senior Republicans, including Sen. John W. Warner (Va.) and former secretary of state James A. Baker III, about the current U.S. course in Iraq -- which he described as more flexible than critics suggest.

"We're constantly changing tactics to achieve a strategic goal," the president said, adding that "stay the course" is only a partial description of his strategy in Iraq. "My attitude is, 'Don't do what you're doing if it's not working; change,' " said Bush, who met yesterday with the senior U.S. commander in Iraq to review the progress of the war. " 'Stay the course' also means don't leave before the job is done."

The hour-long news conference gave Bush an opportunity to try to regain some control over a dangerous political environment for Republicans just four weeks before midterm elections, in which the GOP majorities in both the House and the Senate face a stiff challenge from Democrats. Until recently, Bush seemed to be having some success in shoring up GOP lawmakers with an effort to make terrorism and the improving economy the centerpieces of the fall campaigns.

But that strategy has been thrown seriously awry by new revelations about the administration's troubled conduct of the Iraq war, and by a burgeoning scandal surrounding the House leadership's handling of allegations of sexual misconduct against Florida Republican Mark Foley, who has resigned. Meanwhile, this week's apparent underground nuclear test by North Korea exposed the White House to new questions about the success of its efforts to keep weapons of mass destruction from the world's most dangerous governments.

Bush received only one question about the Foley episode, which he used to restate his support for House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) and Hastert's handling of the matter. He expressed confidence that Republicans will keep control of both chambers despite the Foley scandal, saying that the public supports the GOP on what he termed the two big issues of the campaign -- security and the economy. And he took pointed shots at Democratic leaders for not supporting his tax cuts -- criticism that they said misrepresented their interest in cutting taxes for the middle class.

The White House also announced yesterday that the federal budget deficit dropped to $248 billion, a four-year low, which it attributed to tax cuts and other "pro-growth" economic policies. Democrats derided that explanation and said Bush's boast ignored the considerable debt that the federal government has acquired since he was inaugurated in 2001.

Most of the news conference, however, was devoted to North Korea and Iraq, and Bush enthusiastically defended his basic strategy in both crises, offering lengthy answers to most questions with a mixture of feistiness and contemplation.

Answering a question about the North Korean nuclear test, Bush explained his reluctance to engage in direct talks with Pyongyang by saying that the Clinton administration tried such an approach and it did not work. He said that North Korea violated a 1994 agreement in which Pyongyang promised to shut down its nuclear reactor and keep spent nuclear fuel under international supervision, and that the U.S. government promised certain benefits such as providing oil for energy production. Bush's account left out the U.S. government's own role in scuttling that agreement.

"I learned a lesson from that, and decided that the best way to convince Kim Jong Il to change his mind on a nuclear weapons program is to have others send the same message," Bush said at the news conference. He said Pyongyang's defiance of international demands that it give up its nuclear program is a reflection on the North Korean leader, not on any failure by his administration.

"The inability to convince people to move forward speaks volumes about them," Bush said. "It ought to say to all the world that we're dealing with people that, maybe, don't want peace, which in my judgment . . . requires an international response."

DOJ_NMG_0079391

The refusal to engage with Pyongyang directly has been condemned by lawmakers in both parties and by diplomats, including U.N. Secretary General Kofi Annan, who urged the United States yesterday to sit down with North Korea.

"From North Korea to Iraq, the American people have seen clearly what it means to 'stay the course' with the president's failed national security policies," House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) said yesterday. "The president's policies are not making the American people safer. Staying the course won't change that. It's time for a new direction."

On Iraq, Bush was asked about the recent comments of Warner, chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, who returned from a trip to Iraq last week warning that Iraq is drifting "sideways." Warner said major changes should be considered within a few months if the situation there does not improve.

Bush said he agrees with Warner "completely" that "if the plan isn't working, adjust." But he said the overall strategy in Iraq is sound, even as day-to-day tactics might change. Bush said the upsurge in attacks and casualties is happening because U.S. forces are more aggressively confronting the enemy in Baghdad and elsewhere. "We're on the move," he said. "We're taking action."

Bush said he does not find credible a new report in the Lancet, a British medical journal, which estimates that 655,000 more Iraqis have died since coalition forces arrived than would have died without the invasion. In a comment in the journal, the editors said the study was reviewed by four outside experts, all of whom recommended publication, with one noting the "powerful strength" of the research method. The findings, however, have a large margin of error. The low-end estimate of excess deaths (both civilian and military) is 393,000, while the high-end estimate is 943,000.

Bush disputed the study's numbers but did not supply his own. "I do know," he said, "that a lot of innocent people have died, and that troubles me, and it grieves me."

Staff writer David Brown contributed to this report.

For Bush, Many Questions On Iraq And North Korea (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, October 12, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 11 — President Bush said Wednesday that he would not use force against North Korea because "diplomacy hasn't run its course," but acknowledged that many Americans wonder why he invaded Iraq but has not taken military action to head off North Korea's race for a bomb.

"I'm asked questions around the country, 'Just go ahead and use the military,' " Mr. Bush said at a morning news conference in the Rose Garden, his first extended question-and-answer session with reporters in the days since North Korea announced it had detonated a nuclear device. "And my answer is that I believe the commander in chief must try all diplomatic measures before we commit our military."

Then, without prompting, the president asked an obvious next question.

"I'll ask myself a follow-up," Mr. Bush said. " 'If that's the case, why did you use military action in Iraq?' And the reason why is because we tried the diplomacy."

Mr. Bush's unusual exchange with himself came during an hourlong news conference dominated by questions about North Korea and Iraq. Democrats have criticized him for rushing into a war with Iraq, which turned out not to have unconventional weapons, while not setting limits on North Korea, which declared this week that it had conducted its first nuclear test.

That the president himself raised and rejected this critique appears to reflect concern among Mr. Bush's advisers that North Korea could be a political liability for Republicans, one that the president needed to confront directly with voters.

Mr. Bush's stance was to reassert that the United States would not tolerate a nuclear-armed North Korea, but that the way to shut down its nuclear programs was through multilateral diplomacy, not one-on-one talks or military action.

Intelligence officials have not yet determined the exact size of the device that North Korea tested, or explained why it appeared to have been fairly small, less than a kiloton. Democrats and Republicans have been arguing over who was responsible for the buildup in the North. Madeleine K. Albright, a secretary of state for former President Bill Clinton, issued a statement on Wednesday defending his administration and striking back at Mr. Bush.

DOJ_NMG_0079392

"During the two terms of the Clinton administration, there were no nuclear weapons tests by North Korea, no new plutonium production, and no new nuclear weapons developed in Pyongyang," Ms. Albright's statement said. "Through our policy of constructive engagement, the world was safer. President Bush chose a different path, and the results are evident for all to see."

Despite the North's test, Mr. Bush insisted Wednesday that his diplomatic approach was the best course and that he would continue to seek support for sanctions from other nations. He resisted calls for direct negotiations with North Korea of the sort the Clinton administration had engaged in, saying "the strategy did not work."

"North Korea has been trying to acquire bombs and weapons for a long period of time," Mr. Bush said, "long before I came into office."

On Iraq, Mr. Bush seemed to push back against recent remarks by James A. Baker III, the former secretary of state who is the Republican chairman of a bipartisan panel reassessing Iraq strategy. On Sunday, Mr. Baker suggested that his panel's report would depart from Mr. Bush's repeated calls to "stay the course."

But Mr. Bush signaled that he would not be pressed into a premature withdrawal.

"Stay the course means keep doing what you're doing,' " he said. "My attitude is, don't do what you're doing if it's not working — change. Stay the course also means, don't leave before the job is done. We're going to get the job done in Iraq."

On North Korea, Mr. Bush was asked if he regretted his decision not to take action — military or otherwise — to destroy fuel supplies in 2003, when the North threw out international weapons inspectors, withdrew from the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty and said it would turn its spent nuclear fuel into weapons. At that time, the fuel was all briefly in one known location.

"I used that moment to continue my desire to convince others to become equity partners in the Korean issue," Mr. Bush said, referring to the so-called six-party talks aimed at persuading the North to give up its nuclear capacity. He added, "I obviously look at all options all the time, and I felt like the best way to solve this problem would be through a diplomacy effort."

Experts believe the nuclear buildup in the North dates back to the early 1990's, when the first President Bush was in office. Under an agreement Mr. Clinton struck in 1994, North Korea agreed to freeze its production of plutonium in return for energy aid. North Korea abided by the freeze, but starting around 1997, it took steps on a second, secret nuclear program.

In 2002, after South Korean and American intelligence agencies found conclusive evidence of that program, the Bush administration confronted the North with the evidence that it had cheated while Mr. Clinton was still in office. That led to the six-nation talks, involving the United States, North Korea, South Korea, Japan, China and Russia.

"The Clinton administration was prepared to accept an imperfect agreement in the interest of achieving limits," said Gary S. Samore, a North Korea expert who helped negotiate the original 1994 agreement. "The Bush administration is not prepared to accept an imperfect agreement, and the result is that we have no limits."

But Mr. Bush on Wednesday reiterated his stance that it was "unacceptable" for North Korea to have nuclear weapons. Asked if he was "ready to live with a nuclear North Korea," Mr. Bush gave a one-word answer: "No."

Bush Rejects Direct Talks With North Korea (USAT)

By David Jackson

USA Today, October 12, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush ruled out one-on-one talks with North Korea on Wednesday, saying the United States will work with regional allies to try and stop the communist dictatorship from developing nuclear weapons.

"The best way to convince Kim Jong Il to change his mind on a nuclear weapons program is to have others send the same message," Bush said in a Rose Garden news conference.

Speaking less than a month before elections — and with control of Congress at stake — Bush also defended his Iraq policy, endorsed House Speaker Dennis Hastert and said lower taxes would help preserve the GOP majorities in Congress.

Bush spoke as North Korea threatened more nuclear tests. The president said even though the United States is still working to verify the test North Korea disclosed Sunday, "this claim itself constitutes a threat to international peace and stability."

Bush blamed North Korean dictator Kim Jong Il's "intransigence." He said North Korea cheated on a 1994 agreement with the Clinton administration to forgo nuclear weapons development in exchange for economic help.

DOJ_NMG_0079393

Bush repeatedly said he prefers concerted action with regional partners: China, Japan, Russia and South Korea. The United States and its allies, along with the United Nations Security Council, are discussing possible sanctions against North Korea.

Kim's government lashed back on Wednesday, saying North Korea would interpret sanctions as an act of war.

For his part, Bush stressed that it's too early to consider possible military action. “Diplomacy hasn't run its course,” he said.

Democrats such as Sen. Dick Durbin of Illinois blamed North Korea's reported nuclear test in part on Bush's decision to not negotiate directly with the country, as the Clinton administration did. Durbin also said the Bush administration was distracted from North Korea by the “pre-emptive” war in Iraq. “It is clear that the Bush approach has failed,” he said.

On other issues, Bush said:

•He is adjusting tactics to meet new challenges in Iraq, calling victory there essential to stability in the Middle East. “We can't tolerate a new terrorist state in the heart of the Middle East, with large oil reserves that could be used to fund its radical ambitions, or used to inflict economic damage on the West,” Bush said.

•He supports a pledge by Hastert, R-Ill., to get to the bottom of who knew what — and when — about former Republican representative Mark Foley's alleged inappropriate Internet communications with teenage congressional pages. Bush said Hastert has “done a fine job as speaker.” Hastert has said he will fire any staffer who did not tell the truth about what they knew about Foley. The House ethics committee is investigating whether members of the House or its staff did not respond appropriately when warned about Foley's actions.

•He doubts the Foley scandal will affect the Nov. 7 elections. Bush predicted the economy and national security “will be the issues that drive the election.” He also touted lower budget deficits and higher economic growth, which he said show his tax cuts work.

•He is committed to building 700 miles of fencing along the U.S.-Mexican border, as approved by Congress, focusing on urban areas. Bush also repeated his call for a “comprehensive” immigration bill that expands “guest worker” programs.

Bush Hits Democrats On N. Korea Talks (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, October 12, 2006

President Bush yesterday took aim at Democrats who demand he open direct talks with North Korea's reclusive leader Kim Jong-il, saying they are the same critics who charged he acted unilaterally when he invaded Iraq to oust Saddam Hussein.

"I can remember the time when it was said that the Bush administration goes it alone too often in the world, which I always thought was a bogus claim to begin with," the president said in a press conference at the White House Rose Garden.

But Mr. Bush said one-on-one talks with North Korea "didn't work in the past," and reiterated support for continued pressure from regional leaders to restart the stalled six-party talks, in which the United States, China, South Korea, Japan and Russia deal jointly with North Korea.

"I learned a lesson from that and decided that the best way to convince Kim Jong-il to change his mind on a nuclear weapons program is to have others send the same message," the president said.

He called on the U.N. Security Council to quickly hand down "serious repercussions" for North Korea's purported nuclear test on Monday.

While Mr. Bush said the United States has "no intention of attacking" the communist country and remains committed to diplomacy, he added that "all options to defend our friends in the region" remain on the table.

He again backed new ballistic missile defenses in the region to protect U.S. allies.

In an hour-long session with reporters, Mr. Bush also defended his strategy to secure Iraq, saying "we're constantly changing tactics."

In the face of criticism from leading Republican lawmakers -- including the chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, Sen. John W. Warner of Virginia, who said the situation in Iraq is moving "sideways" -- the president sought to put the best face on the war.

DOJ_NMG_0079394

"I want you to notice what he did say is, if the plan is now not working -- the plan that's in place isn't working, America needs to adjust. I completely agree," he said.

"I believe that the situation in Iraq is, no question, tough on the American psyche. ... Look, the American people want to know, can we win -- that's what they want to know -- and do we have a plan to win? There are some who say, get out, it's not worth it. And those are some of the voices, by the way, in the Democrat Party."

The president's remarks came as the Army Chief of Staff Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker said he plans to keep the current level of soldiers in Iraq through 2010, a later date than Bush administration or Pentagon officials have mentioned thus far.

Without naming former President Bill Clinton, Mr. Bush harshly criticized the 1994 bilateral agreement that traded money and oil for a promise from North Korea to put its plutonium under lock and key.

"We all agree that there must be a strong Security Council resolution that will require North Korea to abide by its international commitments to dismantle its nuclear programs," he said.

"This resolution should also specify a series of measures to prevent North Korea from exporting nuclear or missile technologies, and prevent financial transactions or asset transfers that would help North Korea develop its nuclear and missile capabilities."

Democrats repeated calls for a new direction on Iraq and North Korea, with Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean saying "the stakes are too high to have a permanent commitment to a failed strategy in Iraq."

"North Korea has increased its nuclear capabilities by 400 percent and tested a nuclear weapon because the Bush administration took its eye off the ball," he said.

"Iran has also become an even greater threat. And still, the president refuses to listen to the advice of his own party's leaders like Senator John Warner and [former] Secretary [James A.] Baker, who have spoken out on the need for a new direction in Iraq and acknowledged that we sometimes must talk with our adversaries."

Army Plans Same Troop Levels In Iraq Until 2010 (USAT)

By Tom Vanden Brook

USA Today, October 12, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Army plans to maintain its current level of 120,000 soldiers in Iraq through 2010, the Army's chief of staff said Wednesday.

Gen. Peter Schoomaker said the Army's plans could change if conditions warrant. The Army has maintained that level in part this year by extending deployments for some units.

“This is not a prediction that things are going poorly or better,” Schoomaker told reporters. “It's just that I have to have enough ammo in the magazine that I can continue to shoot as long as they want us to shoot.”

The Army will have to rely on the National Guard and Reserves to maintain the current level of deployments, Schoomaker said. When asked about concerns that Reserve units are struggling to get the training and equipment they need before going back to Iraq, Schoomaker said that no soldiers would be sent into war without needed resources.

Military analysts Wednesday said they doubted the Army could maintain its Iraq levels for that long.

Domestic politics and the strain on soldiers from repeated deployments will force a reduction in the number of troops in Iraq, said Loren Thompson, a military analyst at the Lexington Institute.

“It's very unlikely the Army will have the same number even a year from now,” Thompson said.

Andrew Bacevich, a military analyst at Boston University and a retired Army colonel, said the all-volunteer Army has held up well so far under the strain of multiple deployments. But he said he doubted that current levels could be maintained for another four years.

Bacevich speculated that Schoomaker's comments could be interpreted as a political statement. “This can easily be seen as evidence of growing dissatisfaction with the management of the war,” he said.

Last year Pentagon officials had hoped to be down to about 100,000 troops by the end of this year, but escalating violence and sectarian tensions have prompted military leaders to increase forces. Today, there are 141,000 servicemembers there — overwhelmingly Army.

DOJ_NMG_0079395

In an interview, Lt. Gen. Thomas Metz, deputy commander and chief of staff of the U.S. Army Training and Doctrine Command, said training enough soldiers to meet the current level through 2010 would be challenging.

Gen. Richard Cody, the Army vice chief of staff, said in separate remarks to reporters that soldiers need more than 12 months between deployments to Iraq so they can do a full range of combat training and complete educational programs that enable the Army to grow a fully mature officer corps.

"We need to reset the sergeants and send them to schools, the lieutenants and captains and send them off, so that we don't erode and become an Army that only can fight a counterinsurgency," Cody said. He said North Korea's reported nuclear test "reminds us all that we may not just be in a counterinsurgency fight, and we have to have full-spectrum capability."

Pentagon To Maintain Troop Levels In Iraq (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopulo

Financial Times, October 12, 2006

The US army chief of staff on Wednesday said the Pentagon was planning for the possibility that it might have to keep current troop levels in Iraq until 2010.

General Peter Schoomaker said he was not predicting that the situation in Iraq would require maintaining current levels of about 140,000 troops for the entire period. But he said the army needed to plan for that possibility.

"This is not a prediction that things are going poorly or better," Gen Schoomaker was cited as saying by [a news organization]. "It's just that I have to have enough ammo in the magazine that I can continue to shoot as long as they want us to shoot."

His comments come less than a month before the crucial midterm Congressional elections. The Republicans are in jeopardy of losing control of one, or both, houses of Congress, partly because of falling support for the war.

The US military and Iraqi force continue to struggle to stop the violence in Iraq and as its military death toll in the increasingly unpopular war continues to climb. Since the 2003 invasion, 2,749 troops have been killed in Iraq, and another 337 have died in Afghanistan, where violence has also escalated in recent months. The US has also suffered more than 20,000 non-fatal casualities, with more than 9,000 so serious that the soldier could not return to duty.

President George W. Bush on Wednesday acknowledged that attacks on US soldiers have increased recently, but argued that despite the violence Iraq will still making progress. His comments come less than a month before the November congressional elections, in which the Republicans are in danger of losing control of one, or both, houses of Congress.

Mr Bush did suggested that there would be some flexibility in US policy on Iraq, partly in response to recent comments by James Baker, the former secretary of state who is leading a bipartisan workgroup on Iraq, that there were other options between remaining for the long haul and cutting and running.

The Bush administration had hoped to reduce US troop numbers to about 100,000 by the end of 2006, partly in an attempt to convince the US public that the military was making progress in Iraq. But those plans have had to be shelved because of the growing level of sectarian violence in Iraq and particularly Baghdad. The Pentagon recently extended the tour of some soldiers in Iraq to deal with the increasing violence.

General John Abizaid, head of US Central Command, recently said he expected current US troop levels would be maintained until at least spring of next year. Gen Abizaid in July told Congress that Iraq could descend into full-scale civil war, and warned that curbing the violence in Baghdad was the key to avoiding such an outcome.

Speaking at the Pentagon on Wednesday, General George Casey, the top US commander in Iraq, said the situation in Iraq remained "difficult and complex" but said he did not agree with analysts who say Iraq is already mired in civil war. He added that Shia extremists, death squads and militias comprised the "greatest current threats" in Iraq.

Army: Troops To Stay In Iraq Until 2010 (AP-Y)

By Robert Burns

AP-Yahoo, October 12, 2006

For planning purposes, the Army is gearing up to keep current troop levels in Iraq for another four years, a new indication that conditions there are too unstable to foresee an end to the war.

DOJ_NMG_0079396

Gen. Peter Schoomaker, the Army chief of staff, cautioned against reading too much into the planning, which is done far in advance to prepare the right mix of combat units for expected deployments. He noted that it is easier to scale back later if conditions allow, than to ramp up if they don't.

"This is not a prediction that things are going poorly or better," Schoomaker told reporters. "It's just that I have to have enough ammo in the magazine that I can continue to shoot as long as they want us to shoot."

Even so, his comments were the latest acknowledgment by Pentagon officials that a significant withdrawal of troops from Iraq is not likely in the immediate future. There are now 141,000 U.S. troops there.

At a Pentagon news conference, the top U.S. commander in Iraq, Gen. George Casey, said that as recently as July he had expected to be able to recommend a substantial reduction in U.S. forces by now. But that plan was dropped as sectarian violence in Baghdad escalated.

While arguing that progress is still being made toward unifying Iraq's fractured political rivalries and stabilizing the country, Casey also said the violence amounts to "a difficult situation that's likely to remain that way for some time."

He made no predictions of future U.S. troop reductions.

Appearing with Casey, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said he and other senior Pentagon officials are still studying how the military might keep up the current pace of Iraq deployments without overtaxing the Army and Marine Corps, which have borne the brunt of the conflict. Rumsfeld said one option is to make more use of the Air Force and Navy for work that normally is done by soldiers and Marines.

Sen. Jack Reed, D-R.I., a member of the Senate Armed Services Committee, said Wednesday that the advance planning Schoomaker described was an appropriate cautionary approach. However, he added, the Pentagon should increase the overall size of the military to reduce stress on troops repeatedly sent into combat.

"I applaud the new realism but I think they also have to recognize that this (war) is going to put a huge stress on our forces," said Reed, a former Army Ranger. Reed and other Democrats have called on President Bush to start bringing home troops within a year to force the Iraqi government to take more responsibility for security.

At his news conference, Rumsfeld was asked whether he bears responsibility for what has gone wrong in Iraq or if the military commanders there are to blame.

"Of course I bear responsibility," he replied in apparent exasperation. "My Lord, I'm secretary of defense. Write it down."

In recent months the Army has shown signs of strain, as Pentagon officials have had to extend the Iraq deployments of two brigades to bolster security in Baghdad and allow units heading into the country to have at least one year at home before redeploying.

The Army is finding that the amount of time soldiers enjoy between Iraq tours has been shrinking this year. In the case of a brigade of the 3rd Infantry Division, its deployment to Iraq was delayed by about six weeks because it otherwise would have had only 11 months to prepare instead of the minimum 12 months. As a result, the unit it was going to replace has been forced to stay beyond its normal 12-month deployment.

In separate remarks to reporters, Gen. Richard Cody, the Army vice chief of staff, said soldiers need more than 12 months between deployments to Iraq so they can do a full range of combat training and complete the kinds of educational programs that enable the Army to grow a fully mature officer corps.

That kind of noncombat experience is necessary "so that we don't erode and become an Army that only can fight a counterinsurgency," Cody said. He added that North Korea's announced nuclear test "reminds us all that we may not just be in a counterinsurgency fight and we have to have full-spectrum capability."

Army Plans To Maintain Current Troop Levels In Iraq (MCT)

By Drew Brown

McClatchy Newspapers, October 12, 2006

WASHINGTON - The Army is making plans to keep its current troop levels in Iraq through 2010 if they're needed, the Army's chief of staff said Wednesday.

DOJ_NMG_0079397

But Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker cautioned against putting too much emphasis on the Army's plans, saying that conditions in Iraq would dictate force levels. He said it would be easier to pull troops "off the table" or shorten their tours in Iraq rather than to add more forces later on.

"This is the way you'd expect us to operate," Schoomaker said, speaking to reporters. "This is not a prediction that things are going poorly or better; it's just that I have to have enough ammo in the magazine (so) that I can continue to shoot as long as they want us to shoot."

The general's remarks came as sectarian violence in Iraq between Sunni insurgents and Shiite militias showed no signs of relenting. U.S. casualties have risen sharply while domestic political support for the war continues to slide.

There are currently about 142,000 U.S. troops in Iraq, with the overwhelming majority from the Army. Schoomaker said Army troop rotation plans for 2008-2010 call for keeping the current level of 15 combat brigades in the country.

But the general said that in order to sustain current levels, the Army would have to continue to rely on the National Guard and the Army Reserve.

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld slammed the notion that Schoomaker's remarks meant U.S. troops would be in Iraq in 2010.

"Schoomaker did not, of course, say anything like that, and it's unfortunate that stories go out mischaracterizing what people say," he said at a Pentagon press conference.

The defense secretary said he didn't want to speculate how many troops might be required to sustain the current pace of deployments.

The Iraqi Ministry of Health said Wednesday that more than 2,660 Iraqi civilians were killed in Baghdad during September, about 400 more than in August. At least 41 U.S. troops in Iraq have lost their lives in October, one of the worst two-week stretches of American combat deaths in nearly two years.

The Iraqi government figures were released the same day a new study claimed that nearly 655,000 Iraqi civilians have died as a result of the U.S. invasion. The study, conducted by a team of Iraqi doctors in conjunction with public health experts from the Johns Hopkins School of Public Health in Baltimore, was published Wednesday in The Lancet, a British medical journal.

Deaths from violent causes, mostly from gunfire, totaled more than 601,000 from March 2003 to July 2006, the study found.

President Bush, speaking to reporters at the White House Rose Garden, dismissed the report as "not credible."

Gen. George Casey, the top U.S. general in Iraq, told reporters at the Pentagon that an estimated 655,000 deaths in Iraq seemed "way, way beyond" any numbers that he had seen. The Iraqi government also rejected the findings.

"I have not seen a number higher than 50,000," Casey said during a press briefing with Rumsfeld. "And so I don't give that much credibility at all."

Asked if he needed more U.S. forces in Iraq, Casey said that he did not plan to ask for more troops and wasn't sure if more American troops would lessen the violence in Iraq over the long term.

"It's a tough nut - whether or not bringing in more troops, more U.S. troops will have a significant long-term impact on the violence," Casey said. "There's no question locally more troops will have some effect on the levels of violence, but whether more U.S. troops for a sustained period will get us where we're going faster is an open question."

Rumsfeld said determining sufficient force levels for Iraq wasn't an "easy calculation."

"There's no guidebook where you get up in the morning and look in the guidebook on Chapter 7, page 6 that tells you how to do this," Rumsfeld said, adding that many military officials were working on the problem. "It is getting enormous attention, and there is no road map."

Sen. John Warner, R-Va., chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, after returning from Iraq last week, said the situation there was "simply drifting sideways." Warner has generally been a strong supporter of Bush's policy in Iraq.

Here are some earlier quotes from high U.S. officials on the strength and duration of the U.S. troop commitment in Iraq.

President Bush, November 2005 - "As Iraqi forces gain experience and the political process advances, we will be able to decrease our troop level in Iraq without losing our capability to defeat the terrorists. ... Setting an artificial deadline to withdraw would vindicate the terrorist tactics of beheadings and suicide bombings and mass murder and invite new attacks on America."

DOJ_NMG_0079398

Donald Rumsfeld, Secretary of Defense, August 2006 - "We can persevere in Iraq or we can withdraw prematurely, until they force us to make a stand nearer home. ... Decisions about conditions for a drawdown of our forces in Iraq are best based on the recommendations of the commanders in the field."

Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., June 2005 - "The worst thing we could do would be set a time or date of withdrawal of U.S. troops until the Iraqi military is able to take over those responsibilities of ensuring the security and safety of the Iraqi people as they transition to democracy."

Sen. Joseph Biden, D-Del., ranking Democrat on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, advocate of a phased redeployment of U.S. troops this year, withdrawing most of them by the end of the year 2007. "We would need to maintain, in my view, a small follow-on force to keep the neighbors honest, strike at concentrations of terrorists and train Iraqi security forces."

Gen. Erik Shinseki, former Army Chief of Staff, February 2003 - "Something on the order of several hundred thousand soldiers are probably, you know, a figure that would be required" to win in Iraq, rebuild it and keep the peace.

Kerry Defends Troop Withdrawal Proposal In Las Vegas (BOS)

The Boston Globe, October 12, 2006

LAS VEGAS --U.S. Sen. John Kerry on Wednesday called the Bush administration's Iraq policy a "stand-still-and-lose strategy," and defended his proposal to set a deadline for troop withdrawal.

"Every time President Bush tells the Iraqis we will 'stay as long as it takes,' he is giving squabbling politicians there an excuse to take as long as they want," the Massachusetts senator said in a statement released while campaigning for Nevada candidates. "At each step along the way, the Iraqi leaders have responded only to deadlines."

Kerry was responding to comments Bush made earlier in the day in which the president described the senator's deadline proposal as a "cut and run" approach.

Bush said at a White House news conference, "when you pull out before the job is done, that's cut and run, as far as I'm concerned. And that's cut and run as far as most Americans are concerned."

Kerry and Sen. Russ Feingold, D-Wis., have proposed a July 2007 date for withdrawal of troops from Baghdad.

"We must refocus our military efforts from the failed occupation of Iraq to what we should have been doing all along: tracking down and killing members of al Qaida," Kerry said in a statement.

Sacrifice Of The Few (NYT)

By Bob Herbert

The New York Times, October 12, 2006

Clarksville, Tenn.

Sgt. Mike Krause remembers the time, not too long ago, when he came home on a brief leave from Iraq. He was walking through an airport, in uniform, and other passengers, spotting him, began to applaud.

“It was awesome,” he said. “They were cheering and clapping. It was great. But you know what? I said to myself, ‘That guy’s flying to Toledo on a business trip. This lady over here is flying off on vacation. Their lives are normal. But soon I’ll be getting on a plane to go back to the most abnormal place on earth.’ ”

Just how abnormal is made explicit when the sergeant, just 24 years old, describes the worst task he had to perform in Iraq. He spoke hesitantly. “You’ll excuse me,” he said. “This is not easy to talk about. Part of our job, our duty, was that we loaded, you know, bodies. We were in charge of the airfield, and we would load these heroes into the aircraft.

“My platoon sergeant had a policy. He didn’t want lower-ranking soldiers involved. He told us, ‘I don’t want privates doing this. You guys are going to carry this with you, whether you realize it or not, for the rest of your lives. If I can protect the privates, I will.’

“I don’t know if I could ever explain what that was really like. I loaded those guys — and I know all their names — onto a plane. And you don’t know how heavy a guy in a body bag can be. It’s not just his weight. He may be 180 pounds, but it’s a lot more than just a 180-pound guy. You’re loading his entire life.”

Sergeant Krause, who served with the Army’s 101st Airborne Division, lives in a quiet middle-class subdivision not far from Fort Campbell, which is on the Tennessee-Kentucky border. Sprawled in his living room in jeans and a polo shirt, he seems happy. He's safely home after serving three nerve-racking combat tours — one in Afghanistan and two yearlong tours in Iraq. He's engaged to be married and will receive a degree soon from nearby Austin Peay State University. His commitment to the military, which he made while still in high school in Huntsville, Ala., will end in a few months.

DOJ_NMG_0079399

But there is a definite edge in his voice, an undercurrent of bitterness, when he talks about the tiny percentage of the American population that is shouldering the burden of the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. "We're nowhere close to sharing the sacrifice," he said. "And it should be shared, because it's only in that sharing that society will truly care about what's going on over there.

"Right now it's such a small minority of families who have a stake in all of this. I hear people say things like, 'We lost a lot of good people over there.' I sort of snap around and say, 'We? You didn't lose anybody.' You know what I mean?"

While most Americans are free to go about their daily business, unaffected by the wars in any way, scores of thousands of troops have been sent off on repeat tours into the combat zones. According to the support group Iraq and Afghanistan Veterans of America, two-thirds of the 92,000 Army troops deployed since the beginning of this year are on at least their second deployment.

Many soldiers, like Sergeant Krause, have served three or four tours. There is no way for a nation as big and as rich and as healthy as the U.S. to justify the imposition of such a tragic and heavy load on the backs of so few.

Sergeant Krause showed me a photo of a soldier who he thought would become his brother-in-law, a 23-year-old West Point graduate named Dennis Zilinski. He was killed last November, along with four other American soldiers in a roadside bomb attack near Bayji, Iraq.

Sergeant Krause said that witnessing the profound grief of Lt. Zilinski's mother and fiancée "drove home" the real meaning of wartime sacrifice.

Sergeant Krause is proud of his service and still loves the military. "But we're a nation at war," he said, "and we should all be in this together."

He said that if he could wave a magic wand, he would make some form of public service compulsory. "You wouldn't have to join the military," he said. "But there are many other ways to serve. You could work for AmeriCorps, or the Red Cross, or Homeland Security. You could do something. It's about social responsibility. Especially in a time of war."

Top U.S. Officer In Iraq Sees Spike In Violence (NYT)

By David S. Cloud

The New York Times, October 12, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 11 — The senior American commander in Iraq said Wednesday that violence in Baghdad had reached its highest levels in recent weeks, despite the assignment of thousands more American and Iraqi troops to the capital in August.

The comments, by Gen. George W. Casey Jr. at a Pentagon briefing with reporters, came as President Bush, at a Rose Garden news conference, said he was open to modifying strategy in Iraq if military commanders determined that a new approach was required.

Mr. Bush met with General Casey earlier in the day.

General Casey suggested at the briefing that broad changes were not necessary, though he added, "We constantly review our strategy."

Mr. Bush was responding to questions about comments from, among others, Senator John W. Warner, Republican of Virginia and chairman of the Armed Services Committee, and James A. Baker III, a former secretary of state and co-chairman of a bipartisan panel reviewing Iraq policy, both of whom have said some new approach may be needed.

"Stay the course means keep doing what you're doing," Mr. Bush said. "My attitude is, don't do what you're doing if it's not working — change. Stay the course also means, don't leave before the job is done. We're going to get the job done in Iraq."

General Casey said that the redeployment of troops to Baghdad in August had initially reduced the number of killings and bombings but that attacks had gone back up recently.

"The levels of violence over the last few weeks are as high as they have been," he said.

"It's going to go back down," he added, but "it's not going to be something that we're going to get done quickly."

DOJ_NMG_0079400

Even so, he added, the broad American strategy of trying to contain violence while training Iraqi troops to step in "is still a valid framework."

He called it an "open question" whether more troops were needed, but said that for now, he was not requesting that.

The surge in violence in Baghdad led General Casey to abandon plans over the summer to reduce forces substantially by the end of the year — an example, he said, of his willingness to shift strategy if required.

There are about 141,000 American soldiers in Iraq, more than at any time since January.

The Army is planning for the possibility that it may have to keep that number of troops in Iraq for four more years, Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker, the Army chief of staff, said Wednesday at a roundtable session with reporters.

"This is not a prediction that things are going poorly or better," he said. "It's just that I have to have enough ammo in the magazine that I can continue to shoot as long as they want us to continue to shoot."

General Schoomaker noted that while current Pentagon strategy called for the Army to be able to deploy 19 combat brigades at any one time, it was currently providing the equivalent of 23 brigades around the world, including 15 in Iraq. To keep at the current pace of deployment in coming years, he said, the Army would need "assured access" to the National Guard, large segments of which have been mobilized.

Some military experts said it might be necessary for President Bush to mobilize units that have already gone to Iraq and Afghanistan, or to loosen restrictions that prevent Guard units from being mobilized more than 24 months in a row.

But Mr. Bush is unlikely to take such steps before Congressional elections next month.

Appearing with General Casey on Wednesday, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld acknowledged that he was examining ways of maintaining the current pace of deployments in Iraq.

"The options we have are numerous," he said, "and what we have to do is decide, if we are asked to do something."

President Bush and General Casey both took issue with a study released Wednesday by American and Iraqi public health researchers who estimated that 600,000 civilians had died in violence since the American-led invasion in 2003. The estimate was extrapolated from a survey of Iraqi households.

"I don't consider it a credible report, neither does General Casey and neither do Iraqi officials," Mr. Bush said.

General Casey said the estimate "seems way, way beyond any number that I have seen."

"I've not seen a number higher than 50,000," the general said, "and so I don't give it that much credibility at all."

'Tough' Time In Iraq To Continue, Casey Says (WP)

By Josh White And Thomas E. Ricks, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, October 12, 2006

Violence in the Baghdad region has peaked with a flare-up of sectarian attacks in the past few weeks, leaving U.S. commanders and the Iraqi government "not comfortable" with the current situation there, Gen. George W. Casey, the top U.S. general in Iraq, said yesterday.

Casey, in Washington for regular meetings with top U.S. officials, said at a Pentagon news conference that Iraq is a "tough situation" and that he expects it to continue to be difficult through Ramadan and in coming months, as Sunni and Shiite extremists vie for control of that nation's capital.

"I think it's no surprise to anyone that the situation in Iraq remains difficult and complex," Casey said.

The general tempered his assessment of the Baghdad area by saying that progress exists in Iraq alongside the attention-grabbing violence. Much of the country is relatively peaceful, Casey said, and U.S. goals for the development of Iraqi security forces are on track.

He said the current approach of bringing the level of the insurgency down as Iraqi forces stand up is still "a valid framework for what we're doing in Iraq," and he was dismissive of a wholesale strategic change, as some members of Congress have recently suggested.

Casey said there are no plans to boost the number of U.S. troops in Iraq in the near term, but he said that if he needs more, he'll ask.

DOJ_NMG_0079401

"It's a tough nut: Whether or not bringing in more troops . . . will have a significant long-term impact on the violence," Casey said. "There's no question [that] locally, more troops will have some affect on the levels of violence, but whether more U.S. troops for a sustained period will get us where we're going faster is an open question."

Earlier, Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker, the Army's chief of staff, told reporters at the Pentagon that he plans to be able to provide enough troops to maintain the current level in Iraq through 2010. There are about 140,000 U.S. soldiers there.

"I don't think you should read too much into this," he said, cautioning that "this is not a prediction," but rather an attempt to be prepared for any contingency. The Army provides troops to field commanders, who determine their troop requirements in consultation with the defense secretary and the White House.

Casey and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld met with President Bush yesterday. Casey said he believes the ongoing wave of violence in Baghdad is intensified by the holiday period and the inability of the newly created Iraqi government to handle such a volatile situation. Casey said that although he believes there has been progress on the security front, "this is going to be a long-term process."

Rumsfeld declined to speculate on plans for troop levels or how the U.S. military services might supply troops for a lengthy stay in Iraq, saying that he is evaluating a series of briefings on the matter.

"We're looking around corners, up ahead, and asking ourselves how we would do things," Rumsfeld said.

In his meeting with reporters, Schoomaker, the Army chief, also elaborated on comments made Tuesday at an Army convention that public support for the military is "tepid."

The U.S. public respects the military, he said, but lacks an understanding of how dangerous the world has become and so isn't funding the military adequately, he said. "This is about what's good for America in the strategic environment we're in. . . . I think this is America's choice."

He also insisted that while he strongly desires a sharp increase in spending on the Army, he hasn't threatened to quit over the issue, as has been rumored. "I've never discussed early departure with anybody," he said. "It's not useful to walk around here threatening anybody."

Schoomaker is expected to retire in the next 12 months. Pentagon insiders expect Casey to succeed him.

'All-time High' In Baghdad Violence (USAT)

By Rick Jervis

USA Today, October 12, 2006

BAGHDAD — The number of sectarian killings each month in Baghdad has more than tripled since February, and the violence has not slowed despite a major offensive in the capital.

Death squads killed 1,450 people in September, up from 450 in February, according to U.S. military statistics. In the first 10 days of October, death squads have killed about 770 Iraqis.

The increase in death squad killings reflects the level of religious warfare that is now the largest threat to security in Iraq.

Lt. Col. Christopher Garver, a military spokesman, acknowledged violence in Baghdad is at an "all-time high" and said U.S. commanders, in coordination with their Iraqi counterparts, are continuing to adjust the security plan to try to reduce the violence. "We've been working to keep it peaceful, and we've been frustrated that the extremists keep perpetuating the number of attacks," Garver said.

U.S. forces are also caught in the violence. At least 37 American troops have been killed in combat this month, about half of them in or around Baghdad, where Iraqi and U.S. forces are attempting to loosen the grip of armed militias. The weekly average of U.S. deaths since President Bush declared the end of major combat operations in May 2003 has been about 14.

Sectarian violence grew after the February bombing of a sacred Shiite mosque in Samarra. Gen. George Casey, the top-ranking U.S. officer in Iraq, said the conflict was changing from an insurgency against U.S. forces to a struggle among Iraqis.

The civil unrest has placed U.S. troops in a difficult position. In a seven-day period last week, troops from the Army's 1st Battalion, 23rd Infantry Regiment in northwest Baghdad investigated 40 sectarian killings and collected 57 bodies, many of them mutilated or bearing signs of torture, said Sgt. Jeff Nelson, an intelligence analyst with the unit. "We're finding bodies everywhere out here," he said. The troops haven't caught any suspects in the deaths, Nelson said.

DOJ_NMG_0079402

The U.S. military this summer established an extrajudicial killings task force to share evidence and leads with Iraqi investigators.

The violence, which has pitted Sunni and Shiite Muslims against each other and spawned neighborhood gangs, has escalated despite the presence of more than 60,000 U.S. and Iraqi forces in the capital.

In the worst months this year, sectarian killings averaged about 47 a day, according to the military statistics. So far this month, sectarian assassinations have claimed an average of 77 lives a day. The monthly numbers were rounded before being released and include assassinations and revenge killings but not victims of car bombs or suicide bomb attacks.

In Washington, Bush said, "The violence is being caused by a combination of terrorists, elements of former regime criminals and sectarian militias."

Bush also dismissed a study released this week that indicated that more than 600,000 Iraqi civilians have died in all types of violence since 2003. "I don't consider it a credible report," he said.

2,660 Iraq Civilians Killed In September (AP)

By Qassim Abdul-Zahra And Lee Keath, Associated Press Writers

AP, October 12, 2006

More than 2,660 Iraqi civilians were killed in Baghdad in September, according to new Health Ministry figures — 400 more than the month before despite an intensified U.S.-Iraqi sweep aimed at reining in violence.

The numbers indicate how tough the vital battle to secure Baghdad has proven amid a wave of bloodshed this year, not only from Sunni Arab insurgents but also from Shiite and Sunni death squads who kidnap and kill members of the opposing sect.

So far, October has brought no relief. A U.S. soldier died Wednesday from a roadside bomb while patrolling in Baghdad. That brought to 40 the number of Americans killed across Iraq the past 11 days — a pace not seen since the U.S. attack on the insurgent stronghold of Fallujah in November 2004.

Three car bombs in different parts of Baghdad and attacks elsewhere in the country killed at least 14 Iraqis on Wednesday. Bodies of 11 suspected victims of sectarian slayings were found around the southern city of Kut, while police in the northern city of Mosul discovered the beheaded corpse of a priest.

No cumulative figures for Iraqi deaths in October have been released. But several times this month, police have reported finding 50 to 60 bodies dumped around Baghdad over a 24-hour period, suggesting the bloodshed has not waned.

The Health Ministry figures emerged as a controversial new study claimed the Iraqi death toll in the war since the U.S.-led invasion in March 2003 is vastly higher than believed. The study, to be published Thursday by the British medical journal The Lancet, said more than 600,000 had been killed, more than 10 times most estimates.

President Bush dismissed the number as "not credible," and the Iraqi government called it "inflated" and "far from reality."

The wave of killings in Iraq this year has prompted U.S. officials to warn of a change in American policy unless Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's government shows within a few months that it can rein in militias blamed for sectarian violence.

Since Aug. 7, thousands of U.S. and Iraqi soldiers have been pursuing Operation Together Forward in Baghdad, moving from district to district and searching building by building to clear out weapons and hunt down militiamen and insurgents. They have seized more than 1,700 weapons and arrested more than 120 people. They have also staged raids on prominent militia figures.

But the numbers from the Iraqi Health Ministry suggested that by the end of September, the sweep had yet to slow the bloodshed.

A total of 2,667 civilians in Baghdad died violent deaths during September, two senior Health Ministry officials told The Associated Press this week, based on an official monthly report from the ministry to the Cabinet.

By comparison, 2,222 people died violently in August in Baghdad, according to a U.N. report published in September, which was also based on official statistics from the Health Ministry.

The two ministry officials said the U.N. number was accurate. They spoke on condition of anonymity because the government has issued orders that the death figures not be released.

DOJ_NMG_0079403

The monthly figures include two categories: the number of bodies taken in at the city morgue to determine the cause of death and the number of violent deaths reported by hospitals.

Hospitals reported 1,196 fatalities from explosions, shootings and other attacks in September, and the morgue listed 1,471 people who died from violence.

Shiite and Sunni death squads are known to kidnap their victims, then dump their bodies — often bound and tortured. So many of the morgue's bodies were likely from sectarian killings, though they also would include victims of criminal kidnappings and murders.

Sectarian violence was sparked by the February bombing of a Shiite shrine in Samarra, north of Baghdad. Shiites, a chief target in three years of Sunni insurgent attacks, responded with attacks on Sunnis, starting a cycle of reprisal killings.

The deadliest month was July, when 3,590 people were killed across the country, according to the U.N. The number killed countrywide fell in August to 3,009, which the U.N. said could be attributable to Operation Together Forward.

U.S. troops have taken a heavy blow in the growing violence. In September, 71 Americans were killed — 28 in Baghdad — the second deadliest month this year after April, when 76 died. The number of U.S. wounded in September was 776, the highest since the Fallujah siege.

On Tuesday, militiamen struck back at U.S. troops, firing four mortar rounds at a base in southern Baghdad, hitting an ammunition dump. The resulting fire set off tank and artillery shells that exploded throughout the night, though there were no injuries.

The Islamic Army in Iraq, a Sunni insurgent group, claimed responsibility for the attack in a statement posted on the Internet.

"With the help of God, the mortar and rocket squads of the Islamic Army have shelled a U.S. Army base with two rockets and three mortar shells," said the statement posted on a Web site known to be used by insurgents.

The same Web site aired a 4-minute video later Wednesday showing huge balls of flames stretching into the sky, and a cloud of gray smoke billowing from the site. The sound of explosions is faintly audible on the video, and the tape appeared to be shot from a distance of at least several hundred meters. The footage was stamped with the emblem of the Islamic Army in Iraq. The authenticity of the statement and video could not be verified.

Iraq's Shiite-led parliament on Wednesday pushed through a law allowing the formation of federal regions despite Sunni Arab objections that will splinter the country and fuel sectarian violence.

Many in Iraq's Shiite majority want to form an autonomous region in their heartland of southern Iraq, mirroring the Kurdish self-rule area already in place in the north. Shiites defend a decentralized federal system as the only way to ensure Iraq's communities can live together in peace.

The constitution, passed in a referendum last year over overwhelming opposition from the Sunni Arab minority, enshrines federalism.

Sunnis, however, fear the new law will create sectarian mini-states, giving Shiites and Kurds control of the oil wealth of the south and north and leaving Sunnis in an impoverished central zone.

Critics also warn that moves toward federalism could push Sunnis to more violence in trying to stop it.

The new law says autonomous regions cannot be formed for another 18 months, a concession to Sunnis. But the Sunni Arab coalition and two Shiite parties that also oppose the measure tried to prevent a vote by boycotting the session in an unsuccessful effort to keep the 275-seat body from reaching the necessary 50 percent quorum.

"This is the beginning of the plan to divide Iraq," said Adnan al-Dulaimi, leader of the Sunni National Accordance Front. "We had hoped that the problems of sectarian violence be resolved. We hope there won't be an increase in violence."

Insurgents Cause Ammo Explosions (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi

The Los Angeles Times, October 12, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0079404

BAGHDAD — Insurgents fired a mortar round at a U.S. military base that struck an ammunition supply depot, sparking a series of explosions that shook much of the capital Tuesday night and a massive fire that continued to smolder into the morning, the U.S. military said today.

Meanwhile shootings, bombings and rockets left at least 20 Iraqis dead and 46 injured today around the country. According to a controversial public health study published in the medical journal Lancet this week, more than 600,000 Iraqis have died violently since the 2003 U.S.-led invasion, more than 10 times the number obtained by canvassing Iraqi hospitals, morgues and government offices for death statistics.

Deposed Iraqi President Saddam Hussein and other defendants today returned to a special Baghdad courtroom to hear witness testimony, in which the former Iraqi regime is accused of orchestrating the mass murder of tens of thousands of Iraqi Kurds during the late 1980s campaign dubbed Anfal.

Tuesday night's earth-shaking explosions, which caused no casualties, sent shock waves across southern and central Baghdad shortly after 11 p.m. Fireballs and plumes of smoke could be seen rising hundreds of feet into the night sky from the area in southwestern Baghdad where Camp Falcon is located.

Arab-language television reported that the Islamic Army in Iraq, a Sunni Arab insurgent group, claimed responsibility for the attack, which ignited a tank, artillery and small-arms ammunition at the base.

"Intelligence indicates that civilians aligned with a militia organization were responsible for last night's mortar attack," Lt. Col Jonathan Withington, a U.S. military spokesman, said in a news release.

U.S., British and Iraqi military bases frequently draw of mortar and rocket fire that rarely inflict casualties, but frays nerves and diverts resources from peacekeeping and combat operations.

Multiple rockets and mortars struck near a British military base and a police station in the southern city of Basra on Tuesday. The same day, insurgents launched mortar and rocket attacks on three Iraqi army bases in the northern city of Kirkuk and another base in the southern city of Kut.

Tuesday night's attack south of Baghdad put the base on full alert, with helicopters and unmanned aerial drones launched to locate the mortar position. Firefighters and waste disposal experts continued to douse the fire today.

The ongoing trial of Hussein, disrupted Tuesday when the judge ejected Hussein and the six other defendants from the courtroom, resumed quietly today.

Judge Mohammed Orabi Khalefa opened the trial cordially, asking defendants to behave respectfully toward the alleged victims testifying in the trial.

Hussein politely protested the judge's decisions to cut off the broadcast of the trial sound at certain junctures and force him to stand up when he addresses the court.

"When the defendants speak you switch off the broadcast," he told the judge. "Is that fair?"

Uribe held firm.

"The microphone is for any legal argument but getting into political issues, this is not allowed," he said.

One of the complainants, who told the courtroom of how his village was destroyed and three of his siblings disappeared during the Anfal campaign, produced a document he said that showed 18 women, including 14 of his cousins, were sold to Egyptian nightclubs by Hussein's intelligence services.

But defendants strenuously objected. He apparently got the information from a Kurdish newspaper. The complainant, 50-year-old Abdul Khader Aziz, refused to answer when asked about his service in the Kurdish peshmerga militia and membership in the Communist Party.

Iraq Death Toll Study Has Mixed Reaction (AP)

By Malcolm Ritter

AP, October 12, 2006

President Bush says he doesn't believe it. Some experts have a problem with it. But several others say it seems sound. Such was the varied reception for a controversial new study that estimated the Iraq war has led to the deaths of nearly 655,000 Iraqis as of July.

DOJ_NMG_0079405

Researchers from Johns Hopkins University in Baltimore and the Al Mustansiriya University in Baghdad derived that estimate from a door-to-door survey, conducted by doctors, of 1,849 households in Iraq. Taking the number of deaths reported by household residents, they extrapolated to a nationwide figure.

The researchers, reflecting the inherent uncertainties in such extrapolations, said they were 95 percent certain that the real number lay somewhere between 392,979 and 942,636 deaths.

Even the smaller figure is almost eight times the estimate some others have derived.

The new study — which attributes roughly 600,000 of the deaths directly to violence and 55,000 more to other war-related causes — was released Wednesday on the Web site of The Lancet, a respected medical journal. But just how good is its conclusions?

"I don't consider it a credible report," President Bush said Wednesday.

Neither does Gen. George W. Casey, the top American military commander in Iraq.

"That 650,000 number seems way, way beyond any number that I have seen," Casey said. "I've not seen a number higher than 50,000. And so I don't give it that much credibility at all."

And neither does Michael E. O'Hanlon of the Brookings Institution, which also tracks Iraqi deaths.

"I do not believe the new numbers. I think they're way off," he said.

Other research methods on the ground, like body counts, forensic analysis and taking eyewitness reports, have produced numbers only about one-tenth as high, he said. "I have a hard time seeing how all the direct evidence could be that far off ... therefore I think the survey data is probably what's wrong."

However, several biostatisticians and survey experts were supportive of the work.

"Given the conditions (in Iraq), it's actually quite a remarkable effort," said Steve Heeringa, director of the statistical design group at the Institute for Social Research at the University of Michigan.

"I can't imagine them doing much more in a much more rigorous fashion."

He said the study made "minor departures" from the standards generally used in national surveys for choosing what households to interview. Whether those departures, brought on by wartime conditions in Iraq, introduced a bias in the results is impossible to measure from the data alone, he said.

Frank Harrell Jr., chair of the biostatistics department at Vanderbilt University, called the study design solid and said it included "rigorous, well-justified analysis of the data."

And Richard Brennan, head of health programs at the New York-Based International Rescue Committee, said the study's survey approach was typical.

"This is the most practical and appropriate methodology for sampling that we have in humanitarian conflict zones," said Brennan, whose group has conducted similar projects in Kosovo, Uganda and Congo.

"While the results of this survey may startle people, it's hard to argue with the methodology at this point."

Donald Berry, chairman of the statistics department at the University of Texas' M.D. Anderson Cancer Center in Houston, said he believes the study was done "in a reasonable way." But he said the range of uncertainty given for the estimates was much too narrow, because of potential statistical biases in the survey.

While it's impossible to calculate a better range that accounts for that, he said, it wouldn't be surprising if the low end dropped about four-fold to 100,000 deaths. A wider range of uncertainty would make the 655,000 figure less meaningful, he said.

Meanwhile, one of the study's authors said he's confident in the work's conclusions.

If the estimate seems high, it's because the door-to-door survey turned up deaths that are typically overlooked when sought by other means in wartime situations, said Les Roberts, who was with Johns Hopkins when he co-authored the study but has just taken a post at Columbia University.

As for extrapolating a nationwide figure from the sample of the few hundred deaths actually reported, "almost every statistic you've ever heard about health in America comes from a sample," Roberts said. "It may not be extremely precise, but at least it gets us in the right ballpark."

Iraq Disputes Claim Of 600,000 War Dead (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi

The Los Angeles Times, October 12, 2006

BAGHDAD — The Iraqi government on Wednesday condemned as "exaggerated" a controversial public health study concluding that more than 600,000 Iraqis have died violently since the toppling of Saddam Hussein's regime in 2003.

The statement came as shootings, bombings and rockets left at least 25 Iraqis dead and 46 injured around the country. The bodies of 40 people slain execution-style also were found in the capital, part of the surge in sectarian and insurgent strife that is killing an average of 100 a day, according to the United Nations.

A U.S. soldier also died early Wednesday from wounds suffered when his vehicle was hit in a roadside bombing.

The violence has undermined trust in the Shiite Muslim-led government, which was elected in December with a mandate to restore security. Though deaths of civilians have mounted, government spokesman Ali Dabbagh condemned as inaccurate the findings of U.S. and Iraqi public health researchers that were published this week in the medical journal Lancet.

"We affirm that these numbers are far from the truth and the Iraqi government is making efforts to protect the Iraqi citizen from forces of terror," Dabbagh said in a release.

The study found that, with 95% certainty, 426,369 to 793,663 Iraqis had died violently since the U.S.-led invasion in March 2003, with 601,027 statistically the most probable death toll. Those figures are many times higher than other reported estimates, including the figure of 50,000 reached by The Times in June after a weeks-long canvassing of Iraqi hospitals, morgues and government offices for death statistics.

On Wednesday, the Iraqi Health Ministry reported that more than 2,660 civilians had been killed in Baghdad in September, Associated Press reported. The toll was about 400 higher than in August, despite an intensified U.S.-Iraqi sweep aimed at reining in the violence.

The U.S. military on Wednesday reported that a mortar attack by insurgents caused a fire at a U.S. ammunition supply depot and sparked a series of explosions that shook much of the capital Tuesday night.

Arab-language television reported that the Islamic Army in Iraq, a Sunni Arab insurgent group, had claimed responsibility for the attack. The mortar shell ignited a fire that set off ammunition at Forward Operating Base Falcon in southern Baghdad.

"Intelligence indicates that civilians aligned with a militia organization were responsible for last night's mortar attack," military spokesman Army Lt. Col. Jonathan Withington said in a news release.

U.S., British and Iraqi military bases frequently draw mortar and rocket fire, which, though rarely inflicting casualties, frays nerves and diverts resources from peacekeeping and combat operations.

Amid the continuing violence, the dominant Shiites and Kurds overruled Sunnis and nationalist Shiites in parliament and narrowly passed a law Wednesday that allows for creation of self-ruled federal regions in Iraq, beginning in 18 months.

Many Shiites want to form an area in the south similar to the Kurdish region in the north, but Sunnis fear the move will lead to autonomous states in the north and south that control Iraq's oil wealth, excluding the central Sunni area.

Deposed Iraqi President Saddam Hussein and six codefendants returned to a Baghdad courtroom Wednesday to hear witness testimony. They are accused of orchestrating the killings of tens of thousands of Iraqi Kurds during a late-1980s campaign dubbed Anfal, or "spoils of war."

After ejecting the defendants from the courtroom Tuesday, chief Judge Mohammed Orabi Khalefa opened Wednesday's session cordially, asking them to behave respectfully toward the alleged victims testifying.

Hussein politely protested the judge's decisions to cut off the broadcast of the trial at certain junctures and force him to stand when he addressed the court.

"When the defendants speak, you switch off the broadcast," he told the judge. "Is that fair?"

The judge held firm.

"The microphone is for any legal argument, but getting into political issues, this is not allowed," he said.

One witness told the courtroom that his village was destroyed and three of his siblings disappeared during the Anfal campaign. Abdul Khader Aziz, 50, also produced a document he said showed that 18 women, including 14 of his cousins, were sold to Egyptian nightclubs by Hussein's intelligence services.

DOJ_NMG_0079407

But defendants strenuously objected that he had gotten the information from a Kurdish newspaper. Aziz refused to answer when asked about service in the Kurdish peshmerga militia that battled Hussein's regime and about membership in the Communist Party.

The trial is to resume Tuesday.

In Victory For Shiite Leader, Iraqi Parliament Approves Creating Autonomous Regions (NYT)

By Kirk Semple

The New York Times, October 12, 2006

BAGHDAD, Oct. 11 — Iraq's Shiite-dominated Parliament approved a law on Wednesday enabling provinces to unite to form autonomous regions, in spite of vehement opposition by Sunni Arab leaders who said it could splinter the republic and disadvantage the minority Sunni population.

The vote was a resounding victory for Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, leader of the dominant Shiite bloc, who wants to form an autonomous state from nine predominantly Shiite provinces of southern Iraq, a region that includes much of the nation's oil and other natural resources.

Mr. Hakim cast the result as a victory for democracy. "The road is open for all the Iraqi people to form any region they want, and it is up to the Iraqi people basically to decide this issue," he said.

The American military revealed on Wednesday that a spectacular series of explosions in a munitions depot on an American base here late Tuesday was caused by an 82-millimeter mortar fired by insurgents. The attack destroyed much of the stockpile, shut down most operations on the base and grounded a few battalions, compelling the military to move troops from elsewhere in Baghdad to cover the units' patrol areas.

The right to form semi-independent regions was guaranteed in the Iraqi Constitution, which voters approved a year ago. The law passed Wednesday merely defined the mechanisms of the process.

The law allows provinces to hold referendums on whether to merge into larger states, but it imposes an 18-month moratorium on the process. Consent by a third of a province's governing council or a tenth of its electorate can prompt a referendum, which would then require approval by a majority of voters to pass.

The Sunni Arab blocs and some Shiite and secular legislators, who had united last month to block the legislation, boycotted the session on Wednesday in an unsuccessful effort to prevent a quorum. But 140 of the 275 members attended and voted unanimously for the bill, The Associate Press reported.

Sunni Arab leaders fear that any plan to divide Iraq into regions would eventually shift control of its oil wealth to the Kurds in the north and the Shiites in the south, leaving them with the relatively barren central and western regions. The Kurds already have an autonomous region, but hope to expand it.

"We had our objections, and when they were disregarded, we found that the best way to deal with that was to boycott the session," said Salman al-Jumaili, a legislator from the Iraqi Consensus Front, the largest Sunni bloc. "We believe that implementing this law in its present form will be a prescription for dividing Iraq."

In the governing Shiite coalition, which remains divided on the issue, legislators loyal to the Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr, an ardent nationalist, have demanded that any discussion of federalism proceed only after American forces have left Iraq.

Members of the Fadhila Party, a Shiite group wary of Mr. Hakim's power, had opposed the law because it did not include clauses to prevent the formation of one huge federation across southern Iraq.

The mortar attack on Forward Operating Base Falcon, on the southern fringes of Baghdad was conducted by "civilians aligned with a militia organization," an American military statement said. The insurgents fired four 82-millimeter rounds at the base and one struck the ordnance supply, igniting tank, artillery and small-arms ammunition, officials said.

Powerful explosions continued for several hours, spraying huge chunks of jagged shrapnel across the base, destroying trailers, breaking windows, knocking doors off their hinges and shaking buildings across the capital, where alarmed residents were reminded of overnight aerial bombardments that signaled the start of the American-led invasion in 2003.

Three people were lightly wounded, all servicemen on the base who quickly returned to duty, military officials said.

DOJ_NMG_0079408

Troops were forced to remain indoors until bomb squads could begin clearing the base of live and exploded ordnance, officials said. In the meantime, armored Stryker units were scrambled to the area to cover the base's area of control, which includes the troubled Dora neighborhood.

The Islamic Army in Iraq, a nationalist insurgent group, took responsibility for the attack. "With the help of God, the mortar and rocket squads of the Islamic Army have shelled a U.S. Army base with two rockets and three mortar shells," the group said in a posting on a Web site used by insurgent groups, The Associated Press reported.

In other violence in Baghdad, at least 13 people were killed and dozens more were wounded in several attacks Wednesday, officials said. In the most deadly event, unidentified gunmen stormed a house in Dora, killing five members of a family and wounding two others, said an official at Yarmouk Hospital, where the bodies of the victims had been taken.

The American military announced Wednesday that three marines were killed Monday in an insurgent attack in Anbar Province, and an American soldier was killed Wednesday when an bomb exploded near his patrol in central Baghdad.

At least 41 American soldiers have been killed this month, according to Iraq Coalition Casualty Count, an independent Web site that tracks military deaths based on military news releases and media reports.

Parliament Approves Measure Allowing Autonomous Regions (WP)

By Amit R. Paley, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 12, 2006

BAGHDAD, Oct. 11 -- Parliament on Wednesday approved a controversial law that will allow Iraq to be carved into a federation of autonomous regions, after Sunni Arabs and some Shiite Muslims stormed out of the session in protest.

The bill passed the 275-member parliament by a vote of 141 to 0, despite a nearly successful attempt by opponents to prevent a quorum by walking out, said Mohanned Abdul Jabbar, an aide to parliament speaker Mahmoud al-Mashhadani.

The measure, introduced by a powerful Shiite group last month, creates a mechanism that many believe will lead to a predominantly Shiite zone in southern Iraq that would parallel the semiautonomous Kurdish region in the north. Sunnis vehemently oppose such a division, which would leave them with an area in central Iraq that lacks the vast oil wealth of the north and south.

Under a compromise worked out two weeks ago, the bill includes a provision that prevents the formation of federal regions for 18 months. In exchange for that delay and the creation of a panel to review the constitution, the Sunnis agreed to call off a boycott that had prevented the federalism bill from being introduced.

Although the principle of federalism is enshrined in the constitution, the law passed by parliament is the first to set up a system that will allow provinces in 2008 to merge into autonomous regions.

"This is a first step on a long road toward a new system of governance in Iraq," said Ridha Jawad Taqi, a legislator with the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, the Shiite political party that was the measure's strongest supporter. "It will be up to the residents of whatever province to submit a request and go through the system."

But opponents of the bill -- including not only Sunni Arabs but secular parties and the bloc of anti-American Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr -- expressed fears that the federalism plan could increase sectarian tensions and push the country further toward civil war.

"This is the beginning of the plan to divide Iraq," said Adnan al-Dulaimi, leader of the National Accordance Front, a major Sunni bloc, according to the Associated Press. "We hope there won't be an increase in violence."

Nasaar al-Rubaie, a lawmaker from the Sadr bloc, said: "The present conditions are not conducive to establishing regions, because we lack a strong central government that can overrule the regions." In fact, he added, "the central authority is actually weakening instead of being solidified and strengthened."

Also on Wednesday, former electricity minister Aiham al-Sammarae was convicted of corruption and sentenced to two years in prison. Afterward, U.S. troops took custody of Sammarae, who holds dual Iraqi-American citizenship, because he feared being killed if he was placed in jail, said government spokesman Ali al-Dabbagh.

Dabbagh said that the Iraqi government had demanded his return and that the Americans agreed. "The government of Iraq expects that the Americans will respect Iraqi juridical authority," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0079409

Lou Fintor, a spokesman for the U.S. Embassy, said he could not comment because "federal privacy law prohibits us from releasing information concerning U.S. citizens in the absence of a Privacy Act waiver."

The U.S. military on Wednesday also announced the deaths of four troops, bringing the death toll for American forces this month to at least 40. The military said a soldier was killed Wednesday after his patrol was struck by a bomb in central Baghdad, and three Marines assigned to the 1st Brigade of the 1st Armored Division were killed Monday in Anbar province.

Special correspondent K.I. Ibrahim contributed to this report.

U.S. Agency Cites Flaws In Another Iraqi Construction Project (NYT)

By James Glanz

The New York Times, October 12, 2006

The American-financed rebuilding of an Iraqi police headquarters that was meant to show a new approach to reconstruction has instead turned out to be rife with shoddy construction and is exposing security forces to unnecessary risk, a federal oversight agency said yesterday.

The criticism has come in the midst of an intensive American push to train and equip a police force capable of restoring order to Iraq's increasingly violent streets.

The headquarters project, in the ethnically divided and volatile northern city of Mosul, is the second police-related contract to face harsh criticism recently. Two weeks ago, the same oversight agency told Congress of grotesque plumbing failures and other problems at a $72 million police college in Baghdad.

In the earlier project, most of the criticism was directed at Parsons, the American contractor hired by the United States Army Corps of Engineers to carry out the work with the help of Iraqi subcontractors. But this time, in a step the Army Corps has said will eliminate some of the construction problems, the work was contracted directly to a local Iraqi company.

But the Mosul police headquarters project, a $988,000 contract that was much smaller and presumably simpler than the earlier one, suffered some of the same troubles, according to a report released yesterday by the agency, the Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction.

Brian M. Flynn, the assistant inspector general for inspections at the oversight agency, said there had been no plans to look into the headquarters, called One West, until an inspection team happened to be in Mosul and was approached by the Iraqi police.

The police "were so upset with the quality of construction that they asked us to inspect it while we were there," Mr. Flynn said.

Problems with the construction were not hard to find, the agency's report said. One part of the contract called for the construction of 10 showers, 12 toilets, 10 urinals, 10 sinks and a changing room at One West. Instead, just one shower and one toilet had been built, and there was no changing room. A tree in the spot where the construction took place was allowed to remain standing, and its trunk was cemented into the building's structure.

Numerous other plumbing and construction shortcomings turned up, an electrical generator was delivered but not installed and instead of installing fans in the guard houses, as called for in the contract, workers installed extra windows, leaving the guards exposed in a city where police stations have frequently been attacked.

The problems stemmed from a poor Iraqi contractor and a lack of inspection by Army engineers early in the project, said Stuart W. Bowen Jr., who runs the oversight agency.

"The issue is oversight," Mr. Bowen said. "Our experience is that where there is good oversight there are good projects."

Mr. Bowen cited a courthouse project in Baghdad on which the Army Corps of Engineers kept closer tabs; the inspectors declared it a success. The agency also released a report on that project yesterday.

Maj. Gen. William H. McCoy Jr., commander of the Army Corps' Gulf Region Division until his tenure ends early next week, called Mr. Bowen's findings on One West "on the mark." General McCoy said that for about six months after the project began, in September 2005, government overseers failed to monitor the Iraqi contractor or accurately report construction problems.

DOJ_NMG_0079410

But General McCoy said the corps eventually discovered the problems and was taking steps to terminate the contract when the federal inspectors arrived on the scene. Half the contractor's payment was eventually withheld, he said, and much of the chain of command in charge of the corps' overseers was replaced.

"As a result," General McCoy said, "the performance of this office has greatly improved."

Afghanistan Five Years Later: Charting The Reconstruction (CSM)

The Christian Science Monitor, October 12, 2006

The United States and its coalition partners launched "Operation Enduring Freedom - Afghanistan" in October 2001 as a response to the attacks of Sept. 11. At the time of the invasion, Afghanistan was already a broken nation. Decades of war and austere fundamentalist rule had left the country with little in the way of industry, infrastructure, government institutions, or an educational system.

In the five years since the invasion, the coalition has worked to fill a gaping political vacuum in the face of growing challenges. Since 2001, poppy cultivation in Afghanistan has increased from 8,000 hectares to 165,000 hectares. But Afghanistan has also made strong democratic advances, and the education system has markedly improved. Since 1999, the percentage of Afghans enrolled in primary school rose from 25 percent to 93 percent. The road to democracy

Afghanistan's first democratically elected parliament in more than three decades of conflict convened on Dec. 19, 2005, the culmination of an international effort.

2001

Oct. 7: US and British military strikes launched on Afghanistan as the Taliban refuse US demands to hand over Osama bin Laden, blamed for the 9/11 attacks.

Dec. 22: Hamid Karzai, leader of one of the largest tribes in southern Afghanistan, is sworn in as head of a six-month, post-Taliban government following agreements reached in Bonn, Germany, including an interim powersharing arrangement, the creation of a new constitution, and presidential and parliamentary elections in 2004. The International Assistance Force in Afghanistan (ISAF) is established.

2002

April 18: Deposed Afghan monarch Mohammed Zahir Shah, 87 at the time, returns from 29 years' exile in Italy, escorted by Karzai, to oversee the loya jirga, Afghanistan's traditional grand assembly.

June 10: After a power struggle, Zahir Shah renounces claim as head of state and endorses Karzai.

June 13: Karzai elected for a two-year term by the the loya jirga.

July 6: Vice President Abdul Qadir is assassinated.

Sept. 5: Karzai survives assassination attempt in Kandahar.

October: A constitutional commission of 35 members is appointed to draft a constitution.

2003

Aug. 11: NATO assumes command of the ISAF, under leadership of Germany and the Netherlands at the time, the first NATO peacekeeping mission outside of the Euro-Atlantic area since NATO's creation in 1949.

December: Constitutional Loya Jirga delegates - 500 Afghan civic leaders - meet in Kabul to debate draft constitution.

2004

Jan. 4: The traditional grand assembly, the loya jirga, ratifies a new constitution proposing a presidential system of government with Afghanistan as an Islamic state.

July 9: Electoral commission announces that presidential elections will be on Oct. 9, but delays parliamentary polls until 2005.

Oct. 9: First post-Taliban presidential elections pass without major incident; more than 8.1 million Afghans participate.

Nov. 3: Karzai proclaimed winner with 55 percent of vote.

2005

March 17: Karzai announces delay in parliamentary polls until September.

DOJ_NMG_0079411

July 12: Election officials say more than 5,800 candidates are eligible for the elections, more than 10 percent of them women. Later, several candidates are disqualified, mainly for links to armed factions.

Sept. 15: Taliban militants shoot dead an election candidate, the seventh to die in violence before the poll.

Sept. 18: More than 6.2 million Afghans vote in the first parliamentary elections since 1969.

Nov. 12: After a series of delays, election results are released confirming several seats for former regional warlords and some ex-Taliban.

Dec. 10: Karzai announces his choices for the remaining 34 seats in the upper house.

Dec. 16: Three days before parliament is due to open, a bomb explodes near the parliament building, killing an apparent suicide attacker and wounding two others.

Dec. 19: National Assembly inaugurated in Kabul; parliament convenes for the first time since 1973.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Options Scandal Snares Tech Chiefs (FT)

By Kevin Allison In San Francisco

Financial Times, October 12, 2006

The chief executives of McAfee, the antivirus software maker, and CNET, an online publisher, quit on Wednesday over Silicon Valley's options backdating scandal.

Their departures are likely to increase fears that the apparently widespread practice could lead to a broader shake-up of senior leadership in the world's leading technology hotspot.

The resignations come a week after Apple Computer cleared Steve Jobs, its co-founder and chief executive, of wrongdoing over options backdating, even though he was aware of the practice in "a few instances".

Shares in McAfee rose 2.4 per cent after the company said it had appointed Dale Fuller, the former chief executive of Borland Software, to replace George Samenuk as chief executive.

Mr Samenuk said: "I regret that some of the stock options problems . . . occurred on my watch." His departure followed news that the company would be required to restate its earnings by $100m to $150m to account for improper backdating.

McAfee said it had ousted Kevin Weiss, president, who joined the company in 2002 and became president in March, several years after improper backdating at the company began.

Mr Fuller declined to elaborate, noting that shareholders would be able to "read everything . . . in excruciating detail" in filings.

Shares in CNET, owner of the technology news website, dropped 6.5 per cent after the company announced the departure of Shelby Bonnie, its co-founder, chairman and chief executive. He resigned after an internal probe found the group backdated some options grants between 1996 to "at least" 2003.

Mr Bonnie said he was "deeply disappointed" that backdating occurred under his leadership.

2 More Executives Resign Over Options (NYT)

By Laurie J. Flynn

The New York Times, October 12, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO, Oct. 11 — McAfee Inc. and CNet Networks both announced on Wednesday that their chief executives had stepped down, as casualties from investigations of stock option grants continued to mount.

The departures came as internal reports at both companies — which are also under investigation by federal regulators — revealed that accounting discrepancies might have inflated the value of stock options granted to executives. More than 100 public companies are the focus of similar inquiries, including dozens in Silicon Valley.

McAfee, a major seller of antivirus software, said George Samenuk, chief executive since 2001, had retired and that Kevin Weiss, the company's president, had been fired.

DOJ_NMG_0079412

Dale L. Fuller, who joined McAfee's board in January, was named interim chief executive and president. Charles J. Robel, who joined the McAfee board in June, was named chairman.

"I regret that some of the stock option problems identified by the special committee occurred on my watch," Mr. Samenuk said in a statement, adding that he was stepping down "in the company's best interest."

In a conference call with Wall Street analysts on Wednesday, Mr. Fuller declined to provide details on Mr. Weiss's firing.

Shares of McAfee rose 85 cents, or 3.3 percent, to close at $26.64 on Wednesday. The company is trading well above its 52-week low of $19.52 reached in August.

Rumors have circulated on Wall Street recently that McAfee might be an acquisition target. Eugene Munster, an analyst with Piper Jaffray, said the departure of Mr. Samenuk made that possibility even more likely. "I believe McAfee now is going to get bought," he said. "The fact that it is a rudderless ship makes it a more attractive prospect."

Mr. Fuller, whose eight months on the McAfee board give him relatively little direct experience with the company, told analysts he was well prepared to run the company and had already begun meeting with McAfee's executive team. Mr. Fuller was chief executive of Borland Software for six years and also served as general manager of Apple Computer's Powerbook division.

McAfee, based in Santa Clara, Calif., said that as a result of the accounting problem it could have to restate as many as 10 years of financial records and take a charge of $100 million to $150 million.

In May, McAfee fired its general counsel, Kent Roberts, just days before it announced that it was being investigated by the Securities and Exchange Commission over its stock options.

Many of the recent options investigations have involved backdating, in which a company typically selects a grant date when its stock price was lower, increasing the value of the options for employees who sell them later for a higher price.

CNet, the online media company, announced Wednesday that Shelby W. Bonnie, a CNet cofounder who had led the company since 2000, resigned as chairman and chief executive. Neil M. Ashe, who joined CNet four years ago as head of corporate strategy and development, was named chief executive, while Jarl Mohn, a former television executive, was named chairman. Mr. Bonnie will remain on the CNet board.

A special committee established by CNet's board in May found that in some instances option grants were backdated in the period from the company's initial public offering in 1996 to 2003. Mr. Bonnie, as well as three other former executives, bear responsibility, though none of them "engaged in intentional wrongdoing," a company statement said.

"I apologize for the option-related problems that happened under my leadership," Mr. Bonnie said in a statement. "I believe that the company has come a long way since 2003 in addressing these deficiencies, but am deeply disappointed it happened nonetheless."

As a result of having to restate previous financial results, CNet, based in San Francisco, also revised its outlook for the third quarter. The company now estimates revenue of $92.8 million, compared with previous estimates of $93 million to $96 million. For the full year, CNET expects revenue of $376 million to $386 million, down from a previous forecast of $386 million to $403 million.

CNet shares tumbled on the news, falling 76 cents, or 7.7 percent, to $9.14.

The developments at McAfee and CNet come just days after Monster Worldwide announced that its chairman and chief executive, Andrew McKelvey, had resigned, saying he was unable to devote enough time to the company's options investigation.

And last week, Apple Computer announced that Fred D. Anderson had resigned his post on Apple's board as a result of the company's investigation into the timing of stock option grants during his tenure as finance chief. A committee investigating Apple's accounting practices said last week that Steven P. Jobs, Apple's chief executive, had not benefited from stock option backdating.

Two former executives of Brocade Communications Systems are facing criminal charges related to the backdating of stock options.

Given the number of investigations under way, analysts say the options scandal is far from over. "I think ultimately you're going to see more C.E.O.'s resign over this," Mr. Munster of Piper Jaffray said.

Adobe Options Review

DOJ_NMG_0079413

WASHINGTON, Oct. 11 (Dow Jones) — Adobe Systems, the design and software graphics company, said Wednesday that a review of its stock option granting processes found no improper grants to company executives. But the company said that some grants to employees were changed after their grant date.

The company had not previously disclosed that it was reviewing its option grants. The company said it would correct accounting errors related to the changed options.

As Companies Probe Backdating, More Top Officials Take A Fall (WSJ)

By Charles Forelle And James Bandler

The Wall Street Journal, October 12, 2006

Five senior officers at two well-known Silicon Valley companies became the latest corporate casualties of the stock-options backdating scandal, adding to a toll that is likely to continue to rise as companies wrap up probes of their internal practices.

In the latest actions, Shelby Bonnie, founder and chief executive officer of Web publisher CNET Networks Inc., and George Samenuk, chairman and CEO of computer-security vendor McAfee Inc., stepped down following internal probes that found use of options backdating. So far, some two dozen executives or directors have been fired or suspended or have resigned amid options probes. Among them are top officials of Apple Computer Inc., Web-site operator Monster Worldwide Inc. and software maker Comverse Technology Inc., whose former CEO is facing extradition proceedings in Namibia.

Experts said more departures are likely. More than 100 companies are under investigation for options backdating, and scores of them are still conducting internal probes. Many would like to finish them in time to make disclosures during quarterly earnings reporting, which will be heavy in the next several weeks. The companies face pressure to finish because they may not be able to tally their earnings without knowing whether they will need to record charges for any improper options discovered by the probes.

WSJ's Charles Forelle discusses7 why so many executives are getting caught up in the options backdating scandal and whether more departures are likely.

Many companies have already said they won't meet securities-filing deadlines for the quarter, leaving them at risk of delisting, costly fights with bondholders entitled to timely financial statements, and potentially greater liability in any options-related civil actions by shareholders.

Charles Elson, director of the John L. Weinberg Center for Corporate Governance at the University of Delaware, said he believes more people will lose their jobs. "It is a fundamental breach of trust to your investors," he said.

Backdating amounts to pretending that an option was granted earlier than it actually was, at a beneficial time when the share was trading at a low price. Since options entitle their recipients to profit from a rise in price, claiming the grant occurred at a time of low prices could give the recipient a running start to extra profit.

At a minimum, backdating generally involves accounting and disclosure violations. It can also constitute fraud. U.S. attorneys in more than a half-dozen jurisdictions are probing at least 50 companies. Five former executives of two companies are facing federal criminal charges for their alleged participation in backdating schemes.

Firing an executive doesn't necessarily get a company off the hook with regulators or litigious shareholders, but can be held up as a sign of good faith. The actions at CNET and McAfee underscore how seriously some corporate boards are taking options manipulation. Taken with other recent dismissals, they are establishing a precedent that separating executives from the company is a prudent response to options problems.

Getting rid of someone can be a double-edged sword, though. "The SEC [Securities and Exchange Commission] and the Department of Justice expect crisp remedial measures, so termination of a wrongdoing executive typically helps the company in the eyes of those regulators," says Michael Young, a lawyer at Willkie Farr & Gallagher. "Unfortunately, it can hurt in the defense of subsequent class-action litigation to the extent that plaintiff's lawyers infer that the departed executive did something wrong."

The McAfee departures suggest also that some boards, guided by outside lawyers conducting the probes, are taking a stern view of responsibility. Mr. Samenuk joined McAfee in January 2001, long after manipulations there apparently started. President Kevin Weiss, whose firing was announced yesterday, joined the company in October 2002.

DOJ_NMG_0079414

In a statement, Mr. Samenuk expressed "regret" that some of the problems "occurred on my watch." Mr. Weiss couldn't be reached. Exactly what Messrs. Samenuk and Weiss did that precipitated their departures isn't known; a McAfee spokeswoman said the men were "implicated in the options backdating" but declined to elaborate.

Exactly who will go and who will stay at the scores of companies being investigated is difficult to discern. An executive's fate, of course, depends strongly on what evidence a review finds. But how that evidence is treated can vary from company to company.

Apple Computer threaded the needle last week when it discussed superstar CEO Steve Jobs's role in backdating at the company. Apple's disclosure said Mr. Jobs knew some grants were backdated; earlier, the company said he received a problematic grant. But Apple also said last week that Mr. Jobs wasn't aware of the accounting implications of backdating and didn't get any grants he knew were backdated, implying that any troublesome grant he received was manipulated for his benefit but was backdated without his knowledge. Apple's relatively terse disclosure didn't spell out exactly who did what.

Mr. Jobs apologized and remains with the company, which laid the blame on two unnamed former executives. Apple director Fred Anderson, a former finance chief, resigned from the board.

Bed Bath & Beyond Inc., the specialty retailer, said Tuesday that its review had found rampant backdating, concluding that "almost all annual grant dates" for several years were likely selected "with some hindsight." At a time when many corporate disclosures about backdating are opaquely written, the company's statement was frank and detailed, laying out how many grants the company believed were backdated and giving a sketch of how the process worked.

What's more, Bed Bath & Beyond said, the co-chairmen and chief executive had responsibility for picking the dates; the men themselves benefited from the low prices. But the board committee probing the options offenses concluded that no one had "engaged in willful misconduct." No top executives have departed Bed Bath & Beyond because of options misdeeds.

Mr. Young, the Willkie Farr attorney, says that in investigations of matters like options backdating, board committees try to probe deeply an executive's state of mind. "When somebody is deliberately doing something wrong, and misrepresenting the consequences, then you've got dishonesty in the ranks," says Mr. Young. That, he says, is dealt with harshly. What to do can be a tough call, he says, with "those whose involvement was gray."

San Francisco-based CNET said its review, conducted by law firm Davis Polk & Wardwell and led by a special committee of directors, found "instances of backdating" from the company's initial public offering in 1996 through "at least 2003." Even though CNET said its review didn't conclude that any of these people "engaged in intentional wrongdoing," Mr. Bonnie, General Counsel Sharon Le Duy and human-resources head Heather McGaughey all "bear varying degrees of responsibility." They all resigned and agreed to have any improper options repriced so that they wouldn't continue to benefit from the backdating.

CNET also said directors will reprice improper options; a company spokeswoman says the repricing affects "all members of the board of directors, to varying degrees depending on their length of service."

It isn't clear exactly which grants were backdated, though some raise suspicion. In 2000, CNET granted options to Mr. Bonnie and two other top executives with purported dates that coincided with the stock's lowest closing price in April. Other executives got options dated at October's low price. One received both favorable dates.

Melinda Haag, a lawyer for Ms. Le Duy, said her client neither knew about nor participated in any intentional misdating of options. "Sharon has always acted with integrity with regard to CNET's stock-option grant process and in all other regards," Ms. Haag said. "Given that she was a senior officer for part of the time at issue, however, Sharon recognized that her resignation would best help the company move forward."

An attorney for Mr. Bonnie couldn't be reached for comment.

Ms. McGaughey, a former Time Inc. manager, joined CNET in 1998 as vice president of human resources. She became senior vice president in 2000. "Ms. McGaughey is deeply saddened by the events that have happened at CNET," said her lawyer, Leigh A. Kirmsse. "She believes that in the end her name will be completely cleared of any wrongdoing whatsoever."

Kirk Hanson, executive director of the Markkula Center for Applied Ethics at Santa Clara University, said companies are operating in a climate that places great weight on the integrity of senior-most executives.

Mr. Hanson said he believes a senior executive who initiated or authorized backdating should leave his position.

DOJ_NMG_0079415

"If a CEO who is tainted remains in place, a very unfortunate signal is given to the organization that irregular practices will be tolerated or even applauded," Mr. Hanson said. "This is not a question of whether the CEO is indictable; it is a question of whether the CEO is a credible leader of integrity."

Two Tech Companies Shake Up Leadership (USAT)

By Jon Swartz

USA Today, October 12, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO — Computer-security firm McAfee on Wednesday said chairman and CEO George Samenuk retired and president Kevin Weiss was fired because of accounting discrepancies in stock options.

Shortly after McAfee's announcement, CNet Networks said its co-founder, Shelby Bonnie, resigned as chairman and CEO after an internal investigation at the online media company concluded he shared the blame for backdating CNet stock options.

The Silicon Valley companies both will restate financial results. They are the latest caught in a deepening investigation that has touched more than 120 companies, and led to executive departures at Apple, software maker Mercury Interactive and others.

The new corporate scandals center on how companies handle stock options. Most involve backdating options to days when the company's stock price was lower, inflating executive payouts.

The problems hardly constitute a "crisis in confidence" in tech companies, where stock options first became a staple of compensation packages during the 1990s. But it badly diminishes the reputation of executives, says Charles Elson, director of the University of Delaware's center for corporate governance. As more companies dig into their records, he predicts more executive ousters and financial restatements. "The determination that needs to be made is whether it was intentional, sloppy bookkeeping or a mere coincidence," Elson says. "If it's the former, severe actions like fines may result."

In a statement, McAfee said Samenuk, 51, was retiring, and Weiss was terminated. It fired its general counsel in May after determining he had been involved in option improprieties. McAfee said in June that securities regulators had opened a formal investigation.

"I regret that some of the stock option problems … occurred on my watch," Samenuk said in a statement.

Replacing Samenuk and Weiss on an interim basis is Dale Fuller, 48, a McAfee board member who was CEO and president of Borland Software. McAfee also named board member Charles Robel as chairman.

McAfee said it intends to soon file its restated financial results and annual report and look for a permanent CEO. The charges are likely to be $100 million to $150 million over a 10-year period, it said.

Despite the shake-up, McAfee shares rose 3.3% to $26.64 Wednesday, a reflection of investor sentiment that a management change was in order. Samenuk "has been perceived on Wall Street as unpredictable and inconsistent in financial performance," says analyst Gene Munster of investment bank Piper Jaffray. "For every three good quarters, there was a clunker."

The shake-up also renewed speculation that McAfee could be acquired by Hewlett-Packard or IBM, he says.

CNet, meanwhile, said some stock options were backdated from its initial public offering in 1996 to at least 2003. It appointed Neil Ashe as its new CEO and board member. He has led the company's acquisition of content. It also named Jarl Mohn, a former executive at E! Entertainment Television and MTV, as non-executive chairman. CNet shares fell 7.6% to $9.14.

Scandal Grows Over Backdating Of Options (WP)

By Frank Ahrens

The Washington Post, October 12, 2006

The heads of three well-known technology companies lost their jobs this week as the result of a scandal sweeping through the business world over the improper backdating of stock options, a practice often designed to inflate the value of stock grants to employees.

Internet news publisher Cnet Networks Inc., security software firm McAfee Inc. and online recruitment service Monster Worldwide Inc. announced the resignation or retirement of their chief executives, all apparently over concerns about how the companies granted stock options.

The three are the latest of at least 135 companies to acknowledge or be investigated for backdating stock options, which typically involves picking dates for stock grants when the purchase price was low, so that when the stock is sold, the holder can make more money. The practice is not illegal as long as the options are properly accounted for on company earnings sheets and tax returns.

DOJ_NMG_0079416

According to the Securities and Exchange Commission and the Justice Department, however, a number of companies have not followed the rules. Federal authorities have filed fraud charges against executives at two technology companies, and they continue to investigate many firms.

The investigations are sending shock waves through the tech community, where stock options have long been a key tool for luring talent to start-ups.

"The primary concern in [Silicon] Valley is how many CEOs will be fired, and how many will be indicted," said Kirk O. Hanson, executive director of the Markkula Center for Applied Ethics at Santa Clara University.

Though the scandal lacks Enron's hubris or Tyco's Saturnalian excess, the consequences are grave: Cnet founder Shelby W. Bonnie resigned yesterday as chief executive and apologized for his role in the backdating options. The company issued an internal report that said Cnet backdated options from 1996 through 2003 and partially blamed Bonnie.

Also yesterday, McAfee fired its president, Kevin Weiss, and announced that chief executive George Samenuk was retiring. Earlier in the week, Monster's chief executive, Andrew J. McKelvey, resigned. Last week, Apple Computer Inc. announced the resignation of board member Fred D. Anderson over stock option issues.

Though many of the higher-profile companies under scrutiny are tech firms in Silicon Valley, the SEC and Justice Department are casting their nets widely, investigating companies as varied as Home Depot Inc. and Cheesecake Factory Inc. The SEC said in testimony to Congress last month that it is investigating more than 100 companies for possible fraudulent reporting of option grants.

"As the use of options compensation has increased, however, so apparently has its abuse," SEC enforcement director Linda Thompson testified. "This practice benefits employees at the expense of shareholders."

Former Comverse Technology Inc. chief executive Kobi Alexander is awaiting extradition from Namibia on federal charges related to his company's options practices. Former Brocade Communications Systems Inc. chief executive Gregory L. Reyes also faces federal charges.

How does backdating work?

Companies have long issued stock options to their employees to motivate them. Options allow an employee to buy a certain number of company shares at a price set by management, usually the price the day the option is granted.

The employee makes the most profit by buying stock options at a low price and selling them when the stock market has pumped up the company's stock to a higher price. If a company backdates options, it typically allows the employee to buy options when the stock was at its lowest point, thereby increasing the profit when the stock is sold.

Options usually are granted to a company's highest executives as part of their compensation packages. Backdating has been criticized as a shady way for wealthy executives to get wealthier, even if the company performs poorly.

The process is not illegal if no company documents have been forged, if the other shareholders have been informed and if the backdated options are correctly accounted for in company earnings and tax returns.

It may be legal, but it's "slimy," said Nell Minow, co-founder of the Corporate Library, a corporate-governance watchdog. "It subverts the whole justification for options," she said.

Minow was in New York yesterday lecturing corporate directors on a number of topics, including backdated options.

"No one comes to you and says, 'Let's backdate our options,' " she said. A company's human resources department "will tell an employee, 'We have a great benefit with our options -- a 60-day look-back.' That doesn't sound quite so dirty."

Backdating has cost some companies more than their chief executives. Many have had to restate earnings and take charges on upcoming earnings to account for the improperly recorded options.

For example, in August, Clorox Co. said it took a $25 million pretax charge in its most recent quarter to account for "errors" in how the company accounted for options. Research in Motion Ltd., maker of the BlackBerry, said last month that a review of its options-accounting practices could reduce past earnings by as much as $45 million. Also last month, chipmaker Broadcom Corp. said it would restate earnings to take $1.5 billion worth of options expenses off its books.

DOJ_NMG_0079417

McAfee, Cnet Chiefs Leave As Options Scandal Deepens (Update2) (BLOOM)

By Rebecca Barr And Rick Green

Bloomberg, October 12, 2006

Oct. 11 (Bloomberg) -- The federal crackdown on stock- options backdating claimed the chief executive officers of McAfee Inc. and Cnet Networks Inc., deepening a scandal that has cost investors more than $2.5 billion of earnings.

McAfee, the No. 2 maker of anti-virus software, said Chairman and CEO George Samenuk resigned, fired President Kevin Weiss and announced plans to slash 10 years of previously reported profits by as much as $150 million. Cnet, the online publisher of technology news and reviews, said CEO Shelby Bonnie and two other executives stepped down after an internal probe found the company backdated some stock-option grants.

The toll from backdating continues to mount. More than 30 officials, including eight CEOs, have left companies under scrutiny for manipulating stock options to reward employees, and executives at two, Brocade Communications Systems Inc. and Comverse Technology Inc., face criminal charges. More than 60 companies -- from Apple Computer Inc. to Cablevision Systems Corp. -- have restated or plan to revise earnings.

``It's getting worse before it gets better," said Howard Silverblatt, an analyst at Standard & Poor's in New York. ``The issue will become more widespread as more companies are coming forward voluntarily instead of waiting for official inquiries."

At least 140 companies have disclosed federal investigations or internal probes of potential stock-option manipulation. The Justice Department, the Securities and Exchange Commission, the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the Internal Revenue Service are among the agencies running civil or criminal probes.

Scratching the Surface

Meantime, investors have filed more than 230 lawsuits seeking compensation for the profits that executives and other employees made from improper grants and the earnings misstatements that may have resulted.

``I think we have scratched the surface," said Derek Meisner, a partner in the Boston office of Kirkpatrick & Lockhart Nicholson Graham LLP who's advising companies he declined to name on whether to terminate executives over stock-option manipulation. ``You are going to see more of it as companies conclude internal investigations and the SEC completes its investigations. This is kind of the tip of the iceberg."

Backdating, the most serious abuse, involves retroactively pegging options to an earlier day when a company's stock was trading at a lower price. When the stock rises, holders of backdated grants can buy shares at artificially low levels and pocket the difference.

If not disclosed to shareholders, backdating can be considered fraudulent. The practice hides compensation costs, reduces income-tax payments and overstates earnings.

Widespread Fallout

Companies from Broadcom Corp. to CA Inc. have said restatements for stock-option errors will cut past earnings by more than $2.5 billion. Not since the probe into improper mutual- fund trading three years ago has a scandal swept up as many companies and led to fallout so widespread. That investigation resulted in $4.3 billion in penalties.

Most of the companies that found backdating or other errors in stock-option grants have said the practices weren't deliberate and didn't take action against any executives or board members.

San Francisco-based Cnet is among the exceptions. The company said in a statement today that a special committee of its board, assisted by law firm Davis Polk & Wardwell, found evidence of backdating from 1996 to at least 2003.

Cnet said several executives, including Bonnie, ``bear varying degrees of responsibility for these deficiencies." Neil Ashe, the company's head of strategy, replaced Bonnie as CEO. Jarl Mohn, former CEO of Liberty Digital Inc. and E! Entertainment Television, will be non-executive chairman of Cnet's board.

`I Apologize'

``I apologize for the option-related problems that happened under my leadership," Bonnie, who helped start Cnet in 1993, said in the statement. ``I believe that the company has come a long way since 2003 in addressing these deficiencies, but am deeply disappointed it happened nonetheless."

DOJ_NMG_0079418

General Counsel Sharon Le Duy and the head of personnel, Heather McGaughey, also left because of the options investigation, Cnet said. The company previously disclosed probes by the U.S. Attorney for the Northern District of California and the SEC.

McAfee said director Dale Fuller will take over as president and interim CEO until a replacement is found. Director Charles Robel will become non-executive chairman. Chief Financial Officer Eric Brown declined to elaborate on the ouster of Weiss, 50, during a conference call.

`My Watch'

``If the CEO is somehow culpable then dumping the CEO allows the company to tell regulators that the options problems were a legacy issue and we have established a new tone at the top," Meisner said.

Santa Clara, California-based McAfee began an internal review of stock options in May. It fired General Counsel Kent Roberts less than two week after finding problems with at least one grant. In June, the SEC subpoenaed McAfee as part of a formal investigation. The company was subpoenaed by federal grand jury in August.

McAfee's internal investigation is now largely over and the company plans to file restated results ``as soon as practicable,'' Brown, the CFO, said on the call today.

``I regret that some of the stock-option problems identified by the special committee occurred on my watch," Samenuk, 51, said in a statement today.

Penalty Box

Under Samenuk, whom it hired in 2001, McAfee cleaned up its accounting and settled lawsuits that claimed former CEO William Larson misstated the company's financial condition. McAfee said its restatement for improper options grants will cover a decade's worth of financial statements and probably will cut pretax earnings by $100 million to $150 million. The company previously said it expected to restate three years of results.

Shares of McAfee rose 85 cents, or 3.3 percent, to $26.64 at 4:03 p.m. in New York Stock Exchange composite trading, the highest level since May. The stock has fallen 1.8 percent this year.

Separately, Cnet lowered its third-quarter and full-year revenue forecasts, sending its shares down 7.7 percent. The company's third-quarter results will be delayed because its options probe is continuing. Cnet shares fell 76 cents to $9.14 on the Nasdaq Stock Market.

Management changes are ``the first step for the company out of the penalty box," said Daniel Ives, a New York-based analyst with Friedman Billings Ramsey who follows McAfee and has an ``outperform" rating on the stock. ``Investors can start focusing on the fundamentals again."

CEOs Swept Out By Stock Options Scandal (FINDLAW/AP)

By Michael Liedtke, Ap Business Writer

AP, October 12, 2006

(AP) - SAN FRANCISCO-Companies sullied by stock option chicanery seem intent on cleaning out their executive suites and boardrooms before regulators and prosecutors do it for them.

On Wednesday, the scandal's fallout widened when the chief executives of both McAfee Inc. and CNet Networks Inc. stepped aside to atone for stock option shenanigans that will erase some of the companies' past profits. Santa Clara-based McAfee, a leading maker of computer anti-virus software, also fired its president, Kevin Weiss.

The abrupt departures of McAfee CEO George Samenuk and CNet CEO Shelby Bonnie follow last week's resignation of Apple Computer Inc. board member Fred Anderson - the company's former chief financial officer - after the iPod maker acknowledged its mishandling of past stock options inflated its past profits.

Apple CEO Steve Jobs held onto his job because the Cupertino-based company's internal inquiry cleared him of any misconduct, but other business leaders battling stock option problems won't be so fortunate, predicted Anthony Michael Sabino, a business law professor at St. John's University.

"The day of reckoning is here and there are still a lot of dominoes to fall, both big and small," Sabino said.

McAfee shares gained 85 cents to close at $26.64 on the New York Stock Exchange while shares of CNet, which runs a stable of technology news and entertainment Web sites, fell 76 cents, or more than 7.6 percent, to close at $9.14 on the Nasdaq Stock Market.

The stock option practices of at least 135 companies are under government investigation or internal review.

Most of the inquiries are focused on a technique known as "backdating," which occurs when insiders look back in time for a low point in their company's stock price so the exercise, or "strike," price of the options could be set at that ebb.

If they aren't properly disclosed, backdated options can inflate corporate profits and result in an underpayment of taxes.

Silicon Valley has been caught in the eye of the stock option storm because of an entrepreneurial culture that embraced the rewards during the 1990s as the best way to get rich fast. That mind-set encouraged high-tech companies to pass out stock options like candy on Halloween.

A federal government task force looking for evidence of stock option malfeasance is now based in San Francisco.

Companies that cooperate with the government and take steps to clean up their books have the best chance of avoiding legal trouble, said Eumi Choi, a federal prosecutor who is chairing the task force.

"That's something we will seriously consider when taking action, Choi said. "What's really called for here is a transparent process."

Perhaps the most famous executive caught up in the options scandal is Jacob "Kobi" Alexander, the fugitive former CEO of software company Comverse Technology Inc. He's in the southern African nation of Namibia, awaiting extradition to the United States to face charges of manipulating options.

Another former Silicon Valley CEO, Gregory Reyes of Brocade Communications Systems Inc., is fighting criminal charges tied to his alleged mishandling of stock options at that San Jose-based company.

Neither McAfee nor San Francisco-based CNet elaborated on the reasons why they parted ways with their CEOs, but the financial problems caused by the improper accounting of stock options appear to be a pivotal factor.

McAfee said it expects to absorb charges of $100 million to $150 million to correct the errors. CNet hasn't specified how large its restatements will be other than to say they will be "material."

Wednesday's developments signal the jobs of other CEOs may be on the line if stock option improprieties force their companies to make substantial revisions to their financial statements, said Michael Koenig, a former federal prosecutor now working at a Washington, D.C. law firm.

"The bigger the restatement, the more likely you will see people falling on their swords, rightly or wrongly," he said. "This issue isn't going away soon, by any stretch of the imagination."

The Securities and Exchange Commission is focusing its stock option investigation on companies forced to make big changes to their past profits, said Marc Fagel, head of enforcement in the agency's San Francisco office.

The SEC expects to impose civil fines on some companies and make criminal referrals on others. "There's always fraud versus recklessness and calls will have to be made," Fagel said.

CNet said there wasn't any sign that Bonnie, a company co-founder, engaged in intentional wrongdoing and allowed him to stay on the board. McAfee didn't elaborate on Samenuk's role in its stock option trouble, but he expressed regret for letting it happen on his watch.

Still, the stock option-induced departures of Bonnie and Samenuk "are like red meat for prosecutors and regulators," Koenig said.

The actions of McAfee and CNet may sway other corporate boards to come down hard on their CEOs to signal they have zero tolerance for reckless accounting even if there is no evidence of intentional misconduct, said James Post, a Boston University professor who focuses on corporate governance.

"This kind of lifts the bars for all the other companies" with backdating problems, Post said. "The burden of proof is starting to shift. The executives involved in this may have to prove they are very clean if they want to keep their jobs."

AP Legal Affairs writer David Kravets contributed to this story.

Stock-option Probes Lead To Exit Of Top Execs At McAfee, CNet (MERCN)

By Ryan Blitstein

The San Jose Mercury News, October 12, 2006

McAfee's chairman and chief executive, as well as its president, will step down after revelations of stock-option backdating at the Santa Clara security software company, the company announced today.

Chairman and CEO George Samenuk will retire, and company President Kevin Weiss was terminated by its board of directors.

``The board has had to make some very difficult decisions, in the last 24 hours but we believe they were in the best interests of the McAfee shareholders," said McAfee board member Dale Fuller in a conference call this morning with financial analysts. Fuller, former CEO and president of Borland Software, will take over as the company's interim CEO and president.

A similar review at online media company CNet Networks in San Francisco led today to the resignation of co-founder and Chief Executive Shelby Bonnie.

The three executives are the latest casualties in a scandal that has ensnared more than 120 U.S. companies, about one-fourth of them in Silicon Valley. The businesses either face investigations by the Securities and Exchange Commission or Justice Department or are conducting internal reviews.

Backdating involves changing the dates on the paperwork on options to a day when stock prices were lower, giving recipients a better chance for quick paper profits. Many companies under investigation have warned they will need to restate past financial reports because option abuses led them to overstate their profits.

McAfee said it would have to restate earnings from the last 10 years by $100 million to $150 million.

Fuller spent much of last night and the early-morning hours breaking the news to McAfee senior managers around the world.

``I don't believe that we'll have any disruption of business," he told analysts. ``My job is really to stay partially out of their way and to help clear away any of the deck that might be causing any friction or struggles for them."

In mid-May, McAfee admitted it was in informal discussions with the SEC about possible backdating, and launched the internal investigation. Later that month, the company fired general counsel Kent Roberts in connection with the review.

In June, the company said it had received a subpoena for documents from the SEC for a formal investigation. Several McAfee shareholders have also initiated lawsuits against the company.

At CNet, Executive Vice President Neil Ashe has been appointed CEO, and Charles Robel has been named board chairman. Jarl Mohn, a former MTV and VH1 executive and founder of E Entertainment Television, has been named CNet's non-executive chairman.

The company said it will release its quarterly earnings reports as scheduled on Oct. 23, but will be delaying its 10-K earnings filing with the SEC.

CNET General Counsel Steps Down Over Stock Options Probe (LAW)

By Justin Scheck And Jessie Seyfer, The Recorder

California Recorder, October 12, 2006

It's not clear whether the latest lawyer to go down because of stock option backdating was involved in the actual decision to award suspect options.

But a Recorder review of SEC filings shows CNET General Counsel Sharon Le Duy did receive grants when the stock was trading at quarterly lows.

CNET announced Wednesday that an internal probe found "deficiencies with the process by which options were granted at CNET, including in some instances the backdating of stock options grants" from 1996 through at least 2003. Le Duy and CEO Shelby Bonnie stepped down, along with the company's human resources chief.

The announcement also said "a number of executives of the company ... bear varying degrees of responsibility" for backdated grants, though it didn't specify who those executives are.

Le Duy's lawyer, Melinda Haag of Orrick, Herrington & Sutcliffe, says her client is in the clear.

"Sharon did not participate in or know about any intentional misstating of stock options at CNET," said Haag.

But according to SEC filings, between 1999 and 2003 Le Duy received six options awards, and four of them came at quarterly lows in share price.

The odds that four of six grants would come at quarterly lows is less than one in 880,000, according to an equation provided by Erik Lie, the University of Iowa professor whose research on options grants raised awareness of the backdating phenomenon earlier this year.

The questionable grants given to Le Duy came in 2000, 2001 and 2003. And while they at one time had considerable paper value, Le Duy -- like so many others during the tech boom -- soon ended up having many of her options buried by a plummeting stock market.

Share price was certainly on an overall decline in April of 2000, when Le Duy received the option to purchase 30,000 shares dated April 17. CNET stock was trading at $24.625, which was its lowest price in well over a year.

The stock immediately jumped, hitting $31.50 within two days, and it surpassed $41 less than a month later.

Later in 2000, Le Duy got a much larger grant -- the option to purchase 60,000 shares -- dated Oct. 18, and priced at $18.875. Leading up to that date, the company's share price saw a steady decline. After bottoming out at $18.875, it immediately began rising, exceeding $30 on Oct. 26 before plummeting.

Le Duy never got a chance to profit from these two option grants, as the company eventually exchanged them for a lower-priced award in 2003.

The company did not exchange all of Le Duy's options, though.

Suffering like the rest of the tech industry, CNET saw its share price fall from more than $10 in August 2001 to $3.20 on Oct. 2. On Oct. 8 -- when Le Duy received 60,000 options -- it was priced at $3.42.

It then began a steady increase, hitting $9 by the end of November. It is unclear whether Le Duy ever exercised all of these options.

A fourth grant, in 2003, also came at a quarterly low. After surpassing $5 in early June of that year, CNET's share price hit $4.65 on June 24. On that day, Le Duy received the option to purchase 125,000 shares.

While the grant doesn't appear to have been backdated -- it was reported to the SEC within two days of being awarded -- it came before the company announced favorable financial results on July 22. The stock began a steady rise, hitting $7.34 by the end of July.

"Sharon has always acted with integrity with regard to CNET's stock options grant process and in all other regards," she added. "Given that she was a senior officer for part of the time at issue, however, Sharon recognized that her resignation would best help the company move forward."

A Boalt Hall graduate, Le Duy joined CNET in November 1999 after serving as senior counsel for AirTouch Communications. Before that, she worked as an associate for Latham & Watkins, according to the CNET Web site.

CNET's attorney, Latham & Watkins' Patrick Gibbs, referred questions about the reasons behind Le Duy's resignation to CNET spokeswoman Sarah Cain. Cain declined to comment, saying that any information the company was ready to release was in Wednesday's press release.

Le Duy's departure Wednesday came along with news that the chief executive of computer security firm McAfee Inc., George Samenuk, the target of a federal stock-options accounting probe, also stepped down.

McAfee General Counsel Kent Roberts stepped down in May after an internal investigation revealed he had received an improper stock option grant. In August, Northern California federal prosecutors sent the company a grand jury subpoena.

Roberts' attorney, Cooley Godward Kronish's Stephen Neal, did not return a call seeking comment on the latest McAfee resignation.

Court Denies United Request To Stop State's Options Probe (MINNST)

By David Phelps, Star Tribune

Minneapolis Star Tribune, October 12, 2006

Attorney General Mike Hatch can proceed with his investigation into the question of stock-option dating at UnitedHealth Group Inc., Ramsey County District Judge David Higgs has ruled.

Attorney General Mike Hatch can proceed with his investigation into the question of stock-option dating at UnitedHealth Group Inc., Ramsey County District Judge David Higgs has ruled.

Higgs denied UnitedHealth's request for a protective order to stop Hatch from getting company documents related to the disputed options, which also are the target of investigations by federal regulators, the Internal Revenue Service, the Justice Department and a special independent internal review committee.

UnitedHealth argued that Hatch's civil investigative demands for corporate documents had no jurisdiction under state law and would be an undue burden to the Minnetonka-based company.

Higgs disagreed, saying the material sought by Hatch "is clearly relevant and essential" to the attorney general's investigation to determine whether top executives got favorable treatment in the dating of their stock options.

"UnitedHealth presented no evidence suggesting that it will suffer undue burden if the requested discovery is permitted," Higgs said in a memorandum Wednesday accompanying his ruling.

Hatch and other investigators are attempting to determine whether UnitedHealth's option program allowed top executives to accumulate large numbers of options at low prices and reap large profits when they later exercised the options at a significantly higher share price.

The company said it plans to appeal the ruling.

"While we respect the court's decision, we continue to believe that the attorney general is overstepping the limits of his investigative authority in this matter," the company said in a prepared statement. "UnitedHealth has been and is cooperating fully with the ongoing reviews by federal regulators who have jurisdiction and expertise concerning the issues in question, and by the independent committee of the board of directors supported by outside counsel."

David Phelps • 612-673-7269 • dphelps@startribune.com

Backdating To The Future (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 12, 2006

The options "backdating" backlash continues to cut a swath through corporate management, with executives at CNET Networks and McAfee Inc. getting the ax yesterday after internal probes. While there's no excuse for false reporting to shareholders, the worst reaction to this mini-scandal would be for Congress to overreact.

For one thing, the practice is undeniably in the past, a legacy of the 1990s' stock-market bubble and pre-Sarbanes-Oxley accounting rules. For another, the practice has now been suspected or detected at so many companies -- 115 at last count -- that its alleged perfidy is being diluted by its ubiquity. Are all of the CEOs, CFOs and general counsels at all of these companies greedy and corrupt? Seems unlikely. Maybe these managements were trying to fulfill an important business purpose -- attract and retain key talent in a competitive labor marketplace -- and merely ran afoul of ambiguous option accounting standards.

The Justice Department and SEC are investigating, which is fair enough. But watch out for Senate Finance Chairman Charles Grassley, who has begun to rumble about eliminating the tax deduction for performance-based pay, such as stock options. He's liable to make things worse.

At a recent Senate hearing, neither SEC Chairman Christopher Cox nor Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty expressed any enthusiasm for such a legislative "fix." And Chairman Cox noted the irony of Congress's own role in promoting options compensation: Stock-option issuance to top execs ballooned in the 1990s after Congress capped the tax deductibility of salaries at $1 million in 1993.

"As a Member of Congress at the time, I well remember that the stated purpose was to control the rate of growth in CEO pay," Mr. Cox said. "With complete hindsight, we can now all agree that this purpose was not achieved. Indeed, this tax-law change deserves pride of place in the Museum of Unintended Consequences." The de facto salary cap's main effect was to divert compensation into other, tax-advantaged, modes -- such as stock options.

Mr. Cox was too polite to fill in the blank for the tub-thumping populist who lives inside Mr. Grassley, but the implication is obvious. If the Senator is concerned about "excessive" stock-option grants, he might turn his attention to lifting that arbitrary cap on the deductibility of executive salaries. Senator Robert Bennett of Utah has proposed exactly this. But Mr. Grassley would rather "fix" one government-caused distortion in the incentives for executive pay by layering on another. The tale of the woman who swallowed the spider to catch the fly comes to mind.

Then there is the related, but separate, question of "spring-loading" options by granting them just ahead of news that could reasonably be expected to give the stock price a favorable result. SEC Commissioner Paul Atkins courted criticism in July when he gave a speech defending spring-loading options grants. He noted at the time that, because there was no counterparty to the transaction, there could be no question of insider trading when an options package was approved ahead of good news.

The legality of this practice remains uncertain. In some recent (and extreme) cases, investigations have resulted in settlements with the SEC over well-timed grants. While critics have raised fairness questions, few are pretending that spring-loading and backdating are in any way equivalent.

Keep in mind that executive stock options generally vest over a period of years, far too long for a momentary blip in the stock price to equate to a guaranteed profit. But, other things being equal, granting options at a lower price allows the company to issue fewer options. By way of analogy, take restricted stock, which is effectively a stock option with a strike price of zero. Is restricted stock "unfair" because it has no strike price? The question answers itself. Restricted stock merely allows a company to offer similar compensation with a somewhat different risk-reward balance.

As to whether the executives thus favored with spring-loaded options somehow "unfairly" benefit, the case of Brocade, one of the most infamous of the alleged backdaters, is instructive. For all the huffing and puffing over Brocade's alleged systematic backdating, most of the options in dispute are still under water owing to a collapse in the company's stock price between their issuance and their vesting. Only one executive exercised any of the options in question at all after the company's 1999 IPO. Neither spring-loaded nor backdated options are anything like a surefire road to riches.

This is not to say that falsifying records or failing to disclose compensation practices to shareholders is OK. Shareholders deserve full disclosure from the executives and directors who work for them. But before the dudgeon gets too high, let's bear in mind that this problem is already in the past. And if Congress wants to "fix" it, the Members could do worse than to revisit their own role in creating the problem in the first place.

Enron's Skilling Asks To Remain Free On Bail During His Appeal (WP)

By Carrie Johnson, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 12, 2006

Former Enron Corp. chief executive Jeffrey K. Skilling is asking a judge to let him remain free while he appeals his conviction on 19 fraud, conspiracy and false-filings charges, according to court papers filed by his defense team.

Skilling, 52, faces more than two decades in prison when he is sentenced in a Houston federal court. Under the federal system, he must serve at least 85 percent of his sentence. U.S. District Judge Simeon T. Lake III could order Skilling into custody immediately after the court proceeding, set for Oct. 23.

But defense attorneys this week launched a preemptive strike, asking the judge to allow Skilling to remain free on bail pending his appeal. Alternatively, attorneys requested that Skilling be allowed to surrender to the Bureau of Prisons on Jan. 2, or no earlier than Nov. 27. He presents no flight risk and is not "a threat to society," attorney Daniel M. Petrocelli wrote.

Skilling has had other legal troubles since his May conviction. Earlier this month, he paid $385 to resolve a misdemeanor public-intoxication charge filed in Dallas.

To remain free during the appeals process, Skilling must prove he will raise substantial issues that are likely to result in a reversal of his conviction.

Lawyers cited three key issues they will bring up in the coming appeal: an instruction that allowed jurors to consider whether Skilling turned a blind eye to accounting fraud that took place on his watch, alleged jury bias in Enron's Houston home town, and a lack of access to former insiders at the energy-trading company.

The Justice Department's Enron Task Force has yet to respond to the defense motion.

Filings Illuminate IPO's Bumpy Ride (WP)

By Griff Witte

The Washington Post, October 12, 2006

For 37 years, Science Applications International Corp. has been owned by its employees. In that time, the company has grown from nothing to an $8 billion giant that does some of the government's most sensitive work in intelligence, homeland security and defense.

But within days, those employees -- 43,100 of them, more than a third of whom live in the Washington area -- will have to learn to share their company with people who have never before had the chance to own SAIC stock: members of the public.

SAIC shares could begin trading on the New York Stock Exchange as soon as tomorrow in an initial public offering estimated to be worth $1 billion, which would be among the largest IPOs ever in the defense industry.

The shift to a public company is the culmination of a broader transformation for SAIC of San Diego, which has grown significantly in recent years and is gunning to move into the top tier of contractors. But SAIC has stumbled several times along the way. In recent public filings, it has had to acknowledge that more problems lie ahead as the government market flattens and as it continues to be dogged by questions about its performance.

"The thing that really stands out to me about this IPO is how difficult it's been for the company," said Philip Finnegan, director of corporate analysis at Teal Group Corp., a market research firm. The offering is "smaller than they were originally talking about. It's been delayed so long. And now they've had to admit some programmatic embarrassments."

As with all companies that plan to go public, SAIC was required to disclose the risks of buying its stock in a filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission. That filing shows that the company lost $123 million on a contract with the government of Greece to provide security at the 2004 Olympics in Athens, and it could lose substantially more. Greek authorities have long maintained that SAIC did not meet its obligations under the contract, and that they should get their money back.

SAIC has also been criticized for its work on other high-profile projects, including the FBI's case-management system, data-mining software for the National Security Agency and a television station for post-invasion Iraq.

A spokeswoman for SAIC declined to comment because the company is in its "quiet period" before the IPO. But the firm has defended its work in the past.

SAIC was supposed to go public earlier this year, but the company put off the IPO because it first wanted to resolve problems with the Olympics contract. The delay was ill-timed. The government contracting industry had been flying high as of early 2006, reaching the peak of the boom that followed the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. Since then, revenue and profit have begun to level off, as have company stock prices. SAIC had originally indicated it planned to raise as much as $1.7 billion with its IPO, but a softer market meant that it had to set its sights lower.

Still, the IPO promises to be lucrative for SAIC employees, who would initially hold 81 percent of the company's shares. Not only will employees be able to sell their stock on the public market, but they will also receive a substantial dividend. SAIC has said it would return all the proceeds of its IPO and then some -- $1.6 billion to $2.4 billion in all -- to its current shareholders.

Company directors and top executives would benefit most from that arrangement, as they are the biggest stockholders. Chief executive Kenneth C. Dahlberg, for example, owns 335,927 shares, according to company filings.

But average employees would also gain if the stock performs well, and that could have ripple effects on the regional economy. SAIC is the region's fourth-largest private-sector employer with around 16,000 workers locally, many of them well-paid engineers, consultants and scientists who possess high-level government clearances and work side by side with government employees on top-secret programs.

"If experience is any guide, there will be a real impact here in terms of spending and wealth creation," said Anirban Basu, chief executive of the economic consulting firm Sage Policy Group Inc. "Often, people who find themselves in a lot of money in a short amount of time are in the habit of making a big-ticket purchase -- and perhaps several of them. This is the type of thing that gives berth to Ferraris and Bentleys."

SAIC could make some big-ticket acquisitions of its own. Dahlberg joined the company in late 2003 with the goal of rapid growth, after decades of steady expansion under founder J. Robert Beyster. Since 2004, revenue is up by more than $2 billion, and profit has more than doubled as SAIC cashed in on rising demand for high-end technology and personnel after the 2001 attacks.

DOJ_NMG_0079425

"They've got whole buildings out there in Tysons Corner that are funded by agencies that we're not going to even talk about," said John E. Pike, director of GlobalSecurity.org, a Web site that tracks the defense and intelligence sectors. "They must be doing something right."

Dahlberg, a veteran of General Dynamics Corp. in Falls Church, has made no secret that he wants to put SAIC in the same league as contracting behemoths such as Lockheed Martin Corp., Northrop Grumman Corp. and General Dynamics. He has streamlined the company's structure, which had been famously decentralized, with company units sometimes competing against each other for the same work.

The IPO is intended to help the company grow even more because it would free capital that had been used to buy back employee stock. Trading is to begin at $13 to $15 a share. Fourteen dollars a share would give SAIC a market value of $5.6 billion.

But some worry that SAIC could lose something after it joins the ranks of public companies. Retired Adm. Bobby Ray Inman, former head of the NSA and an SAIC board member for two decades, said employee ownership was what drew him to the company.

"For me, the principal value of the employee-owned culture was the focus on integrity and accountability," said Inman, who left the board several years ago. "Will that be maintained now? I don't know."

Money Rules Behind Soaring Executive Pay, Decades Of Failed Restraints (WSJ)

By Joann S. Lublin And Scott Thurm

The Wall Street Journal, October 12, 2006

In 1993, activist investor Ralph Whitworth shuttered United Shareholders Association, a group that was trying to tackle the contentious issue of executive pay. It looked as if his work was done.

Federal securities regulators had just forced companies to reveal details about pay and perks for top officials, in some cases for the first time. The changes would "make boards think twice" before approving compensation plans that couldn't be justified, Mr. Whitworth recalls thinking. Around the same time, Congress attacked executive pay for the second time in a decade by removing tax breaks on compensation above one million dollars.

Since then, the average pay for chief executives of large companies has quadrupled, according to Kevin Murphy, a professor at the University of Southern California's Marshall School of Business. The average last year was $10.5 million, a figure that includes salary, bonus and the value of stock and stock-option grants.

There are many reasons why Mr. Whitworth was mistaken in his prediction, including the bull market of the 1990s, cozy corporate boards and CEOs striving to keep pace with highly paid athletes and entertainers. What's often overlooked is the role of all the efforts -- by Mr. Whitworth and many others -- to limit CEO compensation. For more than two decades, critics tried to slow skyrocketing pay through regulations, legislation and shareholder pressure. Few of their tactics worked. Many backfired.

As it turns out, disclosure requirements can push pay higher by revealing to CEOs what their peers receive. Limiting one type of compensation often encourages new types of pay, such as stock options, which were pushed as a solution only to become tainted by scandal. Now that shareholders are quicker to push out poorly performing chiefs, CEOs are seeking more financial guarantees. And if companies turn to outsiders, they often have to pay extra.

Curbing executive compensation is "like moving Jell-O," says Kayla Gillan, the former general counsel of the California Public Employees Retirement System, or Calpers, the nation's largest public pension fund. When it's limited in one area, "it squirts out in another."

Mr. Whitworth disputes the idea that advocacy like his helped make things worse. "To say there's a causal relationship between reform efforts and high executive pay is not logical," the veteran shareholder activist says. Instead, he says he and his peers erred in not focusing on company compensation committees and their lack of accountability to investors. As a result, he says, "CEOs still get whatever they can."

In recent years, CEOs have raced ahead of other Americans, including their own lieutenants. Mr. Murphy calculates that average CEO pay was 369 times as much as the average earned by a worker last year, compared with 131 times in 1993 and 36 times in 1976. Meanwhile, the average U.S. paycheck has barely kept ahead of inflation in recent years.

DOJ_NMG_0079426

Carola Frydman, a finance professor at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology's Sloan School of Management, says the pay gap between CEOs and other executives at the same company has doubled since the 1960s.

Charles Munger, vice chairman of Warren Buffett's Berkshire Hathaway Inc., and a longtime business partner of the famed investor, describes executive compensation as "wretched excess." In an interview, Mr. Munger says he hears complaints even from "Republicans who grumble on the country-club porch" about the resulting political turmoil over the pay question. They're "mad at corporate America," he says.

The Securities and Exchange Commission recently set forth another set of rules governing the expanded disclosure of top executive pay and benefits. For the first time, it required that companies reveal top executives' "total compensation." Investors, too, are intensifying efforts to limit pay. They're embarrassing some highly paid CEOs, trying to change corporate bylaws and seeking to replace directors who bless exorbitant packages.

There are already doubts as to whether these moves will be any more effective than prior efforts. According to a survey by the University of Southern California and executive-search firm Heidrick & Struggles International Inc., 64% of directors say they expect CEO cash compensation to continue to rise; 58% say they expect stock compensation to continue to rise.

Many CEOs say they're paid what they're worth. The Business Roundtable, a group of big-company CEOs, says compensation has roughly kept pace with stock-market returns for the past decade. Using different methodology than that employed by Mr. Murphy, the group says the typical CEO makes 179 times as much as a typical U.S. worker.

"I made a lot of money. I became wealthy," says Harvey Golub, CEO of American Express Co. from 1993 to 2000. "My shareholders became even wealthier."

During Mr. Golub's tenure, American Express's shares rose more than sixfold and its market capitalization climbed to $65 billion from $10 billion. "How much of that $55 billion should I get?" he asks.

Mr. Golub was paid roughly $57 million in salary, bonus and restricted stock over eight years. He also exercised options to buy shares valued at $92 million. When he stepped down as CEO, he held options valued at $114.5 million and received an additional 990,000 options. Because he soon after retired as chairman, investors don't know how much Mr. Golub made from exercising those options. He declines to divulge the figure. Mr. Golub is a director of Dow Jones & Co., publisher of The Wall Street Journal.

In his 1936 State of the Union address, President Franklin D. Roosevelt railed against "entrenched greed" at American corporations. At the time, the average compensation for the top executive of a big company was about $95,000, according to MIT's Ms. Frydman, equivalent to $1.4 million in today's dollars.

Reflecting the more egalitarian societal values, as well as punitively high marginal tax rates, executive pay barely budged in the prosperous post-World War II decades. In 1970, Ms. Frydman says, average CEO pay was no more, adjusted for inflation, than it was in 1940.

Then, in the late 1970s, the culture of pay started to change. After a decadelong bear market soured executives on stock and stock options, they began to seek out other forms of compensation, aided by a budding industry of pay consultants. Among the most inventive CEOs was the late Steven J. Ross, chief of Warner Communications Inc. and later Time Warner Inc.

The son of an oil-burner salesman, Mr. Ross built a media empire from a chain of funeral parlors and parking lots. He weathered a federal investigation, fought with partners and investors and fended off takeover attempts from Rupert Murdoch, among others.

In 1981, Mr. Ross took home more than $22 million, including gains on stock options, making him the first executive to crack $10 million in annual compensation, according to Mr. Murphy.

In addition to a salary and a bonus pegged to Warner's profits, Mr. Ross received a dizzying array of other types of compensation, including stock, stock options and multiple forms of deferred compensation. Between 1973 and 1989, he took home $275 million, according to Graef Crystal, a former compensation consultant who is now a columnist and critic of executive pay.

The 1980s witnessed a flourishing of different types of compensation, following President Reagan's deep cuts in the top rates of income tax. Some of the techniques were seemingly unrelated to performance, such as "signing bonuses" for new CEOs and "guaranteed bonuses." In 1981, Occidental Petroleum Corp. CEO Armand Hammer was promised a bonus of at least $240,000.

DOJ_NMG_0079427

Golden Parachutes

Another new technique was the "golden parachute," a sizable sum promised to executives if their company was taken over. Without such assurances, boards worried that executives might oppose a deal that was good for shareholders out of concern for their own futures.

In 1983, Bendix Corp. CEO William J. Agee received $3.9 million over five years after his aerospace, auto-parts and machine-tools concern was acquired by Allied Corp., an industrial conglomerate. It was one of the decade's first bruising takeover battles, sparked by Mr. Agee when he tried to buy aerospace and defense firm Martin Marietta Corp. The size of his parachute, as well as the circumstances in which it was paid, created a furor.

The following year, Congress slapped a special tax on golden parachutes. "The Bill Agee Bill," as some at the time dubbed it, taxed awards valued at more than three times an executive's average compensation over the previous five years.

Rather than curbing pay, the law had the opposite effect. Despite a few well-publicized examples, golden parachutes were rare before Congress intervened. In a survey of companies named in either the Fortune 1000 list or the S&P 500 index, a mere 8% gave at least one executive a golden parachute before the law was passed. By taxing parachutes at a certain level, Congress in effect blessed their existence. It also gave the technique a publicity boost.

Baxter International Inc. adopted golden parachutes for its CEO and 22 other officers for the first time in 1985, promising executives twice their annual salary and bonus. A Baxter spokeswoman says the parachutes came at a "tumultuous" time of mergers in the industry.

By 1991, more than half of the top companies in the survey provided parachutes to certain executives, according to Executive Compensation Reports, a newsletter.

The parachute law also spawned a new form of compensation: payments to cover the new taxes. By 2004, 77% of 1,000 public concerns tracked by consulting firm Towers Perrin offered such tax compensation, known as a "gross up," compared with 10% in 1987.

James F. Reda, a New York pay consultant who began working in the field in the late 1980s, recalls: "It was an easy argument to sell to boards, that it's just money going to the government, so why penalize these people?"

Critics of executive pay say boards, stocked as they often are with CEOs and retired CEOs, rarely need to be sold on pay packages. Mr. Buffett, well known for his dislike of ostentatious compensation, joined the compensation committee of Salomon Inc. after taking a stake in the investment bank in the late 1980s. In 1990, when Salomon's profit declined, Mr. Buffett voted against bonuses for top executives, a rare event inside U.S. boardrooms. Mr. Buffett was outvoted and hasn't been asked to serve on a compensation committee since.

Compensation panels are "tail-wagging puppy dogs meekly following recommendations by consultants," Mr. Buffett wrote in his 2002 letter to Berkshire shareholders. For an outside director to oppose these recommendations "would be like belching at the dinner table."

In spring 1990, Richard Koppes, then general counsel of Calpers, convened a meeting of corporate lawyers and activist investors at Morton's Steakhouse in Washington, D.C. Ira Millstein, a New York attorney and longtime adviser to the boards of General Motors Corp. and Walt Disney Co., urged investors to focus on executive pay. "You shareholders can do something about it," he said.

To better align CEO pay with shareholder returns, activists started urging a wider use of stock options. Options give the holder the right, but not the obligation, to buy shares at a specified price. They become valuable only when a company's share price increases.

Calpers began publishing a "target list" of overpaid, underperforming CEOs. Its initial top target was Rand Araskog, chief executive of conglomerate ITT Corp. Mr. Araskog, the son of Swedish immigrants, graduated from West Point. After fending off corporate raiders, he spent a decade dismantling ITT, a sprawling conglomerate whose businesses stretched from telephones to timber. In 1990, Mr. Araskog's compensation rose 82%, to $7.3 million, the same year ITT shares fell 18%.

DOJ_NMG_0079428

In September 1991, Mr. Araskog met Mr. Whitworth, the investor activist, at the offices of his group, United Shareholders. "I'm tired of being the poster boy for executive compensation," Mr. Whitworth recalls Mr. Araskog saying. "What would you do?"

On a yellow legal pad, Mr. Whitworth sketched a plan that paid a modest cash compensation and plenty of options. Mr. Araskog "tore it off and took it with him," Mr. Whitworth says. Two days later, the chairman of ITT's compensation committee chairman called Mr. Whitworth and declared, "Rand is going to take you up on your offer." Mr. Araskog says he doesn't dispute Mr. Whitworth's recollection.

As a result, ITT gave Mr. Araskog options for the first time -- 170,000 with an initial value of $3.5 million. The board also revamped its long-term performance plan and moderated Mr. Araskog's salary increases. The CEO received a 6% raise in 1992, down from a 17% raise the year before. Mr. Araskog says ITT embraced options partly because making money under the old performance plan was "next to impossible."

With subsequent grants, Mr. Araskog held options valued at $17.8 million by the end of 1995 when ITT broke itself up and sold off the pieces. He retired in 1998 and received $15 million in severance.

Other top CEOs took up the concept. In 1990, H.J. Heinz Co. CEO Anthony J.F. O'Reilly received options to acquire four million shares. The following year, Leon Hirsch, chief of medical-products company U.S. Surgical Corp. received options for 2.75 million shares valued at $170 million, more than 100 times his annual salary and bonus.

At the time, "we never saw an [option] plan we didn't like," Mr. Whitworth recalls. "People would say, 'How much is too much?' We said, 'The sky's the limit as long as it's tied to stock options,' which we equated to performance."

Shareholders expected option grants would displace other types of compensation. More often, they were doled out as an extra. As chairman and CEO of Chase Manhattan Corp., Walter V. Shipley received a $750,000 salary and options for 90,000 shares in 1993. Four years later, he was granted options for 240,000 shares, with an estimated value of $3.8 million. Mr. Shipley's salary rose, too, to $950,000.

The huge option grants began to trigger enormous paydays. In 1992, Disney CEO Michael Eisner exercised options valued at nearly $127 million. The former studio head reshaped and revived Disney in the 1980s and Disney's share price had risen tenfold.

Amid the economic downturn and corporate restructurings of the early 1990s, complaints about such awards found receptive audiences. In 1992, Democratic presidential candidate Bill Clinton made executive pay a campaign issue. Washington responded.

The SEC said it would require more disclosure about compensation, particularly stock options and executive perks. The following year, after Mr. Clinton was elected, Congress decided companies could no longer take tax deductions on executive compensation of more than $1 million, unless it was related to performance.

Neither approach slowed the upward march of executive compensation. In fact, the disclosure rules allowed CEOs to see what others were getting, encouraging a competitive spiral. The tax law, meanwhile, drove up the compensation of CEOs who were making less than $1 million. Executives considered the cap a "minimum wage for CEOs," says Mr. Koppes, the former Calpers official.

SEC Chairman Christopher Cox recently said the 1993 law belongs in "the Museum of Unintended Consequences," because it encouraged the growth of "less transparent forms" of pay, such as pensions and deferred compensation.

Ignoring the Caps

Some companies felt free to ignore the caps altogether, especially as they wooed outsiders, a tactic increasingly used by boards to fix succession problems. In the 1970s, says the University of Southern California's Mr. Murphy, companies picked outside CEOs about 15% of the time. By the 1990s, that had risen to 27%. Last year, executive-search firm Spencer Stuart says outsiders won 40% of the CEO vacancies at S&P 500 firms.

Eastman Kodak Co. in 1993 wooed George Fisher, the successful chairman and CEO of Motorola Inc. Kodak offered a $2 million salary, more than double what he was earning at Motorola. Kodak didn't seem bothered by having to sacrifice tax deductions on half the $2 million. Mr. Fisher says, "I don't remember that was ever part of the discussion."

DOJ_NMG_0079429

Mr. Fisher says the $2 million figure originated with his attorney, Joseph Bachelder, who had negotiated a similar deal for Louis V. Gerstner at International Business Machines Corp. Kodak also gave Mr. Fisher a $5 million signing bonus, a $1 million guaranteed bonus in both 1994 and 1995, 20,000 restricted shares and more than one million stock options.

"Going outside can be frightful," says Alfred DeCrane Jr., former CEO of Texaco Corp., who has served as a director on four compensation committees. "You can negotiate, but if you want to close the deal, you have to close it."

Defenders of CEO pay say these contracts demonstrate the market value of a successful executive. "There is an incredible shortage of qualified people to manage and lead big companies today," says Kenneth Langone, a veteran Wall Street figure. Mr. Langone is a defender of two executives caught up in pay controversies: Former New York Stock Exchange Chairman Richard Grasso and Home Depot Inc. CEO Robert Nardelli. Mr. Langone chaired the NYSE's compensation committee and is a director and a co-founder of Home Depot.

Mr. Bachelder, who has been negotiating CEO contracts for 26 years, points to another factor: big paydays for athletes, entertainers and money managers. "It's the Michael Jordan principle," Mr. Bachelder says. "If he can get $30 million, I have to get it."

Throughout this time, options remained a favorite pay tool for an important reason -- they were effectively free. Options granted at or above the market price of a stock did not have to be recorded as a company expense in financial results.

Accounting regulators proposed changing this rule in 1993 but backed off following opposition from Congress and Silicon Valley. Then-SEC Chairman Arthur Levitt later wrote in his memoir that failing to support the accounting change was his "biggest mistake" as chairman.

A few directors tried to buck the option fad to little effect. In the early 1990s, shareholder activist Robert Monks persuaded fellow directors of Tyco International Ltd. to pay CEO L. Dennis Kozlowski with restricted stock -- which requires a holder to wait several years before it can be sold -- rather than options. At Mr. Monks's urging, they also decided to deny Mr. Kozlowski a bonus if Tyco's cash flow and earnings didn't grow by at least 15%.

During a 1993 board meeting at a Tyco factory in Michigan, Mr. Monks says, he called for independent board members to meet privately and discuss even tougher ties between pay and performance. Mr. Kozlowski and his predecessor, John Fort, another board member, refused to leave the room, Mr. Monks says. The following year, Mr. Monks was not renominated for the board.

In 1997, Mr. Kozlowski received 3.3 million options after Tyco acquired security firm ADT Ltd. He later swapped some restricted stock for more options. Between 1998 and 2001, Mr. Kozlowski reaped more than $400 million in salary, stock grants and gains from options, according to securities filings. Mr. Kozlowski and his former finance chief were convicted last year of looting more than $150 million from Tyco. Both are serving prison sentences of as much as 25 years, and have appealed their convictions.

Asked for comment, a Tyco spokeswoman would say only that "prior management is no longer in place."

In the bull market of the late 1990s, these awards led to staggering paydays. In general, criticism of such deals was relatively muted as smaller investors also benefited from rising stock prices.

That changed in 2001 when Enron Corp. collapsed in an accounting scandal. Others corporate debacles followed: WorldCom Inc., Adelphia Corp., Tyco. In each case, top executives massaged the books to prop up the share prices that accounted for most of their worth.

In response, the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, passed in 2002, required more timely disclosure of executive-pay deals and required CEOs to return compensation based on financial results that were later restated. The disclosure requirement squelched another pervasive, but little-known, practice of the 1990s, a side effect of the options craze: the "backdating" of stock options. The long-hidden practice burst into public view this year, and now more than 100 companies are under scrutiny for manipulating the timing of option grants to generate even bigger gains for executives.

By 2003, the average option grant fell nearly by half to $3.3 million, according to the University of Southern California's Mr. Murphy. As a result, average CEO compensation actually declined, to $8.7 million in 2003, from $12.8 million in 2000.

The following year, accounting rulemakers finally required stock-option grants to be treated as an expense. Corporate boards responded by distributing fewer options.

DOJ_NMG_0079430

In lieu of options, boards distributed more restricted stock. Some questioned whether this was progress; unlike options, restricted stock retains its value even if share prices decline. Other boards pledged to tie pay more closely to performance.

Big awards are now popping up when executives leave their companies, regardless of performance. As of the end of last year, then-Pfizer Inc. CEO Henry McKinnell accumulated $83 million in pension benefits, according to company filings. He was ousted as CEO in July. During his five-year tenure, Pfizer stock declined nearly 37%. Mr. McKinnell is set to remain Pfizer chairman until his retirement in February.

His pension benefits "were awarded on the basis of many years of service to the company, including years in which the company significantly outperformed the market and its peers," says Dana Mead, head of the Pfizer board's compensation committee, in a written statement.

Golden parachutes are back, too. James Kilts, CEO of Gillette Co., received about $164.5 million in severance and other benefits after the razor maker was acquired by consumer-products giant Procter & Gamble Co. last year. North Fork Bancorp CEO John Kanas received $185 million for selling his Melville, N.Y.-based bank to a rival.

"By the time the payments are disclosed, the CEO is gone," notes Sarah Teslik, a longtime corporate-governance watchdog. "The worst that happens is a day's trashing in the press."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Blagojevich Friend Faces Fraud Charges (SLPD)

By Kevin McDermott, POST-DISPATCH SPRINGFIELD BUREAU

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, October 12, 2006

A federal corruption investigation edged closer to Illinois Gov. Rod Blagojevich on Wednesday, with the indictment of a Blagojevich friend and fundraiser who allegedly conspired with another defendant to extort money from state contractors - some of it earmarked for the campaign fund of "a certain public official."

Blagojevich - a Democrat just 27 days from the end of a re-election campaign in a race that has focused on corruption issues - isn't named in the indictment unsealed in Chicago. U.S. Attorney Patrick Fitzgerald, laying out his case at a news conference, refused to answer repeated questions about whether Blagojevich is the unnamed official for whom the two men were allegedly shaking down contractors.

But the indictment includes allegations that Blagojevich confidant Antoin "Tony" Rezko used "his relationships and influence" in state government to get the other defendant reappointed to a state pension board, so they could continue demanding kickbacks from contractors hired by the board. That board's members are appointed by the governor.

The 24-count federal indictment names Rezko, a close Blagojevich adviser and major fundraiser, and Stuart Levine, a former Blagojevich appointee to the Illinois Teachers Retirement System. It charges attempted extortion, money laundering and mail and wire fraud.

Fitzgerald said Levine is cooperating with investigators. That's likely to put the spotlight on Rezko, 51, a Syrian immigrant and millionaire businessman who has raised hundreds of thousands of dollars for Blagojevich while serving as an unofficial but close adviser to him.

"In the spring of 2004, there was a frenzied effort (by Rezko and Levine) to try to obtain millions of dollars illegally in kickbacks and shakedowns" for themselves and for the unidentified political fund, Fitzgerald said.

In one alleged scheme laid out in the indictment, Rezko and Levine are accused of attempting to prevent one firm from getting a $220 million investment contract unless the firm gave $1.5 million in political contributions to what the indictment identified only as "a certain public official."

The indictment doesn't reveal whether that official is Blagojevich. There's no indication in the indictment that the public official knew about the alleged scheme.

That scheme fell through, Fitzgerald said, after the investment firm threatened to go to the authorities, causing Rezko and Levine to back off.

DOJ_NMG_0079431

The indictment also alleges that Rezko successfully got Levine reappointed to the Teachers Retirement System board so that their schemes could continue. The governor makes all appointments to the board, and it was Blagojevich who reappointed Levine.

Fitzgerald is mum

Fitzgerald turned aside reporters' questions about Blagojevich's possible role. "I'm not going to talk about anyone who's not charged," he said.

He added that the inquiry is ongoing and that it won't be affected by the Nov. 7 gubernatorial election.

"We're going to bring the cases as soon as they're ready to go. . . . We're not going to take a siesta for election season," Fitzgerald said.

Blagojevich has been leading Republican challenger Judy Baar Topinka in polls but has been dogged all year by questions about the continuing federal investigation into people around him.

"The allegations in today's indictments, if proven true, are a violation of my trust but far more importantly a betrayal of the public's trust - the indictment details a pattern of self-enrichment by two individuals, acting on their own, that is reprehensible," Blagojevich said in a written statement. "If these allegations are true, the individuals cited in these indictments should be held accountable to the fullest extent of the law. Wrongdoing must be punished."

The Topinka campaign seized on the indictment as further proof of what she calls "pay-to-play" politics under the Blagojevich administration.

"The governor needs to answer questions about how he allowed this to happen," Topinka said Wednesday. "(Rezko) is his right-hand man. . . . He's been involved in every aspect (of the administration).

"The public ought to brace itself, because it sounds like there's more to come," Topinka added.

Second indictment

In a second indictment, Rezko also was charged with defrauding General Electric Capital Corp. out of $10.5 million in loans in connection with a pizza restaurant business.

Arraignment for both indictments was scheduled for Friday. Rezko was out of the country on Wednesday but was being contacted, according to his legal counsel, Stetler & Duffy Ltd. of Chicago.

"Mr. Rezko is innocent of the charges brought against him and is confident he will be vindicated at trial," the law firm said in a written statement. It called the charges "the creation of Stuart Levine."

Levine attorney Jeffrey B. Steinback said Wednesday that Levine "is cooperating, as he has since early this year, and it is his full intention to continue to cooperate," The Associated Press reported.

The allegations are reminiscent of charges originally leveled at people around former Gov. George Ryan, before Ryan himself was accused of wrongdoing. Ryan ultimately was indicted on corruption charges and convicted earlier this year. He is appealing his conviction.

Top Aide To Illinois Governor Is Indicted In Kickback Inquiry (NYT)

By Libby Sander

The New York Times, October 12, 2006

CHICAGO, Oct. 11 — Accusations of political corruption drew closer to Gov. Rod R. Blagojevich of Illinois on Wednesday, as a federal grand jury indicted one of his top advisers and fund-raisers in an alleged kickback scheme involving state pension funds.

The fraud accusations against the adviser, Antoin Rezko, whose ties to Mr. Blagojevich date to the early 1990's, come in the final weeks of a campaign in which Mr. Blagojevich's opponent has made ethics a top issue. That opponent, Judy Baar Topinka, the Illinois treasurer, has kept up a steady refrain reminding voters that four years ago Mr. Blagojevich ran for governor on the promise of cleaning up corruption.

Mr. Blagojevich, a Democrat, was quick to criticize the accusations against Mr. Rezko, whom prosecutors said devised an elaborate plan to extort millions of dollars from investment firms seeking to do business with state pension funds.

DOJ_NMG_0079432

The governor said in a statement that the accusations against Mr. Rezko and another businessman, Stuart Levine, who is expected to plead guilty later this month, were "reprehensible."

Ms. Topinka has tried to distance herself from the scandals that plagued her party under Gov. George Ryan, who was sentenced last month to six and a half years in prison for government corruption, while spotlighting state and federal investigations into the Blagojevich administration's actions in hiring, fund-raising and awarding state contracts.

John McGovern, a spokesman for the Topinka campaign, said, "The Rezko indictment makes clear that the ongoing investigation into corruption in the Blagojevich administration is broad, is deep and is gathering momentum."

Patrick J. Fitzgerald, the United States attorney who announced the indictment, said Mr. Rezko and Mr. Levine developed plans in 2003 and 2004 to obtain $5 million in kickbacks from six investment firms seeking money from two state pension funds.

In one scheme, the indictment alleged, Mr. Rezko and Mr. Levine agreed to tell one investment firm that it would receive money from the pension fund only if it paid them $2 million or made a $1.5 million political contribution to "a certain public official."

Mr. Fitzgerald, speaking at a news conference, declined to name the "certain public official" cited.

"We're not going to comment on anyone not charged," he said, deflecting repeated questions from reporters about Mr. Blagojevich's role in the investigation. He also said the timing of the indictment had nothing to do with the coming election.

Mr. Rezko, who has raised large sums for Democrats and Republicans alike, told The Chicago Tribune last year that he first came to know Mr. Blagojevich in the early 1990's. When Mr. Blagojevich ran for governor in 2002, Mr. Rezko helped raise money and, after Mr. Blagojevich won, became a close political adviser. But he said his ties to the governor were misunderstood.

"I don't do any business with state government," Mr. Rezko told The Tribune, "and have stayed away from it" since Mr. Blagojevich became governor.

Top Blagojevich Adviser Indicted (CHIT)

By Rick Pearson, Ray Long And David Mendell

Chicago Tribune, October 12, 2006

Federal prosecutors alleged Wednesday that Antoin "Tony" Rezko used his influence as one of Gov. Rod Blagojevich's closest advisers and fundraisers to seek millions of dollars in kickbacks and campaign donations from firms seeking state business.

Rezko's indictment comes less than a month before voters must decide whether to re-elect Blagojevich, a Democrat who won four years ago on a platform of ethics reform in the aftermath of the scandal-tarred tenure of George Ryan.

The governor is not accused of any wrongdoing and the indictment does not mention him by name. But the long-rumored charges have been hanging over Blagojevich's campaign for months.

The indictment alleges that Rezko schemed to extort businesses that came before two state boards with the help of co-conspirator Stuart Levine, a campaign contributor re-appointed to the boards by the governor.

Blagojevich, in a Wednesday evening news conference at his campaign headquarters, described Rezko as a friend and supporter. But the governor played down Rezko's extensive influence in the administration, which ranged from recommending appointees to the governor's Cabinet to low-level jobs at the Illinois Tollway. The governor said he had no personal knowledge of any alleged wrongdoing.

"If in fact these allegations relating to Tony are true, he betrayed my trust," Blagojevich said. "He lied to me. He deceived me. But a lot more important than that, he violated the public trust.

"And I feel a tremendous sense of personal betrayal," the governor said. "But no one is above the law and everybody is accountable to the law and God forbid he did these things. And I pray that he didn't, but if he did, he is going to have to be held accountable and answer to that."

Blagojevich's Republican challenger, state Treasurer Judy Baar Topinka, seized on news of the indictment, alleging the governor had violated the public trust by giving Rezko a prominent advisory role.

"My goodness, this man is just so intricately involved with Rod Blagojevich," Topinka said of Rezko while campaigning in Springfield. "You can spin it all you want, but this was his right-hand man."

In announcing the indictment against Rezko, 51, of Wilmette, U.S. Atty. Patrick Fitzgerald said his office was unconcerned about whether its actions would impact the upcoming election. Fitzgerald refused to discuss Blagojevich.

"We're not going to stop momentum or take a siesta for political reasons," Fitzgerald said. "We're not concerned with elections. We're concerned with bringing the cases as soon as they're ready to go."

Rezko, an international businessman and native of Syria, has been out of the country for weeks and his whereabouts had become a concern for federal investigators. Sources said investigators were waiting to see whether Rezko would return from overseas this past weekend. When Rezko did not return, authorities made the unusual decision to unseal the Oct. 5 indictment even though they aren't certain he will return to the United States.

An arrest warrant has been issued for Rezko and Fitzgerald said if he does not appear for his scheduled arraignment Friday, he will be considered a fugitive.

Joseph J. Duffy, Rezko's attorney, issued a statement denying his client committed any wrongdoing and expressing confidence he would be vindicated at trial. Rezko is currently traveling abroad, Duffy said, adding that he was attempting to notify him of the charges and arrange for his return to the United States.

Fitzgerald alleged the actions of Rezko and Levine, who is cooperating with prosecutors, represented "pay-to-play politics on steroids" and said the two engaged in a "frenzied" effort to score kickbacks.

Robert Grant, special agent-in-charge of the Chicago office of the FBI, said the federal investigation, dubbed "Operation Board Game," continues to build and he all but promised more indictments.

"This is a gathering storm of an investigation with a goal of rooting out the parasites that have plagued our public institutions," Grant said. "Our investigative efforts and those of our partners are ongoing, methodical, aggressive and relentless."

Specifically, the indictment alleged Rezko used his influence with top officials in Blagojevich's office in the spring of 2004 to ensure that allies were appointed to or retained seats on a state hospital planning board and the state's Teachers' Retirement System Board, the $36.5 billion pension fund for retired teachers outside of Chicago.

The indictment alleged Rezko worked to secure Levine's reappointment to the pension panel, by using "his relationships and influence with high-ranking State of Illinois officials" so the two could pull off their extortion plans.

The indictment alleged Rezko would exert similar influence to gain the appointment of pension-board members who would be helpful to Rezko and Levine.

In May of 2004, the indictment said, "Rezko instructed a State of Illinois employee responsible for facilitating appointments to state boards to move forward on Levine's reappointment to the [teachers' pension board], and represented that the reappointment had been approved by a high-ranking state official. The high-ranking state official subsequently directed that Levine be reappointed to the [teachers' pension board]."

Blagojevich reappointed Levine to the teachers' pension board in 2004. A year earlier, the governor also reappointed Levine to the state's Health Facilities Planning Board, the agency in charge of approving hospital construction and expansion. Rezko previously served on the hospital panel.

The indictment contended that once Levine's post on the teachers' pension board was in place, Levine would use his power to try to leverage investment firms seeking state business into paying millions of dollars in "finder's fees" that he and Rezko would split or funnel to intermediaries and associates.

Those intermediaries, who were not named in the indictment or charged with wrongdoing, include significant insiders in state Democratic and Republican politics.

In one instance, the indictment alleges that Levine used his influence on the pension board in 2004 to withhold a planned allocation of $220 million in funds unless a kickback of $2 million was paid to a consultant of Rezko's and Levine's choosing or arrange for $1.5 million in campaign contributions to be made to an unnamed public official.

Though the extortion payment was never made, sources close to the investigation said the donations were solicited for Blagojevich's campaign fund.

Prosecutors alleged that Rezko and Levine used an unidentified intermediary to approach the investment firm.

Citing TRS records, Jon Bauman, the teacher fund's executive director, confirmed that the intermediary, identified in the indictment as Individual A, is longtime Springfield powerbroker William Cellini, a pre-eminent Republican fundraiser who has supported Blagojevich. A federal law enforcement source, speaking on the condition of anonymity, confirmed Cellini was Individual A.

Cellini, who has not been charged with any wrongdoing, did not respond to requests for comment.

While the indictment alleges Rezko and Levine displayed a pattern of attempting to extort several firms, federal prosecutors said Rezko netted $250,000 in a lone instance in which the two succeeded. They said Levine stopped efforts to coax money from other firms after FBI agents interviewed him in May 2004, alerting him to the ongoing investigation.

Levine, a millionaire businessman who was a prominent fundraiser and donor for Blagojevich's 2002 Republican opponent, former Atty. Gen. Jim Ryan, has agreed to plead guilty to corruption-related charges, federal prosecutors said.

Only 11 days before the Nov. 7 election, Levine is scheduled to enter a guilty plea for his role in the pension-fund charges. On Nov. 1, he is to enter another guilty plea regarding kickback charges involving his role at the Health Facilities Planning Board.

Prosecutors said Levine worked with Joseph Cari, a former finance director for the national Democratic Party and a major fundraiser, to try to secure kickbacks and campaign contributions from firms seeking state pension fund business.

In his September 2005 plea agreement, Cari said he was told that pension fund business was steered to firms that made campaign donations under the direction of a high-ranking public official. The unnamed person was described in the plea agreement only as "Public Official A." Blagojevich has denied being that public official.

Cari and Levine traveled with Blagojevich to New York on a fundraising trip following the Democrat's election as governor, which was recorded as a campaign donation to the governor worth more than $4,000.

Shortly after Cari's plea agreement last fall, Blagojevich defended his closest fundraising aides and advisers, including Rezko.

"I have confidence that they do things right," Blagojevich said then. "They don't break the law or make any promises or deals or quid pro quos. Those are obvious and I don't think it takes a brain surgeon to figure out you shouldn't do those things."

On Wednesday evening, as he found his ethical credentials in question, Blagojevich said he would donate to charity as much as $70,000 in direct donations from Rezko. But in his role as one of two key money men for Blagojevich, Rezko was responsible for leveraging much more. Blagojevich has amassed more than $50 million in his campaigns for state office.

Gov's Pal Indicted In Kickback Scheme (CHIST)

By STEVE WARMBIR, NATASHA KORECKI, CHRIS FUSCO AND DAVE MCKINNEY, Staff Reporters

Chicago Sun-Times, October 12, 2006

Wielding their clout like a club, Antoin Rezko, a top adviser and fund-raiser for Gov. Blagojevich, and GOP insider Stuart Levine were partners in crime as they arranged to shake down nearly $5 million in kickbacks from six investment firms looking for business with the state, a federal indictment alleged today.

The new charges against Rezko, 51, of Wilmette, represent the closest federal investigations have come to Blagojevich's inner circle and present fresh complications for the governor as he campaigns for re-election.

Blagojevich acknowledged at a Wednesday night news conference that Rezko "has been a friend and a supporter and ... I pray that these allegations are not true."

"If in fact these allegations relating to Tony are true, he betrayed my trust, he lied to me, he deceived me, but even more important than that he betrayed the public trust," said Blagojevich, who added the indictment did not suggest he had any knowledge of alleged wrongdoing.

Levine was charged in the scheme last year. He's cooperating extensively with federal investigators.

Rezko and Levine also allegedly schemed to shake down a seventh investment firm co-owned at the time by Hollywood producer Tom Rosenberg — a facet of the investigation first reported by the Sun-Times last month. Rosenberg's firm was slated to get a $220 million state deal when the shakedown began. Rosenberg's firm was warned to either cough up $2 million to a consultant of Rezko and Levine's choosing or arrange for $1.5 million to be contributed "to a certain public official." The Sun-Times has reported that official was Blagojevich.

The deal, though, went through, after Rosenberg threatened to notify law enforcement of the shakedown, according to the indictment and sources.

Rezko and Levine are also accused of shaking down a $1 million kickback to get state approval for a corporation to build a hospital in Crystal Lake.

Rezko derived his clout from his close to ties to the Blagojevich administration, while Levine sat on the boards for the Teachers' Retirement System — which the investment firms were seeking business from — and the Illinois Health Facilities Planning Board — which had say over hospital construction in the state.

U.S. Attorney Patrick Fitzgerald said today the criminal charges showed "a frenzy of corrupt scheming."

Rezko and Levine "and their associates put out the word loud and clear: You have to pay to play in Illinois," Fitzgerald said.

In a separate indictment, Rezko was charged with defrauding General Electric Capital Corp. and investors in regard to the financing and sale of Rezko's Papa John's pizza restaurants in Chicago and Milwaukee.

The indictment alleges Rezko fraudulently obtained more than $10 million in loans from General Electric.

Early this afternoon, Blagojevich's Republican challenger for the governor's job, Judy Baar Topinka, stressed she hadn't seen the indictment yet but that charges against Rezko would be "very, very damaging to the governor's campaign."

Calling Rezko the governor's "right-hand man," Topinka said that Rezko had "an influence on hiring . . . He had an influence on the campaign. He's had a tremendous influence."

Rezko, who has been traveling out of the country, has been a key fund-raiser for and adviser to the governor. His name has surfaced in state and federal probes into whether campaign contributions to Blagojevich were being traded for lucrative state contracts and appointments to government boards and commissions. It's unclear whether Rezko has returned to the United States.

The indictment of Rezko, a real estate developer, comes just weeks before Levine, a key figure in the federal probes of the Blagojevich administration, is set to plead guilty in two cases involving boards to which the governor appoints members.

Levine, a wealthy businessman and political insider, was reappointed by Blagojevich to the health facilities board and the state teachers retirement board. Levine plans to plead guilty before the Nov. 7 gubernatorial election to criminal wrongdoing involving both of those boards.

Last year, another man indicted in the TRS case, lawyer Joseph Cari, pleaded guilty and alleged that Levine told him that Blagojevich and top Blagojevich fund-raisers Rezko and Christopher G. Kelly schemed to steer state pension deals to investment firms and consultants who agreed to donate to Blagojevich's campaign. The plea identified Blagojevich as "Public Official A" and Kelly and Rezko as "associates," sources have said.

The governor has called Cari's accusation "triple hearsay." Rezko and Kelly repeatedly have denied wrongdoing.

Kelly's lawyer said this morning he was unaware of any criminal charges being filed against his client, and there was no indication charges against Kelly were imminent.

A lawyer for Rezko could not be reached for comment.

Illinois Governor's Aide Indicted (LAT)

By P.j. Huffstutter, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 12, 2006

A key fundraiser for Rod Blagojevich is accused of trading state contracts for cash. The charges may boost the race's GOP challenger.

CHICAGO — Less than a month before the gubernatorial election, a federal grand jury has indicted a top advisor and fundraiser for Illinois Gov. Rod Blagojevich on suspicion of using his political clout to get millions of dollars in kickbacks from companies seeking state contracts.

The indictment, unsealed Wednesday, alleges that businessman Antoin "Tony" Rezko orchestrated a fraud scheme with Chicago attorney Stuart Levine, whom the governor reappointed to two state boards: one that handles hospital projects and another that manages teachers' pensions.

Rezko was one of Blagojevich's biggest fundraisers during the gubernatorial campaign four years ago, and himself contributed more than $49,000.

DOJ_NMG_0079436

"Rezko used his relationship with certain state of Illinois officials to ensure that Rezko and Levine had the ability to influence the actions of [state boards] … for the benefit of themselves and their nominees and associates," according to the indictment. The two men then "solicited and demanded millions of dollars in undisclosed kickbacks and payments, and received and directed hundreds of thousands of dollars in undisclosed kickbacks and payments."

Rezko also allegedly obtained more than $10 million in fraudulent loans from General Electric Capital Corp. for pizza franchises, and defrauded investors in that business, according to a second indictment unsealed Wednesday.

Levine has already been charged with using his position on the state boards to extort payoffs from medical groups and investment firms, and is cooperating with federal investigators, according to U.S. Atty. Patrick J. Fitzgerald.

An arrest warrant has been issued for Rezko, who is thought to be traveling abroad.

Though neither indictment names the governor, the charges further roil a nasty gubernatorial race between Blagojevich, a Democrat seeking a second term, and GOP rival Judy Baar Topinka, the state's three-term treasurer.

The indictments are part of a federal probe into whether campaign contributions to Blagojevich were given in exchange for business contracts or appointments to state boards and commissions.

The FBI also has been looking into claims that Beverly Ascaridis, the wife of the governor's former campaign treasurer, got her job as a state parks administrator in exchange for a $1,500 check her husband wrote to Blagojevich's daughter.

Blagojevich has repeatedly denied any knowledge of, or connection to, the alleged corruption.

"The allegations in today's indictments, if proven true, are a violation of my trust but far more importantly a betrayal of the public's trust — the indictment details a pattern of self-enrichment by two individuals, acting on their own, that is reprehensible," Blagojevich said in a written statement Wednesday.

Illinois' gubernatorial race is being closely watched, with Democrats and Republicans fighting to attain a majority of the nation's governorships. And the Midwest is particularly contested, seen as key in the 2008 presidential campaign.

After 25 years, the GOP lost Illinois' governorship in 2002, when Blagojevich positioned himself as someone who would clean up state government.

Before that election, the GOP had held almost all top statewide offices.

Today, it has only Topinka's.

Michael Lawrence, director of the Paul Simon Public Policy Institute at Southern Illinois University in Carbondale, said this week's news could prove a break for Topinka.

A poll last month for Copley News Service showed Blagojevich with a 10-point lead over Topinka, 47% to 37%. But voters weren't particularly happy with Blagojevich: A third of voters rated his job performance as "excellent" or "good," two-thirds as "fair" or "poor."

Rezko "is not some little-known person," Lawrence said. "This is someone who clearly knows the governor and is close to him. The question is going to be whether the public will pay attention."

*

p.j.huffstutter@latimes.com

As The Foley Case Unfolds, Hastert Gets A More Enthusiastic Nod From Bush (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg And Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, October 12, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 11— Early last week, President Bush said he respected J. Dennis Hastert as a father, a teacher and a coach — but did not say what he thought of him as House speaker.

Two days later, amid continuing calls for Mr. Hastert to resign as speaker over the Mark Foley e-mail scandal, Mr. Bush expressed more direct support for Mr. Hastert, but only through aides.

This week, Mr. Bush is giving Mr. Hastert a more unmistakable embrace, telling reporters on Wednesday: “Denny is very credible, as far as I’m concerned. And he’s done a fine job as speaker.”

The president is expected go one step further on Thursday, when he is scheduled to appear side-by-side with Mr. Hastert at a Republican rally in Chicago.

DOJ_NMG_0079437

Aides to both men said Mr. Bush's ever-friendlier declarations of support were one part political calculus, one part personal loyalty. The White House has made clear it agrees with Republican leaders in Congress that Mr. Hastert's resignation would only prompt Democrats to demand more scalps in the imbroglio over what Congressional Republicans knew when about Mr. Foley's risqué e-mails to male pages.

But, aides said, it also reflects Mr. Bush's belief that Mr. Hastert has by and large been a loyal supporter who has come through for him at crucial moments — though their working relationship has had its rifts. This year, Mr. Hastert has criticized the administration for approving a deal giving control of operations at several major ports to a Dubai-owned company and for pushing an immigration plan that caused open rebellion among his members.

The strains seemed evident last week as Mr. Bush initially appeared to hold back on giving Mr. Hastert full-throated support as speaker, though aides said the president could only come so far when so many facts were unknown.

But then last Thursday, Mr. Hastert declared that he took ultimate responsibility for his office's missing signals that Mr. Foley was crossing the line with pages — though he said he had not personally known of them. This seemed to clear the way for more forceful presidential support.

Within hours, Mr. Bush called Mr. Hastert at home to say he stood by him as speaker. Aides to both men told reporters about the call minutes later.

People in Mr. Hastert's inner circle describe the phone call as the equivalent of a papal blessing that helped cool demands for his resignation from within the party, even as new reports emerged accusing Mr. Hastert's office of knowing about potential trouble with Mr. Foley earlier than it had acknowledged.

Addressing some friction this year, Ron Bonjean, Mr. Hastert's spokesman, said, "Sure, there have been ups and downs, but at the same time we both have our eye on the ball and we both are trying to defy history in this midterm election."

Aides to Mr. Bush said the president was also grateful for Mr. Hastert's help on signature issues like his tax cuts. Mr. Bush had urged the speaker to stay on in 2004, to help advance his second-term agenda. Otherwise, Mr. Hastert's associates say, he would now be savoring an ambassadorship or concentrating on building a vacation home in Wisconsin.

In the end, Mr. Hastert could not help the president deliver his proposed Social Security overhaul or his immigration plan. But Tony Snow, the White House press secretary, said the president had appreciated Mr. Hastert's candor.

"Sometimes Hastert will say 'I agree with you, but given where the votes are, you're not going to get it,' " Mr. Snow said.

Only weeks ago, Illinois Republicans worried about having Mr. Bush attend a fund-raiser for local Congressional candidates on Thursday, given his approval ratings. Mr. Hastert's name was highlighted on the invitations, printed larger than Mr. Bush's.

Now, it is Mr. Hastert who is seen as the bigger liability. And now it is Mr. Bush who is trying to boost Mr. Hastert.

"When he stands up and says, I want to know the truth — I believe yesterday he said that if somebody on his staff didn't tell him the truth, they're gone — I respect that and appreciate that, and believe him," Mr. Bush said Wednesday.

The president predicted that the scandal would not harm the party on Election Day.

"This Foley issue bothers a lot of people, including me," he said. "But I think when they get in that booth, they're going to be thinking about how best to secure the country from attack, and how best to keep the economy growing."

Hastert Aides Interest Ethics Panel (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, October 12, 2006

With House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert denying personal knowledge of former representative Mark Foley's activities, investigators for the House ethics committee are bearing down on three senior members of Hastert's staff to determine when they learned of Foley's actions and whether they passed on their knowledge to the speaker.

The three -- chief of staff Scott Palmer, deputy chief of staff Mike Stokke and counsel Ted Van Der Meid -- have formed a palace guard around Hastert (R-Ill.) for years, attaining great degrees of power and unusual autonomy to deal with matters of politics, policy and House operations. They are also remarkably close. Palmer and Stokke have been with Hastert for decades. They live together in a Capitol Hill townhouse and commute back to Illinois on weekends.

DOJ_NMG_0079438

It is that relationship that has made investigators so interested in their knowledge of Foley's contacts with teenage male congressional pages, especially allegations that his chief of staff personally appealed to Palmer in 2003 to confront the Florida Republican. Foley resigned Sept. 29 when news reports indicated he had sent electronic messages to a former page.

"It would be very hard to believe if Palmer knew that kind of detail, he wouldn't have acted upon it, and it's hard to imagine Scott Palmer would have spared the speaker that knowledge," said one former Republican leadership aide, who spoke on the condition of anonymity for fear of jeopardizing his lobbying contacts.

Within Hastert's operation, some staff members appear to point accusingly at Van Der Meid, who is in charge of ethics matters and is widely believed to have steered Hastert wrong before.

Van Der Meid, a former chief Republican counsel for the House Committee on Standards of Official Conduct, helped engineer the failed effort to change GOP ethics rules to allow an indicted lawmaker to remain in the leadership. The power play was designed to keep then-House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Tex.) at his post, but it backfired spectacularly, embarrassing many Republicans and leaving a blemish on Hastert's record.

One House leadership aide said Van Der Meid lacks the personal connections with the speaker that Palmer and Stokke have, making him the most vulnerable of the three.

The staff issue will be front and center today, as the ethics committee takes the testimony of Kirk Fordham, Foley's former chief of staff, who is to testify that in 2003 he alerted Palmer to Foley's behavior. A source with knowledge of the events said Fordham will detail repeated efforts by then-House Clerk Jeff Trandahl to raise alarms about Foley's interest in young pages, and Fordham's own confrontations with Foley.

As early as 2000, Trandahl periodically called Fordham to say Foley was spending too much time with pages, the source said, and Fordham would have to "pull him back a little." In brief, awkward conversations, the source said, Fordham would tell Foley: "I just got a call from Jeff Trandahl. And Mark, you just need to be conscious of appearances. Everyone knows you're gay. You're being held to higher standards than everyone else. They see the stereotype -- a gay man going after kids."

In 2003, Trandahl placed another call to Fordham, according to the source. But this time, it was because Foley was seen drunk outside the pages' dormitory after the 10 p.m. curfew, trying to get in. Exasperated, Fordham reputedly told Trandahl, "I don't know if my saying something [to Foley] would make any difference."

Both Fordham and Trandahl decided that Fordham should call Palmer, according to the source. In a phone call with Palmer, Fordham expressed his concern about Foley's "over-friendliness" to pages, although Fordham did not specifically mention that Foley was seen outside the pages' dorm. Palmer said he would talk to Foley about it; two days later, Fordham checked in with Palmer. Palmer said that he spoke with Foley and that he told the speaker about it, the source said.

Palmer has said: "What Kirk Fordham said did not happen."

Now, a rapidly escalating ethics investigation is trying to determine who is right. Peggy Sampson, a former Capitol Police officer who has supervised Republican pages since 1986, went before the committee yesterday. According to several former pages, Sampson was the adult who warned them to stay away from Foley, and she may be able to confirm his alleged visit to the pages' dormitory.

A current staff member who has corroborated Palmer's meeting with Foley has also offered to cooperate with investigators. House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio), who said he told Hastert about the Foley matter this spring, yesterday afternoon received an invitation to testify and "looks forward to cooperating fully," said spokesman Kevin Smith.

Rep. Rodney Alexander (R-La.) and his chief of staff are to testify next week, presumably about e-mails Alexander's staff received from a former page. The 2005 e-mails from Foley, which asked the youth for a picture and what he wanted for his birthday, came to the attention of Stokke and Van Der Meid that fall, the speaker's office said.

For an institution replete with glory seekers, Hastert's inner circle has been virtually invisible to the outside world. Palmer has known Hastert for 28 years and worked on his first political campaign; he is the speaker's gatekeeper, a policy expert who swoops into negotiations to untie knots and seal deals.

Stokke, an old Illinois political hand, is tasked with getting GOP lawmakers what they need for their faltering campaigns, such as an appearance by Hastert, a fundraiser or vital legislation.

DOJ_NMG_0079439

Van Der Meid is the relative newcomer -- he came to the speaker's office after guiding the ethics committee's probe of then-House Speaker Newt Gingrich (R-Ga.). Known by some as the mayor of the House, Van Der Meid has the institutional knowledge of the chamber's customs. He handles legal matters but has been known to intervene angrily on a shade of carpet or which paintings to hang on the Capitol's walls.

The speaker's own timeline points to Van Der Meid and Stokke as central players in the Foley matter. After Alexander's staff alerted a low-level Hastert aide in the fall of 2005, Stokke directed the information to Van Der Meid. Later that day, Stokke met with Alexander's chief of staff, then summoned Trandahl to the speaker's office. Later, Trandahl informed Van Der Meid that action had been taken to stop Foley's communications with the Louisiana youth.

A senior GOP aide, speaking on the condition of anonymity for fear of retribution, said it made little sense to have a political hand such as Stokke handle the Foley matter, a delicate issue involving personnel questions and possible legal violations.

"Did they make an affirmative decision to have the political guy work on this?" the GOP staffer asked. "It clearly was a bad damn idea."

Nowhere in the speaker's timeline is Palmer mentioned. But former leadership aides question how a powerful chief of staff could have been left out of such complicated deliberations and how they would have been kept from Hastert.

The latter point is especially true if Foley's behavior came to Palmer's attention in 2003, one former aide said. In recent months, as the House has become consumed in scandal and political trouble, Hastert has been less engaged in the day-to-day activities of the House, he said. That was not true in 2003, however, the former aide added.

Ethics Panel Questions Page Supervisors (AP-Y)

By Larry Margasak

AP-Yahoo, October 12, 2006

House officials who directly supervise teenage congressional pages were questioned Wednesday by ethics committee investigators probing the handling of former Rep. Mark Foley's inappropriate messages to pages.

The internal investigators spoke privately with Peggy Sampson, who supervises House pages sponsored by Republican lawmakers, and her Democratic counterpart, Wren Ivester.

The high schoolers attend classes at Congress' page school and perform errands for lawmakers.

By starting with those closest to the pages, investigators can learn what the youngsters might have told the supervisors about Foley, R-Fla., and whether they reported any inappropriate conduct to higher House officials.

Until now, there has been no evidence that any Democratic lawmaker or employee knew about Foley's conduct.

Investigators planned to question Foley's former chief of staff, Kirk Fordham, on Thursday. He says he took action in 2002 or 2003 when he learned of Foley's inappropriate approaches to pages.

Fordham has emerged as a key figure because he said he brought the allegations to Speaker Dennis Hastert's chief of staff, Scott Palmer. Fordham has said he subsequently learned that Palmer spoke with Foley.

Palmer has denied speaking with Fordham at that time, and Hastert's office said the speaker's staff first learned about Foley's conduct in the fall of 2005.

An internal review by Hastert's office said the information passed on last fall concerned Foley's overly friendly — but not sexually explicit — computer messages to a former page from Louisiana.

The page was sponsored by Rep. Rodney Alexander, R-La. His office said the lawmaker and his top aide will appear before the ethics panel next week.

Hastert, R-Ill., said he did not learn of Foley's conduct until the end of September. If that is correct, his staff will have to explain to investigators why they did not tell the speaker what they knew last fall.

Hastert said he believes his staff acted appropriately when the information was passed on to the House clerk and Rep. John Shimkus, R-Ill., the chairman of the board that oversees the page program. Shimkus and the clerk met with Foley and made it clear he should stop communicating with the former page to avoid even the appearance of impropriety.

The speaker said this week that if he finds that anyone on his staff covered up the problem, they would be fired.

President Bush has expressed confidence in Hastert's handling of the Foley matter several times, the latest on Wednesday.

He said Hastert's "strong statements have made it clear to not only the party members, but to the country, that he wants to find out the facts," Bush told a White House news conference.

"I mean, this is disgusting behavior when a member of Congress betrays the trust of the Congress and a family that sent a young page up to serve in the Congress."

The president called the speaker "very credible as far as I'm concerned," and said Hastert has "done a fine job as speaker."

Bush planned to speak at a fundraiser in Chicago on Thursday that Hastert was hosting to help two Illinois Republicans in tough races.

Boehner Asked By Ethics To Testify On Foley (RC)

By Susan Davis

Roll Call, October 12, 2006

The House ethics committee is stepping up its investigation into former Rep. Mark Foley's (R-Fla.) relationships with House pages, as Members are being lined up to offer testimony before the panel.

According to sources, House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) received an invitation Wednesday to appear before the Committee on Standards of Official Conduct, but a specific date was not disclosed.

A spokesman for Boehner reiterated that he will cooperate fully with the investigation.

"Mr. Boehner welcomes the opportunity and looks forward to meeting with them and providing any information that might be helpful to their inquiry," said spokesman Kevin Madden.

Additionally, Rep. Rodney Alexander (R-La.) will appear before the ethics committee next week. Adam Terry, a spokesman for Alexander, said he will "voluntarily" offer testimony Wednesday.

The Louisiana Republican will discuss his role in 2005 in informing House Republican leaders that a former page — sponsored by his office — had been made uncomfortable by an e-mail exchange with Foley that was characterized as "over-friendly."

The public revelation of that e-mail exchange two weeks ago quickly led to the disclosure of a series of other, more sexually explicit online discussions Foley had with former House pages that prompted him to resign from the House on Sept. 29.

The ethics committee launched a formal investigation of the Foley matter Oct. 5. On Wednesday, lawyers for the committee met separately with Peggy Sampson and Wren Ivester, the majority and minority House page supervisors, respectively. Those discussions were characterized as informal because committee rules dictate that two House Members must be present "to take testimony and receive evidence" as part of a formal investigative subcommittee.

At least two panel members, Chairman Doc Hastings (R-Wash.) and ranking member Howard Berman (D-Calif.), were scheduled to return to Capitol Hill today to hear testimony from Kirk Fordham, a central figure in the investigation. Reps. Judy Biggert (R-Ill.) and Stephanie Tubbs Jones (D-Ohio) also are on the investigative subcommittee.

Fordham was chief of staff to National Republican Congressional Committee Chairman Tom Reynolds (N.Y.) before resigning last week as the scandal unfolded. Fordham previously spent more than a decade working for Foley, and he has offered an account that conflicts with the timeline of events provided by senior aides to Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.).

Fordham has said publicly that he warned Hastert's chief of staff, Scott Palmer, as early as 2003 on Foley's interactions with House pages, but Palmer denied he ever spoke to Fordham on that topic.

Palmer, Deputy Chief of Staff Mike Stokke and staff counsel Ted Van Der Meid are expected to be called before the panel. Ron Bonjean, communications director for Hastert, said Wednesday that he did not know whether anyone in the office had been contacted by the committee yet.

Other Members who may be called to offer testimony include retiring Rep. Jim Kolbe (R-Ariz.), but his spokeswoman said Wednesday the office had not been contacted.

Rep. John Shimkus (R-Ill.), a co-chairman of the House Page Board, also is expected to appear, but a spokesman did not return calls. Former House Clerk Jeff Trandahl also has said he will cooperate with the ethics committee. His attorney did not return calls seeking comment.

DOJ_NMG_0079441

A spokesman for Reynolds did not comment directly on whether his boss would appear before the panel, stating only "Congressman Reynolds supports a complete and full investigation and has said so since the beginning."

Hastings and Berman told reporters last week that the panel had approved nearly four-dozen subpoenas for documents and testimony in the Foley case. They have promised a thorough and timely investigation.

While the ethics panel investigates the Foley case, the House also is considering ways to reform the chamber's page program.

A spokeswoman for the House Administration Committee said any decisions regarding new orientation procedures for students and administrative changes to the operation of the House page program will be discussed following the completion of the current investigations.

"Everything is operating normally right now. No kids have left the program," said spokeswoman Salley Collins, whose panel oversees the Office of the Clerk, which manages the page program along with the three-member Page Board.

Along with setting up a toll-free hotline number for current and former pages to report any inappropriate contact they may have experienced, "the Office of the Clerk has reached out to the parents of the current class to one, reiterate the fact that safety and security has been and will continue to be the top priority and two, to inform them of the hotline that has been established," Collins said. "Supervisors have spoken to the teenagers directly regarding this issue and counselors are available for the students both at the school as well as at the dorms residence."

Page: Foley Touched Page On House Floor (MDAy)

By Walter Nowinski

Michigan Daily, October 12, 2006

A former House page said he witnessed inappropriate contact between former Republican Congressman Mark Foley and another page in the back of the House floor in early 2001.

The page, Richard Nguyen, a first-year student at the University's Gerald Ford School of Public Policy, said he saw Foley pat a male page's behind.

Foley's attorney did not return calls for comment.

Nguyen said he was not sure during which month the incident took place. He was a page between January and June of 2001.

Nguyen did not report the incident to authorities. At the time, the then-16-year-old thought it was "questionable activity," but he was unsure how to interpret it.

"I wasn't sure if it was a social norm I wasn't accustomed to," Nguyen said. "I mean, you see athletes patting each other's asses all the time on the field."

Nguyen, a first-generation Vietnamese American from California, said he was amazed by what he learned about other points of view and other lifestyles while serving.

"It was one of the most rewarding experiences of my life," he said.

However, the positive experience Nguyen had as a congressional page has recently been dimmed by doubts about the program's future.

In the aftermath of an unfolding sex scandal involving sexually explicit instant messages and inappropriate e-mails between Foley and several underage male pages, there have been calls for the program to be suspended or abolished.

Rep. Ray LaHood (R-Ill.) has called for the current page class to be sent home and the whole program to be reviewed.

Nguyen said he and other pages found LaHood's call alarming.

"We are united in that we want to make sure the page program is preserved," he said.

Nguyen described the page program as having been one of the most significant parts of his life.

"For someone like me who doesn't have a million dollars and is a first-generation American, it was a wonderful way to feel like I was a part of the American fabric," he said.

Yet the future of the page program is in jeopardy as the Foley sex scandal continues to unfold.

DOJ_NMG_0079442

Two weeks ago, reports by ABC News revealed that Foley exchanged sexually explicit instant messages and inappropriate e-mails with several underage male House pages.

Foley resigned from Congress on Sept. 29 after a reporter from ABC News confronted him with a graphic instant message transcript in which Foley discussed masturbation techniques with an underage male page.

Earlier this week, there were reports that at least one former male page who served in the House in the fall of 2000 had sexual relations with Foley after the page had left the program. He was 21 years old.

Nguyen said many of the pages in his class were suspicious of Foley.

"We always saw that Mr. Foley was very friendly to male pages," he said. "There were signs, for an observer like myself, but I never knew what I know now."

Nguyen said he never felt threatened. The dormitory where he and the other pages lived was guarded by police, and the page program enforced curfews and a buddy system.

"I always felt safe when I was there," Nguyen said. "But then again, I was a Democratic page."

In the fallout from the Foley sex scandal, questions have been raised about how much the Republican House leadership knew about Foley's actions and when they knew it. Several prominent conservative voices, including the editorial page of the Washington Times, have called for House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) to resign for failing to act after he learned of inappropriate e-mail exchanges between Foley and pages.

Hastert has refused to resign and maintains that he acted properly.

The FBI is investigating Foley's conduct, and the House Ethics Committee is reviewing the Republican leadership's handling of the situation.

"If there were people who knew that the pages were being sexually harassed, you have to ask yourself," Nguyen said. "Are these the right people to be in charge of young people and to be in charge of our country?"

Nguyen hopes the page program will survive the current political uproar.

"By eliminating the page program we would be punishing the victims who came forward," Nguyen said. "That is unfair."

Page basics: A Congressional page is a high school junior who works in the House of Representatives and assists members of Congress with their duties on the House floor.

They are housed in a Capitol Hill dormitory and attend classes at the Library of Congress.

Scandal Sidelines Hastert, Reynolds (WP)

By Juliet Eilperin

The Washington Post, October 12, 2006

Weeks before the Nov. 7 elections, the Mark Foley scandal and its aftermath have already had a visible effect on Republican prospects: Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) and Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds (R-N.Y.), the two men leading the GOP efforts to keep power in the House, have both been largely sidelined from the public campaign.

Under normal circumstances, the House speaker and the chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee, currently Reynolds, would be in a full sprint in the closing weeks of an election campaign -- raising money and rallying partisans to help House members in the most competitive races. Both leaders, however, have drastically curtailed their appearances this month after coming under fire for what critics have called an inadequate response to early warnings about Foley's behavior with House pages.

Reynolds is now battling to hold on to his own district in Upstate New York, while Hastert has been tied down in Washington, holding news conferences and attempting to control the legal and political fallout from the uproar -- including demands from Democrats, commentators and at least some Republicans that he resign the speakership. Although speculation has centered on whether Hastert can hang on, and how much the episode is hurting Republicans at the polls, there is already a tangible impact on GOP fortunes.

In the past week alone, Republicans have canceled nearly a dozen campaign events with Hastert and Reynolds. Rep. Don Sherwood (Pa.) -- who is one of the GOP's most endangered incumbents after revelations that his former mistress had sued him in Maryland, alleging assault -- told both men not to come to his district, forgoing crucial campaign dollars to minimize additional negative news coverage. In addition, at least seven House GOP candidates have donated to charity nearly $20,000 in contributions that they had received from Foley before the scandal broke.

DOJ_NMG_0079443

"Sometimes political reality takes over travel schedules," said Joe Gaylord, who was a top political adviser to then-Speaker Newt Gingrich (R-Ga.). "This is one of those things where candidates have to decide for themselves what is best for their individual campaigns, and national leaders will follow that."

Increasingly, Republican candidates are telling their leaders to stay home. Houston City Council member Shelley Sekula Gibbs (R), who is running for former House majority leader Tom DeLay's open seat as a write-in candidate, had hoped that Hastert would come to Texas to tout its prospects for economic development. Last week, she told the speaker he need not visit.

"It would be a distraction. I have to focus on winning this race," Sekula Gibbs said in an interview. "They want me to focus on winning," she added, referring to the speaker's office.

Other Republicans have also canceled Hastert fundraisers, such as Rep. Ron Lewis (Ky.), who was once regarded as safe for reelection but now looks imperiled.

In other instances, the speaker and Reynolds are the ones pulling the plug. Hastert told both Rep. Michael E. Sodrel (R-Ind.) and Ohio state Sen. Joy Padgett that he could not stump on their behalf this month, while Reynolds canceled events with fellow New York Rep. John E. Sweeney and Florida businessman Vern Buchanan.

"My understanding is he had to go back to his district," said Buchanan spokeswoman Sally Tibbetts. She added that the campaign went ahead with the Oct. 2 event aimed at "rallying some of our grass-roots supporters and leaders in the community."

Though Hastert and Reynolds have crisscrossed the country for months raising money and generating publicity for congressional candidates, it is not just money that matters at this point. Motivation counts just as much, because a visit by a House leader under better circumstances can help build the enthusiasm that is critical for turnout efforts.

Former House majority leader Richard K. Armey (Tex.) said he has warned fellow Republicans "for a long time the biggest danger the Republican majority faced is insufficient turnout of their own base, and this Foley thing hasn't helped anything." Rallying the troops through last-minute campaign stops "can be very important," Armey said, recalling the efforts of Gingrich to "get people excited."

House leaders have not abandoned the campaign trail altogether. Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) attended a fundraiser yesterday on behalf of Rep. John Kline (R-Minn.) and will campaign for other candidates in Minnesota and Iowa this week. Hastert will campaign today for Illinois Republicans Peter Roskam and David McSweeney, along with President Bush.

But freshman Rep. Melissa L. Bean (D-Ill.), McSweeney's opponent, said the speaker's appearance "doesn't surprise me" because McSweeney is "a rubber stamp" for the GOP. "People appreciate independence," Bean said.

Bush acknowledged at a news conference yesterday that the page controversy has resonated with the public.

"This Foley issue bothers a lot of people, including me," Bush said. But he added that Americans care more about national security and the economy when voting. "When they get in that booth, they're going to be thinking about, you know, how best to secure the country from attack and, you know, how best to keep the economy growing."

Neither Reynolds nor Hastert has said that the fallout from the Foley scandal has hampered their ability to run their party's reelection effort.

"It has not affected [Reynolds's] ability to be NRCC chairman, not at all," said NRCC spokesman Carl Forti. "I think you've seen over the past three years he's been able to run the committee, be home on weekends and when Congress is in recess, and still make decisions here. Nothing has changed that."

But several Democratic campaign experts, including former Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee chairman Martin Frost (Tex.), said Reynolds's intensified reelection fight will distract him and take a toll on his ability to make last-minute decisions about where to focus the GOP's dollars and effort.

"You have to make some substantial judgments about who has a chance and who doesn't," Frost said. "The campaign chairman needs to bring all his faculties to bear on those questions. . . . This is enormous additional trouble, and I don't think they can survive this."

Polls: GOP Put Politics Ahead Of Pages (AP-Y)

DOJ_NMG_0079444

By The Associated Press

AP-Yahoo, October 12, 2006

Most Americans say the House Republican leadership worried more about politics than the safety of congressional pages in the case of disgraced former Rep. Mark Foley, according to polls. Most also say Democrats would not have handled the situation better.

Republicans have come under criticism for their response to Foley, who sent sexually explicit messages to teenage male pages. GOP House leaders have faced questions whether they acted promptly to deal with the Florida congressman.

People were split on whether House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., should step down, with just under half saying he should, according to several polls.

Among the other findings:

More than half in several polls said Hastert tried to cover up what he knew about Foley.

Almost half in an Associated Press-Ipsos poll said recent reports of scandal and corruption would be very important in their vote.

Two-thirds said the GOP leadership did not take the e-mails seriously enough when they first learned of them, according to a CBS-New York Times poll.

Six in 10 in an ABC News-Washington Post poll said the Democrats are pursuing the case for political advantage, not to raise concerns about the page program.

The results come from AP-Ipsos, ABC-Washington Post, CBS-Times and Newsweek polling done in the last week. The polls questioned from 1,000 to 1,500 adults and had margins of error of plus or minus 2.5 percentage points to 3 percentage points.

National GOP Fights To Keep Foley Seat (NSDY/AP)

By Brian Skoloff

Long Island Newsday, October 12, 2006

WEST PALM BEACH, Fla. -- National Republicans haven't given up on former Rep. Mark Foley's district, recently spending $244,300 for television ads attacking Democratic hopeful Tim Mahoney.

The Democratic newcomer has become a strong contender, partly because Foley's name will remain on the ballot even though his replacement will receive those votes. The replacement, state Rep. Joe Negron, has just under five weeks to campaign.

The National Republican Congressional Committee spent the money between Foley's resignation Sept. 29 and Oct. 10, when the filing was made to the Federal Elections Commission. Foley was considered likely to be re-elected easily until his sexually explicit Internet messages to teenage male House pages were publicized.

Mahoney's campaign notes that the group has committed to spend another $690,000 by reserving air time through Nov. 7. The committee doesn't have to use the time -- or pay for it -- if they later determine it is not necessary.

"It looks like the bosses in Washington have sent $934,000 in tainted funds to prop up (House Speaker Dennis) Hastert's hand-picked attack dog," Mahoney campaign consultant Charles Halloran said of Negron. "We look forward to campaigning on issues that matter to Florida."

Negron said the national support shows that "Republicans are in a fighting mood, and we're not going to roll over and send a John Kerry Democrat to Congress."

The ad attacks Mahoney for his stance on Social Security. The NRCC claims Mahoney's plan would raise taxes. Halloran said Mahoney has no plans to push for higher taxes but he opposes privatization, an option favored by President Bush.

NRCC spokesman Ed Patru wouldn't say if more ads were planned, but acknowledged that more needed to be done to ensure voters know that Negron is the candidate.

In the district, registered Republicans outnumber Democrats by 202,500 to 170,369, according to the latest state figures.

Foley Case Snags Incumbent In Ohio Race For House Seat (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney

DOJ_NMG_0079445

The New York Times, October 12, 2006

COLUMBUS, Ohio, Oct. 11 — Representative Deborah Pryce is a former municipal court judge, a Republican and a member of the House leadership who has represented her central Ohio district for 14 years. She is also friends with Mark Foley, the congressman who resigned in the page scandal, as she told Columbus Monthly for a feature it published just last month.

Ms. Pryce always thought she would have a difficult re-election campaign this year in a state raked by Republican scandals. But since Mr. Foley quit, she said in an interview on a tense day of campaigning here, her own internal polls have measured a steady drop in support under the weight of attacks by Mary Jo Kilroy, her Democratic opponent.

Ms. Kilroy has emphasized Ms. Pryce's connections to Mr. Foley, who was on a list of five people Ms. Pryce said she considered Washington friends in the Columbus Monthly interview.

"I'm totally convinced," Ms. Pryce said, her voice faint, as she described why her support had declined. "All our polling showed we were going in the right direction until this happened. It fell precipitously."

"It's very sad that sometimes we're slipped up by things that we have no control over and have absolutely nothing to do with," she said. "But that is part and parcel of politics."

The contest, in which Ms. Pryce and Ms. Kilroy are now described as tied in internal party polls, has emerged as a case study of how the fallout from the Foley scandal is causing problems for Republicans across the country. But it is also unusual in a way that reflects the intriguing diversity of this central Ohio district, the 15th, and all the swirling complications of an explosive scandal that landed just four weeks before Election Day.

Ms. Kilroy is using the Foley scandal to try to systematically undercut Ms. Pryce with a big component of the Republican base here, Christian conservatives, when Republicans already worried that those voters would stay home on Election Day. "Deborah Pryce's friend Mark Foley is caught using his position to take advantage of 16-year-old pages," an announcer says in advertisements the Kilroy campaign has placed on Christian radio stations.

Ms. Pryce responded by accusing Ms. Kilroy of gay-baiting. She said in an interview she was hopeful she could win over gay voters in a city long known for a large gay population, particularly because the Human Rights Campaign, a gay advocacy organization, has endorsed both candidates in the race.

"She feels that the gay and lesbian population is a very big component of her support," Ms. Pryce said. "And she really is kind of baiting with this in terms of Mark Foley."

Few other issues are getting the same kind of attention here; no one has been asking them this week about, say, the North Korea nuclear test, both candidates said.

The Foley case is becoming an issue in an increasing number of races, aides in both parties said. But nowhere else has it become quite as pitched as here, where Ms. Kilroy — who had already been trying to link Ms. Pryce to corruption scandals in Ohio involving Republicans — has moved in with withering attacks since Mr. Foley resigned.

In an interview on Wednesday, Ms. Kilroy questioned whether Ms. Pryce had had any warning about Mr. Foley's conduct, and why Ms. Pryce, the No. 4 Republican in the House, had not called for the resignation of Representative J. Dennis Hastert of Illinois as speaker.

"When you have a member of Congress abusing his authority and his position with pages, and you have leaders of Congress looking the other way — protecting their majority instead of protecting the pages — people here saw that and said, that's the final straw," Ms. Kilroy said. "She's in leadership. And I don't understand why she is not calling on those leaders who didn't act to step down."

"What did she know?" Ms. Kilroy said, sitting in her campaign headquarters Wednesday during a break in preparation for a debate here Thursday night. "What did she do about it?"

Ms. Pryce said she did not have earlier knowledge of Mr. Foley's actions, and in the interview she said she stood by Mr. Hastert, while saying he had been "ill-served by his aides." She said she thought Ms. Kilroy would hurt herself by politicizing the Foley case.

"She's taking a big risk doing it," Ms. Pryce said. "She has overstepped a bit — I mean she's running those ads on Christian radio! That because I happened to mention him as a friend that I knew all along; because he was gay, that he must be a pedophile. I mean, I just don't think that's going to really sell like she's hoping it will."

DOJ_NMG_0079446

Even before Mr. Foley resigned, Ms. Pryce was running into a stiff wind. The scandals that have swept this state involving Republican officeholders have caused problems for Republicans up and down the ballot; polls show that Ohio Republicans are at risk of losing a Senate seat, the governor's office and as many as five Congressional seats.

Ms. Pryce's elevation after the 2002 election to the House leadership ranks, if helpful to her in Washington, made her vulnerable to the very kind of anti-incumbent campaign being run by Ms. Kilroy, even before Mr. Foley quit and questions were raised about the Republican leadership.

"Over the years she's run, Congresswoman Pryce has emphasized her centrality to the party, her ties to the leadership and what they can produce for Ohio," said Paul A. Beck, a professor of political science at Ohio State University. "This is a difficult time to talk about that, and Kilroy has hit her pretty hard."

John C. Green, director of the Ray C. Bliss Institute of Applied Politics at the University of Akron, said the Foley disclosures could serve to push more undecided voters into Ms. Kilroy's camp while discouraging conservative Republicans from bothering to vote.

"That district seems to be at the center of the storm in Ohio," Professor Green said.

Although Ms. Pryce is conservative on spending and other issues, she has opposed a ban on same-sex marriage and supported other gay rights initiatives. Her positions on those issues led the Human Rights Campaign to take the highly unusual step of endorsing both candidates in this district.

But Joe Solmonese, the president of the organization, disputed Ms. Pryce's characterization of Ms. Kilroy's attacks on the Foley resignation. Mr. Solmonese said he had reviewed the Kilroy radio advertisements and thought she had gone to great pains to make clear she was criticizing Mr. Foley for improper behavior with a teenage page, and not for being gay.

"I don't think it's gay-baiting at all," he said. "She clearly is trying to make a case here that has a lot more to do with Deborah Pryce's leadership, supporting Denny Hastert, but not about Mark Foley being gay."

Asked about Ms. Pryce's claims, Ms. Kilroy said: "This is about a member of Congress abusing his position with pages, and it's about how the Republican leadership engaged in a cover-up, and it's about Deborah Pryce not speaking out against that. It's not about anyone's sexual orientation."

Phil Burress, president of Citizens for Community Values of Ohio, a conservative group, said that while he initially thought the Foley scandal would keep what he called values voters at home, he thought Democrats had been too brazen in discussing the issue and had lost whatever advantage they might have had.

"It's become so politicized that everyone is sick of it," Mr. Burress said. "They are not concerned about the kids. They are concerned about politics. I think it's beginning to boomerang on the Democrats because they overplayed their hands."

Chris Redfern, the state Democratic chairman, said he thought the Foley scandal would affect races across the state, starting with this one, and that the Democrats had so far been careful in their discussion of it.

"We all have to be careful," Mr. Redfern said. "Democrats shouldn't overplay it. But Republicans shouldn't underplay it."

Bob Bennett, the chairman of the state Republican Party, said he was confident Ms. Pryce would survive because "any wrongdoing by anyone was done by others." But Mr. Bennett said that while he was not worried about Ms. Pryce, he was worried that these latest ethics accusations could complicate Republican hopes of holding onto the Ohio district left vacant by the retirement of Representative Bob Ney, who was caught up in an ethics scandal.

Ms. Pryce said that, if distressed, she was also confident there was time to recover.

"We just have to gain it back," she said. "We have to work hard to turn this back into lemonade."

Foley Scandal Exposes The GOP's Gay Identity Crisis (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely

USA Today, October 12, 2006

WASHINGTON — At a State Department ceremony this week, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice warmly acknowledged the family members of Mark Dybul, whom she was swearing in as the nation's new global AIDS coordinator.

As first lady Laura Bush looked on, Rice singled out his partner, Jason Claire, and Claire's mother. Rice referred to her as Dybul's "mother-in-law."

DOJ_NMG_0079447

The celebratory moment for a gay couple was emblematic of the political identity crisis facing the Republican Party, two years after an election the GOP won in part by making gay marriage an issue and less than two weeks after revelations about a Republican House member's advances toward teenage boys.

For Republicans, the most difficult problem posed by the e-mail exchanges that former congressman Mark Foley had with pages is not necessarily the flagrant misbehavior of one member. Rather it's the fact that the investigation is exposing a politically awkward fact of life: some GOP leaders practice a more tolerant brand of politics in their offices than some in the party have preached on the campaign trail.

"They play somebody different on TV than they are in person," says John Aravosis, a gay blogger who used to work for Sen. Ted Stevens, R-Alaska.

Jeff Trandahl, the former House clerk at the center of the inquiry into the Foley e-mails and a top-ranking appointee of House Speaker Dennis Hastert, is openly gay. So is Kirk Fordham, the former Foley chief of staff who says he alerted Hastert's office last year to his boss' over-chumminess with high school pages.

The revelations have disturbed some conservative activists, who believe that Republicans owe their victories in the 2004 elections to the thousands of "values voters" who trooped to the polls to vote for anti-gay-marriage measures on the ballots of 11 swing states.

"It was the deciding factor in the presidential election," says Phil Burress. He spearheaded the successful effort to pass a gay-marriage ban in Ohio, the state that decided the election for Bush.

"Has the social agenda of the GOP been stalled by homosexual members or staffers?" Tony Perkins of the Family Research Council wrote in an e-mail message to the organization's activists this week. In an interview, Perkins says that while he has not drawn any conclusions, "these are questions that need to be resolved."

Such sentiments have raised concerns that gay staffers will be pressed to leave Republican offices. "It could be another Salem," says former senator Alan Simpson, referring to colonial-era witch hunts. Simpson, a Wyoming Republican, co-founded the Republican Unity Coalition to encourage gay participation in the party.

Gay Republicans insist they shouldn't be blamed for Foley or the fallout. Patrick Sammon, political director of the Log Cabin Republicans, denounced the congressman's behavior toward pages as "despicable."

Justin Nelson, a former GOP House staffer who founded the National Gay and Lesbian Chamber of Commerce, says "it was gay Republican staffers and an openly gay member of Congress" who delivered early warnings about Foley's behavior.

Both Fordham and Rep. Jim Kolbe of Arizona, Congress' only openly gay Republican member, have said they passed on complaints about Foley to the House speaker and clerk offices.

While many conservatives insist their opposition to gay marriage doesn't equate to opposition to homosexuality, some remain suspicious of gays' trustworthiness. Burress says he believes that homosexual men are more prone to pedophilia than heterosexuals. "There's no question about that," he says.

The Rev. Debra Haffner, head of the Religious Institute on Sexual Morality, Justice and Healing, denies that assertion. "The vast majority of child abusers are heterosexual; the vast majority of abused children are girls," she says.

Former senator John Danforth, a Missouri Republican who has just published a book called Faith and Politics, says his party's successful use of gay marriage as a campaign issue may come back to haunt it. "There are some things that aren't worth doing whether they work or not," he says.

Not all conservatives have had their faith shaken in the GOP, however.

Helen Cindrich, an abortion opponent and conservative activist who is working for Republican Sen. Rick Santorum's re-election in Pennsylvania, says her views about gays and lesbians have evolved as she has met some of them.

"What would you do if you took all those people who are homosexual out of all those offices?" she asks. "There's probably a lot of good people who would be shunned, and that's not the way it's supposed to be."

Cindrich acknowledges that not all her fellow conservatives agree with her, but she adds, "I guess I'm learning to take people where they are."

FBI Seeks Help In Wales Case (SEAPI)

DOJ_NMG_0079448

By Paul Shukovsky, P-I REPORTER

Seattle Post-Intelligencer, October 12, 2006

Author of letter, unidentified man are key elements

The FBI is appealing for help in its five-year manhunt for the murderer of federal prosecutor Tom Wales.

In the weeks before Wales was gunned down as he sat at a computer in the basement of his Queen Anne home, someone noticed a man wandering around the neighborhood and contacted police.

Dan DeLong / P-I

At a news conference at the U.S. District Courthouse, Robert Geeslin of the FBI shows the type of gun used to kill federal prosecutor Tom Wales five years ago in his home.

That information didn't make it to the federal task force handling the case until 2004, and agents are now seeking public help because more discreet inquiries failed to identify the man.

At a news conference Wednesday marking the fifth anniversary of the slaying, agents said they want to talk with the man and released a sketch in hopes that someone would recognize him.

The potential witness is described as white, in his late 30s to early 40s, slim, 140 to 165 pounds, with a chipped front tooth and black hair possibly pulled back in a ponytail.

"We are interested in identifying this person and finding out what they were doing in the neighborhood," said FBI inspector Robert Jordan, who is in charge of the investigation.

Jordan also asked to hear from anyone who might know the author of an anonymous letter sent to the FBI in Seattle last January from Las Vegas by someone claiming to be a hit man hired to killed Wales. FBI behavioral science experts believe the author of the letter may have some connection to the murder.

The letter's return address contains the name "Gidget." Supervisory Special Agent James Fitzgerald of the FBI's behavioral analysis unit said the letter was likely written by an adult, native English speaker in his 30s or older. Because the letter was well-written, the author is probably well-educated or well-read and may use writing in his or her job.

Fitzgerald said the author has probably used the name Gidget in some playful context in the past.

"If there is someone from a year ago or 20 years ago ... that used the term 'Gidget' -- that would be important for us to know," he said.

The FBI's prime suspect in the case -- a commercial airline pilot who lives in Snohomish -- happened to be in Las Vegas on a layover when the letter was mailed in January, according to the suspect's Seattle lawyer, Larry Setchell.

The pilot, who has been the subject of a relentless investigation, including three searches of his homes and electronic surveillance, has not been charged with a crime. In a Seattle P-I story Wednesday, Setchell said his client is innocent and likened the FBI probe to an inquisition.

Jordan, asked to respond to the criticism, said the FBI would not identify any particular suspect.

Potential witness

"When the investigation reaches the point where we have probable cause to arrest someone, we speak with an indictment." Jordan and supervisory agent Robert Geeslin also pointed out that a major part of the investigation is aimed at finding a Makarov 9 x 18mm pistol replacement barrel they believe was used in the murder.

The global hunt for that barrel is "target-neutral" in that it is not tied to any particular suspect, they said. "We will follow the evidence wherever it takes us," Geeslin said.

So far, agents have located and run ballistics tests on about half the 3,500 barrels. They are continuing with the painstaking task of finding the rest and want the public's help.

Anyone with information on the whereabouts of such a barrel, the man seen wandering around Wales' neighborhood or Gidget is asked to call the FBI at 866- 322-7009.

A reward of up to $1 million is offered for information leading to an arrest and conviction.

Several of the FBI agents assigned to the dragnet for the killer were present Wednesday morning at a ceremony at the U.S. District Courthouse celebrating Wales' life as a prosecutor, parent and public servant. Among those speaking was Wales' son, also named Tom.

"It's a dreadful anniversary for me and my family," he said. "Time has not healed any wounds."

Wales noted how even people his father prosecuted lauded his fairness and sense of justice.

"After Pop's murder, we received several letters praising the understanding and guidance he had offered them during the worst period of their lives," he said. "He did not believe anyone was beyond redemption."

P-I reporter Paul Shukovsky can be reached at 206-448-8072 or paulshukovsky@seattlepi.com.

Five Years Later, FBI Still After Wales' Killer (SEATIMES)

By Steve Miletich And Mike Carter, Seattle Times staff reporters

Seattle Times, October 12, 2006

Five years after the killing of Seattle federal prosecutor Thomas Wales, the FBI released a sketch Wednesday of a dark-haired man who may have information about the killing and announced a new Web site to take tips in the investigation.

The steps came as the FBI asked for help in what it acknowledged has been a difficult investigation. About 4,000 people have been questioned and more than 10,000 leads have been pursued in all 50 states and a half-dozen foreign countries.

No one has been arrested in the slaying of Wales, who was shot in his Queen Anne home on Oct. 11, 2001. But the FBI has focused on an airline pilot who had been prosecuted by Wales in a fraud case.

At a news conference Wednesday, FBI officials declined to discuss any suspect but said they are determined to obtain an indictment.

"We will not give up," said Bob Jordan, special agent in charge of the Portland FBI office. Jordan was given oversight of the investigation in June when the head of the Seattle office tried to reduce the number of agents on the case.

Jordan said if Wales was killed because of his work, he would be the first federal prosecutor in U.S. history slain in the line of duty.

In that case, Jordan added, "we are all victims in a sense."

FBI seeking help

Tips about a newly released sketch of a man agents would like to question can be provided at 866-322-7009.

A new Web site has been set up to provide information on the case and to receive tips: http://wales.fbi.gov.

A $1 million reward has been offered for information that helps solve the case.

The sketch, the officials said, is of a man seen pulling a black nylon suitcase in Wales' neighborhood weeks before the killing. Investigators have not identified the man, who had tobacco-stained teeth and a chipped left front tooth.

It is not known if the man has any connection to the killing, but even eliminating him as a subject would be helpful, said Robert Geeslin, an FBI supervisory agent overseeing a task force of five agents, two Seattle police detectives and five investigative analysts.

The man's presence in the neighborhood was first reported as suspicious before Wales was killed. But it was not brought to the attention of the Wales task force until 2004, Geeslin said. After trying unsuccessfully to identify the man, the FBI decided to make the sketch public.

Geeslin said the FBI is continuing its search for a unique silver gun barrel used in the killing. The gun used to kill Wales — an Eastern European pistol called a Makarov — had been fitted with one of the barrels, ballistics experts found.

About 3,600 of the barrels were sold in the U.S. before Wales was killed. The FBI has tracked half of them without finding the one used to shoot Wales, Geeslin said.

The news conference followed a memorial service at the U.S. Courthouse in Seattle, where Wales' 29-year-old son, Tom, sounded a bitter note about how he and his sister, Amy, and their mother, Elizabeth, had suffered the loss. "It is a dreadful anniversary for our family," he said to more than 150 attorneys, judges, and court employees. "Time does not heal all wounds."

His father, Tom Wales said, was unconcerned over the possible danger of his job as a white-collar prosecutor. His life was "lived for the betterment of others."

"After Pops was murdered," he said, "we got letters from people he had prosecuted." All expressed condolences. "He did not believe anyone was beyond redemption."

DOJ_NMG_0079450

Tom Wales, who now lives in England, said his father was a "mentor and inspiration and probably the best friend Amy and I will ever have."

"When my conscience speaks, it does so in my father's voice," he said.

Seattle Police Chief Gil Kerlikowske recalled Wales' role as executive director of Washington CeaseFire, a gun-control advocacy group.

"It is a terrible tragedy that he would lose his life at the end of a gun," the chief said.

Also speaking was Assistant U.S. Attorney Bob Westinghouse, who worked with Wales on the fraud investigation that targeted the man who's now the prime suspect in Wales' killing. Westinghouse was placed under 24-hour protection for months after Wales' death.

"I have not known a prosecutor who was more committed to seeking justice," Westinghouse said. "His legacy is our directive to do justice ... to live our lives as ethically as possible, to have fun, and be good stewards to our community and our country."

FBI Seeks Help Identifying Man (OREG)

By Gene Johnson

The Oregonian, October 12, 2006

SEATTLE -- Shortly before federal prosecutor Thomas Crane Wales was killed five years ago, a man with a chipped front tooth was seen dragging a small, nylon suitcase through Wales' upscale neighborhood on Seattle's Queen Anne Hill.

At least one person who saw the man contacted law enforcement. But that information wasn't passed on to the task force investigating Wales' murder until 2004, and only now is the FBI asking the public for help identifying him.

The FBI released a composite sketch of the man Wednesday, the fifth anniversary of the shooting, saying that its attempts to identify him had come up empty. Wales, an 18-year veteran of the U.S. attorney's office and president of the gun control group Washington CeaseFire, was shot as he worked alone at a computer in his basement.

The FBI is offering up to $1 million for information that helps solve the killing. The sketch bears no resemblance to the only publicly identified suspect, an airline pilot whom Wales once prosecuted in a fraud case. That suspect's lawyer, Larry Setchell, has maintained his client's innocence, and no charges have been brought.

Although the sketch was made in April 2004, years after the initial report, FBI Inspector Robert Jordan said he is confident in its accuracy because agents received "some corroboration" about the way the man looked. He declined to elaborate.

Jordan would not say what agency received the initial tip about the man, how soon it was before the killing, or how close to Wales' home the man was seen. Agents don't know if the man had any connection to the killing. At the time, the man, who was white, was in his late 30s or early 40s, 5-foot-7 to 5-foot-10, slim, 140 to 165 pounds, with black hair and tobacco-stained teeth.

Jordan, who is in charge of the FBI's Portland office, took over the case in June, after Seattle special agent-in-charge Laura Laughlin was criticized

FBI: Strange Man Was Reported In Wales' Neighborhood Before Death (AP)

By Gene Johnson, AP Legal Affairs Writer

AP, October 12, 2006

SEATTLE (AP) -- Shortly before federal prosecutor Thomas Crane Wales was killed five years ago, a strange man with a chipped front tooth was seen dragging a small, nylon suitcase through his upscale neighborhood on Seattle's Queen Anne Hill.

At least one person who saw the man contacted law enforcement. But that information wasn't passed on to the task force investigating Wales' murder until 2004, and only now is the FBI asking the public for help identifying him.

The FBI released a composite sketch of the man Wednesday, the fifth anniversary of the shooting, saying that its attempts to identify him had come up empty. Wales, an 18-year veteran of the U.S. attorney's office and president of the gun control group Washington CeaseFire, was shot as he worked alone at a computer in his basement.

The FBI is offering up to $1 million for information that helps solve the killing. The sketch bears no resemblance to the only publicly identified suspect, an airline pilot whom Wales once prosecuted in a fraud case. That suspect's lawyer, Larry Setchell, has maintained his client's innocence, and no charges have been brought.

Although the sketch was made in April 2004, years after the initial report, FBI Inspector Robert Jordan said he is confident in its accuracy because agents received "some corroboration" about the way the man looked. He declined to elaborate.

Jordan would not say what agency received the initial tip about the man, how soon it was before the killing, or how close to Wales' home the man was seen. Agents don't know if the man had any connection to the killing. At the time, the man, who was white, was in his late 30s or early 40s, 5-foot-7 to 5-foot-10, slim, 140 to 165 pounds, with black hair and tobacco-stained teeth.

Jordan, who is in charge of the FBI's Portland, Ore., office, took over the case in June, after Seattle special agent-in-charge Laura Laughlin was criticized for cutting resources for the investigation. Since then, Jordan said, the FBI has roughly doubled the number of people assigned to the case.

There are now five special agents, a supervisor, and two Seattle Police detectives working it full time, along with five analysts, three federal prosecutors and a King County deputy prosecutor.

The investigation has included close to 4,000 interviews and a nationwide hunt for Makarov pistols outfitted with replacement barrels, which the shooter used. The FBI has located about half of the 3,500 Makarov replacement barrels sold in the U.S., but none matched the ballistics pattern on the bullets that killed Wales.

One Bellevue gun collector who has provided grand jury testimony in the Wales investigation, Albert Kwan, purchased at least one Makarov replacement barrel in March 1996, which he turned over to the FBI. In court papers filed Wednesday, Kwan's lawyers said he repeatedly told the grand jury he doesn't remember buying more than one barrel, but that investigators insist he bought a second barrel, which has not turned up.

Jordan said that if Wales was killed because of his work as a prosecutor, he would be the first federal prosecutor ever slain in the line of duty.

"If that's the reason he was murdered, we are all victims in a sense," he said.

Jordan's comments followed a memorial service that drew dozens of Wales' former colleagues, as well as his son, daughter and former wife.

Wales' son, Tom, said the pain his family felt after the killing remains undiminished. It's a pain they're reminded of when people ask them about the investigation or what their father might have done to provoke the murderer.

"Even if we do not invite peril, it can find us, even in the safety of our own homes," he said.

Wales' colleagues remembered him for his sense of humor, his public service and volunteer work, and his commitment to justice.

Wales "pursued justice relentlessly in his life, and with his life," said U.S. Attorney John McKay.

Seattle Police Chief Gil Kerlikowske said Wales would have been saddened at the recent spate of school shootings across the country, to see how little progress has been made.

"He saw the human face of gun violence," Kerlikowske said. "Such a terrible tragedy, then, to lose your life at the end of a gun."

.

How To Make US Schools Safer (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock, Staff Writer Of The Christian Science Monitor

The Christian Science Monitor, October 12, 2006

A presidential conference focused on people solutions: staff-police cooperation, crisis drills, and identifying problem students.

WASHINGTON

Just hours after a 13-year-old Missouri boy fired an assault rifle at his school - and in the wake of four recent fatal school shootings in rural America - President Bush and national experts vetted plans to make schools "gentle places of learning."

But, unlike comparable panels after the Columbine High School shootings in 1999, proposed strategies did not include curbing access to guns.

DOJ_NMG_0079452

Instead, Tuesday's presidential conference on school safety in Chevy Chase, Md., focused on the human face of the solution: getting "stakeholders" - students, school officials, parents, and police - working together, practicing school crisis plans as regularly as fire drills, and, most critically, identifying students who need help before they pick up a gun.

That means taking bullying seriously, encouraging students to tell an adult when they hear classmates threaten to harm themselves or others, and identifying "students of interest" (taking care not to label a child a troublemaker) and getting them help.

Since more than 3 in 4 shooters talk in advance about their plans, the goal is to get better intelligence, experts say. That means getting police into classrooms, even at elementary schools. "Our first line of prevention is really having good intelligence," said Delbert Elliott, director of the Center for the Study and Prevention of Violence in Boulder, Colo., who urged monitoring children for agitation and aggression.

Other panelists came fresh from their own bouts with school violence. Sheriff Fred Wegener of Bailey, Colo., talked about how recent emergency drills helped his officers "go to the threat," pin down the man with the gun, then evacuate students, after a call came on Sept. 27 that an outsider had taken hostages at the Platte Canyon High School. In the end, the gunman killed himself and a hostage, but was not able to fire into large groups of students.

Although gun control was not on the agenda, it did come up when panelists opened the session to questions. "Obviously, kids should not have access to weapons," said Theo Milonopoulos, a sophomore at Stanford University who with his twin brother, Nico, is a cofounder of Vox Populi and Kidz-LA. The two groups encourage youth to combat violence by engaging in the legislative process.

Sheriff Wegener of Bailey responded that he had a rifle in the bed of his pickup truck when he went to school, but "never thought about shooting anybody with it." He added: "We have to change society."

In an interview after the conference, Mr. Milonopoulos voiced his dissatisfaction: "I'm grateful to the Bush administration for bringing these issues to light through a national conference, and inviting a wide variety of groups, but there needs to be a new approach beyond the dialogue that we heard [on Tuesday]. The first thing I would do is renew the federal assault weapons ban." After the Columbine shootings in Littleton, Colo., school-safety experts called for metal detectors to keep weapons out of schools, surveillance cameras, improved school design to reduce potential hiding places - and new laws to curb access to guns.

While the event was open to the press, it was closed to the general public. Gun-control advocates say they were shut out of the conference, but not the larger fight over how to make society safer.

"The fact that the president doesn't want to address this issue and the Republican Congress is moving in the wrong direction doesn't mean that the issue has been taken off the table," says Ladd Everitt, a spokesman for the Coalition to Stop Gun Violence, citing the 109th Congress's failure to renew the assault weapons ban and a recent House bill that makes it more difficult to curb corrupt gun dealers. Recently, more than 100 mayors have organized to press for curbs on interstate gun trafficking, he notes.

Still, school-safety experts say that experience with threat assessment is beginning to pay off. Art Kelly, police chief of New Bedford, Mass., told the conference that he used information provided by the Secret Service to prevent a school shooting from being committed.

"Generally, generally, America's schools are safe places to be," said Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, one of the speakers. "Your kids are much more likely to be safer in school than they are at the mall. And that's the good news. We are, however, seeing some indications in the last two years that those trends are changing."

But finding the money to pay for all the upgrades needed to keep schools safer is a challenge. In a statement this week, the Democratic National Committee noted that the Bush administration has cut funding for the Community Oriented Policing Services program from $160 million in the last two years of the Clinton administration to $5 million in 2005. In 2006, the program was zeroed out.

Code Blue At Schools Rattles Nerves (WP)

By Lori Aratani And Katherine Shaver, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, October 12, 2006

Montgomery Officials Tighten Security After Threats of Violence Are Received

DOJ_NMG_0079453

A 12-year-old boy's false claim yesterday that an armed man approached him at a bus stop and threatened violence at a school prompted officials to lock the doors and heighten security at 13 campuses in northwestern Montgomery County.

The boy, a seventh-grader at Kingsview Middle School in Germantown, told his story to a driver as he boarded his bus in the morning, then recanted it during an after-school interview with detectives.

Before he did, the tale was enough to throw Maryland's largest school system into confusion and parents into a state of uncertainty. Acting with "an abundance of caution," police and school system officials put the schools under a day-long Code Blue alert, which meant doors were monitored and students continued classes under tighter security than usual.

Police spokeswoman Lucille Baur said detectives are conferring with prosecutors to determine whether to file charges against the boy. She said it was unclear what his motive may have been.

The school system's actions, coming after a series of school shootings and violent threats across the United States, demonstrate the current concern about student safety. Baur said police had initially recommended that three campuses be put under Code Blue alert, but school officials decided to add 10 schools.

Montgomery's response echoes that of officials in Virginia's Culpeper County, which shut down all public and private schools last week after receiving a bomb threat by phone. A 25-year-old man was arrested yesterday in connection with the case.

In Arlington County, security was tightened yesterday at Wakefield High School and neighboring Claremont Immersion Elementary School after a teenager apparently fired a paintball gun while walking to school, an official said. And in Wilmington, Del., three high school students were charged with terroristic threatening and conspiracy for making bomb threats at their school.

On Tuesday, President Bush hosted a six-hour Conference on School Safety in Chevy Chase, at which officials talked about strategies for making campuses more secure.

Yesterday's Code Blue alert in Montgomery was one of several incidents that rattled the nerves of the 139,000-student school system.

Just before 8 a.m., more than 2,200 students at Sherwood High School were evacuated after administrators received a bomb threat. Bomb-sniffing dogs were brought in to sweep the Sandy Spring campus. The threat turned out to be false, and a 15-year-old student from Sherwood was arrested in connection with the incident.

Then, in the early afternoon, two elementary schools in Gaithersburg -- Brown Station and Diamond -- briefly tightened security after Gaithersburg police notified them that a burglary suspect whose description matched that of the man who allegedly made the bus stop threat was believed to be in the area. The Code Blue at those schools, a separate action, was lifted about 90 minutes later.

Montgomery police said that elementary school students were kept inside buildings for recess and that outdoor activities at other campuses were canceled. School system officials also canceled after-school activities at Kingsview Middle.

Under the school district's rules, Code Blue is the less restrictive of two types of alerts issued when there is a potential threat to school security. Under a Code Red alert, students and teachers must remain in their classrooms or in a secured area.

For students, the most frustrating part of the day was being stuck inside.

Akshan Singh, 8, a third-grader at Germantown Elementary, said students were calm throughout the day, but many found the alert frustrating because they couldn't go outside for recess and were allowed to leave the classroom only with special permission.

Some parents, however, found the alert frustrating for other reasons.

Lonnie Williams, 45, an electronic engineer, said he didn't know about the Code Blue until a reporter asked him about it as he waited to pick up his daughter at Seneca Valley High School in Germantown. Williams said he did not receive an e-mail notification on his hand-held computer device, as he would for weather-related changes in the school schedule.

"That's annoying," Williams said. "Since the sniper incident, there's been that edge, wanting to know what's going on when something like this is happening."

But Suzanne Maxey, principal at Seneca Valley, showed The Washington Post a copy of an e-mail she sent at 10:32 a.m. to members of the school's "Eagles Bulletin" e-mail list.

"The overall security of the building has been increased," Maxey wrote, in part. "The students are safe and regular instruction has continued." She said she knew of only one parent who took a child out of school early.

DOJ_NMG_0079454

At Seneca Valley, Code Blue meant no casual bathroom breaks and no lunch trips to McDonald's or Wendy's. The front doors were locked, and teachers and security assistants guarded the other doors between classes. The first-period physical education students were called in from the tennis courts. Many teachers spent their free periods, meant as time to plan their lessons, walking the halls.

"A lot of people were calm," said Ashley Ramos, 14, a ninth-grader. "Some people were like, "Oh my God,' but everything was pretty normal besides being in the classroom with the doors closed."

She said she was never scared. "When they [school officials] said there was security everywhere and not to panic, we felt a lot more safe," she said.

With none of the school's 1,454 students allowed to leave campus for lunch, lines grew in the cafeteria. Many ate lunch in classrooms or the auditorium lobby. School officials unlocked the gym to ease crowds in the cafeteria and let students burn off energy playing basketball.

About 80 seniors carried on with a trip to the Germantown Soccerplex for a college expo.

"Usually we just say, 'Get on the bus,' " Maxey said. "Today, 15 adults were out there to make sure they were okay."

Although officials say they have made strides in making schools safer, they acknowledge -- as in the case of the Montgomery incident -- that it's sometimes difficult to differentiate the real threats from the false ones. But they hope stiffer penalties for such actions will be a deterrent.

Montgomery officials said that despite the vague nature of the threat, they did not want to take any chances. Parents, too, said it is difficult to know how concerned they should be.

Parent Carol Ferrara, 46, said yesterday's Code Blue did not worry her as much as it might have a couple of years ago. Seneca Valley had a bomb hoax last school year, she said, and she hears news reports about threats that turn out to be nothing.

"It's one of those things where you think it's not going to turn into anything, thank God," Ferrara said as she waited in her minivan to pick up her son, a junior at Seneca Valley. "It's so common. But with the school shootings, I sort of hold my breath and wonder when is it going to happen here?"

Staff writers Ernesto LondoÃ±o and Tara Bahrampour contributed to this report.

Fake Threat Puts Schools On Alert (WT)

By Gary Emerling, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 12, 2006

Montgomery County officials yesterday heightened security at 13 schools in Germantown and two in Gaithersburg after a student falsely reported that he had been approached by someone brandishing a weapon.

County police said that the student initially claimed to be waiting for a bus to Kingsview Middle School in Germantown at about 7:30 a.m. when a person with a weapon approached and made a threat about schools.

The student told the bus driver about the incident and the driver radioed school officials, who notified police, Montgomery County police spokeswoman Lucille Baur said.

Miss Baur said that the student later admitted that he made up the story while he was being re-interviewed after classes ended yesterday.

"He recanted the story or the description of the incident," Miss Baur said. "So there was not a man with a weapon who posed a threat to schools and students."

Meanwhile, authorities in Culpeper County, Va., yesterday arrested a 25-year-old man in connection with a bomb threat that closed schools and day-care centers in the county for one day last week.

Mark J. Robinson, 25, of Culpeper, Va., has been charged with four felony counts of making bomb threats, two felony counts of threatening to kill or injure by phone, and one misdemeanor count of using obscene or vulgar language over the telephone.

"It's definitely a relief to know we have someone under arrest and can take a breather for a few moments and get back to it," said Lt. Patrick Coffey, a spokesman for the Culpeper Police Department.

DOJ_NMG_0079455

Police arrested Mr. Robinson after serving two search warrants for an investigation into threats made against the Culpeper Police Department and a Best Western Motel in Culpeper, as well as the schools bomb threat.

Officers searched and seized computer equipment from Mr. Robinson's home and from the apartment of Justin Brown, 19. Police said that Mr. Brown was interviewed about the threats and was not arrested, but that he is still a suspect in the case.

In Montgomery County, Miss Baur said that police do not know why the student fabricated the story and have not determined whether charges will be filed against him.

School officials said that they had not yet determined if the student will be disciplined.

The story prompted police to recommend that 13 schools in Germantown be placed on a Code Blue security alert -- meaning all students and staff at the schools had to be accounted for and entrances to the school were monitored and secured.

School officials also opted to lock the buildings' exterior doors.

Orange cones and marked police cruisers were placed at the schools' entrances, and streets normally crowded around lunchtime near some schools were comparatively quiet.

"We're absolutely relieved that there was no real threat. At the same time, we did maintain a safe environment all day with our students," schools spokesman Brian Edwards said. "Any time there is a question of this nature you have to take it seriously and treat it as real."

Officials temporarily placed two schools in Gaithersburg on Code Blue after city police said they had seen a person in the area matching the description of the person with the weapon.

However, Gaithersburg police spokesman Cpl. Rudy Wagner said that the person was a man suspected of fourth-degree burglary who had escaped from officers but was not the same person wanted for the threat.

County police yesterday also arrested a 15-year-old boy from Olney who phoned in a false bomb threat to Sherwood High School in Sandy Spring.

The school was evacuated and searched, but students returned to classes at about 10 a.m.

•Matthew Cella contributed to this report.

Seven Search Warrants Issued In School Shooting Investigation (AP)

AP, October 12, 2006

LAKEWOOD (AP)— Investigators said Wednesday that seven search warrants have been issued and the gunman's suicide letter sent to the FBI for analysis as they try to determine why Duane Morrison invaded a mountain high school and killed a student two weeks ago.

Authorities also announced the evidence shows that the single bullet that killed Platte Canyon High School student Emily Keyes was fired from Morrison's gun.

Investigators wouldn't discuss the search warrants, which are sealed, or the hundreds of tips they have received, pieces of evidence collected or interviews conducted.

Park County District Attorney Molly Chilson

told reporters during a news conference at the Colorado Bureau of Investigation headquarters that she knows they want answers to why the 53-year-old Morrison entered the school in Bailey, took six girls hostage in a classroom and then shot Keyes and himself when officers entered.

"You want to know what happened in Duane Morrison's life in the months, weeks, days and hours prior to the morning of Wednesday, Sept. 27," Chilson said. "You also want to know detail by detail what happened in the school that day."

Chilson said the investigation by her office and the CBI is trying to answer those questions and releasing any information before the facts are verified would undermine their efforts.

Man Accused Of Call That Closed Schools (WP)

By Michael Alison Chandler, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 12, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0079456

A 25-year-old man was arrested yesterday on suspicion of calling in a vague bomb threat that shut down every school and day-care center in Culpeper County a week ago, and police linked him to previous telephone threats against authorities and a local motel.

Mark J. Robinson of Culpeper was charged with four counts of making bomb threats, two counts of threatening to kill or injure by telephone and one count of using obscene or vulgar language on the phone.

Police searched Robinson's house and a friend's apartment Tuesday night in connection with the Oct. 4 bomb threat and earlier threats against the Culpeper Police Department and a Best Western motel that employed the suspect as a housekeeper, said Lt. Patrick Coffey, the department's lead investigator on the case. Police said they have not established a motive for the threats, which began Sept. 17.

Investigators interviewed the friend, Justin Brown, 19, but did not arrest him, Coffey said.

In searching the Culpeper residences, police did not find any explosive-making materials, but they seized computers and other electronic equipment. Police said computers were used to help disguise the caller's voice and location.

The high-tech strategy made it difficult to identify a suspect, Coffey said. "It wasn't just a phone call with a caller ID," he said. "With this type of technology these days, it makes it more and more difficult to trace these kind of calls."

He said detectives worked round the clock and were aided by the county sheriff's office, state police, the FBI, the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, and the Federal Communications Commission.

"We are extremely relieved," Marla McKenna, spokeswoman for the 7,000-student Culpeper school system, said in response to the arrest.

She said students and teachers have been on edge since the countywide school shutdown last Thursday. Schools have received two additional bomb threats in the past three days.

On Monday, a 14-year-old middle school student phoned in a threat from a bus on her way to school, McKenna said, and yesterday a 15-year-old high school student left a threatening note in a girls' bathroom. The students, both female, were suspended and could be expelled, she said.

"We are taking all these threats really seriously," McKenna said. "We really need to get the messages out that a student might think it's a joke, but the consequences are really serious."

Since school shootings last week in Lancaster County, Pa., and last month in Bailey, Colo., school districts have been on heightened alert.

In Culpeper, about 70 miles southwest of Washington, the past week's events have intensified discussions about school safety. "We are going to continue to evaluate and reevaluate what we need to do to protect our students," McKenna said.

Arrest Made In Culpeper Bomb Threat (CULCIT)

Culpeper Citizen, October 12, 2006

25-year old Mark Robinson was arrested in connection with the bomb threats that closed all area schools on Oct. 5

Culpeper police arrested one man and questioned another in connection with the Oct. 4 bomb threat that closed all schools in Culpeper County.

One man was arrested and another questioned in connection to a telephoned bomb threat that closed all schools in Culpeper County Thursday, Oct. 5, the Culpeper Police Department announced Wednesday.

Mark J. Robinson, 25, of Willis Lane in Culpeper was charged in connection with bomb threats to the school and the Police Department. He is charged with four counts of making bomb threats (class 5 felon), two counts of threatening to kill or injure by phone(class 6 felony), and one count of obscene or vulgar language over the telephone (class 1 misdemeanor). The Culpeper Police Department estimates that Robinson placed about 30 calls to the E-911 center over the last several weeks. Police seized computers and computer equipment during a search of his home.

Justin Brown, 19, of Mountain View Drive in Culpeper, was questioned about threats made to the Police Department and the Best Western Motel in Culpeper, but at this time has not been arrested. Computers and computer equipment were seized during a search of his home.

DOJ_NMG_0079457

Although no other individuals are thought to be involved, the investigation is continuing and additional subpoenas will be served "for telephone records and to obtain electronic tracking information from various communications vendors."

Police received the school bomb threat at 11:31 p.m. Wednesday Oct. 4. Because the threat did not specify a particular school, all schools were closed the following day while six local, state and FBI agencies searched each school.

Former Middletown Twp. Mayor Gets 43 Months For Bribery (NSL)

By John P. Martin, Star-ledger Staff

Newark Star-Ledger (NJ), October 12, 2006

Raymond O'Grady, the former Middletown Township mayor who bragged to undercover FBI agents that he could "smell a cop a mile away" was sentenced yesterday to 43 months in prison for taking bribes.

The punishment, handed down by U.S. District Judge William Martini in Newark, was far less than the term sought by prosecutors but was still longer than nearly any sentence for a New Jersey public official convicted of graft in recent years.

If it bothered O'Grady, 57, he didn't show it. He never testified at his trial in June and declined yesterday to address the judge.

His attorney, Kevin Roe, at one point told Martini that O'Grady was remorseful, but he said after the hearing his client was an innocent man who was entrapped by government agents. Roe said he planned to appeal the verdict and sentence.

A well-known figure in Middletown, O'Grady spent more than a decade on the township committee, including four terms as mayor. The judge said that despite receiving letters of praise from O'Grady's supporters, he felt all he knew about the man was the portrait that emerged during hours of secret FBI surveillance taping.

On those tapes, O'Grady, who was also director of the Monmouth County Central Motor Pool, met with undercover FBI agents who posed as demolition firm employees willing to pay for government contracts.

The same sting, dubbed Operation Bid Rig, has led to nearly 20 arrests and convictions of municipal officials, employees and contractors in and around Monmouth County.

O'Grady boasted to the agents about his ability to be discreet. He said he didn't do "stupid things" like discuss illegal activities on the telephone and warned them about a possible snitch. He also accepted envelopes stuffed with $6,000 cash from them.

During the trial and again yesterday, Roe suggested O'Grady was framed by overeager agents and one of their cooperating witnesses, former county bridges superintendent Anthony Palughi.

The judge, however, said such an argument was an insult to his intelligence. He called the tapes "damning" and the evidence overwhelming.

"Everything in the evidence in this case suggests he was very comfortable in this environment," Martini said.

The prosecutor, Assistant U.S. Attorney James Nobile, had sought a term as high as 78 months, contending O'Grady obstructed the probe by destroying evidence and scheming to kill former Undersheriff Thomas Broderick, who O'Grady believed was cooperating with investigators.

Nobile also said the evidence included conversations in which O'Grady and Palughi discussed taking payoffs from other contractors.

"Mr. O'Grady was not a deer in the headlights," Nobile said, challenging a defense contention. "Mr. O'Grady came to the agents already corrupted."

The judge said he believed the talk of silencing a witness was "puffery" by O'Grady. Broderick was never harmed. But Martini said he was troubled by O'Grady's willingness to take money from strangers and his attorney's suggestion that any harm was minimal because no public contracts were affected.

"The harm goes to the actual confidence people have in their public officials. As people become disillusioned with this type of conduct, they don't participate, they don't vote," the judge said.

Besides fining O'Grady $5,000 and ordering him to perform 200 hours of unpaid community service, Martini banned him from public office or employment for three years after his release from prison.

DOJ_NMG_0079458

"This was an appropriately long prison sentence," U.S. Attorney Christopher Christie said in a statement. "He sold himself and abandoned his obligation to be an honest elected official."

Former Mayor Of A Monmouth County Town Is Sentenced In A Corruption Case (NYT)

By Ronald Smothers

The New York Times, October 12, 2006

NEWARK, Oct. 11 — A former mayor of Middletown, N.J., was sentenced to 43 months in federal prison on Wednesday on bribery and extortion charges arising from a sting operation aimed at what prosecutors said was pervasive corruption in Monmouth County.

The former mayor, Raymond J. O'Grady, 57, is the only one of nearly two dozen public officials and contractors caught up in the F.B.I. sting who has been tried. Most have pleaded guilty to corruption charges.

But a jury took just three hours in June to find him guilty of all five counts of soliciting and accepting $8,000 in bribes from undercover agents posing as contractors seeking government work. At the time, he was on the town council and was in charge of the county's motor pool.

The investigation, called Operation Bid Rig, laid bare what the United States attorney, Christopher J. Christie, said was "a shocking eagerness and ease" by officials "to trade contracts for cash or even to be involved in money laundering."

Prosecutors argued that Mr. O'Grady accepted the bribes with the understanding that he would use his office and influence to steer no-bid contracts to the agents posing as contractors. Mr. O'Grady, a Republican, served four terms as mayor and was on the town council for a decade.

Kevin Roe, Mr. O'Grady's lawyer, said his client continued to maintain his innocence and would appeal both the guilty verdict and the sentence.

Prosecutors said that under federal sentencing guidelines, Mr. O'Grady faced 51 to 78 months in prison. But Judge William J. Martini of Federal District Court said such a sentence would be "disparate" from those handed out to others convicted of similar offenses.

Mr. O'Grady's decision to go to trial, the judge said, brought to light hours of damning audio and video tapes that were played for jurors.

In one conversation, Mr. O'Grady brazenly said he "could smell a cop a mile away" — a remark that led Mr. Christie to suggest that "Mr. O'Grady should have his olfactory senses tested immediately."

At the sentencing on Wednesday, Judge Martini said Mr. O'Grady had "made the decision to go to trial, and when you do that I have the benefit of hearing all of this."

"His statements in this evidence are not consistent with an innocent mind," Judge Martini continued, "and I don't think to this day he has any recognition that he did anything wrong."

Judge Martini's comments recalled his apparent indignation last June when, after the jury verdict came in, he said he was repelled by Mr. O'Grady's cavalier attitude that came through in the recordings. At that time, Judge Martini angrily said that he was considering sending the defendant to jail immediately.

Mr. Roe, the defense lawyer, cautiously made his arguments on Wednesday for a lower sentence for his client. He portrayed Mr. O'Grady as innocently pursuing a legitimate business relationship and maintained that prosecutors had taken the recorded conversations out of context.

"Don't insult my intelligence," Judge Martini fairly thundered from the bench. "I heard that stuff, and those words weren't put into your client's mouth."

After the sentencing, Mr. Roe conceded that he had been uncertain about how his arguments for leniency would be received by the judge in light of his comments in June.

The outcome in court on Wednesday confirmed his concerns, he said, adding that it had "chilled" his defense efforts and deterred him in aggressively making other legal moves on his client's behalf.

But Mr. Christie called the sentence "appropriately long" and said Mr. O'Grady had "sold himself and abandoned his obligation to be an honest elected official in Middletown and government official in Monmouth County."

Menendez Denies Kean's Subpoena Claim (AP)

By Donna De La Cruz

AP, October 12, 2006

TRENTON, N.J. Oct 11, 2006 (AP)— Democratic Sen. Robert Menendez told The Associated Press Wednesday that he has not been subpoenaed in any federal investigation, a claim Republican opponent Tom Kean Jr. continued to maintain.

"There is a subpoena that has his name on it that was issued by an impaneled grand jury and delivered by the FBI," Kean said during an interview with the AP. "That's a fact."

In a separate interview with the AP later Wednesday, Menendez denied Kean's claim. No federal agency has publicly said Menendez has been subpoenaed, and a Menendez campaign spokesman said Kean has no proof to make such a serious accusation.

"There are no such subpoenas to my knowledge whatsoever," Menendez said.

He added that he was not surprised by Kean's continual "one-trick pony act" of portraying the longtime Hudson County politician as corrupt. Menendez has never been charged with any wrongdoing.

The U.S. attorney's office has issued a subpoena seeking records from the North Hudson Community Action Corp. related to a lease agreement it had with Menendez, who rented a house he owned in Union City to the group, and also helped the nonprofit organization obtain federal funds. Menendez has said he obtained verbal clearance from the House Ethics Committee before entering into the lease agreement.

Kean and Menendez discussed their views on the nastiness of the race, the war in Iraq, immigration and other issues in hourlong interviews, but Kean focused mostly on corruption. Menendez has appeared to be the Senate's most vulnerable Democrat in an election season that has seen Republicans on the defensive, but recent polls show him with a slight lead over Kean.

"If we don't know why people are making the decision, whether it be for partisan purposes or personal gain purposes, how do we know the decisions they are talking about are the right decisions for the people of the state of New Jersey?" Kean said.

Menendez said he was tired of being "guilty by geography," referring to Kean's repeated portrayal of Hudson County as rife with political corruption.

Question Of Victim Buttons Comes Before Supreme Court (LAT)

By David G. Savage

The Los Angeles Times, October 12, 2006

WASHINGTON — If the family of a murdered man wears a small, button-sized photo of the victim in the courtroom, does that display violate the defendant's right to a fair trial and require that the conviction be thrown out?

That question came before the Supreme Court for the first time today. And while several justices said they thought trial judges should ban spectators from displaying photos, badges or messages in the courtroom, most of them also said they were reluctant to reverse a murder conviction for that reason alone.

At one level, the case poses a clash between victims' rights and defendants' rights. On another, it tests the power of federal judges to reverse convictions from state courts.

During today's oral argument, Justice David H. Souter questioned whether courtroom spectators could wear badges calling on the jury to "hang" the accused. Others noted that family members sometimes can be heard sobbing in the courtroom and those expressions of emotion have not been seen as depriving the defendant of a fair trial.

The case heard by the court today began 12 years ago.

Mathew Musladin was convicted of shooting and killing the fiancé of his estranged wife in the driveway of her San Jose home in May 1994. The victim, Tom Studer, ran toward Musladin after the woman shouted for help.

At his trial, Musladin claimed he acted in self-defense. The jury disagreed and a judge sentenced him to 32 years in prison.

Studer's parents and his brother Jim attended the trial and they sat in the spectators section wearing lapel buttons that contained a photo of Tom in his Navy uniform.

DOJ_NMG_0079460

Last year, the U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals overturned Musladin's conviction in a 2-1 decision. Judge Stephen Reinhardt, speaking for the appeals court, said the photos, because they "conveyed the message" that Musladin was guilty, deprived him of "the right to a fair trial by an impartial jury free from outside influences."

A California state lawyer urged the high court to overturn that ruling. "The three simple buttons bearing only a photo did not convey any message of blame [or] guilt, anything other than grief of this family," said Gregory A. Ott, a deputy attorney general from San Francisco.

He ran into sharp questioning from Souter and Justice Stephen G. Breyer.

It is "quite a bad idea to have buttons being worn in a courtroom, which is not a place for demonstrations," Breyer said.

"What if three buttons had said 'Hang Musladin'?" asked Souter. "Wouldn't that call for overturning the conviction?"

Maybe so, Ott replied, because that would send an explicit message to the jury. By contrast, he said, the small, button-sized photo of Tom Studer did not convey a specific message. The judge who presided over the trial said he saw "no possible prejudice" to the defendant.

A lawyer representing Musladin said the justices should prohibit the display of photos by spectators because it created an "an impermissible risk" of influencing the jury. "I think you had to do away with this kind of courtroom behavior. It is simply not acceptable," said David W. Fermino, a lawyer from San Francisco.

He ran into sharp questions from Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justice Antonin Scalia.

"A typical jury will understand that the victim is going to have a family and they're going to be sorry he's dead and they might be there at the trial," Roberts said. "The buttons don't seem to add much to what the jury will derive from seeing the family seated behind the prosecution bench."

Even Breyer questioned whether the buttons in this case rose to a constitutional violation. "Why isn't this a normal sign of grief?" he asked.

By the end of the hour, most of the justices sounded as though they were inclined to reverse the 9th Circuit's decision. A ruling in the case, Carey vs. Musladin, is expected in several months.

Court Weighs Effect Of Victim's Image On Trial (USAT)

By Joan Biskupic

USA Today, October 12, 2006

WASHINGTON — Supreme Court justices appeared divided Wednesday over whether a convicted murderer's right to a fair trial was violated when spectators court wore buttons showing a picture of the victim.

“I think they're probably a problem,” Justice Stephen Breyer said of such buttons, suggesting at one point that judges should simply say, “No buttons (in court). No banners. No petitions. No posters.” Justice David Souter also raised concerns that such buttons could improperly prejudiced jurors.

However, Chief Justice John Roberts suggested that buttons — such as those worn by the victim's relatives in the California case that was before the justices — could be no more influential than relatives who sit in a prominent place behind prosecutors.

Justice Antonin Scalia, also seeming unconcerned, likened such buttons to “tank shirts,” “beanie hats” and other items that could break a court's decorum but not necessarily sway a jury.

This is the first time the justices have taken up the question of whether such buttons could unfairly influence a jury, but the issue often arises in trial courts. Judges have taken varying approaches in dealing with displays that could send messages to jurors. In the mid-1990s, U.S. District Court Judge Richard Matsch, hearing the cases of Oklahoma City bombing defendants Timothy McVeigh and Terry Nichols, banned buttons and other items with symbols of the bombing.

The case before the justices dates to 1994, when Matthew Musladin fatally shot Tom Studer, the fiancé of Musladin's estranged wife. Musladin said he shot Studer in self-defense. Relatives of Studer showed up at Musladin's trial wearing buttons depicting Studer's face. The judge said he did not think that would prejudice jurors, noting they had “been instructed not to let passion or prejudice influence their verdict.” The jury found Musladin guilty; he was sentenced to 32 years to life in prison.

A California appeals court backed that verdict, but the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 9th Circuit reversed it. It said the message conveyed by the buttons was “that Studer was the innocent party and that the defendant was necessarily guilty.”

DOJ_NMG_0079461

Much of the justices' hour-long session Wednesday concerned whether buttons should be allowed in court, but there is a legal threshold that could prevent the justices from deciding the case on the merits of that question.

California officials say the 9th Circuit should have rejected Musladin's claim because lower court rulings in his case did not conflict with "clearly established federal law."

Deputy California Attorney General Gregory Ott told the justices that the 9th Circuit violated federal rules for prisoner appeals by not deferring to a state appeals court ruling.

David Fermino, Musladin's attorney, said past cases require that judges not allow behavior that is a risk to a fair trial. He said the buttons worn by Studer's relatives went beyond a normal showing of grief.

Buttons' Influence On Jury At Issue For Justices (WP)

By Charles Lane

The Washington Post, October 12, 2006

Tom Studer's family made a silent but powerful statement 11 years ago at the trial of the man accused of murdering him. They appeared in a California courtroom wearing lapel buttons emblazoned with photographs of him, wearing his Navy uniform and smiling.

Though the defense objected, the judge allowed the buttons. Matthew Musladin was convicted and sentenced to at least 32 years in prison; he says the buttons may have swayed the jury's emotions, depriving him of his constitutional right to a fair trial.

Last year, the San Francisco-based U.S. Court of Appeals for the 9th Circuit agreed with Musladin and overturned his conviction. Prosecutors appealed to the Supreme Court. Yesterday, the justices heard oral arguments in a case about legal due process and the proper relationship between state and federal courts.

Gregory A. Ott, representing the state of California, told the court that, even if the buttons may have influenced the jury, the state court's ruling was entitled to be upheld by the federal courts.

A 1996 federal law says that federal judges should defer to state courts' interpretations of the federal Constitution in criminal cases unless they clash with "clearly established" Supreme Court precedent. But the Supreme Court has never ruled before on buttons worn by courtroom spectators, so there was no such precedent, Ott said.

"It was certainly reasonable for the state court here to conclude that three simple buttons bearing only a photo did not convey any message of blame, guilt, anything other than the grief of this family," he said.

Justice David H. Souter seemed to disagree, citing a 1986 ruling written by Justice Thurgood Marshall that suggested that courtroom practices "inherently prejudicial" to the defendant would violate the Constitution.

"What if the button had said . . . 'Hang Musladin'?" Souter asked Ott. "Is there any question in your mind that allowing the family members to display this message to a jury throughout the trial . . . is raising a risk, an unacceptable risk, that the jury will consider improper influences in reaching its verdict?"

It may, Ott conceded, "but it might still be reasonable for a state court to conclude otherwise."

Several members of the court also seemed troubled by the potential harm that such displays could cause in court. But, given the lack of a clearly applicable Supreme Court precedent, few seemed to think that Musladin's conviction should have been overturned.

David W. Fermino, Musladin's attorney, argued that the 9th Circuit ruling fit a framework outlined by the Marshall opinion and others, including a 1976 case in which the court said the government may not ordinarily require a defendant to appear in prison garb during trial.

"This wearing of the button in a sense branded the defendant in the eyes of the jurors," Fermino said.

But Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg noted that the cases Fermino cited involved government rules, rather than the conduct of private citizen spectators. Fermino's argument, she observed, "certainly goes beyond where our precedent left off."

Justice Antonin Scalia said that "there is a First Amendment problem when you're dealing with people other than the prosecution."

The case is Carey v. Musladin , No. 05-785. A decision is expected by July.

Justices Ponder Relationship Of Federal And State Courts (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, October 12, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 11 — Whether a murder defendant's right to a fair trial was violated when the judge permitted the victim's relatives to sit behind the prosecutor, wearing buttons with the victim's picture on them, was a question in a case argued before the Supreme Court on Wednesday. But it is not the question the justices will answer.

Rather, the case turns on whether the federal appeals court in San Francisco had the authority to order a new trial for the defendant, who was convicted after the state court trial judge refused to tell the family of the victim, Tom Studer, to remove the buttons.

The case is therefore a potentially important test of the relationship between the federal and state courts, as redefined by a 10-year-old federal law that greatly restricted the federal courts' ability to set aside state convictions through writs of habeas corpus. The real question is how one of the most important limitations in that law actually works.

In the 1996 law, the Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act, Congress specified that federal judges could grant habeas corpus petitions only if the state court decision was "contrary to, or involved an unreasonable application of, clearly established federal law, as determined by the Supreme Court of the United States."

That limitation seems straightforward enough, but as the argument on Wednesday made clear, it is more complicated than it looks.

The Supreme Court has had various things to say over the years about the unduly prejudicial impact of such practices as placing a defendant in shackles or in prison garb in the presence of the jury. But it has never said a word about a murder victim's relatives wearing buttons.

So, did the federal appeals court in this case, the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit, have the authority to extrapolate from the old Supreme Court precedents to the new situation? Did it have the authority to apply one of its own cases, a 1990 ruling that overturned a rape conviction because female spectators at the trial had worn buttons declaring "Women Against Rape"?

Gregory A. Ott, a California deputy attorney general, argued that the 1996 law required answering "no" to both those questions. Mr. Ott told the justices that the California Supreme Court's decision upholding Mathew Musladin's murder conviction neither violated "clearly established" law, of which there was none, nor amounted to an "unreasonable application" of the law that did exist.

There seemed relatively little doubt that most of the justices were inclined to agree. So they spent most of the argument trying to tease out the potential implications of a ruling that overturned the Ninth Circuit's decision in his case, Carey v. Musladin. No. 05-785.

Suppose, Justice Anthony M. Kennedy asked Mr. Ott, that there was no Supreme Court ruling on a particular issue, but that the courts of five federal appellate circuits had looked at the issue and had all reached the same conclusion. "And they all say, 'We think the general rule of the Supreme Court is as follows,' " Justice Kennedy said, asking: "Isn't that entitled to some weight? You're not supposed to cite that when you go to the Sixth Circuit court or you go to the state court?"

Such a decision, even if widely shared among the appeals courts, could not be considered "clearly established" law, Mr. Ott replied. "To redefine or shape this court's holdings beyond the face of those holdings, our position is that cannot be done with state or circuit law," he said.

He added that such lower-court extrapolations might be considered "reasonable applications" of Supreme Court law under some circumstances, and those could be of some relevance in a habeas corpus case.

Justice David H. Souter asked Mr. Ott to imagine that rather than a picture of the man Mr. Musladin was charged with killing, the buttons had carried the words "Hang Musladin." Was there "not sufficiently clear law from this court to find that practice unconstitutional?" the justice asked.

There was no "clearly established" law governing that situation, Mr. Ott replied. But he said it would be "unreasonable" for a judge to permit such a display, and that it "would require habeas relief."

How was that really different, Justice Souter wanted to know. "The prosecutor is going to get up and urge the jury to convict him," he said. "What is wrong with it on a button? What risk does the button raise that the prosecutor's argument does not?"

DOJ_NMG_0079463

"It is an outside influence, Your Honor," Mr. Ott replied.

Mr. Musladin's lawyer, David W. Fermino, received a similar line of questioning when he argued that the buttons created an "unacceptable risk that impermissible factors have caused a jury's verdict to be based not solely on evidence introduced at trial." There was a "clearly established rule," Mr. Fermino said, that equated such courtroom behavior with "inherent prejudice."

Suppose "the trial is being held and the families appear and they're all in black because they're still in mourning," Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. asked Mr. Fermino. "Does that violate this clearly established rule?"

It would, Mr. Fermino replied. He said the Ninth Circuit was properly concerned with "the risk, not the reality."

That was an answer unlikely to persuade many justices. So Justice Souter, who emerged during the argument as the justice most sympathetic to the defendant, tried a rescue. Dressing in black might be normal behavior for people in mourning, he said, but the wearing of buttons is "something that is abnormal and something that is intended to presumably get the jury's attention."

"I don't know why otherwise they would be doing it," Justice Souter added.

In a second argument on Wednesday, the justices considered the constitutionality of California's criminal sentencing system in light of the Supreme Court's recent rulings on the respective roles of the judge and jury in making determinations that are central in calculating a sentence.

Last year, in United States v. Booker, the court found the federal sentencing guidelines unconstitutional because the system permitted judges rather than juries to make the relevant factual findings. As part of the same ruling, the court then saved the guidelines by making them advisory rather than mandatory.

The California system also places judges in a central role. But there was considerable confusion during the argument in Cunningham v. California, No. 05-6551, about exactly what the judges' role is. The case is being watched closely for hints about the court's next move on federal sentencing.

Plea Deal Ends Federal Trial For Hells Angels Accused In Deadly Brawl At Vegas Casino (AP)

By Ken Ritter, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 12, 2006

LAS VEGAS (AP) The federal racketeering trial of 11 Hells Angels motorcycle club members came to a sudden end Wednesday after six defendants accepted plea deals to reduce charges stemming from a deadly casino brawl.

The men also entered plea agreements in a parallel state criminal case, sparing them the possibility of life in prison if they had been convicted. Under the deals with federal and state prosecutors, they likely will face no more than 2{ years in prison.

All federal charges were to be dropped against the remaining five federal defendants. The judge said he also would dismiss the federal cases against the 31 other Hells Angles members charged in the brawl.

The collapse of the federal case came after two weeks of trial during which defense lawyers accused government agents and prosecutors of flagrant misconduct and withholding crucial evidence.

U.S. Attorney Daniel Bogden said he agreed to the plea deals because it involved ``the six most active and culpable participants" in the fighting.

The Hells Angels members brawled with rival Mongols biker gang members at a 2002 motorcycle rally in Laughlin, a Colorado River resort town some 100 miles south of Las Vegas.

Two Hells Angels and one Mongols member died and at least a dozen people were injured. Videotape images showed the rival motorcycle gang members battling with guns, knives, wrenches and chairs on the casino floor at Harrah's Laughlin hotel-casino.

Calvin Schaefer, Raymond Foakes, Rodney Cox and James Hannigan pleaded guilty to federal charges of committing a violent crime, battery, in aid of racketeering. Maurice ``Pete" Eunice and Dale Leedom pleaded no contest, conceding the government could prove they committed a violent felony.

Troy Regas, 43, a Hells Angels member whose brother, Sohn Regas, will go free, called it ``better for six to do a small amount of time than for one guy possibly to face a life sentence."

DOJ_NMG_0079464

Defense lawyers noted the settlement of the federal and state cases would clear the Hells Angels of federal claims that it constitutes a criminal enterprise like the Mafia.

``There is no implication whatsoever from this plea that the Hells Angels is a criminal enterprise," said Schaefer's lawyer, David Chesnoff.

No Mongols members were charged in the federal case, though six face state charges.

Republicans Call For Inquiry In Documents Case (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, October 12, 2006

Ten House Republicans called for a Congressional investigation into the improper handling of classified documents by President Bill Clinton's national security adviser, Samuel R. Berger. Mr. Berger admitted last year that he deliberately took classified documents out of the National Archives in 2003 and destroyed some of them. After his guilty plea, he was fined $50,000. The Republican lawmakers asked the House Government Reform Committee to determine whether any documents were missing from Clinton administration terrorism records, to review security measures for classified documents and to seek testimony from Mr. Berger. The group is led by Representatives Duncan Hunter, chairman of the Armed Services Committee, and F. James Sensenbrenner Jr., head of the Judiciary Committee.

Lawmakers Seek Probe Of Berger's Theft (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, October 12, 2006

Several top House Republicans yesterday asked for an investigation and committee hearings to determine which documents were "destroyed, removed or are missing" as a result of former National Security Adviser Samuel R. Berger's admitted theft of papers from the National Archives.

In a letter to the House Government Reform Committee, the lawmakers asked Chairman Thomas M. Davis III, Virginia Republican, to investigate whether there was criminal misconduct in the removal of the classified documents by the Clinton administration official.

"Because Mr. Berger was designated by President Clinton as the representative of the Clinton administration to the national 9/11 commission investigation into the terrorist attacks, it is vitally important for our congressional investigative committee to determine what records were destroyed, removed or are missing," the letter said.

Dave Marin, a spokesman for Mr. Davis, said yesterday that the chairman has requested a copy of the inspector general's report at the National Archives on the Berger matter. He said Mr. Davis plans to review the report before deciding whether to investigate.

Mr. Berger was fined $50,000 by a federal judge in September 2005 for illegally taking classified documents out of the National Archives by stuffing them in his pants. He told the court that he let "considerations of personal convenience override clear rules of handling classified material" and described the removal of the documents as a lapse of judgment as he was preparing to testify before the September 11 commission, which was investigating intelligence and security failures.

But the government said Mr. Berger "knowingly removed classified documents from the National Archives and Records Administration" and stored them at various locations, including his Washington office.

The document theft raised questions about whether Mr. Berger was attempting to cover up the Clinton administration's anti-terrorism policies and actions. The records he took were related to internal assessments of Mr. Clinton's handling of a terrorist threat in December 1999 to bomb airports in the United States.

Mr. Berger pleaded guilty to a misdemeanor charge of unauthorized removal and retention of classified material, including documents outlining the government's knowledge of terror threats in the United States during the 2000 New Year's celebration.

In his televised testimony to the September 11 commission, Mr. Berger said the Clinton administration's "sustained attention" to terrorist threats and "rigorous actions" foiled the New Year's plot.

Attorney General John Ashcroft, however, told the commission in 2004 that he saw some of the documents that had turned up missing from the Archives and that the plot was stopped with "luck playing a major role."

DOJ_NMG_0079465

Members of Congress requesting the investigation and hearings were Republican Reps. Duncan Hunter and Dan Lungren of California, John L. Mica of Florida, Lynn Westmoreland of Georgia, Mark Souder and Dan Burton of Indiana, Patrick T. McHenry of North Carolina, Curt Weldon of Pennsylvania, John J. "Jimmy" Duncan Jr. of Tennessee and F. James Sensenbrenner Jr. of Wisconsin.

Prosecutor: Rove Didn't Sway Spam Probe (AP-Y)

By Larry Neumeister

AP-Yahoo, October 12, 2006

Presidential adviser Karl Rove had nothing to do with the prosecution of a man accused of manipulating stock prices, a prosecutor says, disputing the man's claims that Rove set off probes to retaliate for a flood of spam e-mails to President Bush.

In papers submitted to a judge Friday, Assistant U.S. Attorney David M. Siegal said the criminal case against Robert McAllister was started three days before the e-mails were sent in January 2005.

The investigation began when a staff accountant at the Securities and Exchange Commission was told McAllister had made telephone threats against a stock promoter related to McAllister's events promotion company, Millennium National Events Inc., Siegal said.

McAllister's lawyer, Gerald L. Shargel, said last month he hoped to call Rove as a witness to support a claim that Rove "used his power and influence at the White House to seek quick punishment of Millennium, and therefore also Robert McAllister, for daring to spam the president's personal Web site."

Shargel said McAllister's efforts to grow his company were "thwarted by the wrongful conduct of stock promoters," one of whom sent spam e-mails to the Bush Web site, http://georgewbush.com/, which automatically reconnects to the Republican National Committee, http://www.gop.com/.

The Daily News reported last month that e-mails, phone records and transcripts of phone conversations show Rove contacted McAllister and at least three stock promoters.

Siegal told the judge that Rove did not wield the prosecutor's office "as his personal sword." He cited the careful manner in which the case progressed and written declarations by three government investigators saying Rover never communicated with them.

"This is nonsense, and the myriad claims the defendant makes are all either false, irrelevant or both," he said.

The government says McAllister, of Jupiter, Fla., was already on their radar screen because the FBI in early 2002 investigated his involvement in a scheme to fraudulently manipulate trading in another company.

McAllister was not arrested then, but the FBI recorded him talking to a cooperating government witness about allegedly bribing stock brokers in the plot to manipulate the company's stock, the government said in court papers.

The 2002 recordings are among evidence described in a July indictment charging McAllister with conspiracy to commit securities fraud, wire fraud and mail fraud. There was no indication when the case would go to trial.

If convicted, McAllister could face up to 65 years in prison. Three others in the case have pleaded guilty in the last two weeks and are awaiting sentencing. McAllister is free on $500,000 bail.

Ex-fugitives Plead Guilty In $31 Million Investor Scam (VAPILOT)

By Tim Mcglone, The Virginian-pilot

Hampton Roads Virginian-Pilot, October 12, 2006

NORFOLK - Former crime victim advocate Lee Hope Thrasher and her British boyfriend, Howard Welsh, pleaded guilty Wednesday to defrauding investors in a $31 million scheme.

Despite years professing their innocence while on the run from the FBI, the couple stood before a U.S. District Court judge and admitted that the investment plan was a fraud.

Welsh, 62, a British citizen, pleaded guilty to four felonies including conspiracy to commit mail and wire fraud. He faces up to 20 years in prison.

Thrasher, 52, pleaded guilty to three similar felonies and faces up to 15 years in prison. She had been employed in the 1990s as the victim-witness coordinator in the Virginia Beach Commonwealth's Attorney's office.

DOJ_NMG_0079466

They have agreed to assist the government in recovering $28.5 million that was wired to banks in 13 countries. Federal agents seized $2.5 million during the investigation.

From 1999 to 2004, Welsh and Thrasher offered "corporation sole" investments, typically reserved for churches. They sold the plan, for a fee, at seminars around the country, promising compounded, tax-free profits.

Some 900 investors handed over thousands of dollars and in one case, an elderly woman from Illinois invested $8 million that Welsh had told her was to be used to start a bank.

That bank, according to court records, was nothing more than a post office box in England.

The couple fled the area in 2002 and later left the country.

Federal charges were lodged against them in 2003, followed by a 63-count indictment filed the next year.

The couple was discovered hiding out in the hometown of Welsh's mother, under assumed names, in November 2004. The couple spent 20 months fighting extradition.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Robert J. Seidel Jr., the lead prosecutor, said authorities were seeking the missing money.

"The investigation is continuing to identify the location of these funds and whether any other individuals might have been in control of the money," he said.

One other person has been convicted in the case.

Roy F. Overton Jr., a retired banker from the Peninsula, was sentenced last year to

3 1/2 years in prison after pleading guilty to stealing $2.5 million from Welsh and Thrasher.

Why Farm Belt Sees Rising Crime Wave (CSM)

By Patrik Jonsson

The Christian Science Monitor, October 12, 2006

ATLANTA

At the end of a dirt road in rural South Carolina, a lonely truck careered up through the red-clay ruts and into the woods.

The man, wearing chaps and wielding a chain saw, who emerged from the cab worked for himself, state foresters say. But the trees weren't his. Nor were the small profits he made selling the hauled timber to sawyers in the valley. Despite the whine of his saw, for years no one heard these trees fall.

The man, arrested earlier this year, was ax-cut-deep in a growing problem for America's farm belt: rural commodity theft, or "plaid-collar crime." From lush Hawaii to the Carolina plains, artichoke absconders, nut nappers, tree thieves, and even cattle rustlers are plucking, picking, hauling, and siphoning commodities from diesel to mangosteens at impressive rates. Loss is a familiar concept to a farmer. But such audacious heists have prompted many to go on the offensive to police America's wide-open spaces.

"The vulnerability of farms is legendary," says Bill Yoshimoto, the supervising attorney for a rural crimes task force in Tulare County, Calif. "They're just wide- open places for crooks to come. And crooks are going to go where the pickings are easy and where the prices are favorable."

Several commodities are particularly in demand because their prices are increasing. Almond prices jumped 70 cents a pound this summer, and beef prices remain high. Prices for high-grade lumber continue to climb. And rural backwoods areas have been hit by the copper theft epidemic across the country after prices peaked at $2.80 a pound this summer.

"If somebody can get [a commodity] for nothing, then it's a real good deal," says Ken Cabe, a senior forester with the South Carolina Forestry Commission in Columbia.

The losses from farm thefts in California, Mississippi, and South Carolina run into the hundreds of millions of dollars, according to estimates from law enforcement officers. But since only one of 10 farm crimes is reported, some say total annual losses are about $1 billion nationwide.

These days it's relatively easy to steal commodities without getting caught, Mr. Yoshimoto says. For one, farms are bumping up against suburbs, shortening the time it takes potential crooks to get their hands on freestanding tanks of diesel, barrels of expensive fungicides, and rolls of copper wire. Oftentimes, thieves can operate in plain view since the heavy equipment and tractor-trailers they use to carry out their crimes are common in these parts. Internet trading has also cut down on paperwork, making scofflaws tougher to track down.

DOJ_NMG_0079467

Farm-thief profiles run the gamut from a 24-year-old mother of two arrested last month for timber theft in Mt. Croghan, S.C., to the most common farm thief: a 40-year-old white male, investigators say. The motives are as varied as the crimes.

"Somebody who is stealing copper wire to make a quick buck for a quick fix is very different from somebody who is masterminding a plot to steal hundreds of thousands of pounds of nuts across county lines," says Danielle Rau, a rural-crime prevention specialist at the California Farm Bureau in Sacramento.

In Alabama, where pine forests cover an area nearly equivalent to all of New England timber losses can be staggering, Mr. Yoshimoto says. Last year, Texas investigators recovered more than 5,000 stolen cattle worth more than $3.5 million. Twelve tractor-trailers carrying almonds have been stolen in California this year, the latest heist taking place in San Joaquin County Monday.

"You've got crews coming in and knocking down 10 acres of timber or 40 acres of prime plums, and then you have some on the other end receiving this timber and fruit and injecting it into the commercial stream somewhere," says Yoshimoto. "This level of sophistication has only become prominent in the last 10 years, and we've noticed it tremendously in the last five years."

Historically, farmers and growers have shoved their hands in their pockets and privately fumed. "We don't feel like we have a lot of protection in the first place," says Scott Phippens, a San Joaquin Valley almond grower who had 88,000 pounds of almonds stolen from him this summer. "We're defeated the minute theft happens. The problem is society; there's just far more hideous crimes being committed, and so this is nothing."

That's changing, with influential politicians such as Jeff Denham, a Republican state senator from the Central Valley. He wrote "our food supply is under attack in a recent op-ed article in Ag Alert, a newsletter published by the California Farm Bureau.

The 14-county Agricultural Crime Technology Information and Operations Network (ACTION) in Visalia, Calif., has a collection of motion detectors and low-light cameras that farmers can borrow at no expense to try to catch thieves.

Some farmers are working on ways to brand individual vegetables such as artichokes to thwart theft.

Others are finding that the ticket to stopping theft is through having a paper trail. In Hawaii, a law enacted this year requires that receipts be issued for all commodities that are purchased. And coffee buyers must pay by check instead of cash.

Thefts have quickly gone down as a result. "We took a proactive approach and so far it's worked," says Mitch Roth, a Hawaii County prosecutor.

DOJ Eyes Donor Reimbursement (RC)

By Matthew Murray

Roll Call, October 12, 2006

When Charles La Bella began heading the Department of Justice's campaign finance task force in 1997, federal prosecutors, in his view, were battling a forest fire with a garden hose.

As allegations mounted that illegal campaign contributions had tainted the 1996 presidential election, government lawyers were becoming more and more certain something was amiss. But with the statute of limitations nearing expiration, and with penalties for running afoul of campaign finance laws rivaling those for moving violations, the bad guys mostly got away.

La Bella was furious.

"I made it known why I thought ... changes needed to be made, if they wanted to take campaign finance crimes seriously," La Bella, now in private practice in California, said recently.

Although his criticisms made him "radioactive" at the Justice Department, lawmakers took notice, incorporating some of his recommendations in the Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act of 2002.

Now, nearly a decade after La Bella first called for overhauls, federal lawyers may be tugging on the line of their first big fish, PBS&J, a giant construction and engineering government contractor.

In September, William Scott Deloach, PBS&J's former chief financial officer, and two co-workers pleaded guilty in a Miami court to conspiracy charges in connection with a decade-long embezzlement scheme that netted the trio millions of dollars.

DOJ_NMG_0079468

The three admitted in court papers to bilking the company out of millions, which paid for commercial and residential property, lavish lifestyles and international gambling sprees.

Along with the conspiracy charge, Deloach alone pleaded guilty to reimbursing $11,000 worth of campaign contributions in October 2004 through "straw men," conduit gifts in the names of others, to then-open-seat challenger Mel Martinez (R-Fla.).

The Justice Department and the Federal Election Commission declined to discuss potential or ongoing law enforcement cases, including the one against PBS&J.

However, enhancements inserted into BCRA and teamwork between the DOJ and the FEC have helped boost the priority of these types of cases.

Officials with both agencies confirmed that cooperation has increased in recent years, a kinship that perhaps could result in a jump of combined civil and criminal penalties for two agencies long seen as at-odds.

An FEC official also said public corruption cases, including illegal contribution conduit schemes, have become a "top 10" priority for the DOJ, reflecting the desire of lawmakers.

"When Congress enhances the penalties," the FEC official said, "the message is that [prosecutors should] take those violations seriously and ... enforce them aggressively."

According to court papers detailing Deloach's plea deal, in or around 2004 an unnamed company executive contacted Deloach and "advise[d] him that PBS&J supported the United States Senate campaign of Mel Martinez."

"Deloach then wrote his own personal check, which he contributed to the Martinez campaign," the plea deal reads.

Deloach asked other company employees to give to Martinez's campaign, with contributions made in October 2004 totaling $11,000.

Out of an illegal bank account bloated with embezzled company money, Deloach then reimbursed the four PBS&J employees and two spouses, according to the plea deal. Such a reimbursement is punishable by up to two years in jail and thousands of dollars in fines.

Despite the breadth of the crimes, however, some familiar with the case are suggesting that the three could receive reduced sentences for turning on the company and detailing the workings of an even bigger reimbursement case, which allegedly funneled vast sums of illegal corporate money to politicians nationwide.

Documents obtained by Roll Call, first reported by the Miami Herald, suggest that Deloach was not alone in reimbursing PBS&J employees from company coffers, though he seems to be the only one who used embezzled money.

In a fax dated March 2002, Jim Breland appears to urge Skip Homan, a fellow PBS&J executive, to make a donation to the re-election campaign of then-Sen. Max Cleland (D-Ga.).

"Bob Matthews called with this request ... a 'personal favor'," the fax cover sheet reads, "Bob also said the contribution would not go unnoticed by [Georgia] Gov. [Roy] Barnes. He is strongly backing Sen. Cleland."

The second page of Breland's fax, also dated March 15, 2002, appears to be on company letterhead, titled "Contribution Request Form":

"PBSJ Employee Requesting Contribution: Jim Breland

"Name of Payee on Check: Friends of Max Cleland

"Amount of Contribution Requested: $2,000."

An attached Post-It reads: "To be reimbursed."

Benson Weintraub, an attorney for Maria Garcia, one of the three former PBS&J employees, suggested that the 2002 corporate reimbursement for the Georgia Senate race is just the tip of the iceberg.

"It's our impression that there has been a wide proliferation of political corruption by PBS&J," Weintraub said. "We believe that the illegal campaign contributions were widespread on a national basis.

"The more information [that is] uncovered will indicate the scale and scope of a pattern of illegal campaign contributions," he said.

Garcia's attorney also said a member of PBS&J's board recently told him the reimbursement of illegal campaign contributions "unfortunately still continues today."

DOJ_NMG_0079469

Mark Schnapp, an attorney for PBS&J, acknowledged that the reimbursement Deloach admitted to was not an isolated incident. But he denied that the company is the subject of a DOJ investigation and that the company systematically abused campaign finance laws.

"In the 1990s, there was some reimbursement of political contributions," he said. But those gifts, he claimed, were more a case of a few bad apples, not a rotten corporate culture.

"Before the embezzlement was even discovered, the company had instituted significant changes in the oversight of its PAC and campaign contributions," Schnapp added. "The company recently has instituted additional controls and training about campaign contributions and its political action committee."

The initial push in the United States to regulate campaign contributions began just after the Civil War, according to information available on the FEC's Web site.

Beginning in 1867, federal officers no longer were allowed to seek donations from Naval yard workers. With the signing of the Tillman Act 40 years later, corporations and banks were barred from contributing to federal campaigns.

The law again was expanded in 1947 to bar "labor unions and corporations from making expenditures and contributions in federal elections," according to the FEC.

The Federal Election Campaign Act, enacted in 1972, "provided the basic legislative framework" for political action committees, which could use corporate and union money to establish bank accounts from which "voluntary donations could then be used to contribute to federal races."

But nearly three decades after FECA was enacted, the lack of enforcement of campaign finance laws had come to viewed as a "bad joke," according to La Bella's words in a leaked 1998 Justice Department report.

In addition to reining in soft-money contributions, BCRA sought to boost prosecutorial powers for enforcing campaign finance crimes — an original recommendation of La Bella's that gave him something approaching cult-hero status with reform-minded lawmakers:

"When I first looked into it a couple of years ago, I was frankly surprised by what I learned — and that is that prosecutors just don't have the tools they need to effectively investigate, prosecute and punish people who egregiously violate our campaign finance laws" said Sen. Joe Lieberman (D-Conn.) in a March 2001 floor speech.

A Justice Department official said a delaying of the statute of limitations — ameliorating one of La Bella's original complaints — has helped in the prosecution of campaign finance crimes.

"Until late 2002, FECA crimes were subject to an unusually short, three-year statute of limitation, which complicated the task," the official said. "The statute of limitations for FECA crimes was raised to the usual five years effective Nov. 6, 2002, which has been a helpful tool."

Mosque Suit Says Manager Embezzled $300,000 (WP)

By Jerry Markon And Michelle Boorstein

The Washington Post, October 12, 2006

A prominent Washington mosque has sued its longtime business manager, accusing him of embezzling more than $300,000 and diverting the money to companies he owned or controlled.

The Islamic Center of Washington, D.C., says in the lawsuit that Farzad Darui altered the names of payees on checks intended for legitimate vendors, primarily insurance companies, and substituted his own companies. It says the scheme began around 2000 and continued it until he was suspended last month.

"The actions taken by Mr. Darui constitute fraud . . . unjust enrichment and breach of fiduciary duties," says the lawsuit, filed Sept. 15 in U.S. District Court in Alexandria.

Reached yesterday at Zaal Inc., a Falls Church real estate management company of which he is president, Darui declined to comment on the suit. His attorney, Victoria Toensing, said only that the allegations "are false and we will defend them vigorously."

DOJ_NMG_0079470

Darui has not yet responded in court. He framed the issue as a management dispute in yesterday's Washington Times, which first reported the lawsuit. "This, from my point of view, is about me opposing a Saudi takeover of the center," he told the Times. "They've been trying to unilaterally appoint a new Saudi director without going through the board."

The Islamic Center, on Massachusetts Avenue NW, is Washington's first mosque, opening in 1957, according to court documents and its Web site. It's a regular place of worship for thousands of Muslims, according to court documents.

The center is supported financially by the Saudi government, and the Web site lists the current chairman of its board of governors as Saudi Prince Bandar bin Sultan, who recently stepped down as ambassador to the United States. The center's governing board is largely made up of ambassadors from various Islamic nations to the United States. Calls to the center and to Saudi Embassy were not returned yesterday.

It was unclear yesterday why the allegations were contained in a civil suit and whether a criminal investigation is underway. An attorney for the center, from the D.C. firm of Williams & Connolly LLC, declined to comment.

Darui, of Falls Church, has worked at the center since at least 1984, when he was head of security, according to the lawsuit. He became responsible for the center's bookkeeping after accusing the existing bookkeeper of being involved in a scheme to defraud the organization, the suit says.

As bookkeeper, Darui routinely presented checks to be signed by the center's director, Abdullah M. Khouj. After Khouj signed the checks, Darui was responsible for mailing them to vendors, the lawsuit says.

Khouj began unraveling the scheme when he repeatedly asked Darui to commission an independent audit of the center's finances, but Darui kept putting him off, the lawsuit says. According to the suit, Khouj then discovered that Darui had been changing the names of payees to BLT Services Corp. According to the lawsuit, that is really Blue Line Travel Inc., "a company owned and/or controlled by Mr. Darui."

"Mr. Darui breached his fiduciary duties intentionally, willfully, with malice, and with ill will toward the Islamic Center," says the lawsuit, which is seeking a jury trial but does not specify damages sought.

Florida Judge Wants To See 'Bully' In Court (WP)

By Mike Musgrove

The Washington Post, October 12, 2006

The Bully is taking a beat-down. Game publisher Take-Two Interactive Software Inc. was ordered to demonstrate an upcoming video game titled "Bully" for a judge to determine whether it violates Florida's public nuisance laws. Miami-Dade Circuit Court Judge Ronald Friedman issued the order yesterday.

The move is a major coup for conservative Miami attorney Jack Thompson, known for his crusades against pornography and obscene rap music, and now the video game industry. He claims that the makers of the game have designed a "Columbine simulator" in Bully, which follows the life of a prep school student as he navigates the social ladders of a fictional school called Bullworth Academy.

Thompson filed the lawsuit a month ago, claiming that the game would violate Florida's public-nuisance laws, which are more typically used to prosecute environmental polluters. Besides Take-Two, the suit also names retailers Wal-Mart Stores Inc. and GameStop Corp.

"My view is that the game potentially impinges on public safety," he said. "I'm pretty sure that the game is harmful to minors."

The game is scheduled to be released Tuesday for the PlayStation 2. It has been rated "T" for Teen by the game industry's ratings board.

Thompson said that he and the judge plan to watch the game played in its entirety, no matter how long that takes.

Attorneys for Take-Two did not respond to phone calls or e-mails last night. Rockstar Games, the Take-Two subsidiary that developed the game, as well as the bloody Grand Theft Auto franchise, also did not respond.

As the game has neared its scheduled release date, Rockstar has given a few tech sites and video game magazines an early look at it. So far, the early write-ups seem to have reviewers surprised by the game's lack of violence.

Clive Thompson, who reviewed the game for Wired.com, concluded that the game is "snarkily clever social commentary." His review described the game as not violent.

DOJ_NMG_0079471

"The game doesn't glorify bullying at all," he wrote. "Indeed, it's almost precisely the opposite."

Deal In Brooklyn Corruption Case (NYT)

By Michael Brick

The New York Times, October 12, 2006

Nearly four years into a broad inquiry seeking to expose the sale of judgeships in Brooklyn, prosecutors have agreed to dismiss all charges against the longtime executive director of the county's Democratic Party, Jeffrey C. Feldman, in exchange for his cooperation.

The deal, announced yesterday at a brief hearing in State Supreme Court in Brooklyn, cost prosecutors the second highest ranking target they have identified. But it gained them the most highly placed witness they have named.

So far, the investigation has produced guilty pleas by minor figures in a judicial bribery case and the conviction and resignation of Clarence Norman Jr., a 12-term assemblyman, deputy speaker and chairman of the biggest county Democratic organization east of Chicago.

There were accusations that judgeships were being sold by party leaders, who have considerable influence over the nomination and election of judges. Yet no one has been charged with selling judgeships. Separately, a federal judge has declared the system of selecting state judges unconstitutional.

Evidence from a case in which a judge who oversaw divorce cases was charged with bribery led the Brooklyn district attorney's office to begin a broader investigation in April 2003 into corruption in the process of nominating judges. Mr. Norman has been convicted in two corruption cases and acquitted in a third. In the last pending case, he has been charged with pressing judicial candidates to hire certain election consultants to win favor with the party. Until yesterday, Mr. Feldman was a co-defendant in that case.

"We have concluded that Jeff Feldman was nothing more than a messenger," said Michael F. Vecchione, chief of the district attorney's rackets division. He added that Mr. Feldman "has agreed to testify on behalf of the people in this and other ongoing investigations."

Mr. Feldman has signed a cooperation agreement, prosecutors say, though it is unusual to dismiss charges against such a witness before testimony is completed.

A lawyer for Mr. Feldman, Benjamin Brafman said, "The D.A.'s office looked at the case very differently after we made our submission." Mr. Feldman, 52, declined to comment.

British Court Ruling Gives Boost To Serious Journalism (WSJ)

By Aaron O. Patrick

The Wall Street Journal, October 12, 2006

LONDON -- Britain's top court handed down a landmark decision that could encourage serious investigative journalism in a nation where newspapers are known more for chronicling celebrity scandal.

The Law Lords, a body within the House of Lords that is the equivalent of the U.S. Supreme Court, yesterday provided media organizations with much stronger protection against libel suits if they can show their stories serve the public interest.

The Lords made the unanimous decision in upholding an appeal by The Wall Street Journal Europe. They overturned a lower court's decision that had found a 2002 Journal story libelous. In dismissing the case, the Lords ruled that the Journal's story was in the public interest and was reported in a serious and responsible way.

Until now, British libel laws were among the friendliest to plaintiffs anywhere, making the nation's courts a magnet for foreign celebrities taking action against U.S. publications. When faced with a libel action, publications essentially had to prove their articles were true or meet a detailed checklist about their reporting that considered such things as the seriousness of the allegations and the steps that were taken to verify the information. Truth remains a defense against libel. But now a "qualified privilege" defense under which the defendant does not have to prove the truth of the allegedly defamatory statement is a viable option.

The new ruling brings United Kingdom law closer to the protections U.S. media are afforded under the First Amendment of the U.S. Constitution. U.S. law sets strict and limited standards for when public figures can successfully win libel suits. As honed in a 1964 Supreme Court decision, known as New York Times v. Sullivan, U.S. public figures must show that a story was false and that the publication knew it was false or acted in reckless disregard for the truth.

DOJ_NMG_0079472

The British standard defined yesterday doesn't give all publications such blanket protection as in the U.S. Rather, it will only apply to what a judge deems responsible journalism that is of value to the public. "We need more such serious journalism in this country and our defamation law should encourage rather than discourage it," one of the lords, Baroness Brenda Hale, wrote in her opinion.

"In some ways it's the coming of age of press freedom in the U.K." said Dan Tench, a partner at Olswang Solicitors, a London law firm specializing in media law.

At issue was a February 2002 story in The Wall Street Journal Europe and The Wall Street Journal's U.S. edition that said Saudi authorities, at the request of U.S. law-enforcement agencies, were monitoring bank accounts of prominent Saudis and Saudi businesses to ensure they were not being used, wittingly or unwittingly, to finance terrorism.

Among the accounts being monitored, the article said, were those of the Abdul Latif Jameel Group. Mohammed Jameel, the company's president and a prominent Saudi businessman, sued the paper claiming the story defamed both him and his company and claimed damages.

Throughout the initial trial, The Wall Street Journal Europe didn't seek to defend itself by showing the article was true. It said its sources in Riyadh were afraid of reprisals from Saudi authorities if they testified. The paper also said it wouldn't identify a confidential source at the U.S. Treasury Department in Washington who had confirmed the Saudi information. Instead, the newspaper, which is published by Wall Street Journal Europe SPRL, a subsidiary of Dow Jones & Co., argued that the article was in the public interest because it showed that Saudi Arabia was cooperating in the international effort to combat terrorism and was fairly and responsibly reported.

A jury in the original case ruled against the newspaper and damages of $74,477 were awarded to Mr. Jameel and a Saudi company controlled by his family. The judge in that case said The Wall Street Journal Europe should have made more checks before publishing the article.

Britain's Court of Appeal backed that ruling, prompting the Journal to appeal to the House of Lords. The Law Lords said the trial judge had misdirected the jury that heard the initial case, that The Wall Street Journal Europe had done nothing wrong, and that its article was clearly in the public interest. The ruling strengthened and clarified an earlier judgment that had established the public interest defense but hadn't been widely adopted by judges.

The Law Lords also said it didn't matter that a judge, with "leisure and hindsight," might have made different editorial decisions than those made quickly in newsrooms. Rather, "the question in each case is whether the defendant behaved fairly and responsibly in gathering and publishing the information," the decision read.

The trial judge also had ruled that the story wasn't in the public interest because it breached an agreement between U.S. and Saudi governments to keep the monitoring secret. But the Lords overturned his decision, ruling the media are not bound by a government's desire to keep certain facts or programs secret.

The result could be more investigative journalism in England now that the threat of libel action has somewhat diminished. "Having this pretty unequivocal declaration is pretty important," said Alan Rusbridger, editor of the London-based Guardian newspaper. "We never felt entirely confident" with the previous law, he said.

The Wall Street Journal Europe's lawyer, Geoffrey Robertson, who argued the case, said the ruling would usher in a new role for the media, allowing journalists to "make a genuine contribution to public knowledge rather than parroting back what they are told, often in partisan fashion, by police or politicians."

Stuart Karle, general counsel for The Wall Street Journal, said the ruling gave the media an incentive to "produce serious journalism on compelling subjects of public concern without the risk of nitpicking and second-guessing by courts years later."

Mr. Jameel's lawyer, Andrew Stephenson of Carter-Ruck, said his client would be shocked by the judgment. He added that "the House of Lords has substituted its own view of the facts for that of the judge and jury who had all the evidence." Mr. Jameel released a statement to some media outlets after the ruling that read: "What the Wall Street Journal Europe wrote in February 2002 was that the bank accounts of the ALJ Group were being monitored at the request of the US authorities. That was not true. Mr. Justice Eady and the court of appeal ruled that I was libelled. The House of Lords ruled that I was not, because it was reasonable for the Wall Street Journal Europe to print something that was false. So be it. I was only ever interested in proving that the allegations were untrue."

DOJ_NMG_0079473

The Lords' ruling leaves open many key areas for judges to interpret in future cases. For instance, judges will decide whether an article is in the public interest and whether a publication acted seriously and responsibly.

Neither quality has been a hallmark of Britain's tabloids. They often focus on the personal lives of celebrities, such as model Kate Moss and singer George Michael. Reporting "stings," where reporters take on false identities to elicit information , are acceptable in tabloid culture. Paying for information is not unknown. Such tactics have flourished despite the strict libel laws in large part because many sensational stories are often accurate even if they were reported through stratagems that would be unacceptable in the U.S.

Britain is also a fiercely competitive newspaper market. There are 11 daily national newspapers, with a combined circulation of about 12 million copies a day, boosted in part by sensational headlines.

Both broadsheets and tabloids have been targets of successful libel actions in the past. Singer Elton John was awarded $139,645 in 1995, for example, when he sued the Sunday Mirror, a tabloid, for reporting that he was suffering from an eating disorder, which he said wasn't true.

At other times, British newspapers have settled libel cases rather than fight them. The Financial Times, owned by Pearson Group PLC, agreed in January to pay $558,579 and the legal costs of a brokerage firm, Collins Stewart Tullett PLC, which claimed it had been defamed by the newspaper.

Actress Kate Hudson successfully sued the U.S.-based National Enquirer in Britain in the past year, after it claimed she was dangerously thin, something she denied. There were 74 defamation cases in British courts in the 12 months ended May 2006, and 20 involved celebrities, according to Sweet & Maxwell, a legal publisher owned by Thomson Corp.

It is unlikely that tabloid celebrity coverage will meet the Law Lords' requirement that journalism be in the public interest to merit protection by the new ruling.

High Court In Britain Loosens Strict Libel Law (NYT)

By Sarah Lyall

The New York Times, October 12, 2006

LONDON, Oct. 11 — Britain's highest court ruled Wednesday for the first time that journalists have the right to publish allegations about public figures, as long as their reporting is responsible and in the public interest.

The ruling, a unanimous judgment by the Law Lords, is a huge shift in British law and significantly improves journalists' chances of winning libel cases in a court system that until now has been stacked against them.

English judges have traditionally been so sympathetic to libel plaintiffs that many people from abroad have sued in English courts — even if the publications in question have tiny circulations here — because they have had a much better chance of winning here than at home.

Newspaper editors said the decision, in the case of Jameel v. Wall Street Journal Europe, would free them to pursue stories vigorously without constant fear of lawsuits.

"This will lead to a greater robustness and willingness to tackle serious stories, which is what the judges said they wanted," said Alan Rusbridger, editor of The Guardian. Until now, he said in an interview, newspapers have had to police themselves to the point where "stories weren't getting in the paper or were being neutered by clever lawyers who knew how to play the game."

The case concerned an article published on Feb. 6, 2002, in The Wall Street Journal and in its European edition, The Wall Street Journal Europe, which has a daily circulation of 18,000 in Britain.

The article said that at the request of the United States, Saudi Arabia was monitoring bank accounts of prominent Saudi businesses and individuals to trace whether they were being used, possibly unwittingly, to siphon money to terrorist groups.

One of the businesses mentioned, Abdul Latif Jameel Company Ltd., sued the newspaper, as did Muhammed Abdul Latif Jameel, its general manager and president. Under British libel law, newspapers being sued are required to prove the truth of the allegations they print — the opposite of the situation in the United States, where the burden of proof falls heavily on plaintiffs.

DOJ_NMG_0079474

But that was a practical impossibility in this case, a member of the panel that ruled on Wednesday, Lord Hoffmann, wrote in his decision.

"In the nature of things, the existence of surveillance by the highly secretive Saudi authorities would have been impossible to prove by evidence in open court," he said. The paper argued that the article was in the public interest — that is, important to the debate about terrorism and the authorities' efforts to combat it.

A court ruling in a case several years ago involving The Times of London first seemed to open the door to such an argument. But that decision set out what some lawyers say was a prohibitively high set of standards for newspapers and other news media to meet, forcing them to defend their reporting practices to satisfy the subjective opinions of individual English judges.

In the Jameel case, a lower court jury rejected The Journal's public-interest argument, finding that the article was defamatory. The Journal was ordered to pay £40,000 — or about $74,000 — in damages. An appeals court affirmed the ruling.

The Law Lords overturned the decision. In a ringing rebuke to the lower court judge's conclusion that the article was not in the public interest, in part because it flouted an agreement between the United States and Saudi Arabia to keep the monitoring program secret, Lord Hoffmann declared it to be "a serious contribution in measured tone to a subject of very considerable importance."

Another member of the panel, Lord Scott of Foscote, defended the right of news organizations to publish material deemed private by the government.

"It is no part of the duty of the press to cooperate with any government, let alone foreign governments, whether friendly or not, in order to keep from the public information of public interest the disclosure of which cannot be said to be damaging to national interests," he wrote.

A third member, Baroness Hale of Richmond, wrote, "We need more such serious journalism in this country, and our defamation law should encourage rather than discourage it."

Keith Mathieson, a partner specializing in media law at the firm of Reynolds Porter Chamberlain, said the ruling would make it easier for newspapers to rely on confidential sources, as long as the articles were responsibly reported and in the public interest.

"It should make it easier for newspapers in the U.K. to publish serious stories where they cannot prove that allegations are true," he said in an interview.

Stuart Karle, The Wall Street Journal's general counsel, said that the newspaper had spent millions of dollars on the case and that the decision represented an important turning point. "The history of English libel law was that essentially no decision was final in a newsroom until a judge, several years later, agreed with you," he said in an interview.

"Going forward," he said, "this decision means that if you're a quality news organization you can fully and fairly cover the important issues of the day without this nagging problem of having a libel judge in London basically engage in an autopsy of every single thing you did and decide whether he agrees with your editorial judgment."

A Libel Landmark (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 12, 2006

With murders and court defeats, the free press has endured a rough couple of years. So we're happy to report a landmark libel case victory in Britain's highest court yesterday -- a verdict that will assist the cause of brave and honest reporting in much of the world.

The five Law Lords' unanimous ruling in Jameel v. The Wall Street Journal Europe sets a new standard for libel trials in Britain, until now arguably the most plaintiff-friendly jurisdiction in the free world. Henceforth the press will be able to defend against libel suits by arguing that articles are in the "public interest" and were the product of serious and responsible journalism.

The new Jameel-Journal standard moves the British system closer to the constitutional protection enjoyed by media in the U.S. In its legal impact, the case could be the British version of New York Times v. Sullivan, the 1964 case in which the U.S. Supreme Court held that the First Amendment protects the publication of all statements, even false ones, about the conduct of public figures except when the statements are made with actual malice.

DOJ_NMG_0079475

The news story in question in Jameel was published on February 6, 2002, in The Journal Europe and The Wall Street Journal. The article reported on joint U.S.-Saudi efforts to cut off funds to terrorists. It reported that the Saudi government, acting at the behest of the U.S., was monitoring bank accounts of well-known Saudi individuals and businesses that may, wittingly or not, have been used to finance terrorism. Mohammed Jameel, a billionaire Saudi car dealer, sued The Journal Europe in London for defamation because his company had been named in the story.

The Law Lords overturned two lower-court rulings, which found against The Journal, and held that the information in the article was in the public interest and had been reported responsibly. "The fact that the judge, with the advantage of leisure and hindsight, might have made a different editorial decision should not destroy the defence," Lord Hoffmann wrote. "That would make the publication of articles which are, ex hypothesi, in the public interest, too risky and would discourage investigative reporting."

And here's the key point: Even if an article contained a defamatory statement against a prominent individual, the Law Lords ruled, it would nevertheless be protected if the journalists had behaved "fairly and responsibly in gathering and publishing the information" and if the information is of public importance. This standard had been put forward in a 2001 case called Reynolds v. Times Newspapers but, according to the Law Lords, has been widely ignored by the lower courts.

In his opinion, Lord Bingham described The Journal as an "unsensational" newspaper, a charge to which we plead guilty. While the Jameel ruling won't matter much to Britain's tabloid press, it is likely to influence how "quality" newspapers go about investigative reporting. As another Law Lord, Baroness Hale, put it: "We need more such serious journalism in this country and our defamation law should encourage rather than discourage it."

The ruling should echo throughout the British Commonwealth, including in Australia, Canada, Hong Kong and -- dare we hope? -- Singapore. While Commonwealth countries now mostly have their own courts of final appeal, they still look to the Law Lords for guidance in interpreting the common law. Thanks to their Lordships, the world just got a little freer.

Two U.S. Pilots Criticized In Brazil (WP)

By Monte Reel, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, October 12, 2006

Details of Probe Fuel Anger Over Deadly Midair Collision

BUENOS AIRES, Oct. 11 -- Two American pilots are embroiled in controversy in Brazil as authorities try to determine if they accidentally caused a midair airplane collision two weeks ago over the Amazon rain forest, killing 154 passengers aboard a commercial jetliner.

The Americans were piloting a small executive jet being flown from its manufacturer in Brazil to its new owner in New Jersey when their plane hit a Gol Airlines Boeing 737-800 flying in the opposite direction. The pilots of the small plane, which carried seven people, landed safely at a military base about 120 miles from the point of impact, but the commercial airliner crashed into the dense jungle below, leaving no survivors.

This week, investigators released details that have led many Brazilians to blame New York residents Joseph Lepore and Jan Paladino for the worst air disaster in Brazil's history.

A spokeswoman for the Mato Grosso state police department, which has been investigating the crash, on Tuesday told the Associated Press that the American pilots had been instructed to fly at 36,000 feet at the time of the crash, according to the executive jet's flight plan. The airspace where the collision occurred -- at 37,000 feet -- had been reserved for the commercial jetliner, she said.

Lepore and Paladino earlier told police that they were following flight instructions given to them by Brazilian authorities. Brazil's defense minister, Waldir Pires, labeled the pilots' statements "frivolous" and "irresponsible" during an interview with O Globo Television on Tuesday, adding that it is customary for northbound flights to fly at even-numbered altitude levels.

Adding to the controversy were the comments of a New York Times business columnist who was aboard the executive jet while in Brazil on a freelance magazine assignment. The columnist, Joe Sharkey, told CNN last week that he had heard that Brazil's air traffic control system was notoriously incomplete in the area of the Amazon where the plane crashed. Those comments sparked angry admonitions from Brazilian officials who defended the nation's air control systems, saying they thoroughly cover even the most remote jungle regions.

DOJ_NMG_0079476

Meanwhile, ordinary Brazilians have vented their own anger at the American pilots.

"They have to be judged as criminals," Evarista Soares da Silva, 50, a doorman at an apartment complex in Rio de Janeiro, said Wednesday. "A lot of people died because of them. They were totally irresponsible."

As the investigation continues and the contents of the 737's "black box" are revealed, investigators hope to learn why the transponder aboard the executive jet failed to alert the larger plane of its presence and why the pilots of the small plane did not respond to calls from air traffic controllers before the crash. Some Brazilian authorities have publicly speculated that the pilots might have turned off their transponder, though the pilots' lawyer on Wednesday denied that they had done so.

Even the possibility of mechanical failure doesn't placate many Brazilians who believe that the American pilots could have prevented the crash.

"They said they had problems with the equipment, but why didn't they follow the route?" asked Joyce da Conceicao Fonseca, 67, of Rio de Janeiro. "I'm really sad for all the people who died. I prayed for them."

Special correspondent Fred Alves in Rio de Janeiro contributed to this report.

O.C. Man Gets 50 Years To Life For Molesting Relative On Videotape (LAT)

By Christine Hanley, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 12, 2006

His wife is also charged. They allegedly tricked parents of the 4-year-old.

An Orange County businessman was sentenced Wednesday to serve 50 years to life for molesting a 4-year-old relative in a case that unfolded after authorities discovered a trunk full of homemade child porn movies that investigators called a "little chest of horrors."

David S. Hwang, 35, agreed to plead guilty to all charges under a deal proposed by Superior Court Judge Gary S. Paer. The judge said the plea will spare the girl and her family from reliving "the nightmare" by having to testify or watch the "despicable" videotapes Hwang made while molesting the child, and it ensures that Hwang will never be free.

"In my mind, this is a death sentence," Paer said in summarizing the agreement.

Prosecutors said Hwang and his wife, who is also charged, deceived the girl's parents into letting them "baby-sit" her to practice their parenting skills. Based on the footage, prosecutors also said the couple gave the girl "medicine" that rendered her unconscious while being molested.

Hwang admitted to 60 counts of kidnapping for child molestation, lewd acts on a child under 14, oral copulation on a person under 14, anal or genital penetration with a foreign object of a child under 14, using a minor for sex acts and sodomy of a person under 14.

All the charges involve the girl who was then 4.

Hwang told the court he was pleading guilty against the advice of his attorney, primarily out of his concern for the victim and her family, who have "already been through enough."

He will not be eligible for parole until he is 77. Even then, it is unlikely that he would be considered for release, under state guidelines.

Hwang had faced a sentence of at least 93 years had he been convicted at trial.

To that end, Deputy Dist. Atty. Beth Carmichael said she was satisfied with the outcome. She had arrived at court Wednesday fully prepared to put him on trial.

"I wanted to make sure he will never get out of custody," she said outside court.

Hwang's attorney, Don Ronaldson, declined to comment.

Hwang still faces charges in Texas for allegedly molesting five young girls there, including an 8-month-old. His wife, Sheila Marie Sikat, 26, is charged with the same counts as her husband in the Orange County case and is scheduled to go to trial next month.

The couple were arrested in September 2003, fresh from their honeymoon in the Bahamas.

DOJ_NMG_0079477

At the time, they both worked for Pacific Life Insurance Co. in Newport Beach, he in technical services and she in marketing.

Authorities were led to their Rancho Santa Margarita home after an anonymous tipster sent a package with a videotape that contained scenes from multiple tapes, and revealed where other tapes might be found, Carmichael said.

Inside a green wooden trunk, investigators found 212 videotapes, some shot in Orange County and others shot in the 1990s in Texas, where Hwang went to college and lived before moving to California.

Some tapes allegedly show Hwang molesting girls, sometimes with the participation of his wife or, in earlier years, a former girlfriend, who is also charged.

Investigators in Orange County and Texas have not been able to identify all the victims. The girl at the center of the Orange County charges is seen in four of the tapes.

christine.hanley@latimes.com

CIVIL LAW:

Medicare Saves $2 Bln By Fighting Fraud In U.S. Health Programs (BLOOM)

By Kerry Young

Bloomberg, October 12, 2006

Oct. 11 (Bloomberg) -- The Medicare program, the biggest U.S. buyer of health care, said it saved more than $2 billion by cracking down on fraud and abuse, especially cases involving drugs and medical equipment and tests.

The health plan for Americans who are 65 and older or disabled also said it gave two contracts to Electronic Data Systems Corp. for detecting and preventing fraud. Science Applications International Corp. and Health Integrity LLC each won a Medicare contract for aiding fraud prevention.

Medicare's efforts to prevent fraud have fallen short in the past, according to the investigative arm of Congress. The Government Accountability Office last year said Medicare overpaid for medical equipment and supplies by $900 million, or about 10 percent of its total spending, in the year ended in September 2004.

``Vigilance in protecting beneficiaries and taxpayers from waste, fraud and abuse is one of our top priorities in Medicare," said Mark McClellan, the administrator for the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, in a statement.

The statement from Baltimore-based Medicare didn't say in what period of time it had saved the $2 billion. Medicare spokesman Peter Ashkenaz didn't immediately return a phone call from Bloomberg News. The U.S. Justice Department has opened 63 criminal and 38 civil Medicare fraud cases since October 2005, Medicare said in the statement.

The Baltimore-based agency said it has expanded its efforts in Los Angeles and Miami in particular. Medicare said it revoked billing privilege, known as a provider number, from more than 500 suppliers of medical equipment.

The agency said it also denied about $163 million in charges from testing centers.

GSA Asks Court To Rethink Ruling On FedBizOpps.gov (GCN)

By Jason Miller

Government Computer News, October 12, 2006

The Justice Department, on behalf of the General Services Administration, asked the Federal Claims Court to reconsider two parts of its recent decision that found GSA erred in its awarding of the contract for FedBizOpps.gov.

According to the redacted motion filed by the government, Justice is asking the court to revisit the order to bring in a new source selection authority, and the judge's conclusion that GSA incorrectly calculated the bid from the winning vendor, Symplicity Corp. of Arlington, Va. GSA awarded Symplicity a $17.4 million contract that includes three base years and five one-year options in December after re-evaluating bids following a first protest by Development Infostructure (Devis) Corp. of Arlington, Va., and Information Sciences Corp. of Silver Spring, Md.

ISC, which is the subcontractor to Science Applications International Corp., currently supports FedBizOpps.gov.

DOJ_NMG_0079478

"First, the court's conclusions with respect to the 'independent judgement' of the source selection authority in considering Symplicity's proposal do not completely reflect the record of evidence," U.S. attorneys wrote. "Moreover, injunctive relief should be limited to returning the procurement to the existing [source selection authority], given the absence of any allegations—let along evidence—of bad faith, bias or any other basis to disqualify the SSA ..."

The court in September found in favor of Devis and ISC in their second protest and ordered GSA to appoint a new source selection authority and re-evaluate the bids. This contract has been going on since June 2005.

"GSA still is operating FedBizOpps and will continue to operate it," said a GSA spokeswoman. "We can't comment on litigation."

Joseph Petrillo, a procurement attorney with Petrillo and Powell in Washington and a GCN columnist, said GSA's decision to file a reconsideration motion is somewhat unusual, but not unprecedented. Though, he added, reconsideration is rarely granted.

In the motion, Justice also argues that GSA didn't err in evaluating Symplicity's price because it was not a flat fee, but over a certain time period. The redacted motion does not show the total price or the number of years.

"Instead, the evidence suggests that Symplicity's price, even if price had been used to eliminate offers, would have made Symplicity's offer more attractive and more likely to remain in the competitive range," U.S. attorneys said.

GSA does admit that they calculated Symplicity's total price incorrectly, but Devis and ISC should not benefit from the agency's mistake, U.S. attorneys added.

Additionally, Justice asked the judge to reconsider her ruling for GSA to appoint a new source selection authority even if the decision stands. Attorneys said that there is no evidence that the SSA acted in bad faith and therefore return the procurement the source selection authority. The SSA was Debra Sonderman, the Interior Department's director, Office of Acquisition and Property Management, sources said.

"The judge clearly thought through all these issues and I am surprised DOJ is arguing that the important facts were not well represented in the court's order — which I thought was very clear," said Peter Gallagher, president of Devis. "I guess we must now wait to see if another round of comments will be entertained by the court. We are obviously disappointed that additional legal proceedings are delaying the award."

There is no time frame for the judge to decide on Justice's motion, according to the court's clerk office.

RJR Douses Flavored Smokes Criticized As A Lure For Teens (WSJ)

By Christina Cheddar Berk

The Wall Street Journal, October 12, 2006

R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co. agreed to a ban on certain types of flavored cigarettes in the U.S., ending a practice some critics say was used to lure teens to start smoking.

Under a deal with attorneys general from 40 states, Reynolds, a unit of Winston-Salem, N.C.-based Reynolds American Inc. that makes Kool, Salem and Camel brands, will no longer market cigarettes such as Mandarin Mint Camel Exotic Blends, Midnight Berry Kool Smooth Fusions or any others that use a fruit, candy or alcoholic beverage in its name.

"We recognize that the past use of certain names on a limited number of our brand styles resulted in unintended perceptions and concerns," said Lynn Beasley, R.J. Reynolds president and chief operating officer.

The agreement followed an investigation that began last year after several states raised concerns that the products violated a 1998 settlement with the largest tobacco companies that prohibited marketing of tobacco products to youths.

Under the settlement with Reynolds, the attorneys general agreed to pursue similar agreements with other tobacco companies, according to a Reynolds spokesman.

"This agreement is an important step forward in restricting the marketing of tobacco products to children," said Matthew Myers, president of the Campaign for Tobacco-Free Kids. Mr. Myers said he would like to see legislation banning makers of smokeless-tobacco products from using candy and fruit flavors.

Reynolds introduced the flavored cigarettes in 1999 as a super-premium product priced about $2 above its premium brands such as Camel.

DOJ_NMG_0079479

The flavored cigarettes represented less than 0.1% of the company's annual cigarette volume. In May, the company stopped making the last offerings in its Camel Exotic Blends line.

Write to Christina Cheddar Berk at christina.cheddar@dowjones.com1

CIVIL RIGHTS:

States Are Growing More Lenient In Allowing Felons To Vote (NYT)

By Erik Eckholm

The New York Times, October 12, 2006

Legislatures in 16 states have loosened voting restrictions on felons over the last decade, according to a new report, a trend hailed by some rights advocates as a step toward democratic principles and fairness, especially for black Americans.

Because of their high incarceration rate, blacks are most affected by the voting bans that vary widely among the states, with many barring current inmates and parolees from voting until they have fulfilled their sentences, and some barring felons for life.

In recent years, Iowa, Nebraska and New Mexico have repealed their lifetime bans on voting by people who have been convicted of felonies, and several other states made it easier for freed prisoners or those on probation to vote, according to the report, issued yesterday by the Sentencing Project, a liberal advocacy group in Washington.

The recent changes have restored voting rights to more than 600,000 individuals, the report said. But because the country's prison population has continued to rise, a record number of Americans, 5.3 million, are still denied the vote because of criminal records, it concluded.

"It's good news that many people who'd been disqualified from voting are being re-engaged as citizens," said Jeremy Travis, president of the John Jay College of Criminal Justice in New York and a leader of the movement to smooth the re-entry of prisoners to society.

"I think people are realizing that the country had gone too far in marginalizing a large group of people who have been convicted of felonies," Mr. Travis said. "This has had profound consequences for our democracy and the participation of minorities."

But some conservatives remain philosophically opposed to any wholesale loosening of voting restrictions. "If you're not willing to follow the law, then you shouldn't claim the right to make the law for someone else," said Roger Clegg, president of the Center for Equal Opportunity, a conservative advocacy group in Washington.

Mr. Clegg, who was a senior Justice Department official in the Reagan and first Bush administrations, said that those convicted of felonies should be given the vote only case by case, when they have proved to be constructive members of society.

Some restrictions on voting date to the early years of the country or to the post-Civil-War period, while others were tightened during the "get tough on crime" era of the 1980's.

By federal law, voter rules are mainly set by the states. As a result, even in presidential elections, former prisoners can vote in some states but not others.

Only two states, Maine and Vermont, have no restrictions, even permitting inmates to vote. At the other extreme, three states, Florida, Kentucky and Virginia, still have lifetime bans on voting by felons. Nine others bar selected groups of offenders for life.

New York, Connecticut and New Jersey, like most states, do not allow current inmates or parolees to vote.

In a ballot initiative in Rhode Island this November, voters will decide whether to restore voting rights to prisoners on parole or probation, who far outnumber inmates. Early polls show public support for the measure.

Advocates of change emphasize broad arguments about democratic process, but the racial disparities give the issue a special resonance and raise questions about the representation of minorities in politics.

In 2004, one in eight black men were unable to vote because of a felony conviction, the report said, a rate many times higher than that for other groups.

Felony convictions have left one in four black men barred from voting in five states: Alabama, Florida, Mississippi, Virginia and Wyoming, said Ryan S. King, author of the report and a policy analyst at the Sentencing Project.

DOJ_NMG_0079480

But Mr. Clegg argued that the voting restrictions were applied evenhandedly, and that just because they had a disproportionate impact on one group, that did not make them racially discriminatory.

Though data on felon voting patterns are murky, a large majority of former prisoners are believed to lean Democratic. Even with a low turnout rate, their participation could make a difference in close races, experts say. Florida's rules, for example, might have been a factor in the 2000 presidential election.

In Texas in 1997, Gov. George W. Bush signed a law eliminating a two-year wait before prisoners ending their parole could vote.

Manassas Irate That Inquiry Is Escalated (WP)

By Nick Miroff, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 12, 2006

HUD Sent Case To Justice Dept.

Manassas officials have blasted a Department of Housing and Urban Development decision to turn over an inquiry of discrimination in the city to the Justice Department -- calling the move "incomprehensible" and challenging claims by the housing agency that it had made a good-faith attempt to settle complaints by Hispanic residents and civil rights organizations.

HUD officials notified Manassas last week that the investigation had been forwarded to Justice, which will take over the inquiry into whether the city violated the Fair Housing Act with zoning enforcement efforts such as an anonymous "anti-crowding hotline" and a short-lived ordinance that sought to limit the number of extended relatives who could share a dwelling.

Attempts to reconcile the 11 outstanding discrimination complaints against the city "failed," HUD determined.

The Justice Department will now review HUD's findings and decide whether to bring charges against the city -- an announcement that caught Manassas officials "flatfooted," said City Manager Lawrence D. Hughes.

"We were completely surprised," said Hughes. "HUD never attempted to mediate the complaints, despite the city's repeated requests that it do so."

The gulf between HUD and the city has widened in recent weeks. First, city staff complained that a shifting cast of HUD officials, including seven investigators from four offices, went over similar territory and asked similar questions, burdening city staff. Then the came the announcement that HUD had referred its findings to the Justice Department, which further irked the city because it learned about the decision through The Washington Post.

But HUD said it informed Manassas of its decision through letters and phone calls that were unanswered, according to Bryan Greene, deputy assistant secretary in HUD's Office of Fair Housing and Equal Opportunity.

"We've notified all the parties in this case that we could not complete the investigation," Greene said. "We're done."

HUD's settlement process hit a roadblock, he said, because Manassas failed to satisfy the aggrieved parties who have filed complaints.

"The question is how the city of Manassas addresses the people who allege they have been injured by their ordinances," Greene said. "We tried to obtain relief for individuals, and we reached an impasse."

Under the Fair Housing Act, the agency was required by law to notify parties in the case after the first 100 days of the investigation.

"We will investigate as long as we can, but if we don't think we can resolve it, we want to get the information to the Department of Justice in a reasonable amount of time so they can take the actions they think are necessary," Greene said.

HUD's investigation does not produce a ruling or determination, and details of its findings were not disclosed. But Greene's statement suggests the agency thinks the case is headed for U.S. District Court, where federal attorneys could file suit against the city.

"If the judge or jury determines that the city of Manassas conspired to discriminate against Latino families, the punitive damages could be hefty," said Kent Willis, executive director of the American Civil Liberties Union of Virginia, one of the groups that threatened to sue the city last winter over its anti-crowding ordinance. Suits involving violations of the Fair Housing Act typically lead to punitive and compensatory damages, Willis said. Individuals can also file civil suits against the city over the same complaints, which can be costly for the city.

DOJ_NMG_0079481

Hughes and other city staff called the HUD contention that the city did not address complaints false. "We have asked numerous times for the aggrieved parties to specify what their claim is, and we have not received a response," he said. "So this conclusion that we're at an impasse is unimaginable to us."

Hughes accused those who have alleged discrimination against the city of trying to squeeze Manassas for money. The Fair Housing Act "should not be used by those who are not discriminated against to raise money from a local government's limited treasury," he said in a recent news release.

"I find that comment sad," said Rabbi Bruce E. Kahn, executive director of the District-based Equal Rights Center, a civil rights organization that lodged a complaint to HUD and compiled information about city zoning enforcement practices. "The city has an obligation to face the wrong that it's done and remedy the wrong that it's done, including paying damages."

Kahn accused the city of ongoing civil rights violations, despite changes in city policies and the swift repeal of the anti-crowding ordinance.

For additional legal counsel, Manassas has contacted Richmond lawyer William G. Broaddus, who is working with city attorney Robert W. Bendall. But Vice Mayor Harry J. "Hal" Parrish II said he was hopeful federal attorneys would not come knocking.

Parrish said maybe the Justice Department would decide there is no reason to go after anyone. But he cautioned, "I'm always an optimist."

3 Charged In Hate Crimes; Brooklyn Victim Is In A Coma (NYT)

By Al Baker

The New York Times, October 12, 2006

Three Brooklyn men were charged with hate crimes yesterday in connection with an attack on a man who was lured to a desolate meeting place Sunday night, robbed and forced onto the Belt Parkway, where he was struck by a car and critically injured, the police said.

The victim, Michael J. Sandy, 28, of Brooklyn, was still in a coma yesterday, relatives said. The attack is being treated as a hate crime because investigators believe the assailants singled out Mr. Sandy for being gay and arranged over the Internet to meet him at a place often visited by gay men. One other man was being questioned yesterday in connection with the attack, the police said. Officials said a group of as many as four men orchestrated the rendezvous in order to rob Mr. Sandy, telling him in Internet messages to bring enough money for a hotel room.

At 9:40 p.m. on Sunday at the meeting place — a narrow, garbage-strewn parking lot near Sheepshead Bay, sandwiched between Plumb Beach and the eastbound lanes of the parkway — Mr. Sandy, 28, was attacked by at least two of the men, the police said. He backed away from them and, at one point, darted into the path of a car, which struck him and kept going, the police said. The police were still seeking the driver of the car that struck Mr. Sandy.

Other cars on the highway were forced to stop as the attack spilled across three lanes of roaring traffic. One witness told detectives that after Mr. Sandy was struck by the car, she saw a man drag him to the shoulder of the Belt Parkway and rifle his pockets.

Detectives investigating Internet communications Mr. Sandy had had were led to the first suspect, John Fox, 19, of Knapp Street in Brooklyn, who is a sophomore at SUNY Maritime College. The other two suspects are Gary Timmins, 16, of Gerritsen Beach, and Ilye Shurova, 20, of Sheepshead Bay. The three men were charged yesterday with first-degree assault as a hate crime, and first- and second-degree robbery, also as hate crimes, according to the police. The men face a potentially longer prison term than if the hate crime statute was not applied, according to a spokesman for Charles J. Hynes, the Brooklyn district attorney.

The fourth suspect was being questioned at the 61st Precinct stationhouse in Brooklyn last night, the police said. It was unclear what role each of the four men played in the incident, according to the police.

“The perpetrators had an online interaction with the victim, and they lured him,” said one investigator, referring to what he said was an exchange of AOL instant messages over the course of about an hour.

DOJ_NMG_0079482

When asked why the case was being classified as a hate crime, the investigator said: "Because of the totality of the evolution of the crime."

But the case underlined the fine distinction prosecutors must consider when applying the state's hate crime law. Under the law, established in 2000, a hate crime is typically defined as one in which a victim is chosen because of race, color, sexual orientation, religious practice or some other protected category, said Brian S. MacNamara, an assistant professor of law at John Jay College of Criminal Justice.

"The prosecutor will have to prove that in the underlying assault and robbery the victim was targeted in some way because of his sexual orientation," said Professor MacNamara. "It's a little bit tricky because, obviously, the main crime was the robbery, so you have to prove that the motivation for selecting that victim was substantially because he was gay."

As Mr. Fox was led from the precinct station yesterday, his hands cuffed behind his back, his father, John Sr., yelled out, "John, I care about you."

He later defended his son to reporters, speaking about his son's goal of becoming a naval officer, and said he was perplexed by the hate-crime charge. "He never did anything like that before," the elder Mr. Fox said. "Why would he be rabidly anti-gay? I don't know."

McCartha L. Lewis, Mr. Sandy's aunt, said the family was rallying to support her nephew as he remained in critical condition yesterday at Brookdale University Hospital and Medical Center. She said that Mr. Sandy was in a coma with his breathing supported by a respirator, and that the family was struggling with whether to remove him from it.

Ms. Lewis said the family wanted to wait at least until today, Mr. Sandy's 29th birthday, before making that decision.

"The doctors want us to pull the plug, but I told them no," said Ms. Lewis, 66, a singer who lives in Jamaica, Queens.

Mr. Sandy's father, Ezekiel E. Sandy Sr., is Ms. Lewis's brother, and she said that another of his sons, Tony, had come from Tobago to be with the family.

"He's a very good boy," Ms. Lewis said of Michael Sandy. "He is a hard worker and he is very nice."

Black Employees' Foundation Sues LOC (RC)

By Elizabeth Brotherton

Roll Call, October 12, 2006

Members of a nonprofit foundation designed to assist black employees at the Library of Congress filed a class-action lawsuit against the agency last week, claiming officials have failed to recognize the organization and discriminated against employees who joined it.

Officers of the Howard R.L. Cook and Tommy Shaw Foundation for Black Employees of the Library Inc. allege that by not recognizing the foundation as an employee organization, the Library has denied black employees the right to address racial discrimination in the work force through legal means.

"Now, that's illegal, because that's blatant retaliation," said Howard Cook, a plaintiff in the case and a foundation officer. "We have a right to combat racial discrimination and all other forms of retaliation that exists."

As a recognized employee organization, the Library would allow the foundation to use Library space and duty time for its activities.

In the lawsuit, the plaintiffs are asking that the court declare the Library's actions "illegal and discriminatory," as well as award the foundation $75 million for "the Defendant's illegal actions preventing the Foundation from having open access to financial assistance from its members."

Matt Raymond, a spokesman for the Library of Congress, declined to comment beyond stating that the LOC had not yet been formally served with court papers but was aware of the lawsuit.

"We don't comment on pending litigation," Raymond said.

But in a series of letters dating back to 2003, Library officials wrote to various members of the foundation to argue that they cannot recognize the group as an official employee organization because one of its primary purposes is to sue the Library in discrimination lawsuits by using money raised on Library property.

DOJ_NMG_0079483

"One of the main goals of the Howard Cook/Tommy Shaw Foundation is to assist individuals in filing and maintaining claims, suits and litigation against the Library," Librarian of Congress James Billington wrote to Cook in August 2005. "I firmly believe that emplpoyee [sic] assistance is best provided by the Library through its Equal Employment Opportunity Complaints Office, Dispute Resolution Center, Employee Assistance Program, Office of Workforce Management, and through the collective bargaining agreements between the Library and its four unions."

The foundation was established following the landmark Cook v. Billington class-action court ruling by the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia, which found the Library had discriminated against minority employees.

Officially incorporated by the Washington, D.C., government in September 2001, the foundation provides financial support for those involved in combating racial discrimination at the Library, Cook said, as well as education and training to help minority employees advance their careers.

Lead plaintiff David Hubbard, another foundation officer, said repeated refusals by Library officials to recognize the foundation prompted the suit, which was filed on Oct. 6 in U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia.

"All we want to do is be recognized as an organization within the Library of Congress," Hubbard said. "Now that we have a foundation set up to help employees, they refuse to recognize us."

The Library has struggled with discrimination issues in the past. Following the Cook v. Billington ruling, the Library changed its hiring and promotion practices, which officials have said helped to lead to a drop in discrimination complaints and lawsuits.

But some legal experts familiar with the Library have argued these changes have not been effectively enforced by senior management, and problems have continued.

Cook, who worked for 32 years in the education division at the Library's Congressional Research Service, said he hopes the foundation can give minority employees a leg up at the Library.

"I loved it, but also hated the environment and treatment afforded minority employees," Cook said of his years at the Library.

The Baltimore-based law firm Snider & Associates is handling the case for the plaintiffs. The attorneys handling the lawsuit were unavailable because they were marking the Jewish holiday of Sukkot, a receptionist said.

9th Circuit: UPS Can't Refuse To Consider Hearing-Impaired Drivers (LAW)

By Petra Pasternak, The Recorder

California Recorder, October 12, 2006

A 9th Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals panel ruled Tuesday that United Parcel Service violated the Americans with Disabilities Act by refusing to consider hearing-impaired workers for driving positions.

At issue was UPS' policy mandating that its drivers pass a government hearing test, even though the test isn't required to operate many of the company's vehicles. UPS argued its exclusion policies were designed with safety in mind. But the court said that a blanket determination of safety can't be made on the basis of disability.

"The concept of risk, in other words, is an individual, not an aggregate, one," Judge Marsha Berzon wrote for the unanimous court, "albeit one calculated by averaging out overall risk: how likely is it that the individual driver will get into an accident?"

Judge Betty Fletcher concurred, as did Judge John Gibson, a senior 8th Circuit judge sitting by designation.

Laurence Paradis and Caroline Jacobs of the Oakland, Calif.-based nonprofit firm Disability Rights Advocates represented the plaintiff class.

"There are a whole host of factors that go into every job description, and it's very rare that employees can challenge arbitrary job standards that close the door to people with disabilities," Paradis said. "The ruling was a tremendous victory for people with all kinds of disabilities."

Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher attorneys, who handled UPS' defense, could not be reached for comment. But company spokeswoman Heather Robinson said UPS "strongly disagrees with the court's ruling, and we are evaluating our options, including an appeal. We believe this case is about safety. It has nothing to do with disability or discrimination."

DOJ_NMG_0079484

In upholding an injunction granted by U.S. District Judge Thelton Henderson in 2004, the 9th Circuit panel ruled the plaintiffs did not have to prove they could drive "safely" in order to have standing. Instead, they merely had to meet the other job qualifications UPS listed for the position, which they did.

That reasoning shifted the burden of proof to UPS, which had to prove the driving job mandated the strict government hearing test required by the company.

"UPS didn't show persuasively that hearing-impaired people were more likely to have accidents," Heller Ehrman partner Andrew Livingston said. "And the flip side, it didn't show that there was no way to determine whether or not hearing-impaired drivers present a heightened risk."

Livingston, who followed the case, added: "The opinion certainly changes the way people litigate these types of law suits, both at the summary judgment stage and the trial stage. It shifts the burden under the ADA to the defense to prove that the employee or class of employees are not qualified because of the specific qualifications standard at issue."

Another defense attorney said the ruling in Bates v. UPS, 06 C.D.O.S. 9546, is an example of the pitfalls of a sweeping company policy related to disabled workers.

"It's dangerous to have an across-the-board policy," Winston & Strawn partner Tyler Paetkau said. "For employers, it's risky to treat applicants as a group."

UPS maintains it does not discriminate on the basis of disability.

"UPS has employees with disabilities -- including hearing impairments -- in a wide range of positions throughout the company's nationwide workforce," spokeswoman Robinson said.

South Dakota's Stark Abortion Choice (CSM)

By Amanda Paulson

The Christian Science Monitor, October 12, 2006

SIOUX FALLS, S.D.

An unlikely state could reset the tone of the country's abortion debate this November.

South Dakota voters are poised to weigh in on a landmark bill, passed by the legislature in March and referred to the ballot by a petition drive, that would outlaw all abortions except to save a mother's life. While the law, if approved, will almost certainly be challenged in court, the campaign is under scrutiny by those on all sides of the national debate eager to see whether voters in a conservative, largely antiabortion state are ready to approve an all-out ban on abortion.

If the ban is voted down, it will indicate even abortion opponents aren't willing to rein in all rights, and it will diminish the chances that other states will pass similar bans. If it's approved, observers expect other states to follow, and it's possible a court challenge could reach the Supreme Court.

It's a decision many residents of South Dakota are wrestling with.

"It's really tough for us," Dick Ronken tells an antiabortion canvasser. "We're against abortion, but I think they haven't gone far enough to provide for all cases. It should be between a woman and her God and her doctor, without the government interfering."

Mr. Ronken's views aren't unusual in a state where many oppose abortion but look at it in personal terms - and often oppose government intrusion in their lives. In fact, some abortion-rights advocates say the soul-searching debate this vote has forced is one they welcome, hopeful it will lead to a decision to overturn the ban.

"In the case of abortion, we have long said that people in this country may accept restrictions, but will never accept a total ban on abortion - this debate really lays that bare," says Sarah Stoesz, the president of Planned Parenthood in Minnesota, South Dakota, and North Dakota, which runs the only abortion-providing clinic in South Dakota.

Opponents of the ban hold a small lead in polls - 47 percent to 44 percent in a recent Zogby International poll - but that lead has narrowed. If the ban allowed exceptions in cases of rape and incest, polls show a sizeable majority would support it.

Perhaps for that reason the arguments on both sides have been atypical for an issue that rarely veers from rhetoric pitting a "protect unborn children" slogan against "protect a woman's right to choose." Those opposed to the ban have shied away from promoting access to abortion, focusing instead on the bill's strictness, which doesn't include exceptions for rape, incest, or the mother's health but would allow an abortion to save her life.

DOJ_NMG_0079485

"Honor and protect human life, reduce the number of abortions," says one TV ad sponsored by the South Dakota Campaign for Healthy Families, the coalition opposing the ban. "But should a woman who's the victim of rape or incest be left with no option?... Referred Law 6 makes no exception for these tragic circumstances. ... It just goes too far."

Similarly, proponents of the ban have eschewed slogans about saving babies' lives and photos of aborted fetuses in favor of a more feminist message about protecting women who, they say, are the ones victimized by abortion-rights advocates.

"For the last 33 years, women who have had abortions have been exploited," says Leslee Unruh, campaign manager for VoteYesForLife.com, who brought the bill to the legislature. Ms. Unruh had an abortion many years ago and has regretted her decision. Too often, she says, women aren't informed about the physical and emotional consequences of abortion.

"I've asked women to continue to be at the forefront, and to have it continue to be about women," Unruh says.

When she proposed the bill, legislators convened a task force to study the issue and concluded with a highly controversial report that triggered members of the task force to walk out in protest. Women like Unruh who had abortions they regretted testified before the task force and were a big reason the legislature decided to go ahead with the bill, says Rep. Roger Hunt, the Republican who sponsored it.

"It's very compelling evidence," says Representative Hunt, noting that the task force also determined that life begins at conception.

He and Unruh quibble with the portrayal of the bill as having no exceptions for rape or incest, pointing to one section that guarantees women access to emergency contraception, which helps prevent pregnancy if taken within 72 hours after sex. But opponents of the ban say that doesn't help many women who may not immediately report a rape, and they note that South Dakota recently passed legislation allowing pharmacists to refuse to fill an emergency contraception prescription.

Of the 800 or so abortions performed in the state each year, only a few are due to rape or incest, but for many voters those are the instances they keep coming back to.

"People are saying, are you telling me if my granddaughter was raped she'd have to go to term?" says David Volk, a former state treasurer and secretary of commerce and regulation who considers himself a staunchly "pro-life" Republican. He is opposed to the ban. "It's the wrong case at the wrong time."

In addition to seeing it as too extreme, Mr. Volk objects to the money that will be needed for the state to defend the bill in court - especially since he thinks it has no chance of overturning Roe v. Wade. And many national antiabortion groups seem to agree with him. The National Right to Life Committee barely mentions the case on its Web site, and Americans United for Life, a legal support group in Chicago, says it's unlikely the Supreme Court would revisit Roe through a ban like this.

"It's going to be a very tall hill to climb for that to happen," says David McConchie, the group's executive director. "But if it's a ban of something people support, they should vote for that."

National abortion-rights groups, meanwhile, are watching the vote closely in part because they're concerned about other states - like Ohio, Louisiana, and Texas - following South Dakota and about the changing makeup of the Supreme Court.

"There's this climate that they feel [Roe] could be overturned, and that's what they're doing with the South Dakota ban," says Nancy Keenan, president of NARAL Pro-Choice America. But the chilly reception the ban has gotten in a antiabortion state may be an indication that more extreme abortion opponents are overreaching, she says. "Their true agenda is now uncloaked. ... And American people are saying enough is enough."

At the state's only abortion clinic - already a five-hour drive for people in the western part of South Dakota - protesters wave signs outside on a day when a doctor has flown in. With no doctors in the state willing to perform abortions, the four doctors who work at the clinic have to fly in from Minnesota.

"Women who don't want to be pregnant will go to extreme measures," says Miriam McCreary, a semi-retired obstetrician from St. Paul explaining why she makes the trip one to three times a week. "Abortion should be safe, legal, and available as a backup if contraception fails."

But while the ban is controversial - especially in a state that, while antiabortion, also has many libertarian tendencies - not all South Dakotans struggle with it. Lawns in Sioux City are dotted with pink-and-blue "Vote Yes on 6" signs. Some voters are enthusiastic about the law. As Justin Huck and Katie Kjelden go door-to-door in a neighborhood of small houses to campaign against the ban, they get varied responses.

DOJ_NMG_0079486

"You're talking to the wrong person - I very much believe in the sanctity of human life," a blond woman with two small dogs tells Mr. Huck. Judy Alvine, on the other hand, gives Ms. Kjelden a warm reception when she answers the door.

"They make it sound like if you were Christian you would be for it," she says with frustration. "We have a doctor in the family, and he feels very strongly it should be a medical thing."

"It's refreshing to have people you can actually talk with," says Kjelden, a high school sophomore volunteering for the campaign, as she leaves the house. "And she and her husband are both registered Republicans!"

Report: 5 U.S. States Use Dogs To Control Inmates In Cells (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, October 12, 2006

(AP) - NEW YORK-Five U.S. state prison systems allow the use of trained attack dogs to control inmates - a practice that until now has been kept secret in American prisons - according to a Human Rights Watch report released Wednesday.

"The entire world has seen the photo of an Abu Ghraib detainee crouched in terror before a snarling dog, but the use of attack dogs against prisoners here in the U.S. has been a well-kept secret," said Jamie Fellner, U.S. director of Human Rights Watch. "Longtime corrections professionals were appalled when we told them that guards in some states use dogs on prisoners."

The report, "Cruel and Degrading: The use of dogs for cell extractions in U.S. prisons," says policies exist in Connecticut, Delaware, Iowa, South Dakota and Utah that allow guards to use "aggressive, unmuzzled" dogs to order inmates out of their cells when they refuse to leave. Dogs are ordered to bite prisoners if they resist.

"Human Rights Watch knows of no other country in the world that authorizes the use of dogs to attack prisoners who will not voluntarily leave their cells," the report said. The group does not object to the use of dogs to patrol prison grounds.

The report notes that in South Dakota, Utah and Delaware, dogs are rarely used in cells, if at all. In Connecticut, dogs were used in 20 cases in 2005, and in Iowa in 63 cases between March 2005 and March 2006.

Human Rights Watch interviewed prison officials in Connecticut and Iowa who said using dogs to remove prisoners from cells reduces injuries to guards and keeps prisons safer.

But Kathleen Dennehy, Commissioner of the Massachusetts Department of Correction, said her state stopped using dogs in cells this year because there are other effective alternatives.

"There are other ways to compel inmates to cuff up than sending in an animal to rip his flesh," she told Human Rights Watch.

Arizona also dropped its dog in cells policy this year.

"We welcome these decisions and urge the corrections departments of Connecticut, Delaware, Iowa, South Dakota and Utah to follow suit," the report said.

ANTITRUST:

Justice Department Criticized For Approving Big AT&T Deal (WSJ)

By Amy Schatz And Siobhan Hughes

The Wall Street Journal, October 12, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Justice Department's unconditional approval of AT&T Inc.'s $67 billion buyout of BellSouth Corp. drew criticism from consumer advocates and lawmakers, raising the possibility that the deal could face delays at the Federal Communications Commission.

Hours before the Justice Department's decision was announced yesterday, FCC Chairman Kevin Martin changed course and proposed limited divestitures to protect big-business users of high-speed data lines in 32 office buildings, lawyers who have seen the proposal said. The FCC was scheduled to approve the deal as early as today, but cancelled the vote last night, rescheduling it for tomorrow.

DOJ_NMG_0079487

The Justice Department approved AT&T's purchase of BellSouth without any conditions after determining that the combination isn't likely to hurt competition in the telecommunications industries. "After thoroughly investigating AT&T's proposed acquisition of BellSouth, the Antitrust Division determined that the proposed transaction is not likely to reduce competition substantially," Justice Department antitrust chief Thomas Barnett said. "The division investigated all areas in which the two companies currently compete."

The clearance triggered an outcry from smaller phone-company rivals, Democrats on Capitol Hill and the FCC as well as consumer groups. Opponents of the acquisition complained that the nation's top antitrust regulator had abdicated its responsibility to scrutinize whether the new company, which would control local phone lines from California to Florida, would be so big that it would lessen competition. AT&T also would have sole control of Cingular Wireless, the nation's largest cellular carrier by number of subscribers.

"The Justice Department has packed its bags and walked out on consumers and small businesses by refusing to impose even a single condition in the largest telecom merger the nation has ever seen," Democratic FCC Commissioner Michael Copps complained. The FCC's other Democrat, Jonathan Adelstein, agreed: "By failing to issue a complaint, consent decree, or condition, it appears [the Department of Justice] took a dive on one of the largest mergers in history just to avoid further court scrutiny."

Although Mr. Martin, a Republican, has been pushing hard to wrap up the agency's review, it isn't clear that he has the three votes necessary to approve the acquisition. Republican FCC Commissioner Robert McDowell has so far indicated that he might be recused from voting because he formerly worked for a group that opposes the transaction. In addition to Mr. Copps, Mr. Adelstein has expressed concern about approving the acquisition without conditions. That would leave Mr. Martin without a majority on the five-person commission.

AT&T, San Antonio, said it was elated with the quick Justice Department approval of the merger. "This unequivocal and unconditional approval underscores the competitive nature of our industry and the pro-competitive benefits of this merger," General Counsel James Ellis said.

The BellSouth takeover was valued at $67 billion when it was announced in March. Since then, BellSouth's stock price has risen and based on yesterday's 4 p.m. price, the deal is valued at $78.8 billion, BellSouth said. AT&T shares rose 19 cents to $32.96 in New York Stock Exchange 4 p.m. composite trading, while BellSouth shares were up 24 cents to $43.44, also on the Big Board.

--Mark H. Anderson contributed to this article.

Write to Amy Schatz at Amy.Schatz@wsj.com1 and Siobhan Hughes at siobhan.hughes@dowjones.com2

AT& T Deal Wins A Key Go-Ahead (WP)

By Alan Sipress

The Washington Post, October 12, 2006

The Justice Department yesterday endorsed AT&T Inc.'s proposed $78.5 billion purchase of BellSouth Corp., clearing the way for the Federal Communications Commission to approve as early as this week the creation of a corporate giant that would be the country's largest provider of telephone, wireless and broadband services.

But the outcome of the FCC consideration, scheduled for tomorrow morning, remains in doubt because the prospective swing vote on the five-member board has maintained since summer that he is sitting out the case to avoid a possible conflict of interest.

The merger, proposed in March, would reunite two major parts of the old AT&T telecommunications empire that was broken up by the federal government in 1984. The deal would also give AT&T complete control over Cingular Wireless, the country's largest cellular telephone provider, now owned jointly by AT&T and BellSouth.

The deal, originally valued at $67 billion, is now worth substantially more because of increases in stock prices.

While consumer advocates say the merger would lead to higher prices for a range of telecommunications services, the companies have argued it would foster greater innovation.

If the FCC's newest commissioner, Robert M. McDowell, is ultimately recused, this could leave the board split along party lines and deny the merger the majority required for approval. That would put pressure on Chairman Kevin J. Martin, a Republican, to offer some concessions on consumer protection and competition that the panel's two Democratic members have sought but he has been reluctant to make. Martin has previously urged that the deal be approved without conditions.

Though a Republican appointee, McDowell has already shown an independent streak and said he is recusing himself because he previously worked as senior vice president for Comptel, an association that has lobbied on behalf of companies competing with AT&T and BellSouth. A spokeswoman in his office said yesterday that McDowell has continued to act as if he is recused.

But the final decision on whether he will participate could rest with the FCC's general counsel, raising the prospect that McDowell could be called on to decide the matter, even though he has said he has intentionally steered clear even of reviewing written submissions in the case. McDowell has never said publicly how he would vote if forced to participate, but industry analysts speculate he would likely side with his fellow Republicans.

Martin, saying little in public about the standoff, has signaled only that it remains unresolved.

Late yesterday, the commission announced that formal consideration of the merger, originally scheduled for today, would be delayed until Friday. Though no explanation was given, sources close to the FCC said negotiations between the two sides on the commission had only begun in recent days, leaving it unprepared to take up the matter as quickly as first envisioned. The sources spoke on condition of anonymity because they are not authorized to speak publicly on the matter.

By approving the merger, a step industry analysts expected, the Justice Department gave additional ammunition to advocates of the deal. The department concluded that there are enough other corporate competitors and emerging technologies to ensure that consumers are protected, and it placed no conditions on the approval.

"After thoroughly investigating AT&T's proposed acquisition of BellSouth, the antitrust division determined that the proposed transaction is not likely to reduce competition substantially," said Assistant Attorney General Thomas O. Barnett. The ruling came after the antitrust division examined the areas in which AT&T and BellSouth now compete, including local and long-distance telephone service and Internet service for homes and businesses, he said. The impact on future competition in wireless Internet service was also considered.

Both AT&T and BellSouth hailed the ruling and said they looked forward to a swift FCC endorsement.

"This unequivocal and unconditional approval underscores the competitive nature of our industry and the pro-competitive benefits of this merger," said AT&T General Counsel James D. Ellis. "AT&T is focused on bringing more video choices and next-generation broadband services to as many consumers and possible, and our merger with BellSouth will help deliver these benefits to more consumers, more quickly."

By issuing approval without any of the conditions it imposed on prior mergers, the Justice Department made it more likely that some FCC members will try to impose restrictions, said Rebecca Arbogast, a telecommunications analyst with Stifel, Nicolaus & Co. In other recent mergers, the department called for the divestiture of special access lines -- which carry data from buildings to the phone companies -- so competitors would have the chance to handle this business.

Hours after the Justice Department ruling, Democratic Commissioner Jonathan S. Adelstein vowed to press for consumer safeguards. "Since Justice dropped the ball, it's incumbent on us to do their job as well as our own," he said.

Last year, with the FCC split evenly among Republicans and Democrats, the commission imposed modest conditions in approving a pair of high-profile mergers -- AT&T with SBC Communications Inc. and Verizon Communications Inc. with MCI Inc. Among them were requirements that the rates for special access lines be temporarily frozen, that DSL connections be sold separate from telephone service and that the companies temporarily abide by "net neutrality" principles allowing customers to use their broadband for any application they want.

Arbogast suggested the commissioners would be hard-pressed to break with this precedent in approving AT&T's purchase of BellSouth.

"The most likely outcome is that the FCC ultimately ends up imposing conditions on this merger that are similar to the conditions imposed in earlier ones," she said. "The question is how long it takes the two Democrats and the two Republicans to come to some agreement." She predicted that the two sides would work out a compromise without McDowell having to participate against his will.

DOJ_NMG_0079489

Consumer advocates, who sharply criticized the Justice Department decision, warned that AT&T's purchase of BellSouth would inflate prices while suffocating innovation by setting up a single company that dominates regional markets and faces only token opposition from potential competitors.

"Justice has thoroughly abandoned the theory of promoting maximum telecommunications competition," said Gene Kimmelman, senior vice president of the Consumers Union. Though he acknowledged that the merger would likely move ahead, he urged the FCC to require the companies to divest enough of their airwave spectrum to allow competitors to offer wireless broadband services.

BellSouth Deal Faces FCC Fight (USAT)

By Paul Davidson

USA Today, October 12, 2006

Democrats on the Federal Communications Commission said Wednesday that they would push for significant conditions on AT&T's purchase of BellSouth after the Justice Department cleared the deal with no requirements.

The FCC is scheduled to consider the $78.5 billion deal Friday, but the vote could be delayed if the agency's two Democrats and two Republicans cannot reach a consensus. Republican Chairman Kevin Martin has recommended approval of the merger with no conditions.

“The Justice Department has packed its bags and walked out on consumers and small businesses,” says FCC Democratic Commissioner Michael Copps. He added, “It's all the more important for the FCC to ensure that consumer interests have a seat at the table.”

A third Republican commissioner, Robert McDowell, has said he will recuse himself from voting because he formerly worked for a group that opposed the deal. But Martin could still ask him to vote if he deems it in the public interest to break the stalemate.

Justice antitrust chief Thomas Barnett said the deal was approved with no divestitures because it's “not likely to reduce competition substantially.” Justice has cited the emergence of cable companies' Internet-based phone services and wireless among the new low-cost rivals to the big phone companies.

But Gene Kimmelman of Consumers Union says such services have limitations, adding that AT&T and BellSouth could have competed with each other.

Justice's “rubber stamp on this merger suggests (it) has thrown in the towel on competition between the Bell phone companies,” Kimmelman says.

The merger, he says, dashes hopes that BellSouth would use spectrum it owns to offer wireless broadband services that might compete against AT&T in its region. Among other conditions, FCC Democrats could press AT&T-BellSouth to sell BellSouth's spectrum.

The FCC also could require the new company to sell or lease lines in about 30 buildings in which both AT&T and BellSouth are the only providers serving big businesses. Justice imposed a similar requirement in the SBC-AT&T and Verizon-MCI mergers because of duplicate facilities in several hundred buildings.

A federal judge is reviewing the settlements Justice reached with the companies in those mergers after suggesting the requirements did not go far enough.

FCC Democrat Jonathan Adelstein says it appears Justice did not impose such conditions on the AT&T-BellSouth merger “to avoid further court scrutiny.”

Barnett said Justice's review was based on an extensive investigation of the impact of the deal.

Justice Department Approves AT&T-BellSouth Merger Plan (AP)

By By John Dunbar, Associated Press

AP, October 12, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0079490

The Justice Department gave its unconditional approval to AT&T Inc.'s buyout of BellSouth Corp. on Wednesday, a coast-to-coast behemoth that would be the largest U.S. provider of telephone, wireless and broadband Internet services.

The decision cheered company executives but outraged consumer advocates and two members of the Federal Communications Commission. At first the FCC scheduled a vote for Thursday on whether the $78.5 billion deal should go forward, but late Wednesday the agency pulled the item from the agenda and scheduled a commission meeting for Friday for a possible vote on the deal.

The FCC did not say why it was delaying a vote. "We are committed to evaluating merger applications fairly and in a manner consistent with the public interest," agency spokesman Clyde Ensslin said in a statement. "We are continuing to work to complete our AT&T and BellSouth merger review in a timely manner."

Despite the scale of the purchase, the Justice Department found no potentially adverse effects on competition.

The decision was immediately criticized by FCC member Jonathan S. Adelstein, a Democrat who called it "a reckless abandonment of DoJ's responsibility to protect competition and consumers."

Michael Copps, the commission's other Democrat, said the "Justice Department has packed its bags and walked out on consumers and small businesses by refusing to impose even a single condition in the largest telecom merger the nation has ever seen."

If the deal wins final government approval, the merger would give San Antonio-based AT&T Inc. total control over the nation's largest cellular provider, Cingular Wireless, a joint venture of the two companies that serves 57.3 million customers.

"After thoroughly investigating AT&T's proposed acquisition of BellSouth, the antitrust division determined that the proposed transaction is not likely to reduce competition substantially," said Assistant Attorney General Thomas O. Barnett. He heads the section that examines proposed mergers.

The department's approval "underscores the competitive nature of our industry and the pro-competitive benefits of this merger," AT&T General Counsel James D. Ellis said in a statement.

"AT&T is focused on bringing more video choices and next-generation broadband services to as many consumers as possible, and our merger with BellSouth will help deliver these benefits to more consumers, more quickly," Ellis said.

BellSouth said in a statement that it looks forward to FCC approval "in the very near future."

Consumer advocates and some lawmakers claim the government is well on its way to reconstituting the old Ma Bell monopoly, which was broken up in 1984 after a lengthy court battle.

House Judiciary Committee Chairman Rep. James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis., and other members of Congress had asked that the deal be held up until a federal judge decided whether two previous telecommunications company mergers, which were challenged by the Justice Department, were in the public interest.

A message left at Sensenbrenner's office was not immediately returned on Wednesday.

When Verizon Communications Inc. bought MCI Inc. and SBC Communications Inc. bought the old incarnation of AT&T, which kept the name, the Justice Department sued to block the mergers, but entered settlement agreements with the companies the same day.

The agreements, called consent decrees, required the companies to sell off some of their assets in certain regions. A federal judge is mulling whether the decrees are in the best interest of the public.

In the AT&T-BellSouth merger, the department avoided judicial review altogether. The FCC's Adelstein said by taking that course, "it appears DoJ took a dive on one of the largest mergers in history just to avoid further court scrutiny."

A coalition of consumer groups said the approval was "a move likely to leave consumers with fewer choices and inflated prices for a host of services."

Barnett said Justice Department lawyers looked at all areas where AT&T and BellSouth currently compete, including local and long-distance phone and Internet service for residential and business customers. The department also examined the merger's impact on future competition for wireless broadband service.

He said the lawyers cited competition in the marketplace, changing regulatory rules and emerging technology in finding that the merger was unlikely to hurt consumers.

Instead, it "would likely result in cost savings and other efficiencies that should benefit consumers," Barnett said.

With the action moving to the FCC, a number of scenarios may play out. The FCC's chairman, Republican Kevin Martin, has circulated an order recommending approval. He probably will get support from commissioner Deborah Taylor Tate, also a Republican.

With Adelstein and Copps so critical of the merger, all eyes will be on Robert McDowell, the third Republican on the commission.

McDowell's last job was as vice president and assistant general counsel for a trade association that has fought legislative and regulatory battles with AT&T and other major carriers.

McDowell's office reaffirmed Wednesday that he continues to proceed under the assumption that he will not participate in the vote. McDowell could be urged to vote on the deal if he were cleared to do so by the FCC's general counsel, Sam Feder. Feder declined comment.

FCC spokesman David Fiske said he is not aware whether an opinion on McDowell's withdrawal has been requested or filed.

In addition to the merger item, the FCC also moved to Friday a vote that would begin an agency inquiry into broadband industry practices. The session is expected to deal with whether Internet service providers should be forced to provide equal treatment to all traffic on their networks, a controversial issue called "network neutrality."

Complicating matters is a planned trip by Martin to China beginning next week.

Despite the strong language from Adelstein and Copps, there may be a way to come up with conditions to win their support for the merger.

The combination of San Antonio-based AT&T and Atlanta-based BellSouth would have operations in 22 states. AT&T estimates that about 10,000 jobs would be phased out over three years.

Combined, the companies generate $117 billion in revenue and operate 68.7 million local phone lines stretching coast to coast across the southern United States and up through the Midwest. The merged company would employ 309,000 people before any job cuts.

The deal would further the reunification of the Baby Bells. The seven regional telephone operating companies and one long-distance provider were spun off from the national AT&T monopoly under a federal court order designed to introduce competition.

Including BellSouth, the new AT&T would consist of four former Baby Bells and the long-distance business, which was acquired by the company late last year. The other two companies created from Bells are Verizon Communications Inc., which dominates the eastern United States, and Qwest Communications International Inc., the phone company for most of the Rocky Mountain and Northwest regions.

AT&T shares rose 19 cents, or 0.6 percent, to close Wednesday at $32.96 on the New York Stock Exchange. BellSouth shares rose 24 cents, or 0.6 percent, to $43.44.

___

Associated Press writers Lara Jakes Jordan in Washington, Bruce Meyerson in New York and Harry Weber in Atlanta contributed to this report.

BellSouth's Final Call; AT&T Set To Take Over (AJC)

By Matt Kempner, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, October 12, 2006

The last hurdle could be cleared this week for a massive combination of AT&T and BellSouth, spelling the end of Atlanta-based BellSouth as an independent in a fast-consolidating industry.

The Federal Communications Commission was slated to vote on the deal Friday, following the U.S. Justice Department's decision Wednesday to approve the nation's biggest telecommunications combination without conditions.

Justice said the deal would not substantially reduce competition or hurt consumers, despite complaints from consumer groups.

DOJ_NMG_0079492

BellSouth could disappear as a stand-alone company and be rolled under the AT&T name with a shuffle of paperwork within hours should the FCC give its blessing. But a true melding of the businesses would be farther off, including eliminating 10,000 overlapping jobs in the coming months and changing BellSouth signs and advertising to AT&T.

Plenty of questions important to the metro Atlanta economy remain, including where the combined company will cut jobs, which of its 6.4 million square feet of office space it might vacate as it consolidates operations and how much of a role it will retain in the community.

It could take three years for the new company to smooth out its networks so that all its customers have access to identical services, said Jan Dawson, a vice president with Ovum, a Boston-based firm that consults for telecommunications companies and some of their biggest customers.

"It's going to be a long time before all the benefits of the merger really filter through to consumers and businesses," he said.

The deal also would give AT&T full ownership of Cingular Wireless, the cellular service provider it owns jointly with BellSouth.

Metro area impact

Locally, some of the job cuts will undoubtedly target certain corporate jobs here rather than blue-collar ones. The companies have said many of the reductions will come through attrition, and that such changes won't come until early next year.

AT&T has said since announcing the merger that its headquarters would stay in San Antonio, while Cingular would keep its home office in Atlanta. Atlanta will remain the hub for AT&T's Southeast regional telephone operations.

Gov. Sonny Perdue suggested in March he would consider leading a mission to Texas to possibly offer AT&T incentives to relocate the combined company's headquarters here. Atlanta Mayor Shirley Franklin said she was willing to go with the governor.

Instead, Perdue hosted a private dinner April 20 at the governor's mansion with Ed Whitacre, AT&T's chairman and chief executive, said Heather Hedrick, a Perdue spokesman.

Hedrick would not say whether Perdue offered AT&T any incentives to move here or keep operations in Georgia, but the governor believes the state and the company "enjoy a great relationship for the future," she said.

Back to the future?

Nationally, an AT&T/BellSouth combination resurrects much of Ma Bell that the Justice Department helped break apart in 1984 over antitrust concerns.

But Dawson, the industry consultant, said the competitive landscape is far different than it was 22 years ago. He cited the rise of cellphones, the Internet, aggressive cable company expansion and phone service over the Internet. "There are all kinds of other forms of competition which are opening up the markets much wider than just the established phone companies in 1984," he said.

Consumer advocates see a worrisome consolidation of telecommunications power, though. They criticized Justice officials for not limiting the risks and predicted the combination will hurt consumers.

"The Justice Department has abdicated responsibility to promote the competition it promised when it broke up AT&T 20 years ago," said Gene Kimmelman, senior vice president for Consumers Union.

"In the end, the majority of consumers will end up paying inflated prices that result when Bell companies merge and dominate local, long distance, wireless and Internet services in their territories."

EarthLink, the Atlanta-based Internet service provider, said Justice "abandoned consumers and small businesses by refusing to require even those modest protections" it put in place last year on two smaller combinations: AT&T/SBC Communications and Verizon Communications/MCI.

In a statement released Wednesday, Thomas Barnett, the assistant attorney general in charge of Justice's antitrust division, issued a statement saying, "the proposed transaction is not likely to reduce competition substantially."

"The presence of other competitors, changing regulatory requirements and the emergence of new technologies in markets for residential local and long distance service indicate that this transaction is not likely to harm consumer welfare," Justice said.

Both BellSouth and AT&T praised the decision and voiced hopes for quick approval from the FCC.

Justice is charged with looking at antitrust issues, a narrower view than the mandate before the FCC to consider public interest.

DOJ_NMG_0079493

Even critics believe the FCC will approve the AT&T/BellSouth combination. The real question is what, if any, conditions the FCC might set to ease concerns about having so much market power in the hands of one company.

Among the possibilities: requiring that consumers be allowed to buy DSL service even if they don't have phone service with the company; stiffening mandates for the company to lease some lines to local phone and data service providers; and barring AT&T from someday charging higher rates to online content providers who want particularly big pipelines to Internet users.

Republicans hold three of the five seats on the FCC and chairman Kevin Martin has circulated a plan to OK the deal without restrictions. But with expectations that one Republican will bow out to avoid a potential conflict of interest, Martin may offer conditions to placate Democrat commissioners and avoid a tie vote.

The FCC was originally expected to vote Thursday but late Wednesday announced a one-day delay, likely to allow further negotiations over the conditions.

Staff writers Walter Woods and Scott Leith contributed to this article.

AT&T-BellSouth Deal Delayed As FCC Postpones Vote (Update1) (BLOOM)

By Molly Peterson

Bloomberg, October 12, 2006

Oct. 11 (Bloomberg) -- AT&T Inc.'s $79 billion purchase of BellSouth Corp. hit a regulatory snag as the U.S. Federal Communications Commission postponed a vote on the deal scheduled for tomorrow.

The FCC will hold a hearing on the merger a day later on Oct. 13, the agency said today in an e-mailed statement.

The delay may signal Chairman Kevin Martin and fellow Republican Commissioner Deborah Tate need to make concessions to Democrat members Michael Copps and Jonathan Adelstein to get the deal approved. Both criticized today's backing of the purchase by the Justice Department. The fifth commissioner, Republican Robert McDowell, recused himself from the vote.

``We are committed to evaluating merger applications fairly and in a manner consistent with the public interest," FCC spokesman Clyde Ensslin said in the statement. ``We are continuing to work to complete our AT&T and BellSouth merger review in a timely manner."

Justice Department Clears AT&T Takeover Of BellSouth (AFP-Y)

AFP, October 12, 2006

The Justice Department approved AT&T's proposal to take over BellSouth, clearing one of the last hurdles in a deal that would create the largest US telecommunications firm.

The department's antitrust chief, Thomas Barnett, said it had concluded that the deal is "not likely to reduce competition substantially" because of emerging technologies changing the competitive landscape.

To the contrary, Barnett said the merger "would likely result in cost savings and other efficiencies that should benefit consumers."

The 67-billion-dollar merger announced earlier this year, which still needs approval by the Federal Communications Commission (FCC), would create the country's largest telecom group and put back together much of the "Ma Bell" empire broken up in the 1980s.

The combined company would serve 70 million phone customers and 10 million high-speed Internet users. It would also have about 315,000 employees -- though that number would surely fall after the merger -- and combined revenue of an estimated 121 billion dollars.

The deal would give AT&T full control of Cingular Wireless, the largest US mobile operator, which it currently owns jointly with BellSouth.

The merger has sparked criticism from consumer advocates who argue that consolidation in the telecom industry means fewer choices for most people.

Yet others point out that despite the dwindling number of telecom firms, there is increasing competition among companies that had been in cable television and other services but are now offering "bundles" that include Internet access, television and a variety of telephone options.

The planned deal comes after AT&T's recent merger with SBC Communications, which like BellSouth is another of the regional "Baby Bells" created by the breakup of the phone monopoly in the 1980s.

SBC clinched that 16-billion-dollar deal last year, but chose to adopt the storied American Telephone and Telegraph name for the newly merged company.

The merger is on the agenda of the FCC for Thursday, but members of Congress and others have urged the agency to postpone approval until all the competitive elements can be evaluated.

Several lawmakers sent letters to the FCC and to the Department of Justice urging delay on AT&T's case until a decision is returned in a federal court case that is reviewing last year's mega-mergers that combined AT&T with SBC and a separate deal that merged Verizon Communications with MCI.

Some activist groups have also sought to block the merger that they say would create the largest telecom group in the world.

"If you aren't scared about the merger of AT&T and BellSouth, you should be," says the website of the Competition Coalition, a group that includes consumer organizations.

"This merger will create the largest telecommunications company in the world and will create a nationwide monopoly, stretching from California to Florida, controlling the largest local and long distance phone company, the largest wireless company, the largest broadband company, and the largest Internet company in the nation ... Chances are, you will be at the mercy of AT&T."

Will Approved AT&T-BellSouth Deal Help Company Against Cable Providers? (AP)

By Harry R. Weber, Associated Press

AP, October 12, 2006

ATLANTA – AT&T's $78.9 billion purchase of BellSouth, approved by the Justice Department Wednesday, would better position AT&T to increase its share of big business customers by creating more of a one-stop shop for clients with far-flung operations.

But analysts question whether the deal will serve as much of a weapon in the growing battle with cable TV providers targeting consumers and small business segments. The phasing out of the BellSouth brand and the name of the two companies' wireless venture, Cingular, also poses significant challenges.

“They are going to be dominant in a certain segment, but that's not going to make up for the weakness or the competition in other segments,” said Patrick Comack, a telecom analyst in Miami.

Major corporations that are used to getting their local phone and Internet service from Atlanta-based BellSouth Corp. would get it from San Antonio-based AT&T Inc., and the company could use that leverage and the power that comes with owning the infrastructure to increase its share of big business customers.

Officials at several big businesses in BellSouth's hometown of Atlanta, including Coca-Cola, Delta and The Home Depot, either declined to comment on the pending changeover to AT&T or did not immediately return calls seeking comment.

“They will have 60 percent of the wires that go into the buildings of the Fortune 1000,” Comack said of AT&T. “They just will have so much last mile to corporate America, it's out of control. They will be overwhelmingly dominant in not just retaining but capturing more market share in the business arena.”

The consumer side is another story.

Cable companies are likely to increase their effort to siphon local and long-distance telephone customers and Internet customers away from traditional telephone companies like AT&T. The cable companies also have an advantage with such customers because of the providers' in-house television and video-on-demand offerings.

There are still opportunities for AT&T in the consumer and small business segments, however.

Rich Nespola, chief executive of consulting firm TMNG Inc., said the addition of BellSouth's local phone service area offers AT&T a big opportunity to sell advanced services to consumer and small business customers in the battle against cable players.

“It's always easier to sell to an existing customer rather than a new customer. That's right out of Marketing 101, and it still holds true. They trust you,” he said.

DOJ_NMG_0079495

Meanwhile, Atlanta-based Cingular Wireless LLC, the nation's largest cell phone provider, has spent a significant amount of money building up its brand, particularly after buying the old AT&T Wireless for $41 billion in 2004 and eliminating that brand's name. But the Cingular name will be eliminated early next year assuming the AT&T-BellSouth deal is completed. Federal Communications Commission approval of the deal, which could come as early as Thursday, is all that remains. The BellSouth name will be phased out over the next several months, spokesman Jeff Battcher said.

"There are Cingular billboards everywhere," Comack said. "And AT&T Wireless blew up and their brand got dragged through the mud. I would think if AT&T were smart, they'd call it AT&T or AT&T Mobile. That might be a decent idea. They certainly don't want to call it AT&T Wireless."

AT&T spokesman Dave Pacholczyk said only that there has been no decision on the exact name or variation of AT&T it will pick for its wireless brand. He would not discuss the impact on customers who currently call Cingular home.

"As soon as the merger closes, we'll be talking to them a lot," Pacholczyk said. He declined to say what AT&T will tell customers.

Branding decisions can be difficult after a merger, particularly if both companies' products are well established with consumers. By choosing to get rid of the BellSouth and Cingular names, in which billions of marketing dollars have been invested, AT&T is betting that there's greater long-term benefit in having one unified brand. The company, formerly known as SBC Communications, chose the very same strategy late last year when it acquired AT&T Corp., adopting the long-distance carrier's name in place of its regionally familiar SBC brand.

AT&T's approach contrasts sharply with that last year by Sprint when it acquired Nextel, renaming the company Sprint Nextel Corp. and keeping alive both cellular brands. Sprint Nextel has struggled in the aftermath of that deal, reporting a sharp earnings drop and troubles winning and keeping customers. The latest sign of those problems came Monday when former Nextel CEO Tim Donahue announced his resignation as Sprint Nextel chairman.

"They're biting the bullet and actually doing the right thing," Comack said of AT&T. "It's going to be a bundling war out there. They can't make it messy with having another brand in there. They just want to call it AT&T and say, 'You can get everything from AT&T.'"

Wednesday's anticipated Justice Department decision came just seven months after AT&T announced its intentions on March 5 to buy BellSouth. The deal, originally worth $67 billion, has climbed nearly 18 percent in value as AT&T shares have risen in that time. The shares closed at $32.96 in trading Wednesday on the New York Stock Exchange. Under the agreement, AT&T is also assuming $22 billion in BellSouth debt.

AT&T is already the largest telecommunications company in the United States, reporting $62 billion in revenue in 2005 and serving customers in Texas, California and the Midwest. BellSouth provides service to nine states in the Southeast and reported $34 billion in revenue in 2005.

Both companies say the combination would help eliminate challenges they now face in their dual management of Cingular, 60 percent of which is owned by AT&T and the rest by BellSouth.

FTC Ramps Up Actions Against Real Estate (INMAN)

Inman News, October 12, 2006

Agency to discuss 7 law enforcement actions this week

The Federal Trade Commission today announced a "real estate competition sweep" that includes seven law enforcement actions.

Jeff Schmidt, director of the FTC's Competition Bureau, will discuss the actions during a Thursday press conference, according to an announcement at the agency's Web site. The event will be held at the agency's Washington, D.C., headquarters.

The announcement does not specify what types of actions the FTC is taking. Over the past few months, several multiple listing services have announced FTC investigations over MLS restrictions on some types of property listings. And earlier this year the National Association of Realtors announced 14 separate investigations focusing on MLS rules that prevent some property listings from reaching some Web sites.

DOJ_NMG_0079496

Several MLSs have changed those policies and announced resolution with the FTC while one MLS, RealComp II Ltd. in Michigan, has announced it is prepared to fight the FTC to keep its policies in place. Also, the FTC -- sometimes acting independently and sometimes with the support of the U.S. Department of Justice -- has opposed some Realtor-backed state measures that seek to set minimum service requirements for real estate licensees.

The Justice Department is engaged in antitrust litigation against the National Association of Realtors over the trade group's policies for the online sharing and display of property listings information, and that agency has also taken action against states that impose restrictions on the ability of real estate companies to offer rebates to consumers.

Schmidt will discuss the series of FTC law enforcement actions and "put them in the context of previous real estate-related enforcement actions," according to the agency's announcement.

Steve Cook, a spokesman for NAR, today said, "We were not aware of the news conference and plan none of our own."

Most MLSs across the country are affiliated with local Realtor associations that are, in turn, affiliated with the national trade group, which has about 1.3 million members.

Inman News has reported on four MLSs that have changed their policies relating to a specific type of property listing. The New Jersey MLS, the Realtors Association of Northeast Wisconsin MLS, the Northern New England Real Estate Network and the Austin Board of Realtors have lifted restrictions on the display of "exclusive agency listings" at public property-search sites such as Realtor.com and MLS member Web sites that use a data exchange standard to display other members' property listings information.

In an exclusive agency agreement between a home seller and an agent, sellers retain the right to sell their property themselves without paying a commission if the agent is not involved in the sale. The more common listing agreement called "exclusive right to sell" provides that the listing broker is guaranteed a commission.

Realcomp II Ltd., the largest MLS in Michigan, with about 15,000 members, announced that it will fight to keep its MLS policies in place, even if it results in litigation with the FTC. Realcomp's CEO, Karen Kage, told Inman News that exclusive agency listings can facilitate the sale of a home without a Realtor and can therefore fall "outside the scope of what an MLS is."

She said the MLS is designed to "help the public but through the Realtors. An MLS's job is just to service the Realtors. That is our core function."

The Austin Board of Realtors signed an agreement with the FTC to resolve charges over its MLS policies, and the Northern New England Real Estate Network also announced that it had reached an agreement with the FTC.

Healthways To Buy Axia Health For $450M (AP-YBIZ)

AP, October 12, 2006

Healthways to Acquire Axia Health for $450 Million, Sees Deal Adding to Fiscal 2007 Earnings

NASHVILLE, Tenn. (AP) -- Healthways Inc., a provider of diabetes treatment programs for health plans and hospitals, said Wednesday it agreed to purchase Axia Health Management LLC, a provider of preventive health and wellness programs, for $450 million.

The acquisition, which is forecast to add to Healthways' financial results for fiscal 2007, is expected to close before the end of the calendar year, subject to antitrust clearance and other closing conditions.

The transaction will be financed through a combination of cash on hand and committed bank debt.

Healthways first expanded into health support services in 2005, with its acquisition of myhealthIQ, a wellness program that identifies individual health risk factors through an onsite wellness exam, including a full biometric screening with blood draw, and provides each participant with a standardized health risk score.

In addition to services for the commercial market, Axia offers Healthways new products for government and government-sponsored health plans. Axia's cornerstone product, the SilverSneakers Fitness Program, provides an approach to physical activity for nearly three million Medicare-eligible members in 42 states and is available at more than 2,100 fitness centers and class sites.

DOJ_NMG_0079497

Together, Healthways and Axia will have more than 120 unique health plan customers whose membership totals more than 165 million. The combined organization will employ approximately 3,500 people. In addition, Axia's QuitNet smoking cessation program has more than 300,000 users.

The company said Ben Lytle, CEO of Axia, will join the Healthways board upon closing. Prior to founding Axia, Lytle was CEO of Anthem, which acquired Wellpoint to become the nation's largest health plan. In addition, other key members of Axia's senior management team will also continue with Healthways.

Healthways shares fell 26 cents to close earlier at $40.55 on the Nasdaq, and were down 15 cents in aftermarket trading on the INET exchange.

Antitrust Law's Delicate Dance (WSJ)

By Nathan Koppel

The Wall Street Journal, October 12, 2006

When does an alliance that is legal cross the line to become a collusion that is illegal?

It is a standard antitrust law question that is now being asked by lawyers who follow the private-equity industry, in the wake of news that the Justice Department is pursuing an inquiry into how private-equity firms conduct their bidding for control of public companies. Antitrust cases are often tough to make. The Justice Department, for instance, battled with Microsoft Corp. for years before reaching a settlement with the software giant in 2002. On Wall Street, these cases can be even tougher, as U.S. officials have discovered more than once.

Unlike some industries dominated by one or two players, Wall Street is a highly competitive arena, says Keith Shugarman, an antitrust lawyer with Goodwin Procter LLP. Private equity represents only one pool of capital competing for company shares. "There is so much money out there that there is almost unlimited potential competition," says Steven Newborn, a partner at law firm Weil, Gotshal & Manges LLP. "There are so many alternative bidders" for attractive investment targets that it is hard to artificially depress prices, he says.

In the late 1990s, the Justice Department launched an investigation into whether Wall Street firms conspired to fix their commissions at 7% as part of their "underwriting" business -- the lucrative process of helping corporations issue new stock. The investigation followed a 1998 study by University of Florida professors Jay Ritter and Hsuan-Chi Chen, who found that many midmarket companies issuing stock in the mid-1990s paid the exact same fees to banks that underwrote the offerings and that those fees seemed to move in unison. By 2001, however, the Justice Department closed an investigation into whether the Wall Street firms had conspired to fix their commission and no charges were brought. "They were looking for a smoking gun, and they weren't able to find it," says Mr. Ritter.

In the mid-1990s, the government investigated securities firms, including Merrill Lynch & Co. and Goldman Sachs Group Inc., for allegedly conspiring to fix trading costs on Nasdaq Stock Market shares. The Justice Department reached a settlement with the securities firms prohibiting them from colluding in the future, but the firms weren't forced to pay fines and didn't admit or deny wrongdoing. (There was also private litigation and damages were paid.)

In the 1950s, U.S. officials alleged that 17 Wall Street firms monopolized the securities-underwriting business. The case was thrown out of federal court. Federal antitrust law typically involves a delicate dance of identifying when free-market arrangements hamper the market itself. Companies are allowed to band together for business purposes -- moves they ostensibly make to stay competitive. But issues arise when the agreements are seen as stifling competition.

The private-equity inquiry, run by the Justice Department's antitrust unit in New York, is preliminary and like other such matters, may eventually lead in a different direction or nowhere at all. Private-equity firms generally are pools of capital collected usually from wealthy investors and institutions, and used to bid for control of companies. People familiar with the matter say the Justice Department has asked relatively generic questions of a few private-equity firms about how they bid for control of the companies they pursue.

Regulators could have questions about whether private-equity firms' practices when they team up to make bids to take companies private cross the antitrust-law line. Such deals are known in the industry as "club deals." A legal issue would be whether, absent the creation of such teams, there would have been more competition that would have pushed the price of pursued companies higher.

DOJ_NMG_0079498

The theory is "a company's shareholders are hurt if they don't have the full panoply of competition" in corporate auctions, says Mr. Newborn, of Weil Gotshal. The Justice Department declines to comment.

Cases typically proceed in one of two fashions, attorneys say. If the government can muster actual evidence -- such as email or witness testimony -- that firms have entered an agreement to limit competition, the government can argue a "per se" violation of the Sherman Antitrust Act, meaning that no proof of harm to shareholders is necessary. "Certain agreements are so obviously harmful to the free-market system that they are automatically condemned," says Todd Henderson, a professor at the University of Chicago School of Law.

Regulators could probe whether firms colluded by agreeing not to compete on every auction: "I'll bid on this case, and you bid on the next one," says Harry First, a professor at New York University School of Law and the former lead antitrust regulator in the New York attorney general's office. "If they find that, it is per se illegal. No fancy analysis is needed."

But antitrust cases rarely work out that way. Without smoking-gun evidence, the government would have a much tougher time. It would have to show actual economic harm, a process that involves economic analysis of prices, and the players' powers in that market.

Some economists say making such a case could be difficult. Steve Kaplan, a University of Chicago economist who follows the private-equity industry, notes that private-equity firms don't have ultimate control over the value of the companies they target. "The seller doesn't have to sell," he says. "The board can always say, 'I'm not going to sell.'"

Mr. Kaplan adds that the large deals that have attracted club bids -- such as recent bidding for companies like Harrah's Entertainment Inc. or Freescale Semiconductor Inc. -- probably wouldn't have occurred without private-equity firms teaming up, because so much capital was required. In the absence of these team bids, he notes, the share prices of target companies might have been lower. In other words, teaming up helped to raise share prices, not lower them.

Transmeta Sues Intel Over Chip Patents (WSJ)

By Don Clark

The Wall Street Journal, October 12, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO -- Transmeta Corp. sued Intel Corp., alleging that some of Intel's most popular chips violate ten Transmeta patents.

The Silicon Valley company, which filed its complaint in federal court in Delaware, says Intel's Pentium III, Pentium 4, Pentium M, Core and Core 2 lines of microprocessor chips infringe patents on feature that include controlling power consumption in computers.

Without specifying dollar figures, Transmeta said it will seek triple the damages it has suffered and an injunction against sale of the Intel products, which Transmeta Chief Executive Arthur Swift estimated had accounted for more than $100 billion in cumulative revenues over the years.

An Intel spokesman declined comment until the company has had a chance to review the complaint.

Transmeta -- based, like Intel, in Santa Clara, Calif. -- was founded in 1995 to develop chips for building portable computers with features that include long battery life and small size. After failing to gain traction for its chips, the company recently shifted its business to licensing intellectual property.

Mr. Swift said Transmeta only opted to sue after extensive licensing negotiations with Intel that failed to result in an agreement. "Discussions reached a point where we felt we really had to seek a judgment in the court," he said.

Citigroup Purchase Rocks Legg Mason (WP/BLOOM)

By Sree Vidya Bhaktavatsalam

The Washington Post, October 12, 2006

Legg Mason Inc.'s stock price tumbled 17 percent, the most ever, after it said that earnings fell short of analysts' estimates for the third straight quarter since its $3.7 billion takeover of Citigroup Inc.'s fund unit.

DOJ_NMG_0079499

Legg Mason, run by chairman and chief executive Raymond A. "Chip" Mason, has been hurt by $5 billion in customer withdrawals and rising costs to sell funds since the Citigroup purchase in December. Its flagship fund, managed by William H. Miller III, is having its worst year since 1990.

"There are a lot of skeletons they are working through with the Citigroup integration," said Ryan Caldwell, an analyst at Waddell & Reed Financial Inc. of Overland Park, Kan., which owns 810,000 shares of Legg Mason. "The costs are higher than they thought, and that combined with outflows is making it exceptionally hard" to forecast earnings.

Shares of Legg Mason fell $18.16, to $87.15, the biggest drop since the Baltimore company went public in 1983. The stock price is down 36 percent since reaching $136.40 on Feb. 23, wiping out more than $6 billion in shareholder value.

The decline accelerated after Legg Mason said Tuesday that it would report profit of $138 million to $148 million (96 cents to $1.02 a share) in its fiscal second quarter, which ended Sept. 30. Analysts had estimated that the company would earn $1.16 a share, according to a survey by Thomson Financial.

Legg Mason agreed in June 2005 to swap its stock brokerage for New York-based Citigroup's fund unit, doubling its assets and putting it into the top echelon of money managers with Fidelity Investments and Vanguard Group. Investors were enthusiastic, and the stock price rose more than 50 percent by the end of the following January, a month after the acquisition was completed.

The deal, the company's biggest since Mason took over in 1962, hit turbulence in February after Legg Mason reported fiscal fourth-quarter earnings. Profits were reduced by the costs of consolidating the Citigroup unit and retaining key employees.

The company said results in the second quarter were hurt by "unanticipated" sales expenses of $12 million, which reduced earnings by 4 cents a share. The money was owed to a third-party broker for selling Citigroup funds in past quarters. Mary Athridge, a Legg Mason spokeswoman, would be more specific about the expenses.

Legg Mason is also suffering from poor investment returns by Miller's $18.7 billion Legg Mason Value Trust, its flagship equity fund. Miller's fund is at risk of trailing Standard & Poor's 500-stock index for the first time in 16 years. The fund is down 1.7 percent in 2006, compared with the S&P 500's 10 percent return, including dividends.

Miller's portfolio has been hurt by investments in Internet, health-care and home-building stocks. Four of the fund's 10-largest holdings have fallen this year, led by online retailer Amazon.com Inc., which is down 30 percent. Sprint Nextel Corp., Value Trust's largest holding as of June, is down 17 percent.

Bloomberg staff writers Danielle Kost and Matthew Keenan in Boston contributed to this report.

Firms Sweeten Offer For Harrah's, But Bid May Not Be Rich Enough (WSJ)

By Peter Sanders

The Wall Street Journal, October 12, 2006

Private-equity bidders sweetened their offer for casino operator Harrah's Entertainment Inc., but the new bid of $83.50 a share may not be rich enough to clinch a deal, said people familiar with the matter.

Earlier this week, the Las Vegas-based company's board rejected an initial $15.1 billion buyout offer from private-equity firms Apollo Management and Texas Pacific Group. The company then received an updated offer of $83.50 a share in cash, or roughly $15.5 billion, from the two firms.

People familiar with the situation and industry observers still think the offer needs to reach $85 a share or more, 28% higher than Harrah's closing price of $66.43 on the Friday before the talks were announced. Officials from Harrah's, Texas Pacific and Apollo declined to comment.

People close to the situation say the new offer provides additional value to Harrah's holders through continuing dividend payments. Under the proposed offer now being reviewed by Harrah's special committee, the world's largest casino company would pay 40-cent-a-share dividends to shareholders five times before the deal's close. Any deal would likely take at least a year to close. People familiar with the equity firms' thinking contend that the firms believe the dividends add $2 a share in value to the bid, boosting it to $85.50. But since the company would be paying the shareholders on a regular dividend schedule, some investors don't see tremendous upside.

DOJ_NMG_0079500

People close to the matter don't rule out the possibility that Apollo and Texas Pacific could soon increase the cash offer above $85 a share.

Investors were generally unenthusiastic about the increased offer, which was reported by the New York Times yesterday. Shares were down five cents to $76.34 on the New York Stock Exchange.

The initial buyout offer, disclosed by Harrah's on Oct. 2, was expected by the company. Confidentiality agreements were in place between the potential buyers and Harrah's "well before" a Sept. 15 letter was sent to state gambling regulators by a Las Vegas casino-law attorney. The attorney, Frank Schreck, said he received a waiver from Harrah's to work with the private-equity firms. A person close to the casino operator said, "There was no 'understanding' with management; the bid was unsolicited but not unwelcome."

MAN Buys At Least 5% Of Scania (WSJ)

By Jason Singer

The Wall Street Journal, October 12, 2006

Escalating the tension in an already hostile $12 billion takeover battle in the European truck industry, MAN AG of Germany tried to buy a stake of at least 5% in Scania AB of Sweden in the market, in a move that would give MAN more influence over takeover talks with Scania.

Buying through Citigroup Inc., MAN offered investors 475 Swedish kronor ($64.22) each for Scania's Class A shares. Class A shares have 10 times the voting rights of Class B shares. The price is about 6% higher than the level of MAN's cash-and-stock hostile bid for Scania launched last month. That bid is currently valued at about 448.7 Swedish kronor a share.

The move is a test by MAN to see how Scania shareholders react to an offer of a price higher than its existing takeover bid, which was rejected by Scania's board and its two main shareholders, Volkswagen AG and Swedish holding company Investor AB. The two shareholders control about two-thirds of Scania's shareholder votes.

It's also the latest of a series of moves that have pitted several of Europe's largest industrial companies against one another. MAN's bid for Scania is an effort to form the heavy-vehicle maker with the largest market share in Europe, and the world's third-largest after Volvo AB and DaimlerChrysler AG.

But in the process, the interests of Scania's corporate shareholders have clashed, creating a complex power struggle over the future of a market for commercial vehicles that is growing strongly due to increasing demand from fast-developing Eastern European economies.

If investors agree to sell their Scania shares to MAN in the latest market raid, the German company told investors it would be willing to buy more, up to as much as 16% of the company's Class A shares. The offer, made yesterday after the market closed, was left open to shareholders to consider until early this morning. It wasn't clear how many shares MAN was able to purchase yesterday, but it had achieved the minimum 5% it was seeking.

Investor explained that its rejection of the MAN bid was due to its high hopes for future Scania performance. "We estimate potential synergies in a combination of Scania and MAN to be substantially higher than the €500 million per year indicated by MAN, even when taking execution risks into consideration," Investor said.

Scania reiterated its rejection of MAN's buyout offer, adding that Volkswagen representatives on its board will continue to abstain from participating in decisions regarding MAN. Representatives of MAN couldn't be reached to comment.

MAN has already agreed to buy a 5% stake in Scania from French car maker Renault SA, announced when MAN's hostile bid for Scania was launched. If MAN's share-buying is successful, and it forges a deal with Volkswagen, the two companies could together hold more than 50% of Scania's votes.

A Volkswagen spokeswoman declined to comment.

ENVIRONMENT:

Lawyer In BP Case Ordered To Turn Over Evidence (HC)

By Anne Belli

DOJ_NMG_0079501

Houston Chronicle, October 12, 2006

Suggesting that the criminal probe into BP is gaining momentum, federal prosecutors this week issued a wide-ranging subpoena to a lawyer representing a woman whose parents died in the 2005 blast at the company's Texas City refinery, the lawyer said today.

Brent Coon of Beaumont said the U.S. attorney's office in Houston has ordered him to turn over all of the evidence he has gathered so far — dozens of depositions and hundreds of thousands of documents — in preparation for a November trial in state court.

``We have been subpoenaed to turn over all of our underlying documents," he said.

Included in those, he added, are the applications and other documents related to permits BP received from the Texas Commision on Environmental Quality to operate the equipment that ultimately exploded, killing 15 and injuring scores more.

Coon has said that those documents contain evidence that BP misled the state agency in order to win permits to operate the blowdown drum and vent stack associated with the refinery's isomerization unit.

A spokesman with the U.S. attorney's office here declined to comment, saying the agency does not confirm or deny the existence of federal probes.

``I can't comment on the purported statements of others," said John Yembrick, a spokesman for the agency.

BP spokesman Neil Chapman said the company continues to cooperate with all authorities who have been investigating the March 23, 2005, explosion.

The Justice Department began its investigation after the Occupational Safety and Health Administration in September levied a record $21.3 million fine against BP and slapped it with more than 300 violations.

Local FBI agents and investigators with the Environmental Protection Agency's environmental crimes division also are said to be heavily involved in the federal probe.

Coon represents Eva Rowe, the daughter of James and Linda Rowe, who died in the blast. Hers is the only case involving a fatality that has not settled out of court.

BP in the past 18 months has settled more than 1,000 claims against the company, Chapman said. The company has set aside $1.2 billion to pay for those claims.

Also today, Coon told state District Judge Susan Criss that BP has not turned over a critical diagram that should have been attached to one of its permit applications in 2003.

That diagram is crucial, Coon said, because BP had indicated to the TCEQ that it has installed a flare on the blowdown drum when it had not.

Federal accident investigators have said that had the equipment included a flare, the hydrocarbons that ignited and caused the fatal blast likely would have safely burned away and lives would not have been lost.

BP lawyer Jim Galbraith told Criss that BP did not have the diagram, saying: ``They have alleged we misled the state agency. We have not."

But Criss ordered the company to produce the missing diagram anyway, and to pay Coon's costs for trying to track it down.

Coon said he has spent ``hundreds of thousands of dollars" trying to obtain documents regarding BP's permiting applications.

But, more valuable than that, he said, was the judge's ruling that the jury can hold the missing document against BP at trial in November. That could be enough evidence to allow the jury to consider awarding punitive damages beyond the state-mandated cap of $750,000 plus twice actual damages, he said.

Also today, Criss ordered BP chief executive John Browne to give a deposition in the case, set to go to trial Nov. 8.

BP's Chapman said the company will appeal that ruling.

anne.belli@chron.com

BP CEO Ordered To Give Deposition (AP)

By Juan A. Lozano, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 12, 2006

BP Chief Executive Ordered to Give Deposition Regarding Plant Explosion

GALVESTON, Texas (AP) -- BP PLC's chief executive must give a sworn deposition in a lawsuit against the company brought by a woman whose parents were among 15 people killed in the 2005 Texas City refinery explosion, a judge ruled Wednesday.

State District Judge Susan Criss said John Browne must give a deposition to attorneys representing Eva Rowe, whose parents were working inside trailers that were leveled by the blast. The case, the only one involving a fatality not settled out of court, is set to go to trial Nov. 8. Rowe's attorneys are asking for $1.2 billion in damages. BP has said it has settled 950 lawsuits related to the blast.

"We want to know what (Browne) knew about budget cuts and problems in respect to process safety management," said Arturo Gonzalez, one of Rowe's attorneys.

Criss said Browne's recent media interviews and statements to BP employees indicate he has "unique and superior" knowledge about factors that could have contributed to the explosion.

"We've got statements that were beyond the company line," Criss said in reference to Browne's remarks. "I'm not convinced he doesn't want to come here and tell the world."

A deposition is a sworn statement, often videotaped, based on an extensive interview with attorneys in a case.

Company attorney Jim Galbraith argued there was no new information in Browne's recent interviews and that statements he made during town hall meetings were intended only for BP employees. Galbraith also said the request violated an agreement between the company and Rowe's attorneys in which the CEO was only to be questioned if another BP executive referred questions to Browne.

BP spokeswoman Sarah Howell said the company would appeal the ruling.

The explosion occurred when faulty sensors did not warn of gathering vapors near the isomerization unit, which boosts the level of octane in gasoline. The vapors ignited as the unit was starting up. The blast in Texas City, about 40 miles southeast of Houston, also injured 170 people.

The U.S. Chemical Safety and Hazard Investigation Board, one of several agencies investigating the blast, concluded the unit had a history of problems and was not hooked up to a flare system that burns off vapor and could have prevented or minimized the accident

Also during Wednesday's hearing, Rowe's attorneys alleged BP misled the Texas Commission on Environmental Quality by indicating in a 2003 permit renewal application that the isomerization unit had a flare system.

Brent Coon, one of Rowe's attorneys, said the application indicated the company had a diagram of the unit that showed a flare system was attached. He said BP did not turn over the diagram.

BP's attorneys said Monday that the application was mislabeled and the document with the diagram never existed. But Wednesday they told Criss they had found a draft copy of the diagram that had never been turned over to BP or the TCEQ.

"They have alleged we misled the state agency. We have not," Galbraith said. "There is evidence we never had" the diagram.

Two BP employees, Danny White and Ruben Herrera, testified Wednesday the company never tried to misrepresent the fact that the unit had a flare system. Herrera, who used to work for the TCEQ, said he never used influence with his former employer to get the permit approved.

Criss ordered BP to produce the missing diagram and pay for costs Rowe's attorneys incurred in searching for the document. Criss also issued a sanction against BP in which the jury could hold the missing document against the company.

Howell said BP would review the ruling on the missing document and decide whether to appeal.

Rowe's lawyers also said the U.S. Attorney's Office has issued them a subpoena asking for all documents gathered in their lawsuit. The Justice Department is not commenting on its investigation.

Renewable Energy Meeting Kicks Off With Ethanol Criticism (DJ)

By Maya Jackson Randall

Dow Jones Newswire, October 11, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0079503

WASHINGTON (Dow Jones)--A national renewable energy conference has just gotten underway and already one renewable fuel is being criticized.

Most speakers at the government-sponsored conference in St. Louis this week will likely have positive things to say about E-85, a biofuel made up mostly (85%) of ethanol, which can be produced from crops like corn.

Only 15% of E-85 is traditional gasoline produced from crude oil, which is why the fuel is seen as a way to help reduce U.S. oil consumption and the country's dependence on foreign energy.

But the head of large oil and natural gas industry group American Petroleum Institute, or API, criticized E-85 in a speech Wednesday morning, calling it costly and inefficient, and urged federal and state policy-makers against using mandates to promote its use.

Speaking at the St. Louis conference, co-hosted by the U.S. Department of Energy and the U.S. Department of Agriculture, API President Red Cavaney's E-85 swipes come just as federal and state lawmakers have touted the biofuel as a way to boost rural America, where corn for ethanol is largely grown.

Senate Finance Committee Chairman Richard Lugar recently suggested a need for all new cars sold in the U.S. to be be able to run on E-85. Arguing that oil companies are refusing to install E-85 pumps that will give consumers greater access to the alternative fuel, the Indiana Republican also suggested the need for legislation that would force oil firms to spend some of their profits on installing E-85 pumps in at least 25% of the nation's gasoline stations within 10 years.

Meanwhile, President George W. Bush, who is scheduled to speak at the renewable energy conference later this week, recently told the Wall Street Journal that he wants to spend the remainder of his term focusing on ways to address ethanol-related transportation issues. The president has said the U.S. is addicted to oil and that using ethanol is one way to ease that dependence.

Arguments Over Value

Cavaney painted a dismal picture of E-85, arguing that regular gasoline, which already contains up to 10% ethanol, is better for consumers than E-85.

"It seems obvious that ethanol is a better value for most consumers as a gasoline additive than as E-85," he said, arguing that ethanol prices on a volume basis have been higher than gasoline prices for the better part of the last two-and-a-half years.

Cavaney warned state lawmakers against adopting regulations that would require a set amount of ethanol to be blended in gasoline, saying E-85 has serious downsides for consumers. Because ethanol cannot be shipped by pipeline, mandates that vary by state could lead to volatile prices and make it harder for areas to get adequate motor fuel supplies during disasters or times of abnormally high demand, he said.

"A national emphasis on increasing ethanol volumes through E-85 can prove unnecessarily expensive and risky," said Cavaney. "If we are to encourage more long-term use of ethanol, we need to avoid surprising consumers with unanticipated problems."

Consumers will go farther on a gallon of regular gasoline than on a gallon of E-85, the API president said. Pointing to findings in a recent Consumer Reports article, Cavaney said cars that can run on E-85 incur a 25% to 30% fuel mileage penalty.

"Interested consumers need to be aware of these facts before they make their purchase decisions," he said. He added that vehicles that can run on E-85 comprise only 2.6% of the U.S. light-duty vehicle fleet. That number is likely to jump only to 6.5% in about two decades, he said.

Cavaney said the oil industry is not opposed to ethanol and supports the Renewable Fuels Standard that Congress passed last year. The standard requires 4 billion gallons of ethanol to be blended into gasoline in 2006 to produce a cleaner-burning fuel.

The St. Louis energy conference, "Advancing Renewable Energy: An American Rural Renaissance," which runs Wednesday and Thursday, focuses on ways to promote President Bush's renewable energy goals. The conference follows the president's State of the Union pledge to replace more than 75% of Middle East oil imports by 2025 through greater use of clean coal and hydrogen technologies, as well as ethanol, and wind and solar power.

Execs Tout Renewable Fuels At Conference (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0079504

By Cheryl Wittenauer

AP, October 12, 2006

ST. LOUIS (AP) -- A century ago, Henry Ford's Model T was the first flexible-fuel vehicle, running on gas, ethanol or both, and the automaker foretold the future when he said fuel could be gotten from fruit, weeds, sawdust or anything else that could be fermented.

The story, as told by Archer Daniels Midland's CEO Patricia Woertz, resonated with her audience at a national renewable energy conference here Wednesday.

Woertz, formerly head of refining at Chevron, now heads the Decatur, Ill.,-based agricultural company that is also the biggest ethanol producer in the U.S.

Count her among the converted.

"We believe we are just at the start of this new era of bioenergy," she said, acknowledging ADM began building toward that start 30 years ago. "We believe the market can and should grow larger."

Woertz was among dozens of speakers representing business, financing, government and research at the conference co-hosted by the U.S. departments of energy and agriculture. President Bush is scheduled to address the conference Thursday.

One speaker after another touted renewable fuels as the new frontier, a revolution in the making that will wean the U.S. from its foreign oil addiction, create a new economy for rural America, and decrease greenhouse gas emissions.

Ethanol, a clear, colorless fuel made from corn, is what most often comes to mind when considering alternative fuels.

Six years ago, 54 ethanol plants produced 2 billion gallons a year. Today, 100 plants produce 5 billion gallons a year, and 44 plants are on the way, Agriculture Secretary Mike Johanns said.

Biodiesel made from animal fat and vegetable oil also has caught on. National Biodiesel Board chief executive officer Joseph Jobe said the industry is doubling or tripling production every day. Quality fuel, that is, not French fry oil right out of the restaurant fryer, he said.

DaimlerChrysler announced Tuesday that 2007 Dodge Rams made in St. Louis will be "factory filled" with B5 biodiesel, or 5 percent biodiesel fuel, to help stimulate the market.

Jobe said his board recently launched a toll-free number truckers may call to get the name and location of the nearest biodiesel truck stop. Truckers, a "patriotic lot," also support family farms, Jobe said.

Ten biodiesel plants in 2000 have grown to 86 today, with 78 on line.

Robert Lane, chairman and chief executive officer of Deere & Co., based in Moline, Ill., said the company has formed the John Deere Wind Energy Group to help farmers harvest wind. Deere has wind energy projects in Missouri, Texas, Minnesota and is looking at other states. It provides the capital and the glue to get the projects off the ground.

"Our goal," Lane said, "is to foster competitive renewable energy businesses. The U.S. can be a leader. It has reliable wind sources, capital and entrepreneurial spirit."

Johanns said the potential for renewable fuels has never been greater and predicted the day when biomass such as wood chips, pecan shells, corn stalks, switchgrass and animal waste would replace petroleum products as America's fuel source.

"We want to buy our energy by the bushel, not the barrel," he said.

Johanns and Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman on Wednesday announced nearly $17.5 million for 17 biomass research, development and demonstration projects.

Bodman said the Energy Department sponsors research at two bioenergy research centers, which are trying to crack the technical barriers to biofuels. They are looking to convert inedible agricultural plants into ethanol and convert sunlight into fuel.

"There are lots of fresh ideas out there, and we're excited about all of them," he said.

The American Petroleum Institute's president, Red Cavaney, said it's not true that renewable fuels are a thorn in the side of the petroleum industry.

"We're experiencing demand in the global energy market," he said. "As we look forward to the next 20 to 30 years, we're going to need all the energy we can use that is economically viable. Ethanol, crude oil, biodiesel. It all has a bright future."

Talkin' Energy At The Energy Conference (SLPD)

DOJ_NMG_0079505

By Jeffrey Tomich

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, October 12, 2006

When conceived earlier this year, the goal of the first national renewable energy conference was clear: Government officials, corporate executives and investors would assemble under a single roof and discuss ways to advance development of an emerging industry.

The first day of the two-day conference in St. Louis seemed to accomplish that. Yet comments from two of the most colorful speakers also highlighted the sharp divide over E85, the corn-based gasoline substitute that proponents think could curb America's "oil addiction."

Vinod Khosla, the co-founder of Sun Microsystems Inc. who now runs a Silicon Valley-based firm that invests in renewable energy, said big oil is spending millions of dollars to spread "misinformation" about ethanol to stunt the growth of biofuels.

"Their considerable clout is directed at making sure this doesn't happen as quickly or doesn't happen at all," Khosla said later at a news conference.

Khosla is co-chairing a ballot initiative in California to establish an oil extraction tax, an effort to raise $4 billion to fund alternative energy and efficiency initiatives. The oil industry has spent $57 million to defeat it, he said.

The criticism came just minutes after Red Cavaney, head of the American Petroleum Institute , told the same audience that the oil industry "isn't opposed to ethanol" or trying to discourage its use.

"Ethanol is here to stay and it is a very important part of our gasoline supply pool," Cavaney told a packed hall at America's Center. But, "we believe in allowing market forces and consumer preferences to determine where and how ethanol is consumed."

Rushing E85 to the mass market too quickly is risky, especially for independent gas station owners faced with investing thousands of dollars to convert pumps to sell the fuel, Cavaney said. And missteps could sour consumers on ethanol in the same way that automakers soured a generation of Americans on diesel-powered cars, he said.

Cavaney warned that a patchwork of state ethanol mandates could lead to more volatility in ethanol prices and spot shortages.

Khosla, meanwhile, said he envisions a time within three years that every Wal-Mart store in the U.S. sells E85 for less than $2 a gallon.

Appropriate policy changes and signals they would send to investors, Khosla said, make it possible for the U.S. to replace all of the oil it imports for gasoline with ethanol, a move that could put a state like South Dakota on par with Iran and Saudi Arabia as a transportation fuel supplier.

Other government and industry officials, including Archer Daniels Midland Co. Chief Executive Patricia Woertz and Agriculture Secretary Mike Johanns, were less outspoken. Still, they spoke passionately about the need for renewable fuels.

Energy Secretary Samuel W. Bodman said federal funding for renewable energy research appropriated in last year's energy bill and subsidies in place to encourage ethanol production are doing what they were intended, helping attract millions of dollars in investment.

"There is no doubt that there are plenty of incentives in place right now," Bodman said in an interview with the Post-Dispatch. The secretary would like to see automakers continue to produce more cars, trucks and SUVs capable of running on E85, but said the government doesn't mandate it.

Bodman said development of so-called cellulosic ethanol -- fuel made from wood chips, corn stalks or switch grass -- is probably "several years off," and could only be viable when production costs, now about $2.20 a gallon, are cut in half to match the costs of making corn ethanol.

"The goal is to have a relatively large number of small ethanol producers operating all over the country and therefore reduce the issue of production and distribution," he said.

Big Oil Fine With Ethanol As Additive (FWST)

By Dan Piller

The Fort Worth Star-Telegram, October 12, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0079506

ST. LOUIS — Big Oil supports corn-based ethanol as a gasoline additive but opposes efforts to mandate greater use of ethanol through so-called E85 motor fuel, the head of a trade group representing major oil and gas producers said Wednesday.

"Some industry critics erroneously claim that our industry is opposed to ethanol and is doing all it can to discourage its use. Nothing is further from the truth," Red Cavaney, president of the American Petroleum Institute, told a conference on renewable fuels co-sponsored by the U.S. Agriculture and Energy departments.

But Cavaney, whose organization includes heavyweights like Exxon Mobil, Chevron and ConocoPhillips, said new fuel sources should not be pushed at the expense of others.

"We do not have the luxury of limiting ourselves to only a few sources of energy supply to the exclusion of others," he said. "Nor should our leading sources of energy, oil and natural gas be written off before we have found cost-competitive and readily available alternatives."

He reiterated figures from the Energy Information Agency that highlight America's dependence on foreign energy sources.

"Oil and natural gas will provide nearly two-thirds of U.S. energy consumption to the year 2030, including more than 90 percent of motor-fuel consumption," Cavaney said.

He said political efforts by some ethanol-producing Midwestern states to mandate use of E85, an 85 percent ethanol gasoline blend, "can prove unnecessarily expensive and risky."

He pointed to recent government reports that ethanol has only about 70 percent of the fuel power of gasoline and that relatively few U.S. motor vehicles can use E85.

"If we are to encourage more long-term use of ethanol, we need to avoid surprising consumers with unanticipated problems," Cavaney said.

Corn-based ethanol has emerged as the renewable fuel of choice this year, primarily because of a government-ordered switch away from MTBE — now discredited because of its toxicity — as an environmentally friendly extender.

Ethanol consumption will amount to about 4.6 billion gallons this year, compared with 140 billion gallons of gasoline.

But ethanol, blended mostly at 10 percent a gallon, is now part of 46 percent of all gasoline sold in the United States.

The surge in ethanol demand has led to the construction of more than 100 processing plants in Nebraska, Iowa, Illinois, Minnesota and the Dakotas. To allay fears that the rising demand for corn will put pressure on food prices, scientists are working on ways to convert so-called cellulosic biomass — primarily cornstalks and switch grass, as well as wood chips, into fuel.

"The time for renewable energy clearly has come," U.S. Agriculture Secretary Mike Johanns told the crowd gathered at the St. Louis convention center. "We are looking toward the day when the U.S. buys fuel not by the gallon but by the bushel."

Johanns said that ethanol will remain economically competitive as long as crude-oil prices stay above $30 a barrel, roughly half of where it has traded in recent weeks. He also said ethanol is profitable even without the 51-cent per gallon federal tax subsidy in place through 2010.

Johanns and U.S. Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman spoke Wednesday as part of the Bush administration's effort to associate itself with politically popular renewable fuels.

The president, who kicked off much of the interest in renewable fuels when he lambasted America's "addiction" to oil in his State of the Union address in January, will visit the two-day meeting for a luncheon speech today.

The profit potential for renewable fuels isn't lost on some of the mainstay industries in the Corn Belt. Speakers Wednesday included the chief executives of Illinois-based Archer Daniels Midland Co., a leading grain processor and ethanol producer, and of the venerable farm-implement maker Deere & Co.

"There is still a nagging fear that the current interest in renewable fuels is a product of the recent rise in the price of gasoline or just the political power of the Midwest," said Robert Lane, Deere's chief executive. "We must build sustainable, profitable businesses in renewable energy."

Archer Daniels Midland CEO Patricia Woertz said: "We must not let cynics dim our vision."

Emboldened States Take Charge Of Energy Issues (WSJ)

By Rebecca Smith

The Wall Street Journal, October 12, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0079507

State officials are asserting more control over their energy destinies, intervening to block or delay utility mergers that don't promise enough consumer benefit and challenging the electricity deregulation that has been fostered by the federal government in recent years.

In some states, these efforts could result in smaller electricity bill increases, at least in the short run. Some costs simply would be deferred to future years. The efforts also could prolong supply-and-demand imbalances and burden the nation's electricity system with different rules and market practices, making it more complicated and less efficient.

Touching on parts of the energy business once seen as beyond state reach, the heightened state activism is especially pronounced where important pocketbook or environmental issues are at stake. State officials are especially fearful of political fallout stemming from high electricity rates and disenchantment over the unmet promises of electric-industry deregulation.

"The states are the ones in charge of the process now," says Richard Kelly, chairman and chief executive of Xcel Energy Inc., a Minneapolis energy company. Mr. Kelly says his company, which owns utilities in eight states, doesn't expect to grow through utility acquisitions in part because "it's hard to conceive of a merger we can get through all eight states."

In New Jersey, state officials last month effectively blocked Chicago-based Exelon Corp.'s proposed $17.7 billion purchase of Public Service Enterprise Group Inc. amid fears the combination could increase Exelon's market power and harm New Jersey consumers. In Maryland, public opposition to a pending rate increase at Baltimore Gas & Electric has threatened to unhinge the $11 billion purchase of parent company Constellation Energy Group Inc. by FPL Group Inc. Speaking to investors recently, FPL Chairman Lewis Hay III said he has "limited patience" left and implied he may walk away from the deal.

Duke Energy Corp. acquired Cinergy Corp. after garnering approvals from five states in about five months. But "people have to earn the right to do deals," says James E. Rogers, chief executive of Duke Energy. He cautions that if a utility already is facing rising rates, "it's probably a bad time" to propose a transaction.

California, meanwhile, has methodically regained control of its energy destiny. It permits utilities to build new plants and it drastically has reduced the volume of business conducted through federally administered electricity markets. Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger signed a law in late September to cut carbon-dioxide emissions to 1990 levels by 2010, a reaction to federal inaction on that front.

Sensing the states' increased activism, federal energy officials are expressing more sensitivity to states' rights than in the past. Joseph Kelliher, chairman of the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission, says working with states "isn't just a matter of good manners but is necessary" since authority is divided between federal and state bodies. Still, he argues that there always have been federal-state dustups.

Much of the current commotion is caused by the fact wholesale electricity markets haven't developed the way people expected. Deep, liquid wholesale markets -- overseen by federal regulators -- were expected to give big suppliers good places to shop by attracting numerous power providers. Retail customers, it was thought, would buy juice from those big suppliers, bypassing their local utilities. Instead, wholesale markets contracted after 2001 and millions of consumers remained customers of their local utilities because they didn't have good alternatives.

More than 99% of residential and small-business consumers in the Boston area, for example, still get their electricity from Nstar -- the utility formerly known as Boston Edison -- because they have no other choice. Prices have risen 78% since 2002, to 11.4 cents a kilowatt hour from 6.4 cents, but the increase hasn't caused political fallout because it has been gradual.

States are left to create new ways for utilities to obtain power since many have sold their plants or transferred them to affiliates. Illinois state officials conducted their own electricity auction in early September that will result in rate increases of 22% to 55% early next year at its biggest utilities, unless increases are postponed. Elected officials now are talking about freezing electricity rates for three years at Ameren Corp.'s three utilities and Exelon's Commonwealth Edison unit in Chicago. In a reference to the 1773 Boston Tea Party, Lt. Gov. Pat Quinn, who is up for re-election with Gov. Rod Blagojevich, is urging consumers to send tea bags or email look-alikes, in effect blaming them for higher prices. The utilities have their own proposals, which would allow small increases and protect their creditworthiness.

US Pandemic Flu Plan: Hole Up At Home (AP)

By Marilynn Marchione

DOJ_NMG_0079508

AP, October 12, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO -- Could you work from home for weeks at a time? How long could you hole up without needing to go to the grocery or drugstore? Would you be willing to wear a face mask and isolate yourself from others?

Harvard researchers are surveying Americans on questions like these as the government wraps up work on a plan to use primitive infection-control measures to deal with a killer flu outbreak until drugs and vaccine become available.

The federal Centers for Disease Control and Prevention is pitching the plan at medical meetings and aims to send it out for review by the end of the year. State and local governments have asked for unusually detailed and specific advice on such matters as closing schools and canceling public events, one CDC official said.

This week, CDC awarded $5.2 million in grants related to the plan, including research on whether to recommend face masks to the public. CDC also asked the Institute of Medicine, a group of scientific advisers, to meet on these measures later this month.

"We can't afford to neglect some of the traditional approaches to contagion control because we very well may find ourselves in a situation where that's all we've got for a period of time," said CDC's quarantine chief, Dr. Marty Cetron.

However, skeptics say parts of the plan amount to wishful thinking with little evidence they would work.

"A lot of these things sound good but they lack practical application," said Michael Osterholm, a University of Minnesota health expert involved in the planning.

Advising people in big office buildings to avoid elevators and stay 6 feet away from each other is impractical, and people can't stay in their homes for weeks or months without needing insulin and other medications, he noted.

The nationwide survey by the Harvard School of Public Health is an attempt to get a handle on how Americans would follow such advice.

As for hygiene tips like sneezing into your sleeve, "we have no data that that makes any difference" in controlling a pandemic, Osterholm said.

The bird flu that has ravaged poultry in Asia and killed at least 140 people is "still smoldering" as a human threat, showing no signs yet of morphing into one that spreads easily among people, said Dr. Anthony Fauci, director of the National Institute of Allergy and Infectious Diseases.

If it does, severe travel restrictions would delay its spread in the United States by only a week or two and at extreme cost, the CDC's Dr. David Bell said at a recent meeting of public health and disease experts in San Francisco.

Thermal scanning to try to detect people with fevers during the SARS outbreak turned up no cases and caused many false alarms. But voluntary quarantine, voluntary isolation of infected people and hygiene measures like hand washing, "cough etiquette" and face masks did help and might for flu, too, Bell said.

Dr. Frederick Hayden, a University of Virginia virologist currently working on global flu planning for the World Health Organization, agreed.

"The classic public health measures did work in SARS," he said. They won't be enough to stop a flu pandemic but could prolong and spread out its impact to prevent hospitals from being swamped and running out of respirators to keep the sickest alive.

The CDC plan will list multiple scenarios for pandemics that range in severity or attack certain age groups like children or college students, and recommend corresponding control measures.

These will include voluntary isolation of sick people, voluntary quarantine for those exposed to the germ but are not ill, and protective sequestration to separate healthy people or communities from a source of infection.

"Quarantine has gotten a very bad name and for very good reason. It has been abused in the past. It works best when we obtain and maintain the public trust," Bell said.

However, Osterholm said there's not enough science to recommend some measures, like "keep your distance" campaigns. Scientists know flu spreads through hand contact and big droplets when people cough or sneeze, but they don't know how far tiny particles remain in the air, or how important that is for spreading the germ.

In fact, experts know surprisingly little about what enables a flu germ to spread.

DOJ_NMG_0079509

Health officials need to give advice but should be honest about the limits of what is known "and not oversell it, which there is a tendency to do in times of crisis," Osterholm said.

If that happens, "we will lose credibility quickly," he said.

Mulch Madness (opinion) (NYT)

By Steve Fleischli

The New York Times, October 12, 2006

TOWERING cypress once covered much of southern Louisiana — 1,000-year-old trees darkened ancient, moss-laden, water-saturated forests. These wetlands not only gave the bayou its flavor, its culture and its mystery, they also acted as critical natural "speed bumps" for major storms.

It's been estimated that every 2.7 square miles of wetlands reduces storm surge by a foot, and yet over the last century Louisiana has stripped away 1,900 square miles of swamp, an area the size of Delaware. Evidence shows that such improper land management, reducing the cypress-tupelo swamps to a small fraction of their original grandeur, worsened flooding in New Orleans during Hurricanes Katrina and Rita.

Yet at a time when the nation should be investing billions to restore the Gulf Coast's wetlands for protection against future storms, these cypress swamps continue to face many challenges, including development, saltwater flowing in and rising water levels. The most dangerous threat of all, however, may be garden mulch — the stuff that gardeners usually use to protect their plants.

As they exhaust the cypress forests along Florida's coast, mulch companies are moving into Louisiana with shady operators among them grinding up entire cypress forests, 70 percent to 80 percent of which will never grow back. This is hurricane protection lost forever — habitat and flood control converted to quick cash, one bag of mulch at a time.

The Environmental Protection Agency has finally begun to require permits for logging in southern Louisiana, which has still not stopped the wholesale clear-cutting of cypress forests.

The situation was further exacerbated by a Supreme Court ruling this summer ordering government agencies and lower courts to undertake a painstaking, case-by-case analysis of waterways, with only those wetlands determined to be of special significance afforded federal protection. It's a move that could effectively stymie preservation efforts.

So in the meantime, the safety of our nation's already depleted wetlands comes down to sellers and consumers of cypress mulch.

Big mulch retailers — like Lowe's, Home Depot and Wal-Mart — have been slow to take real action about the mulch in their stores. But all three companies should put into place formal, meaningful policies that guarantee their cypress mulch comes from sustainable sources rather than the imperiled swamps of the Gulf Coast. Many retailers have done so with lumber and they can do it for cypress mulch.

Until then, consumers would do best to avoid cypress mulch altogether, switching instead to mulches made from pine bark, pine needles or straw. These work just as well and do not have the same environmental impact.

Already, several Florida municipalities, after witnessing the destruction of their wetlands, have banned the use of cypress mulches. In Louisiana, Gov. Kathleen Blanco is exploring her authority to carry out a broader moratorium.

Consumers need to remember that their mulch purchases may be leaving New Orleans and other coastal communities vulnerable. Every bag of cypress mulch for you could mean another sandbag for someone else.

Maryland's Environment (WP)

The Washington Post, October 12, 2006

AS A CANDIDATE four years ago, Maryland Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. made no bones about his pro-business tilt, which led plenty of environmentalists to fear the worst from his Republican administration. In fact Mr. Ehrlich's record on the environment is a mixed bag -- good on the Chesapeake Bay, poor on land conservation and so-so on air pollution.

Mr. Ehrlich deserves unalloyed credit for the creative Chesapeake Bay Restoration Act of 2004. The law -- by means of a $30 annual fee charged to households for sewer and septic use -- finances sewage plant upgrades to dramatically reduce harmful nutrients discharged into waterways. It's smart policy that over time should sharply reduce nitrogen pollution in the bay.

DOJ_NMG_0079510

Mr. Ehrlich's record on land conservation is more checkered. For decades Maryland has set aside a dedicated funding source (a portion of the real estate transfer tax) to pay for the purchase of pristine tracts. From the outset, Mr. Ehrlich was unenthusiastic. Faced with a daunting budget shortfall, he raided the state's land-buying kitty, in effect converting money set aside for conservation into general fund revenue. Previous governors had done the same, but not to this extent. Mr. Ehrlich added to the impression that he cared little for land conservation with his abortive attempt two years ago to sell off more than 800 acres of forested, state-owned land to a politically well-connected developer in St. Mary's County; media exposure killed that deal. He has pledged to keep his hands off the land conservation fund if he is reelected.

On air pollution, Maryland is probably better off today than when the governor took office. This year he signed the Healthy Air Act, which will force the state's largest coal-fired power plants to cut toxic emissions. But Mr. Ehrlich had to be dragged into doing the right thing, having helped kill a similar measure in the legislature last year. In the end, it was probably the exigencies of electoral politics and federal standards that led him to sign the 2006 version of the bill -- especially after lawmakers defied him by adding modest limits on carbon dioxide emissions, which scientists consider a major cause of global warming and rising sea levels.

Mr. Ehrlich's Democratic rival, Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley, must be judged more by his words than his deeds, having faced a comparatively narrow range of environmental issues. He says he would fully fund land conservation, commit himself to the clean air bill signed by Mr. Ehrlich and strictly monitor progress in cleaning up the Chesapeake Bay. He seems less ambivalent about protecting the state's natural resources than Mr. Ehrlich does, but there's not much of a track record by which to predict his actions in the governor's office.

Foolish Vaccine Exemptions (NYT)

The New York Times, October 12, 2006

States that make it easy for parents to opt out of vaccinating their children are suffering increased disease rates as a consequence, according to an article published yesterday in The Journal of the American Medical Association. The findings should be a warning to all parents and state officials who think they can let their guards down on immunizations that are needed to protect both the children and the communities in which they live.

We saw what happened in Indiana last year when measles broke out among children who had been schooled at home and thus avoided the compulsory shots required of those who attend public schools. At least 34 people became ill, of whom three were hospitalized, one with life-threatening complications. Their families had succumbed to fears that the vaccine was dangerous, forgetting that the disease itself was the real danger.

Now the new article by researchers at Johns Hopkins University, the University of Florida and the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention has taken a broad look at the rates of whooping cough in the 48 states that allow people to be exempted from required shots for various nonmedical reasons. All 48 of the states allow exemptions based on religious objections, but 19 of them also allow exemptions based on philosophical or other personal beliefs. Some states make it easy for parents to claim an exemption by simply signing a prewritten statement on the school immunization form. Others make it harder by requiring a signature from a local health official, a personally written letter, notarization or annual renewal.

Sadly, states that readily grant exemptions or allow personal belief exemptions have about 50 percent higher rates of whooping cough, or pertussis, compared with stricter states, after adjusting for demographics. This is disturbing given that pertussis, which can cause severe illness and death in young children, has been on the rise in recent decades.

The pendulum has swung too far toward letting parents opt out. States need to work harder at educating parents about the value of vaccination and should get tougher in granting exemptions.

Bad Salad (WP)

The Washington Post, October 12, 2006

LAST MONTH'S spinach scare has been followed by a string of recalls and warnings about produce contaminated with E. coli bacteria. Just last week, a lettuce company announced a recall of its product after it found high levels of E. coli in irrigation water. Yet government regulators and the companies that grew the produce still don't know how the bacteria got to the crops. In fact, according to the Food and Drug Administration, no one has pinpointed a source for any of the 20 or so known cases of E. coli contamination in produce since 1995.

DOJ_NMG_0079511

About half of those cases, including the latest spinach scare, were traced to California's Salinas Valley. But Caroline Smith DeWaal, director of food safety at the Center for Science in the Public Interest, says investigators have no fewer than three theories about where the E. coli came from: manure used during planting, floodwater contaminated with waste from livestock or aquifers containing treated sewage.

If regulators don't know how the E. coli contamination occurred, what can they do to make salad safe? First, Congress should provide money to increase inspection staffing at the FDA, which regulates spinach, lettuce and other produce but inspects farms and packaging plants infrequently. Next, lawmakers should require the FDA and other agencies responsible for food safety to institute a tracing system for food produced in the United States -- so that containing the next outbreak will take a few days, not two weeks. Congress should also consider giving the FDA the power to issue mandatory recalls of tainted produce, which would introduce a more powerful incentive for growers and packers to conform to safety standards.

Sen. Richard Durbin (D-Ill.) and Rep. Rosa L. DeLauro (D-Conn.) have introduced legislation to require food producers to code their products for tracing purposes before sending them to market. The bill also calls for the creation of a federal agency with responsibility for monitoring the safety of all foods, a non-starter in the current Congress and a less valuable reform than other, more modest measures. For now, Congress should focus on giving existing agencies the resources and authority they need.

Doubting Inhofe (NYT)

The New York Times, October 12, 2006

In a recent speech in the Senate, James Inhofe of Oklahoma called himself "the senator who has spent more time educating about the actual facts about global warming." Too bad he is not the senator who has spent more time educating himself.

His speech, one in a series on global warming, was a brisk survey of the way the news media have covered climatic predictions over the past century. Cooling, warming — we never get it right. Naturally, Mr. Inhofe dismisses what he calls media "hysteria," which is also a way of dismissing not just Al Gore but the consensus among mainstream scientists and the governments of nearly every industrialized nation concerning manmade climate change.

Mr. Inhofe is particularly hard on James Hansen, whom he calls a "NASA scientist and alarmist." Mr. Hansen is a timely target, since he is co-author of a new climatological report in The Proceedings of the National Academy of Sciences. The report concludes that because of rapid warming in the past 30 years, the earth is approaching and will soon surpass the warmest temperatures in the past 12,000 years — since the end of the last ice age, in other words. And, as the study notes, recent warming "has brought global temperature to a level within about one degree Celsius of the maximum temperature of the past million years." The shift in temperature isn't uniform. Higher latitudes are warming faster, as are the Indian and western Pacific Oceans.

We do not expect Mr. Inhofe to see the light — or feel the heat — any time soon. He and his staff are serious collectors of opposition research. But the essence of his strategy is to seize upon a mistaken or overblown story to try to undermine the broad consensus. If that fails, he can always question his opponents' politics and motives, as with his insinuations that environmentalists dreamed the whole thing up to scare people and raise money.

Mr. Inhofe has buttressed himself with a small jury of scientists who argue that climate change is only natural. But he has really buttressed himself with the will to disbelieve. He accuses scientists and the media of hysteria. But if there is such a thing as a hysteria of doubt, then Mr. Inhofe is its master.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Ex-ATF Chief Had Staff Give Homework Aid (AP-Y)

By Lara Jakes Jordan

AP-Yahoo, October 12, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0079512

The man who recently departed as director of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives ordered his staff to help with his nephew's high school homework, wasting the agency's time and violating ethics rules, an inquiry found Wednesday.

The nephew's project — a documentary about the ATF that took 10 months to complete — was one of a half-dozen examples of lapses in judgment Carl J. Truscott committed before he resigned in August, says the report by Justice Department Inspector General Glenn A. Fine.

The report found that only the high school project demonstrated mismanagement by Truscott, whose employees accused him of wasting federal funds, taking costly trips and creating a hostile work environment.

Still, investigators described themselves as troubled by Truscott's leadership, hiring practices and financial decisions, including his plan to spend $100,000 on gym equipment for the ATF's new headquarters.

The most damning conclusions were saved for the homework episode.

"Significant ATF resources were used to assist Truscott's nephew on a high school project," the report found. "By directing and authorizing the use of ATF resources in his nephew's high school class project, we believe that Truscott violated several ethical regulations."

An estimated 20 ATF employees were pulled in to help with the documentary, spending dozens of hours on research, pulling film footage from the agency's library and setting up interviews with Truscott and other officials in Washington and Philadelphia.

The nephew received an 'A' on the project, the report noted.

Moreover, the report found, Truscott "failed to fully accept responsibility for the project by minimizing the extent of ATF resources that were committed to it" and tried to justify his staff's help as a form of community outreach.

Truscott could not be reached for comment Wednesday. But in a Sept. 25 letter to Fine, responding to a draft copy of the report, Truscott acknowledged that he should have placed appropriate limits on the resources that could be used in support of the project."

In his letter, Truscott also lashed back at the critical report, which he called negative in tone and based on allegations from anonymous sources who second-guessed his judgment.

Fine opened the investigation after he and Special Counsel Scott J. Bloch received an anonymous letter dated Jan. 20, 2006.

It contended that Truscott had horribly mismanaged federal dollars in a variety of ways, including demanding a larger security detail than needed, making unnecessary upgrades to the new ATF headquarters building project, and taking expensive trips to London, New York City, Boston, and Ottawa on the agency's bill. The letter also complained that Truscott created a hostile work environment by directing two staffers to serve lunch to him and his guests.

Fine's investigation substantiated the charges and chided Truscott for poor judgment, but it added, "We did not find that these financial decisions constituted misconduct."

A person close to the investigation, who spoke on condition of anonymity, said Wednesday the allegations may have been made by Truscott's top deputies, who were facing reassignment as part of an agency reorganization.

E-mails dated Jan. 15 — five days before the anonymous letter was sent to Fine — show Truscott telling ATF Deputy Director Edgar Domenech the changes would come "as early as this week."

Fine received another anonymous letter Sept. 22 from a group that described itself as concerned ATF employees. The group argued that three ATF assistant directors also were mismanaging agency funds by commuting to work in government-owned cars, promoting relatives and arranging weeklong conferences for employees at resorts like the Hard Rock Casino in Los Vegas.

It was not immediately clear whether Fine's office was investigating the newest allegations.

Audit Critical Of Former ATF Director's Expenditures (USAT)

By Kevin Johnson

USA Today, October 12, 2006

WASHINGTON — As director of the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms and Explosives, Carl Truscott ordered lavish upgrades to the agency's new headquarters and had about 20 bureau employees help his nephew complete a high school video, according to a Justice Department audit released Wednesday.

The 150-page review by the department's Office of Inspector General offered a critical account of Truscott's two-year tenure, which ended when he resigned in August amid questions about his spending of agency funds. The report concluded that the former director contributed to a "drain" of manpower and funds at ATF.

It noted that Truscott, a former assistant director of the U.S. Secret Service, often traveled with an entourage that included an excessive number of ATF employees and a personal medic.

The report found Truscott ordered extravagant woodwork and other "unnecessary amenities" for the director's suite in the ATF's new building in Northeast Washington, which is still under construction and several million dollars over its $120 million budget.

The report also said the 10-month video project that ATF workers helped Truscott's nephew complete required "substantial employee time." The report concluded that by authorizing the use of ATF resources for the video, Truscott violated "various ethics regulations." The nephew received an "A" on the project.

Auditors also indicated that Truscott would not take responsibility for his budget decisions.

"From relatively minor issues, such as decisions on how to furnish the director's suite in the new headquarters building, to major policy directives … Truscott attempted to deflect responsibility to his subordinates, misrepresented the amount of involvement he had in the actions or otherwise sought to distance himself from his own decisions," the report said.

"We found several instances where Truscott's statements to us about his conduct were contradicted by numerous other witnesses, and in some instances, by documents as well."

In a strongly worded rebuttal, Truscott said the inspector general was unable to substantiate "a single allegation relating to administrative misconduct."

He rejected the findings as "negative in tone" and said the report "impugns my character and integrity without basis."

The review of Truscott was triggered by allegations contained in an anonymous letter to the Justice Department's inspector general that was dated Jan. 20.

According to Wednesday's report, the complaint alleged that the director had participated in "egregious acts of gross mismanagement of public funds and failures of leadership."

Truscott dismissed the allegations as accusations from unidentified sources who "likely were resistant to my status as an outsider from another rival federal law enforcement agency and my efforts at necessary change."

Wednesday's report said that auditors had "substantiated various allegations" raised in the letter.

It said that although Truscott had "exercised poor fiscal judgment in many cases," his financial decisions did not amount to official misconduct.

Report Criticizes Ex-ATF Chief (WP)

By Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, October 12, 2006

The former director of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives violated ethics rules by requiring 20 employees to help his teenage nephew prepare a high school video project, part of a wide-ranging pattern of questionable expenditures on a new ATF headquarters, personal security and other items, according to a report issued yesterday.

Carl J. Truscott, who previously served as head of President Bush's security detail at the Secret Service, also took several trips with excessive numbers of ATF agents, including a $37,000 journey to London in September 2005 with eight other employees, according to the report.

The report by Justice Department Inspector General Glenn A. Fine also finds fault with Truscott's treatment of some female employees, saying that he ordered two female administrative staff members to prepare meals for guests on several occasions. One of the employees was allegedly required to announce, "Lunch is served."

DOJ_NMG_0079514

These and other findings follow Truscott's abrupt resignation in August amid growing questions about his conduct. The Washington Post reported in February that Truscott had allegedly authorized or proposed hundreds of thousands of dollars' worth of unnecessary plan changes and upgrades to ATF's new 438,000-square-foot headquarters, which is behind schedule and millions of dollars over budget.

Fine's 157-page report confirms these allegations and many more, concluding that Truscott frequently broke regulations or exercised poor judgment in making decisions that had a serious impact on the ATF's operational budget when the agency was cutting back on vehicle maintenance, bulletproof vests and other basics.

The report also says that Justice investigators were "troubled by Truscott's lack of acceptance of responsibility" for his actions and their repercussions.

"From relatively minor issues, such as decisions on how to furnish the Director's Suite in the new Headquarters building, to major policy directives, such as how many new employees to hire, Truscott attempted to deflect responsibility to his subordinates, misrepresented the amount of involvement he had in the actions, or otherwise sought to distance himself from his own decisions," the report says. "We found several instances where Truscott's statements to us about his conduct were contradicted by numerous other witnesses, and in some instances, by documents as well."

Truscott said in a Sept. 25 letter in response to the findings that the report "is negative in tone" and "impugns my character and integrity without basis."

"Your Draft Report also fails to put the allegations made into context, to make mention of the significant progress ATF made during my stewardship and under difficult circumstances, or balance the allegations made against my unblemished professional career," Truscott said.

He said it was important to be involved in the details of the new headquarters to ensure that the building was designed and constructed properly. Truscott conceded that he should have limited the assistance given to his nephew.

Truscott's Washington attorney, Sheldon Krantz, was traveling outside the country yesterday and could not be reached to comment.

Truscott was briefly replaced by the ATF's career deputy director, Edgar A. Domenech, who reversed a decision to include a costly engraved quotation from Bush's post-9/11 speech to Congress at the new headquarters entrance. U.S. Attorney Michael J. Sullivan of Boston has since been named acting head of the ATF; no permanent replacement has been nominated.

The ATF building, under construction in Northeast Washington, is at least $19 million over its original $120 million budget and its opening has been delayed until next year.

Truscott was particularly fixated on adding "unnecessary amenities" to the director's suite and the building's gymnasium, the inspector general's report said, including millwork estimated at $283,000. Agency e-mails show that Truscott requested for his office a 42-inch flat-screen television set that could be hidden when not in use. He wanted his personal bathroom to include a "[t]elephone, TV flat panel and radio speakers to listen/view news," a quartzite tile floor to match the floor in the building atrium, a bench with a water-resistant wood seat, a tile wall "in horizontal straight stacked layout vs brick," and sconces.

Truscott also suggested buying $100,000 in new equipment for the building's gym, and pushed to build a $156,000 garage to house a single truck owned by the ATF's National Response Team at Fort A.P. Hill.

"Truscott devoted an excessive amount of time to the redesign and upgrading of his suite and the gym, immersing himself in details at a level that we would not expect of the Director of a major law enforcement agency," the report said.

Furthermore, after being warned by congressional staff members to stop spending operational money on the building project, other ATF managers took the lead in scaling back many of the changes Truscott ordered, the report says. "Without those modifications Truscott's design changes would have had a substantially more severe impact on ATF's operational budget," the report says.

Some of Fine's harshest conclusions come in connection with an ATF school documentary by Truscott's nephew, who lives in the Philadelphia area and is described by his uncle as "a young man who is passionate about everything he does -- particularly as it related to his personal interests of videography and his career aspirations of following in my footsteps as a career public servant in the field of law enforcement."

The report said that over 10 months, Truscott's nephew peppered ATF employees in Philadelphia and Washington with e-mails and time-consuming requests, obtaining copies of stock ATF video footage, interviewing ATF officials -- including his uncle -- and using agency video equipment. "Significant ATF resources were used to assist Truscott's nephew on a high school project," the report says.

The nephew submitted his project to his teacher in April 2005, and included the credit, "Thank you for giving me this amazing opportunity Uncle Carl."

The report says he received an A.

Ex-ATF Director Blamed For Unnecessary Upgrades (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, October 12, 2006

The former head of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives was responsible for costly design changes at the ATF's new Washington headquarters and ordered hundreds of thousands of dollars in unnecessary upgrades to his personal suite, a report said yesterday.

The Justice Department's Office of Inspector General said Carl J. Truscott, who resigned in August, "encouraged and approved" changes at the Northeast Washington headquarters that were "related more to appearance ... than to functionality" and proposed structural changes to the gym that included the purchase of $100,000 in new equipment.

The report said Mr. Truscott immersed himself "in details at a level that we would not expect of the director of a major law enforcement agency" shortly after his arrival at the agency in 2004 -- after construction had begun.

It said senior ATF managers took the lead in scaling back the project and canceling many upgrades requested or authorized by Mr. Truscott.

Inspector General Glenn A. Fine said investigators identified several "overarching concerns" with respect to Mr. Truscott's leadership and management, and said he "attempted to deflect responsibility to his subordinates, misrepresented the amount of involvement he had in the actions, or otherwise sought to distance himself from his own decisions."

Mr. Truscott, in a letter to Mr. Fine, said investigators found no evidence substantiating "a single allegation relating to administrative misconduct" but released a report that was negative in tone and impugned his character and integrity.

He said the report "second-guesses my professional judgment, discretionary decisions and management style based upon criticisms from unidentified sources."

"I believe strongly in the inspector general concept, but inspectors general, given their awesome powers, have an obligation to be impartial and fair, to, make judgments based upon legal norms and a careful review of the facts, and to operate within their statutory mandates," he said. "Nothing in the Inspector General Act gives you the license to second-guess professional discretionary judgments."

The report also questioned:

•Mr. Truscott's hiring policy that resulted in 950 new agents and other personnel but contributed to a $21 million decrease in the agency's operating budget. The report said the policy went forward despite repeated warnings by senior officials and was a major reason ATF could not buy necessary investigative equipment, including bulletproof vests for its agents.

•The number of ATF employees Mr. Truscott took with him on trips, including a September 2005 visit in London with members of London's Metropolitan Police Service. The report said eight ATF officials accompanied Mr. Truscott, costing the agency $37,000, including four security personnel, although London police had provided protection for him and the meeting place was secure.

•Mr. Truscott's order to ATF employees to assist his nephew in making a video for a high school project. The report said Mr. Truscott improperly allowed government property and official time of ATF personnel to be used in connection with the project.

•An order by Mr. Truscott to two female administrative staffers to assist in preparing for and serving lunches to him and his guests -- telling them how he wanted the meals prepared and served. It said ATF employees confirmed that on at least one occasion, Mr. Truscott directed one of the staff members to announce, "Lunch is served."

The ATF headquarters building had been budgeted in 2004 at $119.7 million, but is expected to cost more than $140 million when it is completed this year.

Federal Cases Land Four In Jail _ Foil Murder Plot (AP)

AP, October 12, 2006

NEW ORLEANS -- Federal and St. John the Baptist Parish law officers interrupted an investigation of a drug network to arrest two men they learned were planning a double murder.

Louis Johnson, 27, of Edgard and Trevor Jeffery, 31, of Vacherie, were charged with possession and intent to distribute crack cocaine and powdered cocaine worth more than $150,000.

At a news conference Wednesday, federal authorities said agents had tapped the telephones of Johnson and Jeffery, identified as high ranking members of a drug network operating between New Orleans and Baton Rouge. One of the conversations involved the planning of the kidnapping and murder of two men they believed had robbed them. Because full details of the plan, including the identities of the men, were not known, officials said they moved quickly to get arrest warrants.

Because the investigation is continuing, agents could not discuss the drug network, said William J. Renton Jr., of the Drug Enforcement Administration.

Johnson and Jeffery will probably face other charges, U.S. Attorney Jim Letten said.

In another case two New Orleans men plead guilty to drug and gun charges.

Matthew L. Carter and Darryl Cavalier were arrested by Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives agents and New Orleans police working under the Project Safe Neighborhood.

They were prosecuted on federal charges which results in serving longer sentences, Letten said.

"Federal sentences are hard time," Letten said. "There's no early release."

The pair face a minimum of five years in prison and a maximum of 40 years, plus fines.

Arrests Foil Murder Plot, Feds Say (NOTP)

By Susan Finch, Staff Writer

New Orleans Times-Picayune, October 12, 2006

Wiretap heard River Parishes pair planning to kidnap, kill enemies

Two River Parishes men, under federal investigation since December as suspected cocaine dealers, were arrested over the weekend after investigators monitoring their phone conversations heard them making plans to kidnap and murder two men they thought robbed them of drug profits in Baton Rouge last week.

U.S. Attorney Jim Letten said Wednesday that prosecutors moved quickly in the middle of the night to get arrest warrants for Louis Johnson, 27, of Edgard, and Trevor Jeffery, 31, of Vacherie, in order to prevent the murders. The men were arrested early Saturday morning.

Authorities say both men were "high-ranking" members of a drug organization that distributed drugs between New Orleans and Baton Rouge.

A search of their residences turned up firearms and more than 1.5 kilograms of cocaine powder and crack cocaine. They are both charged with conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute both forms of the drug.

Authorities were tightlipped about most aspects of the case, including whether there are plans to charge the two men with planning a kidnapping and murder.

Both men are being held without bond in Orleans Parish Prison and are due before a federal magistrate today to decide whether they will be allowed bail. Prosecutors say they will ask that bail be denied on grounds that the men are a danger to the community.

Authorities said the information that launched the investigation came from slain St. John the Baptist Parish narcotics investigator Capt. Octavio "Ox" Gonzalez.

Gonzalez, a 14-year veteran of the Sheriff's Office who headed the sheriff's narcotics division, was shot and killed in June. Authorities say he was lured from his unmarked vehicle by a woman pretending to be a stranded motorist and was shot from behind by her accomplice. The couple then stole his vehicle, authorities say.

William Renton, special agent in charge of the Drug Enforcement Administration's New Orleans field office, said the current case is "special" because of Gonzalez's role.

"This case was initiated by him; he provided the first information . . . This is probably the last case we'll be able to say we worked with officer Gonzalez."

Renton said the investigation of Johnson's cocaine network is continuing.

Maj. Mike Tregre, spokesman for the St. John the Baptist Parish Sheriff's Office, said Johnson recently served time in jail, but would not offer specifics. He said additional details about the investigation would be released today by St. John Sheriff Wayne Jones. Investigators from the St. John sheriff's narcotics office assisted DEA agents with the arrests, he said.

Federal authorities say they had been investigating Johnson and his cocaine distribution organization since December 2005.

During the investigation, in which agents listened to wiretapped conversations of Johnson and Jeffery, they discovered that the two had been robbed during a drug transaction involving four kilograms of cocaine in Baton Rouge on Oct. 4, authorities said.

Shortly after, agents overheard the two making plans to kidnap and murder the two men they believed had robbed them.

Warrants were obtained Friday and served early Saturday morning, authorities said.

In a search of Johnson's Edgard home, authorities say agents recovered a .45-caliber Highpoint pistol, an AK-47 assault rifle, 1 1/2 kilograms of cocaine hydrochloride, about 300 grams of crack and $18,210 in cash.

From Jeffery's Vacherie home, authorities say they recovered 133 grams of crack, $1,300 in cash, a Smith and Wesson 9 mm semiautomatic handgun, scales, bags and other material used for repackaging drugs.

Prosecutors say they will ask a federal grand jury to return indictments against both men.

Hearing Set On Suit Over Plants Destroyed As Marijuana (AP)

AP, October 12, 2006

GULFPORT — A federal court in New Orleans will hear arguments next month in a property owner's appeal of the dismissal of his lawsuit against Harrison County Sheriff George H. Payne Jr.

U.S. District Judge Louis Guirola Jr. in May 2005 dismissed Marion Waltman's civil lawsuit against Payne. Waltman had claimed the sheriff violated his rights by destroying more than 500 kenaf plants grown as deer food.

Payne said it was an honest mistake when he and other law officers destroyed what they thought were marijuana plants.

Waltman appealed Guirola's ruling to the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, which has set arguments for Nov. 7.

Waltman sought $225,000 in damages from the Sept. 8, 2003, raid on land leased for the Boarhog Hunting Club. Waltman, who had planted the kenaf, claimed he was watching a television news report when he saw inmate workers chopping down plants and heard the sheriff say the plants appeared to be marijuana.

Guirola determined that Payne was acting within his official capacity and within the scope of discretionary authority. Qualified immunity shields Payne from liability because his conduct was "objectively reasonable," the judge said.

Court records show an informant reported the crop as marijuana to state narcotics agents and U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration officers. The plants were scattered among other plants, a technique common among marijuana growers, authorities said.

A field test on a sample plant did not identify it as marijuana. Payne ordered the plants seized and sent samples to the state Crime Lab.

Africans grew kenaf as early as 6000 B.C., and within the last century it has been grown in India, Asia, Africa, the Near East and Latin America. U.S. farmers devoted about 12,000 acres to kenaf in recent years, mostly in Texas, Mississippi and Georgia.

Kenaf comes in two varieties: One with leaves that resemble marijuana, the other with heart-shaped leaves similar to the hibiscus plant, a kenaf cousin.

Waltman said the kenaf plant has seven leaves at the top and okra-looking leaves at the bottom. He said marijuana has only five leaves.

DOJ_NMG_0079518

Kenaf stalks, which reach heights of 12 to 14 feet, have two types of fiber. The long, stringy outer fiber can be twisted into cords and ropes. The shorter inner fibers can be used to make paper, or blended with plastic to make molded or extruded products.

Inside The Beltway (WT)

By John McCaslin

The Washington Times, October 12, 2006

Second fiddle

"I know she was your first choice for this fundraiser."

--President Bush, addressing a Mac Collins for Congress reception this week in Macon, Ga., referring to the always-popular first lady Laura Bush, who unfortunately had a previous commitment.

Still had enough?

Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean is all but unfazed by the dismal primary voting turnout for the otherwise vital midterm elections, continuing to insist that "people have had enough."

"We're poised to win historic victories up and down the ballot -- but only if we follow through and make it happen," said Mr. Dean, who is concerned enough about voter numbers of recent weeks to ask every Democrat who can do so to take the day off from work on Election Day.

Curtis Gans, director of American University's Center for the Study of the American Electorate (CSAE), announced this week that U.S. voter turnout for the 2006 statewide midterm election primaries hit the lowest number ever recorded -- despite it being a year when Democrats contend that Americans are fed up with their elected officials and demand change.

Turnout in the recent primaries fell 17 percent from midterm levels in 2002, with barely 15 percent of the eligible electorate going to the polls.

Fool's prize

A more popular definition for patsy is a "chump: a person who is gullible and easy to take advantage of." Others describe a "fool," a "sucker."

"I thought you'd like to know the names of the officials the Center for Military Readiness has selected as the finalists for our inaugural CMR 'Patsy' Award," says CMR President Elaine Donnelly, referring to this evening's 11th annual CMR awards gala at the Hall of States.

The honor, she hints, will go to "an official whom feminists have used to impose their policies on the men and women of the military."

Mrs. Donnelly argues that the U.S. military is no longer a conservative institution, rather "it is on the cutting edge of liberal social change."

Without further ado, the "Patsy" finalists include Undersecretary of Defense for Personnel and Readiness David S.C. Chu, Army Secretary Francis J. Harvey, Navy Vice Adm. Rodney P. Rempt, and the entire English Department of West Point.

Disingenuous buzz

Under the headline "Exhale," we quoted White House Drug Control Policy Director John P. Walters as saying don't hold your breath if you think the Bush administration would one day consider legalizing marijuana.

"Of the roughly 7 million people we have as an estimate that need treatment because of dependence or abuse of illegal drugs, roughly 60 percent are dependent on marijuana," Mr. Walters told C-SPAN's "Newsmakers" on Sunday, insisting more teens are "dependent on marijuana than all other illegal drugs combined."

Which comes as news to Bruce Mirken, director of communications for the Marijuana Policy Project on Capitol Hill. (How does one land that gig?)

Mr. Mirken tells Inside the Beltway that Mr. Walters is "deliberately and rather brazenly disingenuous," and calls our attention to a federal government report titled the "Treatment Episode Data Set" (TEDS).

DOJ_NMG_0079519

"What Mr. Walters didn't mention is that the majority of these treatment admissions were referred by the criminal justice system -- i.e., kids were arrested and offered treatment instead of jail," he explains. "Virtually all of the supposedly alarming growth in marijuana treatment admissions has been driven by arrests.

"Another nugget buried in the TEDS stats: Of those admitted to treatment for alleged 'marijuana dependence,' over one-third did not use marijuana at all in the month prior to admission, and half used it three times or less.

"These are addicts? Give me a break," says Mr. Mirken. "Bottom line: We arrest people for smoking marijuana, force them into treatment and then use those treatment admissions as 'proof' marijuana is dangerously addictive. Somewhere, George Orwell is smiling."

Disgusted dad

Mark Foley, the Florida Republican who recently resigned from Congress after it was revealed he had sent sexually explicit e-mail messages to former congressional pages, would be denied his federal pension under legislation proposed by Rep. Rick Renzi, Arizona Republican.

Under current rules, the 52-year-old Mr. Foley will be eligible to receive an annual pension of $32,000 once he turns 62.

"As a father of 12, I am disgusted," says Mr. Renzi.

Doctor Will Remain In Prison Until Retrial (WP)

By Jerry Markon

The Washington Post, October 12, 2006

Former Northern Virginia pain-management doctor William E. Hurwitz, whose conviction on drug-trafficking charges was overturned, will not be released from prison until his retrial, a federal judge ruled yesterday.

U.S. District Judge Leonard D. Wexler said he was concerned that Hurwitz might flee after a federal jury in Alexandria convicted him in 2004 of running a drug conspiracy out of his McLean office and trafficking in narcotics. Hurwitz is perhaps the most prominent doctor to be targeted in a federal crackdown on what authorities call the over-prescribing of OxyContin and other painkillers.

"Things have changed with respect to flight," Wexler said as he rejected a motion from Hurwitz's attorneys to free him on bond. "A jury has found him guilty of 50 counts . . . I think there is a risk of flight."

The case has generated strong emotions, with Hurwitz becoming a symbol in a nationwide debate over whether licensed doctors who prescribe legal medication to patients in chronic pain should be prosecuted if their patients abuse or sell the drugs. About 10 family members and supporters were in court yesterday, and Hurwitz's brother said afterward that the judge's concerns were "laughable."

"He's not going to run away," said Kenneth Hurwitz, who is a senior associate for Human Rights First in New York. "He believes he's innocent. This is a guy who went to law school and medical school. He cares about his reputation. He's not someone who wants to live as a fugitive who knows where."

William Hurwitz, dressed in a green prison jumpsuit, sat quietly during the hearing, then glanced at family members and glumly shook his head as he was escorted out. He had been free on $2 million bond during his first trial.

In August, a federal appeals court overturned Hurwitz's conviction and granted him a new trial, which is scheduled for March. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the 4th Circuit ruled that Wexler improperly instructed jurors that they could not consider whether Hurwitz acted in "good faith" when he prescribed large amounts of OxyContin and other painkillers -- for one patient, 1,600 pills a day. The "good faith" argument was central to Hurwitz's defense, his attorneys have said, because he believed he was helping his patients.

The appeals court noted that prosecutors presented "powerful" evidence at Hurwitz's trial that showed he was "acting outside the bounds of accepted medical practice." Wexler also cited that finding in declining to release Hurwitz yesterday.

Jurors convicted Hurwitz of trafficking that is alleged to have caused the death of one patient and seriously injured two others. They found him guilty on 50 counts, acquitted him on nine and deadlocked on three. Hurwitz, then 59, was sentenced to 25 years in prison.

DOJ_NMG_0079520

The likelihood of a long prison term if he is convicted again gives Hurwitz reason to run away, prosecutors said yesterday as they urged Wexler to keep him in prison. "At least one jury found him guilty 50 times over," said Assistant U.S. Attorney Gene Rossi. "He's about 60 years old, and the sentence that was imposed, 25 years, is essentially a life sentence. That is a strong incentive."

Hurwitz's attorneys said he has a good chance of winning the retrial and didn't flee when he had the chance before. "He faithfully abided by every condition of his release," said defense attorney Lawrence Robbins.

U.S. Cuts Economic Aid For Colombia Area (AP)

By Joshua Goodman

AP, October 11, 2006

The United States is quietly cutting back economic aid in a region where cocaine production is surging, a strategy critics say hurts Washington's $4 billion effort to try to wean Colombia off the illegal drug trade.

In an internal memo obtained by The Associated Press, the U.S. Agency for International Development blames unacceptable security risks for its workers and a lack of private investment partners for its pullout from Caqueta, a former rebel stronghold in impoverished southern Colombia.

Six years and more than $4 billion in American tax dollars after Plan Colombia was launched in Caqueta, Colombia's army is still fighting rebels here, and coca, the raw ingredient of cocaine, is still the region's No. 1 cash crop.

But the alternative development programs meant to provide farmers with a profitable alternative to growing coca are vanishing in the state _ a symptom, critics say, of how Plan Colombia has failed to persuade enough coca growers to switch to legal crops even as coca production reaches volumes unseen in years.

Washington spends $70 million annually on development projects in drug-producing areas of Colombia. While such projects win praise, the United Nations and development groups lament their limited scope.

Caqueta and neighboring Putumayo state produced 24 percent of the 356,000 acres of coca detected by the most recent U.S. survey _ contributing to a 26 percent surge last year nationwide. Yet Caqueta has seen only a trickle of U.S. development aid _ $5.6 million since 2000.

And now even that is drying up.

As part of the U.S. strategy to win over coca growers, almost 20 percent of annual assistance is devoted to nonmilitary social programs and development projects. Managing this "soft side" of diplomacy is USAID, whose mission in Colombia is its biggest in the hemisphere.

But under the agency's new five-year $350 million plan for development projects, Caqueta and four other Amazonian states where coca production is rising won't receive a penny.

"It's a complete contradiction of Plan Colombia," said Luis Fernando Almario, a congressman from Caqueta who supports President Alvaro Uribe's aerial eradication drive. "Instead of investing generously to eliminate dependency on the illegal drug trade, we're being shunned."

A USAID official at the U.S. Embassy in Bogota said resources from Caqueta would be channeled to other areas with a greater likelihood of sustaining development long-term. He spoke on condition of anonymity because he is not authorized to comment publicly on the issue.

But critics say that by writing off the south, the U.S. and Colombian governments are leaving the region with little alternative to coca.

Despite USAID's pessimism about the region's economic prospects, at least some foreign investors are still committed: the multinational Nestle SA, with aid from the United Nations, plans to double the capacity of a dairy plant in Caqueta.

"It makes no sense for residents of a historical guerrilla stronghold to be subjected to a strategy of all stick and no carrot _ combats, mass arrests, searches and fumigation, but no aid," said Adam Isacson, an analyst at the Washington-based Center for International Policy.

The drying up of development aid is in contrast with the tens of millions spent on aerial eradication efforts that have barely curtailed coca cultivation in the region.

DOJ_NMG_0079521

Some 400 coca farmers gathered here recently for a coca-growers' congress. In sweltering heat, normally tight-lipped peasants railed for hours against the lack of government aid even as a U.S.-supplied crop duster dumped clouds of the herbicide glyphosate on nearby fields.

Since June, when the latest round of spraying began, six peasants in the area have been arrested for having coca on their land.

"All the government ever does is fumigate and fumigate _ it's their own fault we grow coca because they never show their face to offer alternatives," said Juan Carlos Mazabel, one of the organizers.

Instead of more spraying, Caqueta's 450,000 residents want financial support, their representatives say.

The war on drugs was expanded in 2001 to target rebels who profit from the cocaine trade. A legion of U.S. soldiers and contractors have since passed through Caqueta to train and assist 20,000 counterinsurgency troops.

The rebels have largely retreated into the mountains, restoring a dose of safety to cities and roads. But that hasn't led to new jobs for impoverished residents.

The U.S. Embassy says security constraints and limited private interest are also thwarting its work in Putumayo, at $65 million the top recipient of Plan Colombia economic aid among Colombia's 32 states.

Some projects already have faltered. In the town of Orito, an animal-food concentrates plant has been idle for nearly a year, its machinery rusting since the U.S. abandoned the project.

"We're worried," says Putumayo congressman Orlando Guerra, "because we have no idea what is going to happen."

County Offers Reward In Accokeek Arson Inquiry (WP)

By Joshua Partlow

The Washington Post, October 12, 2006

In the world of arson victims, Jim Underwood comes across as one of the least aggrieved.

"I was mad in a way, but I was going, 'Man, too bad it didn't burn all the way to the ground,' you know. And they left the barn. They did forgot to light the barn up," he said. "It saved me money. Really, I mean, you know it was all going to get tore down eventually anyway."

Understand, Underwood was planning to get a permit to allow the fire department to burn the vacant house he owned along rural Livingston Road in southern Prince George's County, to clear the way for a nine-house subdivision.

But the flames leaping from the house Saturday still dismayed him and other property owners in Accokeek, primarily because the fire was the latest in a string of unsolved arsons in the neighborhood.

Prince George's fire officials announced a $15,000 reward yesterday for information leading to the arrest and conviction of those responsible. They also launched an investigative team to focus on the cases, in partnership with the Maryland state fire marshal and the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives.

Between March 2004 and the burning of Underwood's house Saturday, there have been 12 arsons in the neighborhood, including nine along Livingston Road, fire officials said. There have been seven this year. Investigators have linked the arsons because they are in the same small area and involved unoccupied structures with some connection to construction.

The targets were all "either new homes under construction, houses that are scheduled for demolition to make way for new construction or construction equipment to be used to build . . . new structures," said Scott K. Hoglander, Prince George's fire investigations battalion chief.

Although the fires have not injured anyone, they have caused a "couple million" dollars in property damage, Prince George's Fire Chief Lawrence H. Sedgwick Jr. said at a news conference. The case is baffling investigators.

"We're at a point where we need some help," said Hoglander, as he and other fire officials asked the public to watch for suspicious behavior and call or e-mail authorities with any tips.

Investigators did not go into detail about how the Accokeek fires were ignited, but Hoglander said that aside from locations and links to construction, there are "not many similarities between the various incidents."

The Accokeek cases have led investigators to review the files of the 2004 mass arson in the Charles County subdivision of Hunters Brooke, which is within 10 miles of Accokeek. In those fires, which destroyed or damaged 27 new, unoccupied houses, five white men were convicted and prosecutors alleged that some of the men were angry because many of Hunters Brooke's new homeowners were black.

DOJ_NMG_0079522

Sedgwick said yesterday that no motive had been identified in Accokeek.

Maryland Fire Marshal William E. Barnard said that his office has reviewed the Charles fires within the past year to see whether there might be a connection with Accokeek.

"We can find no connection at this point. That's not saying that the next incident that occurs may not be connected," Barnard said.

In Accokeek yesterday, Nazim Khan, 42, stood with Underwood, 45, and other friends around a pickup truck recounting their arson stories. They were at the site where Khan's new auto-body shop is being built. He said he planned to use surveillance cameras and watchdogs to guard the place.

"Me and him," Khan said, motioning at Underwood, "we got houses we're building around here, and I'm running scared every day."

Firefighters ask anyone with information about the Accokeek arsons to call 301-77-ARSON or e-mail77arson@co.pg.md.us.

Proposal Urges Citizens To Arm For City Growth (NYT)

By William Yardley

The New York Times, October 12, 2006

GREENLEAF, Idaho — Say an earthquake snaps a dam and the full force of the Boise River floods the Treasure Valley, driving untold thousands toward high ground.

Or maybe the subdivisions spreading west from Boise finally push big-box, subwoofer, exit-ramp America right up to this plateau of mint and alfalfa fields, where rural lives have passed in peace since Quakers settled a century ago.

However humanity's rush may arrive, a town must prepare. Greenleaf, population 862, is not taking the task lightly. Thus the proposed language for Section 2, Chapter 6, Subsection 2 of the Greenleaf City Code.

"Heads of households to maintain firearms," the heading announces.

"In order to provide for the emergency management of the city, and further in order to provide for and protect the safety, security and general welfare of the city and its inhabitants," the proposal says, "it is recommended that every head of household residing in the city limits maintain a firearm, together with ammunition therefore, and obtain appropriate training relating to proper, safe and lawful handling of firearms."

News of the proposal spread quickly, bringing that rush of humanity even sooner than expected, if only in search of amusement. Jay Leno, the late-night comedian, needled Greenleaf in his monologue two nights in September. Journalists from Italy sought interviews. Jon Stewart? His people called, too.

Sure, said Steven G. Jett, the city councilman who wrote the proposed ordinance, he gets it: the notion of Idaho isolationists with itchy trigger fingers is an easy punch line. But that misses the point, Mr. Jett said, emphasizing that this was about public safety, and, after all, the proposal did not mandate gun ownership. He said he saw "recommended" as the crucial word.

"Leno said 'require,' " Mr. Jett said. "We're not requiring."

If that clarification does not stop the jokes, it may at least put people like Gene Cox at ease.

"I think it's a stupid idea," said Mr. Cox, 68, who bales hay part time, as he sat in his pickup truck next to a patch of sugar beets. "We already have a right to bear arms, so we don't need anything messing that up. We don't need any changes. And monitoring it is going to be a problem. You're going to be invading people's houses to see if they've got a gun or not."

Again, Mr. Jett said, a misunderstanding.

"We all hate government — councilmen, too," said Mr. Jett, who is also director of the Southwest Idaho Juvenile Detention Center. "We are not for heavy-handed government at all. That's why I backed off the 'required' wording early on, before I even had this printed up. The government does not want to step into your home and say: 'Where is it? What do you have?' "

DOJ_NMG_0079523

Mr. Jett said his idea for the ordinance, which must be voted on by the City Council, was inspired by the chaos he saw on television after Hurricane Katrina and by the fact that a subdivision with 240 houses on 105 acres had been platted and could double the population of the city.

He also has a model. Kennesaw, Ga., passed a law in 1982 requiring residents to arm themselves. The law has proved to be unenforceable, but, as Mr. Jett noted, crime in Kennesaw declined after the law took effect even as the population grew.

"That's the kind of message I want to send," he said. " 'We're not sitting ducks.' We don't have any crime, and that's the way I want to keep it."

For all the fuss, the practical effect of the ordinance could be minimal.

"Firearms exist in significant numbers here," Mayor Brad Holton said. Mr. Holton estimated that guns, whether a relic rifle brought West on a wagon or a shotgun used for hunting elk up north, were already present in at least 80 percent of the city's households.

One gun owner is Alan Weinacht, a Quaker who is pastor of Greenleaf Friends Church. Mr. Weinacht hunts, but he opposes the gun ordinance. He noted Quakers' peace-loving roots and cited local public opinion.

"It simply doesn't resonate with a felt need," Mr. Weinacht said, predicting that the ordinance would not survive a series of public meetings this fall. "Nobody's scared of anything. This is not exactly crime central."

He did not disparage Mr. Jett for the idea, however.

"It's a fair question: How do we adequately prepare for an emergency?" Mr. Weinacht said. "I think the inherent contradiction is how do you say we're for community, and at the same time, the guns are cocked?"

Mayor Holton, however, said the ordinance could be read as promoting responsibility for gun owners, and as recognizing that many residents had weapons and that it would be in everyone's interest to be trained to use them properly.

The proposal does not include money for training. One idea is to ask hunting instructors to teach classes in the meeting room at City Hall.

The mayor said he owned about 25 rifles and handguns and stored them in a safe.

"I keep all of them there but one," he said, "and you don't want to run into that one at night."

IMMIGRATION:

President Bush Reaffirms Support For A Fence On The Mexican Border (MCT)

By Dave Montgomery

McClatchy Newspapers, October 12, 2006

WASHINGTON - President Bush said Wednesday that his administration is committed to building more than 700 miles of fencing along the Southwest border, dispelling questions about whether the barrier will actually be constructed.

Bush expressed strong support for the multi-state fence approved by Congress late last month as well as an accompanying "virtual wall" of high-tech gadgetry such as sensors, cameras, radar and unmanned surveillance aircraft.

"We're going to do both," Bush said at a news conference in the White House Rose Garden. "You can't fence the entire border. But . . . you can use a combination of fencing and technology to make it easier for the Border Patrol to enforce the border."

Legislation that cleared Congress on Sept. 29, just before the start of an election-season recess, would require reinforced fencing and barriers along porous sections of the border in California, Arizona, New Mexico and Texas.

The proposed fence has ignited diplomatic protests from Mexico as well as vigorous opposition from many U.S. border communities, escalating speculation that it may never be built.

Congress has approved $1.2 billion for border fencing but the barrier envisioned by lawmakers is expected to cost at least $2.2 billion and possibly more than $6 billion. The Department of Homeland Security has also sent mixed signals about its commitment to building the fence.

DOJ_NMG_0079524

In response to a reporter's question, however, Bush left little doubt that his administration intends to carry out the congressional mandate to build double-layered fencing - two parallel rows of fencing - and adjacent patrol roads in sections of the border with heavy concentrations of smuggling and illegal immigrant traffic.

The fencing, he said, would be erected in areas "where there is a high vulnerability for people being able to sneak in," he said. In remote, less-populous areas, he said, high-tech enforcement may prove to be the better approach.

"It's a combination of fencing and technologies," said the former Texas governor. "It's hard to enforce that border. You got some rugged country . . . stretches of territory where you don't even know where the border is."

He said fencing "makes sense" in high-density urban corridors such as Southern California, El Paso and sections of Arizona, where illegal immigrants often "rush across the border into a little subdivision," with all but a few eluding the Border Patrol.

The bill awaiting Bush's signature calls for five sections of fencing totaling more than 700 miles, but Senate and House leaders assured border state lawmakers that local communities would have a say in exactly where the barriers would be located.

While Bush said several weeks ago that he planned to sign the bill, he used Wednesday's press conference to again urge Congress to enact a comprehensive immigration plan that would include a guest worker program and legal protections for more than 11 million illegal immigrants now in the country.

Lawmakers shelved the guest worker plan and concentrated on passing border security measures such as the fence before leaving town to campaign for the Nov. 7 elections. Supporters of Bush's proposed comprehensive overhaul hope to resurrect the issue when lawmakers return for a brief post-election work session in November.

Bush Vows To Build Fence (WT)

By Stephen Dinan And Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, October 12, 2006

President Bush yesterday pledged to follow through on building 698 miles of wall along the U.S.-Mexico border but said that the Department of Homeland Security will decide where and that he wants sensors and cameras to watch the border.

"We're going to do both," Mr. Bush said at a press conference yesterday. "We're just going to make sure that we build it in a spot where it works."

Some fence advocates and members of Congress have questioned Mr. Bush's commitment to fencing. The president yesterday said it is a part of his broader border-security strategy.

"You can't fence the entire border, but what you can do is you can use a combination of fencing and technology to make it easier for the Border Patrol to enforce our border," he said.

Mr. Bush said any solution on the border will also require a guest-worker program, which he said would funnel workers through legal points of entry.

Mr. Bush last week signed the homeland-security spending bill, which includes $1.2 billion for fencing and other infrastructure, such as cameras, vehicle barriers and ground-based radar.

He has also promised to sign the Secure Fence Act, which Congress passed last month and which authorizes 698 miles of wall along the border. That bill passed 283-138 in the House and 80-19 in the Senate.

As of Tuesday, the bill had not been transmitted to the White House for the president to sign, and groups that advocate for rights for illegal aliens are urging Mr. Bush to veto it.

Yesterday, the Catholic Church joined that call in a letter from Bishop William Skylstad, president of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops.

He said that fencing could cause the death of illegal aliens trying to sneak into the country and that it "would send the wrong signal to our peaceful neighbor to the south, Mexico, as well as the international community."

Mr. Bush's pledge of support for the fence bill drew praise from House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, Illinois Republican, who said illegal immigration is "a clear threat to our safety."

House Republicans consider passage of the fence bill a major victory in their push for an enforcement-first policy and are campaigning across the country on the accomplishment.

DOJ_NMG_0079525

"It should concern the American people that 131 Democrats voted against creating this security fence along our southern border," Mr. Hastert said yesterday. "They don't want border security; instead, they would rather jeopardize our national security and put Americans at risk."

By contrast, Mr. Bush has been silent about immigration as he campaigns and raises funds for Republican candidates.

There is no official cost estimate for all 698 miles of wall. Sen. Jon Kyl, Arizona Republican, has estimated that this year's funding bill will cover about 150 miles.

In a last-minute deal, congressional leaders did grant the administration discretion in places where they determine a fence is not practical or the best use of resources.

Mr. Hastert and Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, Tennessee Republican, said they will revisit the issue in a lame-duck legislative session later this year.

Some fence advocates have feared that the administration won't follow through on the construction.

Last week, after a report in The Washington Post indicated that the Department of Homeland Security would not commit to building all 700 miles of fence, Rep. Duncan Hunter, California Republican and chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, wrote a letter to Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff telling him that building the fence is not optional.

A report accompanying the fence bill says Congress will withhold $950 million until it approves an administration plan for how it will spend the $1.2 billion included in the bill for infrastructure. Mr. Bush said last week that such a move violates the separation of powers and that he will consider that a request rather than a mandate.

Meanwhile, Mexican government officials have sent a diplomatic note to Washington protesting the fence and have said they may complain to the United Nations.

Mr. Bush yesterday said he will follow through in "implementing that which Congress has funded, in a way that says to folks, the American people, we'll enforce the border."

But he also said a guest-worker program is critical.

"If somebody is not trying to sneak in to work, in other words, coming through in a way where they're showing a temporary-worker pass, where they're not using coyotes to smuggle across, where they're not going through tunnels, it's going to make it much easier for us to do our job," he said.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Proclaims Deficit Halved, Three Years Early (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, October 12, 2006

President Bush yesterday claimed victory on his promise to cut the 2004 budget deficit in half, announcing he has reached that goal three years ahead of his self-imposed 2009 deadline.

The Treasury Department said the federal government ran a $247.7 billion deficit for fiscal 2006, which ended Sept. 30.

It is the seventh-highest deficit ever in dollar terms, but measured as a portion of the economy as determined by the gross domestic product, it is 1.9 percent -- smaller than in 18 of the past 25 years. It is also less than half of the $521 billion deficit the president projected for 2004, leaving Mr. Bush crowing in both a morning press conference and an afternoon speech.

"We have now achieved our goal of cutting the federal budget deficit in half and we've done it three years ahead of schedule," the president said, crediting his 2001 and 2003 tax cuts with spurring economic growth and thus more tax revenue.

"The reduction of the deficit I've announced today is no accident. It is the result of the hard work of the American people, and because of sound fiscal policies here in Washington," Mr. Bush said.

Democrats said the president's tax cuts have ruined the federal budget in the past five years, and turned record surpluses into deficits.

"No amount of Republican Party spin can obscure the bottom line: The Bush administration and congressional Republicans inherited a projected 10-year budget surplus of $5.6 trillion in 2001, and in just 70 months turned that surplus into a projected deficit of $4 trillion," said House Minority Whip Steny H. Hoyer, Maryland Democrat.

DOJ_NMG_0079526

Rep. John M. Spratt Jr. of South Carolina, the top Democrat on the House Budget Committee, said the projection for 2006 when Mr. Bush took office was for a $305 billion surplus, and he blamed spending increases and tax cuts for the deficit.

He said the administration is including in its calculations money supposedly dedicated to Social Security. Excluding that money, the deficit for 2006 would be more than $425 billion, Mr. Spratt said.

Federal spending hit a record high in 2006, at $2.654 trillion. That is a $182 billion increase over fiscal 2005.

Tax revenues grew by $253 billion, far outstripping the increased spending.

Mr. Bush was able to gloat about the deficit numbers because Democrats had been on the record doubting the president would achieve his deficit-cutting goal.

"When the president says he's going to cut the deficit in half over the next five years, I don't believe it," Sen. Kent Conrad, North Dakota Democrat, said in 2004.

He has accused Mr. Bush of inflating the early deficit projections in order to claim better progress later on. Administration officials dismissed that charge as bad politics because it would mean eight months of criticism for the higher numbers earlier in the year.

The president has been highlighting tax cuts as he campaigns for next month's congressional elections. When fully enacted, he said, they will amount to $1.1 trillion back in taxpayers' pockets.

Many of the cuts are due to expire 10 years after enactment, and Mr. Bush said a Democrat-controlled Congress will guarantee those taxes will go back up.

Each party blames the other for blocking tax cuts in the waning days of last month's legislative session. Democrats supported extending the tax cuts for college tuition and for state and local sales tax deductions, but opposed making the estate tax cut permanent. Republicans insisted on passing them all as a package, and the two sides ended in a stalemate.

Federal Deficit Now Lowest In 4 Years (AP-Y)

By Deb Riechmann

AP-Yahoo, October 12, 2006

The federal deficit fell to a four-year low in the budget year that just ended, a result President Bush pointed to Wednesday in claiming Republicans are better stewards of the economy than are Democrats.

The administration said the deficit dropped to $247.7 billion — welcome news for Republicans struggling to keep control of Congress. Bush boasted he had made good on a 2004 campaign promise to cut the deficit in half over five years.

"These budget numbers are proof that pro-growth economic policies work," Bush said.

Democrats said the improvement in the 2006 federal deficit was a temporary blip. They predicted rising deficits for years to come unless policies are changed.

"Only a president with such a historically bad economic record would be this excited about a $248 billion deficit," said Rep. Carolyn Maloney, D-N.Y. "Under his watch ... record surpluses turned into record deficits as far as the eye can see."

Republicans are trying to convince voters that the GOP champions tax cuts while Democrats will raise taxes if they gain control of Congress. Democrats contend the administration's tax cuts have primarily benefited the wealthy.

"There's a difference of opinion in the campaign about taxes," Bush said, predicting that the GOP still will lead the House and Senate after Nov. 7. "I would like to ... make the tax cuts permanent. And the Democrats will raise taxes."

The administration credits its tax cuts for the improving economy, contending they helped the nation withstand the 2001 recession, the terrorist attacks and corporate accounting scandals. The deficit narrowed sharply because revenues climbed by 11.8 percent, outpacing a 7.4 percent increase in spending.

Administration officials said the actual 2006 deficit is down to 1.9 percent of the gross domestic product. They said that is below the 40-year average deficit of about 2.3 percent of the GDP, which measures the value of all U.S. goods and services. This continues a positive trend that comes despite soaring war costs and $50 billion in emergency spending for hurricane relief, they said.

Still, the long-term deficit picture is bleak.

DOJ_NMG_0079527

The nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office projects that the deficit for the current budget year will rise to $286 billion. Over the next decade, the office forecasts that the deficit will total $1.76 trillion.

Bush's critics argue that the White House is using sleight of hand when boasting about the deficit.

The president can rightly state that he has fulfilled his 2004 campaign pledge to cut the deficit in half by the time he leaves office. In fact, he can say he has done it three years early. But in making that claim, the president is using the administration's original forecast of what the 2004 deficit was expected to be — not what it actually turned out to be.

Back when Bush made his promise, the administration was predicting that the 2004 deficit would be $521 billion. That prediction turned out to be off by $100 billion. To achieve the feat of slicing the actual 2004 deficit number in half, the federal deficit Bush was highlighting would have to have dropped to $206 billion, not $247.7 billion.

Democrats say the narrowing of the deficit will be temporary because when 78 million baby boomers retire, the cost of Social Security and the Medicare health care program for the elderly will soar.

"The fact that some are trumpeting this year's deficit number as good news shows just how far we've fallen. Our budget picture is extremely serious by any measure," said Sen. Kent Conrad, the senior Democrat on the Senate Budget Committee.

President Sees Signs Favoring G.O.P. Victory (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, October 12, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 11 — President Bush predicted on Wednesday that Republicans would be victorious in November, declaring that positive economic signs, combined with tough rhetoric against Democrats on national security, would help lift his party on Election Day.

Mr. Bush made his prediction at a news conference in the Rose Garden at which he promoted new figures from the Treasury Department showing that the federal budget deficit had dropped sharply from last year, to its lowest level in four years, on stronger-than-expected revenues. The event gave the president a chance to call attention to his party's election-year message on the economy, which has largely been drowned out by other news this summer and fall.

"We'll have a Republican speaker and a Republican leader of the Senate, and the reason I say that is because I believe the two biggest issues in this campaign are, one, the economy and the economy is growing," Mr. Bush said during the hourlong briefing in the Rose Garden. (The other major campaign issue, he said later, was national security.)

The Treasury Department reported that its preliminary data for the fiscal year 2006, which ended Sept. 30, showed that the federal budget deficit was $248 billion, down from $319 billion in 2005.

Mr. Bush said the new data showed that his administration had succeeded, three years ahead of time, in fulfilling his promise in 2004 to cut the deficit in half by 2009 and underscored the success of his tax cuts. But that promise was based on a projected 2004 deficit of $521 billion; the deficit that year was actually $413 billion.

Democrats continue to press attacks against Mr. Bush and Republicans on the economy, saying Mr. Bush's claim is based on an "artificially inflated" projected deficit and arguing that trouble lies ahead because of Mr. Bush's tax cuts, the cost of the war in Iraq and baby boomer retirements.

Still, the new data provided an opportunity to direct attention to positive economic news — and away from news reports about the Mark Foley scandal involving Congressional pages, casualties in Iraq and declining Republican electoral prospects in November. Administration officials said there was no disputing that they had hit the target deficit of less than $260 billion, three years early.

Officials have complained in recent weeks that they have been unable to draw attention to their arguments on the economy even though gasoline prices have dropped.

Mr. Bush used the occasion of the deficit announcement to pivot against the Democrats, saying that if they were to win control of Congress they would end his tax cuts and economic growth along with them.

"Democrats will raise taxes," he said. "Now, I know they say only on rich people, but that's in my judgment — having been around here long enough to know — it's just code word: They're going to raise them on whoever they can raise them on."

DOJ_NMG_0079528

In keeping with a Democratic promise to respond to all Republican attacks, Representative Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland, the Democratic whip, hit back with a statement pointing to the $8.5 trillion national debt and Republican votes to raise the debt ceiling.

"The fact is," Mr. Hoyer said, "this is the most fiscally irresponsible administration in American history."

At his news conference, Mr. Bush said he would welcome such debates, which tend to provide opportunities to go toe to toe over tax cuts. "There's a difference of opinion in the campaign about taxes," he said, "and we will keep them low."

Mr. Bush also used the briefing to repeat his attacks on Democrats for, he said, trying to stand in the way of provisions that would give him more latitude to pursue terrorists.

"The vast majority of Democrats in the House voted against a program that would have institutionalized the capacity of this government to listen to Al Qaeda phone calls or Al Qaeda affiliate phone calls coming from outside the country to inside the country," he said, referring to a bill to give Congressional approval to his program granting wiretaps to the authorities seeking terrorism suspects without warrants.

Democrats have said that such statements mischaracterize their positions — in this case to make it appear that they oppose efforts to listen to terrorists' phone calls, when what they oppose is trying to do so without warrants that they argue can be obtained quickly.

U.S. Deficit Is Smallest In Four Years (LAT)

By Molly Hennessy-Fiske

The Los Angeles Times, October 12, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush got some welcome news Wednesday as the federal deficit for the last fiscal year shrank to $247.7 billion, the smallest in four years, because of a nearly 12% jump in tax revenue. Bush said the numbers were more evidence that the economy was booming thanks to tax cuts that he wanted to see extended.

At two separate briefings, Bush used the news as an opportunity to reassure voters less than a month before midterm congressional elections that the economy was still in good shape, with more new jobs and investment leading to greater tax revenue.

"Tax relief fuels economic growth and … when the economy grows, more tax revenues come to Washington. And that's what's happened," Bush said at his afternoon news conference, where he was joined by Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr.

Bush said "pro-growth policies" that congressional Democrats had resisted had helped him deliver on a 2004 campaign promise to halve the deficit, and three years ahead of schedule.

The administration has drawn criticism for its deficit projections, and Democrats cried foul again Wednesday. They said the deficit reduction was exaggerated because Bush's 2004 figure was a projection later reduced by $100 billion, meaning the deficit actually shrank 39% from 2004 to 2006.

"Cutting the deficit in half from an intentionally inflated high point is a misleading goal and certainly no measure of success," said the Senate Budget Committee's ranking Democrat, Kent Conrad of North Dakota.

Conrad added that the president also failed to note that he was tapping Social Security revenue to help cover the deficit through off-budget borrowing. Accounting for that, Conrad said, would have added $550 billion to the deficit last fiscal year, money that will have to be repaid as 78 million baby boomers become eligible for Social Security.

Other Democrats said Bush had overstated the strength of the economy and gave too much credit to tax cuts.

"Only a president with such a historically bad economic record would be this excited about a $248-billion deficit," said Rep. Carolyn B. Maloney of New York, ranking Democrat on the Joint Economic Committee. "The large budget deficits run up by President Bush have produced record-low national saving, record-high trade deficits and record-high foreign borrowing."

Though Bush took credit for "restraining spending," federal expenditures rose 7.4% compared with 2005, to a record $2.65 trillion. The biggest spending increases: education, up 28.1%; Medicare, up 12.5%; and interest on the public debt, up 15.2%. Tax revenue also reached an all-time high of $2.41 trillion.

Republicans, many of whom face newly competitive races as a result of the congressional page scandal involving former Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.), quickly celebrated Wednesday's budget figures with a stream of statements about a strong economy.

DOJ_NMG_0079529

Among them was House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), who has been a lightning rod for criticism in the Foley scandal.

"Coupled with an improving deficit picture, inflation remains low, unemployment is at historically low levels, family income is up, and gas prices at the pump fell by more than 70 cents per gallon in just a few months," Hastert wrote. He promised that if elected, Republicans would "keep driving down the deficit with responsible fiscal policies." Democrats, he said, "are promising to roll back the Bush tax cuts should they be in the majority next year."

Clouding the sunny outlook offered by the Republicans are warnings issued in recent weeks, including from Federal Reserve Chairman Ben S. Bernanke, that the economy is slowing because of the slumping housing market and tepid job creation.

And many economists believe this year's smaller deficit is just a blip. The nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office predicts the deficit for fiscal 2007 will swell to $286 billion and total $1.76 trillion over the next decade.

The Congressional Budget Office also cast doubt on Bush's assertion that tax cuts would reduce the deficit. Its estimates show that extending the cuts, which are scheduled to expire in 2010, would add $2.2 trillion to the deficit through 2016.

Treasury Department estimates show that the cuts would add 0.7% to economic growth, or $29 billion.

Conservative economists also questioned the connection between tax cuts and growth.

Rudolph G. Penner, Republican-appointed director of the Congressional Budget Office during the 1980s and a senior fellow at the Urban Institute in Washington, said tax cuts in 2001 helped prevent a deeper recession by boosting income at all levels, but could not be credited with delivering broad-based growth now. "Otherwise more of the growth would have showed up in the payrolls," he said.

Douglas Holtz-Eakin, former director of the Congressional Budget Office under Bush, now with the Council on Foreign Relations, said: "It's tempting to say tax cuts then, good payoff now. But … the tax cuts' effect is more complicated."

He said extending the tax cuts wouldn't produce the huge increases in corporate profit and tax revenue seen last year because he expected overall economic growth to slow to 2.6%.

"That can't go on forever," he said. "I fully expect for this to slow down in the years to come."

GOP Promotes News Of Lower Budget Deficit (USAT)

By Richard Wolf

USA Today, October 12, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush touted a $248 billion budget deficit Wednesday as good news. Compared to forecasts, it was just that.

The reduction in red ink for the fiscal year that ended on Sept. 30, caused by a second consecutive year of soaring tax revenue, is the latest in a series of positive economic signs. It comes on top of a record-high stock market and tumbling gas prices.

That economic news is sure to be used by Republicans as a potential antidote to a bevy of bad news: mounting casualties in Iraq, a nuclear standoff with North Korea and former congressman Mark Foley's improper e-mails to teenage pages. Bush, in fact, predicted Wednesday that economic and security issues will keep Congress in GOP hands.

“The economy is growing,” Bush said at a Rose Garden news conference. “The national unemployment rate is 4.6%. We've just discovered, as the result of analyzing new data, that we added 6.6 million new jobs since August of 2003. Gas prices are down. Tax cuts are working.”

On that last point, opinions differ. Bush says his tax cuts of 2001 and 2003 stimulated the economy, generating more revenue. Rep. John Spratt, D-S.C., and other Democrats say they have increased annual deficits, forcing Congress to raise the national debt limit by $3 trillion since 2002. A recent Congressional Research Service report says the increased debt is probably greater than the added revenue.

The significance of the reduced deficit is a matter of debate:

•The new deficit figure is less than half of the projected $521 billion deficit that Bush faced in February 2004, when he pledged to cut it in half by 2009. Although several private forecasters had similar projections, the actual 2004 deficit came in at $413 billion.

DOJ_NMG_0079530

•The $248 billion deficit is a far cry from the $236 billion surplus that existed when Bush was elected in 2000. Republicans note, however, that the economy already was in recession when Bush took office. Today's deficit is just 1.9% of the economy, says White House budget director Rob Portman — smaller than in 18 of the past 25 years.

•Looking ahead, the deficit picture gets worse as the baby boom generation retires, increasing the costs of Medicare and Social Security. Bush acknowledged as much Wednesday in urging action by Congress to tame those entitlement programs.

A recent Congressional Budget Office report shows that over the next decade, the government likely will rack up $3.5 trillion in red ink. That assumes Bush's tax cuts are extended beyond their 2010 expiration, middle-income taxpayers are protected from the alternative minimum tax, and the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan are phased down.

The $248 billion deficit "is a pleasant surprise, but this is as good as it gets," says Mark Zandi, chief economist of Economy.com.

Even so, look for Republicans to use the latest news in the final four weeks of their campaigns. "There's a terrific economic story to be told," says former GOP congressman Pat Toomey, president of the conservative Club for Growth.

That won't work, says Rep. Rahm Emanuel, D-Ill., chairman of the House Democrats' campaign committee.

"Voters will think, how out of touch are you?" he says. "For average families, it's a struggle."

Bush Claims Victory Over Debt Reduction (FT)

By Caroline Daniel

Financial Times, October 12, 2006

The Bush administration on Wednesday said it had reached its goal of cutting the budget deficit in half "three years ahead of schedule", citing soaring federal tax revenues generated by a policy of tax cuts.

President George W. Bush, who in 2004 set the goal of halving the deficit by 2009, sought to reinvigorate Republican chances of retaining the Senate and House of Representatives in the forthcoming midterm elections by touting the new deficit number of $248bn for 2006, a four-year low.

"I still stand by my prediction, we'll have a Republican Speaker and a Republican leader of the Senate," he said in an hour-long press conference on Wednesday. He added that the two biggest issues in this campaign were "one, the economy" with national security second.

Mr Bush said the reduced deficit was proof his "pro-growth policies worked", and that his tax cuts should be made permanent. The cuts, starting in 2001, had fuelled 37 quarters of economic growth, he said.

Some economists were sceptical that the tax cuts had generated the economic growth and pointed out that much of the recovery in tax revenues – up by $253bn in 2006 – appeared to be linked to record corporate profits. They warned that 2006 could mark a low in budget deficits before rising next year.

James Horney, senior fellow at the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities, said the new forecast was a "blip in a bleak fiscal outlook" and the administration did not deserve "any credit" for halving the deficit.

He suggested the goal had been set using an inflated figure for the 2004 deficit of $521bn, rather than the lower forecast from the Congressional Budget Office of $477bn, to make it "easier to meet the goal".

Administration officials denied that they manipulated forecasts for political purposes. Ed Lazear, chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers, last week said the forecasts had nothing to do "with strategic behaviour by anybody".

Citing figures from the CBO, Mr Horney warned that if tax cuts were made permanent and relief from the alternative minimum tax extended, deficits could reach "nearly $3.5 trillion over the next 10 years".

Mr Bush said the economy had created 6.6m jobs since 2003. New data issued on Friday showed the biggest revision in a quarter-century.

The administration has struggled to get credit for economic growth, with fiscal conservatives angered by rising government spending and consumers' perception of the economy damped by high petrol prices. An ABC/Washington Post poll this week found that 40 per cent agreed the economy was excellent or good; 60 per cent judged it not good or poor.

Budget Deficit Shrinks On Strong Tax Receipts (WSJ)

By Deborah Solomon

DOJ_NMG_0079531

The Wall Street Journal, October 12, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Strong tax receipts from individuals and corporations helped to shrink the U.S. budget deficit for the fiscal year ended Sept. 30 to $248 billion, far narrower than the $423 billion previously projected by the White House.

The deficit, $71 billion slimmer than the previous year's figure, allowed President Bush to declare that he had delivered early on his 2004 pledge to cut the then-projected $521 billion federal deficit in half by 2009. In remarks at the White House, Mr. Bush credited his administration's "pro-growth economic policies" for the "dramatic reduction" in the deficit.

"The budget numbers are proof that pro-growth economic policies work. By restraining spending in Washington and allowing Americans to keep more of what they earn, the economy is creating jobs and reducing the deficit and making our nation a more prosperous nation for all our citizens," Mr. Bush said.

Much of the deficit reduction, however, came not from spending restraint but from surging tax revenue buoyed by a strong economy. Federal spending continued to grow in 2006 to $2.65 trillion, up from $2.47 trillion last year, according to the Treasury Department. Among the biggest expenses were outlays for defense and military spending, interest on the public debt and entitlement programs, such as Medicaid, Medicare and Social Security.

Emergency spending for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan and for Hurricane Katrina relief added to the costs.

While the deficit shrank in fiscal 2006, the White House and many economists expect it to widen again this fiscal year as revenue growth slows and spending continues to increase. The costs of entitlement programs are growing faster than the government's ability to pay for them, and government debt payments, which totaled $406 billion in fiscal 2006, are also rising.

"Spending is rising faster than the growth rate of the economy," said Brian Bethune, U.S. economist at consulting firm Global Insight. He projects the deficit will widen to $285 billion in fiscal 2007, while the White House projects it at $339 billion.

As he has done in the past, Mr. Bush acknowledged the unsustainable growth in entitlement spending, saying the "health of these programs is in serious jeopardy" and pledging to work toward reforming the programs over the next two years. "My hope is, in the last two years of this administration, we can set aside needless politics and focus on what's right for the United States of America and solve these entitlement programs once and for all," Mr. Bush said.

The 2006 deficit narrowed in large part because the growth in spending was offset by surging tax receipts, which reached $2.4 trillion, up 12% from $2.15 trillion, the Treasury said. The biggest surge came from corporate income taxes, which increased 27% to $354 billion as corporate profits skyrocketed. The single biggest chunk of tax revenue came from individual income taxes, up 13% to $1 trillion, largely fueled by wealthy individuals, who benefited from higher salaries, bonuses and stock-market gains.

Mr. Bush and administration officials said spending slowed in areas other than defense and entitlements. Robert Portman, director of the Office of Management and Budget, said while most of the deficit reduction was attributable to strong revenue, about 25% was a result of spending restraint. "What's really significant is that even with entitlement spending and the war on terror we're still showing numbers that are better than what anyone expected," Mr. Portman said.

Declining Debt (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 12, 2006

It turns out the budget deficit news for fiscal 2006 was even better than we previewed in these columns last week. Thanks to a burst of September revenue, Treasury reported yesterday that the deficit fell to $247.7 billion, or 1.9% of GDP, below our report of $260 billion.

A couple of other notable budget facts: Revenues again rose faster than the economy, so tax receipts have now climbed to 18.4% of GDP. That's higher than in all but 15 years since 1962, according to the Congressional Budget Office. Seven of those years were in the Clinton era, when revenues rose to a postwar high of 20.9% in 2000, thanks in part to the confiscatory tax rates that voters elected to reduce with their Presidential choice that same year. In other words, to the limited extent the deficit remains a problem, it is all about spending, not a lack of revenues.

The incredible shrinking deficit means that the federal government's overall debt has also begun to decline as a share of the economy. The final figures aren't available, but our guess is that debt held by the public (the figure that counts because the feds have to pay it back) will have fallen in 2006 back to 37% of GDP or lower. The debt burden fell to 33% in 2001 but began climbing again as deficits grew in the wake of recession and spending to fund the war on terror. Now it's falling once more.

DOJ_NMG_0079532

The Democratic/media criticism that all of this good news is merely "temporary" is beside the point. Of course entitlement spending will rise in the future, but any extra revenues Democrats raised today would be spent today. They surely wouldn't be saved for somebody's future retirement. Democrats who continue to moan about the deficit are really saying that the government should take an even larger tax bite from the economy than its currently hefty 18.4%; in other words, they want to raise taxes.

What Not To Wear In Front Of Bush (LAT)

By Johanna Neuman

The Los Angeles Times, October 12, 2006

WASHINGTON — Even as he talked about North Korea's nuclear ambitions and other weighty matters, President Bush on Wednesday returned to his occasional role as fashion critic to the White House press corps.

"If I might say, that is a beautiful suit.... And I can't see anybody else that even comes close," the president told NBC's Kevin Corke, who was wearing pinstripes, in the course of a Rose Garden news conference that focused on North Korea-related diplomacy and the Iraq war.

Corke responded that he would convey the president's comments to his tailor. "I'll be happy to pass along my tailor's number if you'd like that, sir," he also offered.

Soon after, the president asserted that CNN's Suzanne Malveaux was the "first best-dressed person here."

By the time Bush called on Jim Axelrod of CBS, the reporter felt compelled to start with a defensive comment: "My best suit's in the cleaners," Axelrod explained to the president.

"That's not even a suit," Bush retorted, eyeing Axelrod's sport coat and slacks.

Bush, who has suits made by Georges de Paris, the tailor to presidents since Lyndon Johnson's time, has teased reporters about their appearance in the past. In June, he poked fun at CNN's David Gregory for his loud pocket scarf.

"Gregory, fine-looking scarf — not scarf, what do you call that thing?" said Bush. "It's strong."

In August, while discussing the war in Lebanon, Bush took note of a suit worn by Ken Herman of Cox Newspapers, saying: "By the way, seersucker is coming back." Later in the news conference, Bush again referred to the suit, calling it "that just ridiculous-looking outfit."

Asked about the president's commentary, White House Deputy Press Secretary Dana Perino called Bush "a personable man," saying that "although he's president and that's a serious job, he does like to reach out to others in friendly ways."

Some who study presidential news conferences attached no great meaning to the byplay.

"I think this is probably the way he deals with people in social encounters," said Kathleen Hall Jamieson, director of the Annenberg Public Policy Center at the University of Pennsylvania. "It may make him feel more comfortable."

Herman, the reporter in seersucker, was amused when a media dust-up followed Bush's comments on his suit. "If there's anything reporters know better than math, it's fashion," he joked.

Herman said he considered the banter just part of Bush's social mannerisms. "I've been covering him since 1993 in Texas," Herman said. "That's the way he likes to make connections. He still has some frat boy in him. He likes to tease people."

Tony Snow Knows How To Work More Than One Room (WP)

By Howard Kurtz

The Washington Post, October 12, 2006

On the morning of Oct. 2, Tony Snow did six back-to-back television interviews from the White House lawn, and one phrase came back to haunt him.

While criticizing Mark Foley, the Republican congressman who resigned over sexually graphic messages he sent to former House pages, Snow told CNN's Soledad O'Brien: "It's not always pretty up there on Capitol Hill, and there have been other scandals, as you know, that have been more than simply naughty e-mails."

Snow also told O'Brien: "You're trying to create problems. What you are trying to do is pick fights here," which she quickly disputed.

DOJ_NMG_0079533

There has never been a White House press secretary quite like Snow. He is a combative presence on television and radio, relishes the repartee at daily briefings and, in a first for his position, has hit the fundraising circuit for Republican candidates. Snow brings a flashy, Fox News sensibility to the high-profile podium, which means he is increasingly popping up on newscasts and in the papers.

"Sometimes it does feel like the Tony Snow Show," says Richard Wolffe, Newsweek's White House correspondent. "There are tactics he uses that are straight out of talk radio. The extent to which he personalizes things or comes back with a one-liner, it revs up the base. They love it when he takes us on."

In an interview in his West Wing office, Snow readily acknowledges that "naughty e-mails" did not capture the gravity of Foley's graphic exchanges with teenage boys. "I shouldn't have used the words," Snow says. "I'm not going to defend having used the words." But, he says, "I did six interviews that morning and people picked on one-half of one line."

Snow says his years as host of "Fox News Sunday," and especially as a radio host, were ideal preparation for the daily briefings, because you have to "think on your feet" with callers and guests. When facing reporters, he says, "if you can't roll with the punches and give sensible answers, you're going to get killed." And, he says, "if you try to spin guys, they're going to see through it."

Part of Snow's art -- some might deem it spin -- is to openly proclaim what he is doing. Last week, for instance, after consulting with the office of House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), Snow doggedly refused to field questions on what President Bush thought of Hastert's handling of the Foley mess.

"I will dodge it, and I will tell you exactly why I'm going to dodge it," Snow explained. "Because this is a question that requires knowledge of a lot of details that are not in evidence, certainly not to me, at this point."

In the five months since he succeeded the tightly scripted Scott McClellan, Snow has put his verbal agility and sense of humor to good use, and the White House has clearly given him more running room. Struggling on several fronts, from Iraq to domestic scandals to depressed poll numbers that have put the Republican control of Congress at risk, the president has never been more in need of a slick salesman. Administration officials describe Snow as a major asset.

"He definitely likes the combat," says Martha Raddatz, ABC's White House correspondent. "One of his devices is he stops and smiles at you. The megawatt smile is supposed to punctuate his sentences, but it hasn't worked as well for him lately. It's a pretty tight-lipped administration, and that hasn't changed."

CBS's Jim Axelrod recalls how Snow once issued a press release assailing a story Axelrod had done on Medicare eligibility. "He basically sent out this report calling me a liar, and then showed up at the booth smiling, with a handshake, and we had a half-hour chat. . . . He plays the affability card."

After the president's televised speech on the fifth anniversary of 9/11, Axelrod pressed Snow on why what was billed as a nonpolitical speech had become a vigorous defense of the Iraq war. Snow shot back that if Bush hadn't discussed Iraq, "it would have been seen as dereliction, and you guys would have been out here just clubbing me like a baby seal." Some viewers called Axelrod to say that he had been disrespectful.

Snow, says Axelrod, "has got a talk show host's knack of taking whatever question is asked and steering it into a two- or three-minute response that is a fairly strong defense of the administration's policies. He's probably dealt with angry callers before, and maybe we're nothing more than angry callers to him."

Sometimes the exchanges get heated. When NBC's David Gregory asked why Bush had not acknowledged more shortcomings in an assessment of the battle against terrorism, Snow accused him of expressing "the Democratic point of view." Gregory vigorously objected.

"Let's not let you get away with being rude," Snow said.

"Excuse me, don't point your finger at me," Gregory said. "I'm not being rude."

"Yes, you are," Snow insisted.

Snow says he "felt bad" about what happened and later called Gregory, saying he could ask as many follow-up questions as he wanted if he let Snow finish the answers. "I wanted to make sure we didn't have any more of those exchanges, because I think he's a good reporter," Snow says.

DOJ_NMG_0079534

Sometimes Snow's freewheeling style produces a pratfall. In July, he inflamed the issue of stem cell research by saying that Bush believes the federal government should not "finance something that many people consider murder. He's one of them." Snow had to back off during the ensuing controversy, saying he had "overstated the president's position."

Reporters cut Snow some slack during his shakedown period, when he would sometimes plead ignorance on various issues. "Tony's made some statements he regrets, and he gets a pass on some days because he's new," Raddatz says. "But I think that little honeymoon is over."

Like every press secretary, Snow also must function as a reporter, ferreting out information from within the administration. When Bob Woodward's book "State of Denial" charged that Bush and his team were not being honest about the mess in Iraq, Snow spoke to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, national security adviser Stephen Hadley and Henry Kissinger, among others, which helped him challenge various points in the book. But it was his glib sound bite -- "The book is sort of like cotton candy; it kind of melts on contact" -- that was widely picked up.

Away from the cameras, journalists give Snow mixed grades for providing information. They say he often delegates detailed questions to his deputy, Dana Perino, and other assistants. Snow says he can answer questions "to a certain depth" but that it makes more sense for reporters to deal with staff members who specialize in the subjects.

Others praise Snow for his accessibility. "I have e-mailed him at 6:30 in the morning on a weekend, and I have a response within a half-hour," Axelrod says.

Snow has pushed for the president to grant more interviews -- Bush spoke to every major network during the 9/11 anniversary -- and to continue to hold more news conferences than he did during the first term. As for his own spate of television interviews, Snow says the White House staff thinks he can be helpful, but he is wary of accepting too many bookings.

"You don't want to get overexposed," he says.

Snow initially hesitated to take the job, after enduring surgery and chemotherapy for colon cancer last year, until his doctors gave him a clean bill of health. While Snow begins each day with a 6:30 a.m. staff meeting, he says he has managed to take most weekends off and visit a family retreat on Maryland's Eastern Shore.

But any spokesman's schedule remains unpredictable. After news broke Sunday night that North Korea had tested a nuclear bomb, Snow held a 1:30 a.m. conference call with White House pool reporters to field questions on the incident.

Having held jobs ranging from Washington Times editorial page editor to Fox weekend host to syndicated radio talker, Snow understands the rhythms of journalism. Having worked as a White House speechwriter for Bush's father, he knew something about the machinery of government. But he felt that the press secretary's post offered the possibility of far more influence than he had wielded as either a mid-level staffer or a talking head.

Snow's celebrity has produced a stack of invitations to appear at GOP fundraisers. No other press secretary has helped his or her party raise money, a tradition grounded in the notion that the person who is the public face of an administration should not moonlight as a partisan operative. But Snow, after getting a green light from White House lawyers, has been hitting the road to raise cash.

"I'm not going out and calling out Democrats by name," Snow says. "These aren't red-meat speeches. I'm staying out of the bare-knuckle stuff. If it ends up compromising my ability to be press secretary, we'll stop doing it. If I was pounding on the podium and calling [Senate Minority Leader] Harry Reid nasty names, that would be a problem."

Joe Lockhart, a press secretary in the Clinton White House, says he has no ethical objection to Snow raising money for the Republicans, but that it "makes the job harder" by distracting Snow from his main responsibilities.

As for Snow bringing entertainment values to the briefing room, Lockhart says: "That may sound trivial, but it's not. It's hard to get your message out to reporters who aren't coming to your briefing."

AP Exclusive: Reid Got $1M In Land Sale (AP-Y)

By John Solomon And Kathleen Hennessey

AP-Yahoo, October 12, 2006

Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid collected a $1.1 million windfall on a Las Vegas land sale even though he hadn't personally owned the property for three years, property deeds show.

DOJ_NMG_0079535

In the process, Reid did not disclose to Congress an earlier sale in which he transferred his land to a company created by a friend and took a financial stake in that company, according to records and interviews.

The Nevada Democrat's deal was engineered by Jay Brown, a longtime friend and former casino lawyer whose name surfaced in a major political bribery trial this summer and in other prior organized crime investigations. He's never been charged with wrongdoing — except for a 1981 federal securities complaint that was settled out of court.

Land deeds obtained by The Associated Press during a review of Reid's business dealings show:

_The deal began in 1998 when Reid bought undeveloped residential property on Las Vegas' booming outskirts for about $400,000. Reid bought one lot outright, and a second parcel jointly with Brown. One of the sellers was a developer who was benefiting from a government land swap that Reid supported. The seller never talked to Reid.

_In 2001, Reid sold the land for the same price to a limited liability corporation created by Brown. The senator didn't disclose the sale on his annual public ethics report or tell Congress he had any stake in Brown's company. He continued to report to Congress that he personally owned the land.

_After getting local officials to rezone the property for a shopping center, Brown's company sold the land in 2004 to other developers and Reid took $1.1 million of the proceeds, nearly tripling the senator's investment. Reid reported it to Congress as a personal land sale.

The complex dealings allowed Reid to transfer ownership, legal liability and some tax consequences to Brown's company without public knowledge, but still collect a seven-figure payoff nearly three years later.

Reid hung up the phone when questioned about the deal during an AP interview last week.

But in a news conference Wednesday in Las Vegas, the senator said he believed he did nothing wrong but was willing to change his ethics report's account of the sale if the Senate Ethics Committee ordered him to do so.

"Everything I did was transparent," Reid said. "I paid all the taxes. Everything is fully disclosed to the ethics committee and everyone else. As I said, if there is some technical change that the ethics committee wants, I'll be happy to do that."

The senator's aides said no money changed hands in 2001 and that Reid instead got an ownership stake in Brown's company equal to the value of his land. Reid continued to pay taxes on the land and didn't disclose the deal because he considered it a "technical transfer," they said.

They also said they have no documents proving Reid's stake in the company because it was an informal understanding between friends.

The 1998 purchase "was a normal business transaction at market prices," Reid spokesman Jim Manley said. "There were several legal steps associated with the investment during those years that did not alter Senator Reid's actual ownership interest in the land."

Senate ethics rules require lawmakers to disclose on their annual ethics report all transactions involving investment properties — regardless of profit or loss — and to report any ownership stake in companies.

Kent Cooper, a former Federal Election Commission official who oversaw government disclosure reports for federal candidates for two decades, said Reid's failure to report the 2001 sale and his ties to Brown's company violated Senate rules.

"This is very, very clear," Cooper said. "Whether you make a profit or a loss you've got to put that transaction down so the public, voters, can see exactly what kind of money is moving to or from a member of Congress."

"It is especially disconcerting when you have a member of the leadership, of either party, not putting in the effort to make sure this is a complete and accurate report," said Cooper. "That says something to other members. It says something to the Ethics Committee."

Other parts of the deal — such as the informal handling of property taxes — raise questions about possible gifts or income reportable to Congress and the IRS, ethics experts said.

Stanley Brand, former Democratic chief counsel of the House, said Reid should have disclosed the 2001 sale and that his omission fits a larger culture in Congress where lawmakers aren't following or enforcing their own rules.

"It's like everything else we've seen in last two years. If it is not enforced, people think it's not enforced and they get lax and sloppy," Brand said.

SALE HIDDEN FROM CONGRESS

DOJ_NMG_0079536

Reid and his wife, Landra, personally signed the deeds selling their full interest in the property to Brown's company, Patrick Lane LLC, for the same $400,000 they paid in 1998, records show.

Despite the sale, Reid continued to report on his public ethics reports that he personally owned the land until it was sold again in 2004. His disclosure forms to Congress do not mention an interest in Patrick Lane or the company's role in the 2004 sale.

AP first learned of the transaction from a former Reid aide who expressed concern the deal hadn't been properly reported.

Reid isn't listed anywhere on Patrick Lane's corporate filings with Nevada, even though the land he sold accounted for three-quarters of the company's assets. Brown is listed as the company's manager. Reid's office said Nevada law didn't require Reid to be mentioned in the filings.

"We have been friends for over 35 years. We didn't need a written agreement between us," Brown said.

The informalities didn't stop there.

PROPERTY TAXES LOOSELY HANDLED

Brown sometimes paid a share of the local property taxes on the lot Reid owned outright between 1998 and 2001, while Reid sometimes paid more than his share of taxes on the second parcel they co-owned.

And the two men continued to pay the property taxes from their personal checking accounts even after the land was sold to Patrick Lane in 2001, records show.

Brown said Reid first approached him in 1997 about land purchases and the two men considered the two lots a single investment.

"During the years of ownership, there may have been occasions that he advanced the property taxes, or that I advanced the property taxes," Brown said. "The bottom line is that between ourselves we always settled up and each of us paid our respective percentages."

Ultimately, Reid paid about 74 percent of the property taxes, slightly less than his actual 75.1 ownership stake, according to canceled checks kept at the local assessor's office. One year, the property tax payments were delinquent and resulted in a small penalty, the records show.

Ethics experts said such informality raises questions about whether any of Brown's tax payments amounted to a benefit for Reid. "It might be a gift," Cooper said.

Brand said the IRS might view the handling of the land taxes as undisclosed income to Reid but it was unlikely to prompt an investigation. "If someone is paying a liability you owe, there may be some income imputed. But at that level, it's pretty small dollars," he said.

FEDERAL LAND SWAPS

Nevada land deeds show Reid and his wife first bought the property in January 1998 in a proposed subdivision created partly with federal lands transferred by the Interior Department to private developers.

Reid's two lots were never owned by the government, but the piece of land joining Reid's property to the street corner — a key to the shopping center deal — came from the government in 1994.

One of the sellers was Fred Lessman, a vice president of land acquisition at Perma-Bilt Homes.

Around the time of the 1998 sale, Lessman and his company were completing a complicated federal land transfer that also involved an Arizona-based developer named Del Webb Corp.

In the deal, Del Webb and Perma-Bilt purchased environmentally sensitive lands in the Lake Tahoe area, transferred them to the government and then got in exchange several pieces of valuable Las Vegas land.

Lessman was personally involved, writing a March 1997 letter to Interior lobbying for the deal. "This exchange has been through many trials and tribulations ... we do not need to create any more stumbling blocks," Lessman wrote.

For years, Reid also had been encouraging Interior to make land swaps on behalf of Del Webb, where one of his former aides worked.

In 1994, Reid wrote a letter with other Nevada lawmakers on behalf of Del Webb, and then met personally with a top federal land official in Nevada. That official claimed in media reports he felt pressured by the senator. Reid denied any pressure.

DOJ_NMG_0079537

The next year, Reid collected $18,000 in political donations from Del Webb's political action committee and employees. Del Webb's efforts to get federal land dragged on.

In December 1996, Reid wrote a second letter on behalf of Del Webb, urging Interior to answer the company's concerns. The deal came together in summer and fall 1997, with Perma-Bilt joining in.

In January 1998 — just days before he bought his land — Reid applauded the Lake Tahoe land transfers, saying they would create the "gateway to paradise."

None of Reid's letters mentioned Perma-Bilt. Reid's office said the senator never met Lessman nor discussed the Lake Tahoe land transfer or his personal land purchase. A real estate attorney handled the 1998 sale at arms-length, aides said.

"This land investment was completely unrelated to federal land swaps that took place in the mid-1990's," Manley said.

Lessman said he never talked to Reid or asked for his help before the 1998 land sale, and only met the senator years later at a public event. "Any suggestion that the land sale between Senator Reid and myself is somehow tied in with the Perma-Bilt exchange is completely absurd," Lessman said.

THE REZONING

Clark County intended for the property Reid owned to be used solely for new housing, records show. Just days before Reid sold the parcels to Brown's company, Brown sought permission in May 2001 to rezone the properties so a shopping center could be built.

Career zoning officials objected, saying the request was "inconsistent" with Clark County's master development plan. The town board in Spring Valley, where Reid's property was located, also voted 4-1 to reject the rezoning.

Brown persisted. The Clark County zoning board followed by the Clark County Commission voted to overrule the recommendation and approve commercial zoning. Such votes were common at the time.

Before the approval in September 2001, Brown's consultant told commissioners that Reid was involved. "Mr. Brown's partner is Harry Reid, so I think we have people in this community who you can trust to go forward and put a quality project before you," the consultant testified.

With the rezoning granted, Patrick Lane pursued the shopping center deal. On Jan. 20, 2004, the company sold the property to developers for $1.6 million. Today, a multimillion dollar retail complex sits on the land.

On Jan. 21, 2004, Reid received more than $1.1 million of the sale proceeds. Reid disclosed the money the following year on his Senate ethics report as a personal sale of land, not mentioning Patrick Lane.

A BUSINESS PARTNER'S PAST

Brown has been a behind-the-scenes power broker in Nevada for years, donating to Democrats, Republicans and charities. He represented a major casino in legal cases and dabbled in Nevada's booming real estate market.

Brown befriended Reid four decades ago, even before Reid served as chairman of the Nevada gaming commission and decided cases involving Brown's clients.

Brown's name has surfaced in federal investigations involving organized crime, casinos and political bribery since the 1980s.

This past summer, federal prosecutors introduced testimony at the bribery trial of former Clark County Commission chairman Dario Herrera that Brown had taken money from a Las Vegas strip club owner to influence the commission. Herrera was convicted of taking kickbacks. Brown was never called as a witness.

Brown declined to discuss past cases where his name surfaced, including Herrara. "The federal government investigated this whole matter thoroughly, and there was never any implication of impropriety on my part," he said.

Reid Got $1.1 Million In Land Sale (WT/AP)

By John Solomon

The Washington Times, October 12, 2006

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid collected a $1.1 million windfall on a Las Vegas land sale even though he hadn't personally owned the property for three years, property deeds show.

DOJ_NMG_0079538

In the process, Mr. Reid did not disclose to Congress an earlier sale in which he transferred his land to a company created by a friend and took a financial stake in that company, according to records and interviews.

The Nevada Democrat's deal was engineered by Jay Brown, a longtime friend and former casino lawyer whose name surfaced in a major political bribery trial this summer and in previous organized-crime investigations. He has never been charged with wrongdoing -- except for a 1981 federal securities complaint that was settled out of court.

Land deeds obtained by the Associated Press during a review of Mr. Reid's business dealings show:

•In 1998, Mr. Reid bought undeveloped residential property on Las Vegas' booming outskirts for about $400,000. Mr. Reid bought one lot outright, and a second parcel jointly with Mr. Brown. One of the sellers was a developer who was benefiting from a government land swap that Mr. Reid supported. The seller never talked to Mr. Reid.

•In 2001, Mr. Reid sold the land for the same price to a limited liability corporation created by Mr. Brown. The senator didn't disclose the sale on his annual public ethics report or tell Congress he had a stake in Mr. Brown's company. He continued to report to Congress that he personally owned the land.

•After getting local officials to rezone the property for a shopping center, Mr. Brown's company sold the land in 2004 to other developers, and Mr. Reid took $1.1 million of the proceeds, nearly tripling the senator's investment. Mr. Reid reported it to Congress as a personal land sale.

The complex dealings allowed Mr. Reid to transfer ownership, legal liability and some tax consequences to Mr. Brown's company without public knowledge, but still collect a seven-figure payoff nearly three years later.

Mr. Reid hung up the phone when questioned about the deal during an AP interview last week.

In a press conference yesterday in Las Vegas, the senator said he thought he had done nothing wrong but was willing to change his ethics report's account of the sale if the Senate Select Committee on Ethics ordered him to do so.

"Everything I did was transparent," Mr. Reid said. "I paid all the taxes. Everything is fully disclosed to the ethics committee and everyone else. As I said, if there is some technical change that the ethics committee wants, I'll be happy to do that."

The senator's aides said that no money changed hands in 2001 and that Mr. Reid instead got an ownership stake in Brown's company equal to the value of his land. Mr. Reid continued to pay taxes on the land and didn't disclose the deal because he considered it a "technical transfer," they said.

They also said they have no documents proving Mr. Reid's stake in the company because it was an informal understanding between friends.

The 1998 purchase "was a normal business transaction at market prices," Reid spokesman Jim Manley said. "There were several legal steps associated with the investment during those years that did not alter Senator Reid's actual ownership interest in the land."

Senate ethics rules require lawmakers to disclose in their annual ethics report all transactions involving investment properties -- regardless of profit or loss -- and to report any ownership stake in companies.

Kent Cooper, who oversaw government disclosure reports for federal candidates for two decades in the Federal Election Commission, said Mr. Reid's failure to report the 2001 sale and his ties to Mr. Brown's company violated Senate rules.

"This is very, very clear," Mr. Cooper said. "Whether you make a profit or a loss, you've got to put that transaction down so the public, voters, can see exactly what kind of money is moving to or from a member of Congress."

"It is especially disconcerting when you have a member of the leadership, of either party, not putting in the effort to make sure this is a complete and accurate report," Mr. Cooper said.

Other parts of the deal -- such as the informal handling of property taxes -- raise questions about gifts or income reportable to Congress and the Internal Revenue Service, analysts said.

Stanley Brand, former Democratic chief counsel to the House, said that Mr. Reid should have disclosed the 2001 sale and that his omission fits a larger culture in Congress, where lawmakers aren't following or enforcing their own rules.

"It's like everything else we've seen in last two years. If it is not enforced, people think it's not enforced, and they get lax and sloppy," Mr. Brand said.

Mr. Reid and his wife, Landra, personally signed the deeds selling their full interest in the property to Mr. Brown's company, Patrick Lane LLC, for $400,000, records show.

Despite the sale, Mr. Reid continued to report on his public ethics reports that he personally owned the land until it was sold again in 2004. His disclosure forms to Congress do not mention an interest in Patrick Lane or the company's role in the 2004 sale.

AP first learned of the transaction from a former Reid aide who expressed concern that the deal hadn't been properly reported.

Mr. Reid isn't listed anywhere on Patrick Lane's corporate filings with Nevada, even though the land he sold accounted for three-quarters of the company's assets. Mr. Reid's office said Nevada law didn't require Mr. Reid to be mentioned in the filings.

"We have been friends for over 35 years. We didn't need a written agreement between us," Mr. Brown said.

Reid Land Deal Under Scrutiny (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum

The Washington Post, October 12, 2006

Harry M. Reid of Nevada, the Senate's top Democrat, said yesterday that he was in discussions with the chamber's ethics committee to determine whether he should amend his financial disclosure forms to include details of a real estate transaction that allowed him to collect $1.1 million.

The Associated Press reported that Reid gained a windfall from that sale of land in 2004 even though he had not personally owned the property for the previous three years. Reid also did not divulge the 2001 transfer of the land to a company he co-owned with a friend, a transaction that would normally call for a mention in Senate financial disclosure documents, the AP said.

Reid's spokesman, Jim Manley, defended the sale as a "normal business transaction at market prices." He added that the land went through "several legal steps associated with the investment . . . that did not alter Senator Reid's actual ownership interest in the land." If, however, the ethics committee determines that the land's transfer to a company requires additional disclosure, Manley said that Reid would be "happy to provide" it.

Reid and his wife purchased the land in Clark County, on the outskirts of Las Vegas, in 1998 for $400,000. The acquisition was done in tandem with an adjacent property that was bought by Reid's friend of 35 years, Jay Brown, a former casino lawyer whose name has surfaced over the years in organized-crime investigations, according to the AP. Brown has never been charged with criminal wrongdoing, the AP added.

In 2001, Reid transferred his property into a partnership company that he co-owned with Brown. The transaction was done, according to a statement by Manley, to make it easier for the Reid family and the Brown family to try to rezone the undeveloped land so a shopping center could be built on it.

Manley said that Reid continued to report in his Senate disclosure forms that the land belonged to him rather than to Patrick Lane LLC, the company to which he had transferred it. The reason, he said, was that the senator dealt with the property as if it were still his.

Nonetheless, disclosure experts said that the Senate's rules do not permit such a lapse. "Signing over a deed is a basic legal step and is the kind of thing that needs to be disclosed," said Kent Cooper, the former disclosure chief of the Federal Election Commission and co-founder of PoliticalMoneyLine.com.

The local zoning board, overruling a staff recommendation, granted the land's reclassification and Reid's share of the company was sold for $1.1 million to shopping-center developers in 2004, leaving him with a theoretical profit of $700,000.

Reid reported the transaction as a personal land sale in his Senate disclosure forms. According to the AP, Reid is not listed as a co-owner of Patrick Lane in corporate filings in Nevada. Manley said that Reid and Brown handled the partnership informally -- as a deal between friends. In addition, he said, Reid's name did not have to be included on the corporate listing.

A call to the Senate ethics committee was not returned yesterday. Its staff rarely comments publicly on ongoing matters involving senators.

Senator Offers To Amend Financial Forms (NYT)

By Philip Shenon

The New York Times, October 12, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0079540

WASHINGTON, Oct. 11 — The Senate Democratic leader, Harry Reid of Nevada, said his office contacted the Senate ethics committee on Wednesday and offered to correct his financial disclosure statements if they misrepresented his ties to a land deal in his home state in which his family made a profit of about $700,000.

In a statement, Mr. Reid did not acknowledge errors in the disclosure forms but said he was ready to make a "technical correction" if the ethics committee determined that adjustments were needed.

The contact with the committee was prompted by an article released Wednesday by The Associated Press that suggested Mr. Reid might have violated Congressional ethics rules by failing to disclose financial transactions involving two adjoining land parcels on the outskirts of Las Vegas that he and his family bought in 1998 for about $400,000.

According to a timeline provided by the senator's staff, Mr. Reid's family owned one of the properties outright and the second with a friend, Jay Brown, a prominent Las Vegas lawyer who had worked in the casino industry.

In 2001, the timeline showed, ownership of the land was transferred to a holding company, Patrick Lane LLC, named for a street near the properties, as part of effort to rezone the area for development of a shopping center. Mr. Reid became a partner in the holding company. After the rezoning was approved, the land was sold for $1.6 million, with $1.1 million directed to Mr. Reid as his share, a return of about $700,000 on the investment.

The senator's financial disclosure statements during the period show that he never reported that the land had been transferred to the holding company, leaving the impression that he continued to own the land directly instead of through a partnership with Mr. Brown and others.

Congressional ethics specialists said the omission was at least a technical violation of the disclosure rules, which are intended to identify a lawmaker's business partners and potential conflicts of interest. Spokesmen for the Senate ethics committee did not return phone calls Wednesday night.

"This is a basic requirement," said Kent Cooper, a former compliance director at the Federal Election Commission.

Mr. Cooper said the disclosure laws were intended to disclose a lawmaker's "assets, liabilities and financial transactions, so the public can have an idea of whether or not the legislator is doing things that benefit him or others."

Mr. Reid's spokesman, Jim Manley, suggested that Republican Party strategists were behind the accusations of potential ethics violations in the land deal.

"Desperate to get their scandals off the front page," Mr. Manley said, "the Republican Party is once again trying to smear Democrats. The fact is Senator Reid owned the land from 1998 to 2004, and he fully disclosed that fact."

Speaker Duped By Evangelist? (RC)

By Mary Ann Akers

Roll Call, October 12, 2006

An international evangelist, who apparently conned his way into Speaker Dennis Hastert's (R) home in Illinois, actually is on a "crusade" to "save America from the wrath of God and Republicans abusing their power and mired in scandal," the evangelist's spokesman said Wednesday in an e-mail to reporters.

For reasons beyond us, Hastert allowed the self-described "world's most popular evangelist," Dr. K.A. Paul, into his home Tuesday, taking him for a conservative clergyman who wished to provide spiritual counsel amid the current GOP crisis. What the Speaker got instead was a self-promoting, Indian-born Christian evangelist who asked Hastert to step down over the page scandal.

"The guy was misrepresenting himself," a senior House GOP leadership aide told HOH. "The Speaker thought he was offering support. Instead he quickly found out this was no Billy Graham."

According to the Chicago Sun-Times' Lynn Sweet, Paul's aide, Dennis Ryan, was eating at a restaurant in Plano, Ill., when Hastert walked in. Ryan got Paul on the phone and the two scheduled the Tuesday meeting.

The Sun-Times called the meeting a "serious security breach." But GOP leadership aides aren't going that far. And a spokeswoman for the Capitol Police, which is responsible for Hastert's round-the-clock security, told us, "This wasn't a security breach. Please seek comment on Speaker Hastert's appointments from his office."

Unfortunately for Hastert, he isn't in very good company.

DOJ_NMG_0079541

According to a 2004 article in the New Republic, Paul has "cultivated a peculiar specialty as spiritual adviser to the scum of the earth. Liberia's Charles Taylor, Yugoslavia's Slobodan Milosevic and Iraq's Saddam Hussein are among the more infamous butchers to talk with Paul about the moral implications of running a brutal, repressive, and occasionally genocidal regime."

Geez, we could have warned Hastert. We can't even count the number of copies of Paul's book "Al-Qaeda Winning — America Losing," that have arrived at Roll Call's offices (and into recycling bins) over the past week.

Steele Accusations. Democrats have been buzzing about how much time Maryland Republican Senate candidate Michael Steele seems to be spending over at the offices of the lobbying firm Quinn Gillespie and Associates. Ironic, they say, given how much effort Steele has spent trying to portray his Democratic opponent, Rep. Benjamin Cardin (D-Md.), as too tight with special interests.

One source who tipped off HOH said that Steele has been over at QGA "two days a week, dialing for dollars."

Hogwash, says Steele spokesman Doug Heye. Steele has been hanging out at the lobbying shop because master GOP political operative Ed Gillespie (yep, the guy who put the "G" in QGA) has been prepping the candidate for his debates against Cardin.

"He doesn't go there twice a week to make fundraising calls," Heye said. "He doesn't go there to make fundraising calls at all."

Another source said that Steele does spend "quite a bit of time" at the lobbying shop prepping for debates and, like all candidates, "carries a cell phone. He may return calls."

Let it also be noted that the Q in QGA — former Clinton White House counsel Jack Quinn — has done its bit to help Cardin.

Dissed in Print. Members of Congress have never been accused of having small egos. So how do you suppose Rep. Connie Mack IV (R-Fla.) felt about a magazine photo caption referring to him simply as "guest" of his girlfriend, Rep. Mary Bono (R-Calif.)?

No, not "Congressman." Not "Representative." Not even "Joe Schmo." The caption underneath a photo of the lovebirds in the October issue of DC magazine reads, "Rep. Mary Bono and guest."

If the freshman lawmaker wishes he got a little more recognition than "guest" to his girlfriend, a five-term Member, he sure isn't showing it. "Well, he was her guest at the event," Mack spokesman Jeff Cohen explained. "So it's nothing if not accurate."

After a nasty litigation battle, Mack's divorce from his ex-wife, Ann McGillicuddy, was finalized in August. The two reached an agreement after a messy breakup that, as late as last May, appeared headed for trial.

Bono and her ex-hubby, Glenn Baxley, have reported an amicable parting of ways. She and Mack have been openly romantic since last winter.

Former Justice Descends Judicial Ladder, To Lower Court (NYT)

By Anemona Hartocollis

The New York Times, October 12, 2006

Sandra Day O'Connor, the retired Supreme Court justice, gave a star turn yesterday as a visiting judge on a federal appeals court in Manhattan. But no one can accuse court officials of giving her the juiciest cases.

Things started slowly, as the judges heard arguments about a dispute over legal fees. That was followed by a landlord-tenant case and a battle over corporate financial statements. Things got a little more interesting with the medical-malpractice case brought by a veteran who claimed that prescription drugs fueled his addictive personality and led him to crash his car and commit a crime. A case involving a scheme to defraud unsuspecting investors capped the morning of mostly technical legal arguments.

As the often mind-numbing proceedings dragged on, Justice O'Connor, 76, sitting as part of a three-judge panel on the Second Circuit, one rung below the Supreme Court, might have been forgiven for wishing for the good old days of certiorari — the Supreme Court system of picking and choosing which cases to hear, a luxury the circuit courts do not have.

Her inner thoughts, however, remained a secret, since she did not speak with reporters, and confined her public remarks in court to a handful of tart legal questions.

Her sphinxlike demeanor did not stop the lawyers in five cases yesterday from gushing over her presence.

DOJ_NMG_0079542

"This is what we refer to as a hot bench," Louis R. Aidala, a defense lawyer for one of the defendants in the currency-trading-fraud case, which involves a currency trader called Evergreen International Spot Trading, said later. "If you keep in mind we're all human beings, that helps a lot."

Being lawyers, however, none of those presenting arguments allowed Justice O'Connor's stature to get in the way of a good argument.

"The government's case began to unravel during my cross-examination of their lead cooperating witness," Mr. Aidala, resplendent with a Salvador Dali-esque waxed mustache, announced in an attempt to overturn his client's conviction.

The session got off promisingly with the usual pomp as the courtroom deputy, Rosa Diaz, called the court to order by banging a gavel three times and intoning, "Hear ye, hear ye, hear ye." Justice O'Connor, smiling faintly, wearing her own personal black robe and a fluffy white dickey, took her place on one side of the bench, while Dennis Jacobs, the chief judge, sat in the middle, and Judge John M. Walker sat on the other side.

The mahogany-paneled peanut gallery was almost filled with judicial law clerks, young lawyers and a few tourists carrying shopping bags.

Judge Walker, who stepped down as chief judge in September, had invited Justice O'Connor, who retired in January, to sit on the Second Circuit, Karen Milton, the circuit executive, said. Such guest appearances are not unprecedented. In 1992, Justice Thurgood Marshall returned to the Second Circuit, where he had served in the 1960's, for a week after he retired from the Supreme Court.

But moonlighting as a judge can be more than just a hobby. By law, if Justice O'Connor, who is entitled to lifetime pay, carries 25 percent of the workload of an active judge, she could qualify for a pay raise, Dick Carelli, a spokesman for the federal courts, said yesterday, though he added that this may be a moot point, since federal judges had not received any pay raises since 1989.

True to Justice O'Connor's reputation as a tough interrogator, she got in a few zingers, at least by judicial standards, early in the two-hour session.

As the two sides in the landlord-tenant case argued over who was to blame for the property standing empty, Justice O'Connor weighed in.

"It looks to me like you sat on it," she said tartly, to Michael P. Richman, the lawyer for the landlord.

To which Mr. Richman protested: "The landlord is the victim."

But for the last three cases, Justice O'Connor was rubbing her brow under her cloud of white hair. When a cellphone rang, she seemed to almost welcome the breach of decorum.

One of Mr. Aidala's co-defense lawyers in the fraud case, Jeremy Gutman, said he was flattered to have argued a case in front of the justice. "I think we're now members of a very elite club who have appeared before her — other than at the Supreme Court," he said.

The other defense lawyer, Nathan Dershowitz, said he was happy to argue before any judge who was "prepared and smart."

But it was the young assistant United States attorney in the fraud case, Cynthia Monaco, who seemed the most excited of all. Her father, Carmine, a retired aerospace engineer, had encouraged her to take Justice O'Connor out to lunch, which is, sadly, against the rules. It turned out Justice O'Connor already had a lunch date with other judges, though Ms. Monaco confided that she would not have asked anyway.

After her oral argument, Ms. Monaco looked in the audience and discovered that her father, as well as her mother, brother and brother-in-law had all come to watch. "I came for my daughter," her father said.

Medicare To Reassign Some Californians' Drug Plans (LAT)

By Ricardo Alonso-Zaldivar

The Los Angeles Times, October 12, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0079543

WASHINGTON — About 270,000 low-income elderly and disabled Californians will be assigned to new Medicare prescription drug plans Jan. 1, raising concern about a resurgence of the coverage glitches that led state officials to bail out the federal program when it was launched this year.

Plan operators promise the switches will be made without complications, but seniors' advocates say many are upset over confusing signals from the Medicare agency, which initially indicated that nothing would change.

Less than two weeks ago, the agency said in a news release that "in California, 100% of low-income beneficiaries will not need to switch plans to continue to receive this coverage for a zero premium."

The Medicare drug program delivers its benefits through a variety of private insurance programs. And 4 out of 10 prescription plans serving low-income Californians will not be available in 2007, according to the National Senior Citizens Law Center in Oakland, which discovered the discrepancy. That means many of the estimated 1 million lowincome state residents participating in the Medicare plan will automatically be reassigned to other plans.

"Last year, the auto-assignment process was very disruptive and confusing," said Jeanne Finberg, an attorney with the center. "We were pleased initially when we heard there wasn't going to be any disruption, but now we are alarmed that [Medicare] seems to be hiding the ball."

An executive of a leading drug plan operator said seniors had nothing to worry about.

"I do appreciate all the citizen action groups being concerned, but I want to assure them we have taken extraordinary steps to make sure we represent stability and good service," said Jackie Kosecoff, chief executive of Ovations Pharmacy Solutions. "I honestly believe this is going to be painless." Ovations is part of Minnesota-based UnitedHealth Group, which runs the AARP drug plan.

Across the country, hundreds of thousands of low-income seniors will also face such changes, Finberg said.

For low-income seniors and disabled beneficiaries, Medicare pays the full monthly premium. Although these beneficiaries are responsible for some modest co-payments, they are also spared the "doughnut hole," a coverage gap in the middle of the benefit.

Nonetheless, the insurance companies that provide the benefit must renew their contracts with the government each year, and they are free to withdraw a plan altogether or raise premiums. And if a plan's cost exceeds certain levels, the government will no longer subsidize it for low-income seniors.

The cutoff point for the subsidy is determined each year according to a complex formula, and it varies across the country.

Such nuances mean a Medicare prescription coverage card is different from a regular Medicare card, which is good for life.

In California, two of the plans offered to low-income seniors — PacifiCare Saver Plan and United HealthRx — will be withdrawn in 2007. Two other plans, AARP MedicareRx and Health Net Orange 008, are projecting premiums above the cutoff point for the subsidy, meaning that low-income seniors will have to transfer out.

About 70,000 Californians in the Health Net plan will be transferred into another plan run by the company, said spokesman David Olson.

"If they stay within Health Net, it's the same system even if their plan changes," he said. "That's not going to impact their ability to get a medication."

An additional 200,000 Californians in AARP, PacifiCare and United plans will be transferred into a plan called AARP MedicareRx Plan Saver.

"While the plan may change, the sponsoring organization won't change," Medicare spokesman Jeff Nelligan said in a statement. "So for those beneficiaries, the change will be seamless."

Surveys have shown that about 80% of seniors are satisfied with their Medicare prescription plan, although a significant proportion — almost 2 in 10 — say they have had a major problem trying to use it. Lowincome seniors and those who took more than six medicines a day were more likely to say they had run into problems.

Despite the assurances from plan operators and Medicare, Finberg said there was no guarantee that coverage policies in the new plans would be the same.

DOJ_NMG_0079544

"What we have found out before from experience is that any time there is a change, it brings out the worst in the system," she said.

Democrats Should Build On Bush's Drug Plan, Not Wreck It (RC)

By Morton M. Kondracke

Roll Call, October 12, 2006

Despite abundant evidence of its success, Democrats are still on the warpath against President Bush's 2004 Medicare prescription drug plan — and they threaten to undermine future success if they take control of Congress.

At an Oct. 4 campaign event in Sunrise, Fla., House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) declared, "this is a bill borne of corruption at the expense of America's seniors, and we can do something about it."

She promised that one of the top priorities of a Democratic Congress would be to authorize the federal government to directly negotiate with drug companies to lower their prices instead of relying on private insurance companies.

The savings, she said, would be used to close the "doughnut hole," the gap between the first $2,250 in a beneficiary's annual drug expenditures, of which the government pays 75 percent of the cost, and $5,100, above which it pays 100 percent.

To save money, Congress required seniors to cover the $2,850 hole themselves, either by buying insurance or paying out of their own pockets — which Democrats denounced at the time even as they assailed the administration for underestimating the total cost of program.

According to Mark McClellan, who is leaving this week as head of the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, competition among private insurance companies and their negotiations with drug companies have lowered the estimated 10-year cost of the program by nearly 20 percent, to $516 billion, and may reduce it by another 10 percent next year.

That was just one of the successes he cited at a reporters' breakfast sponsored by the Christian Science Monitor, as well as in a subsequent interview. Others include the fact that the average prescription drug insurance premium paid by seniors is $27 per month, not $34, as originally estimated.

And polls consistently show that 75 percent to 85 percent of participants in the program are happy with it. J.D. Power and Associates recently gave the program, known as Medicare Part D, a 75 percent approval rating. A forthcoming AARP study shows that only 11 percent of seniors disapprove.

Democrats predicted that few private insurance plans would participate in the program. Then, when dozens of companies offered competing plans, they charged that the program was "chaotic" and that seniors were so confused that few would sign up.

In fact, 16 million seniors who previously lacked drug coverage did sign up. According to the CMS, 90 percent of all the nation's 43 million Medicare beneficiaries now have coverage. Their average savings for drug purchases is $1,200 a year. About 9 million low-income seniors pay nothing for their drugs.

McClellan pointed out that the original Democratic plan for eliminating the doughnut hole would have cost $1 trillion. As the program has developed, according to America's Health Insurance Plans, the health insurance lobby, 15 percent to 25 percent of seniors have been able to find plans that cover all their drug outlays, thus closing the hole.

If Democrats do take over either the House or Senate, or both, they should strive to improve on the Medicare reform record set by McClellan and the Bush administration — not undermine it with top-heavy government regulation.

Rep. Henry Waxman (D-Calif.), one of the leading critics of Bush policy who's slated to be chairman of the Government Reform Committee if Democrats take over, said in a January radio address, "We need to go back to basics. Put prescription drug coverage in regular Medicare. Make the choice simple. Make the benefit understandable. Use the purchasing power of all of America's seniors to get low prices and better coverage."

A popular Democratic idea is to have Medicare set prices for drugs the way the Veterans Affairs does for its participants. It's true that VA drugs cost about half the Medicare average, but the VA supplies only about half of the drugs most commonly used by seniors, according to McClellan.

About 35 percent of VA patients also participate in Medicare plans to obtain wider choices, and the VA patients are required to see only VA doctors and use VA hospitals and VA pharmacies.

DOJ_NMG_0079545

According to McClellan, “our beneficiaries have actively told us by their choices that they do not want a restricted network approach to delivery of their health care. They want much more access to physicians, to neighborhood pharmacies, to other providers and drugs.”

Congress certainly could improve Medicare. It could ensure that about 3 million low-income seniors who currently lack drug coverage get it and apply Part D savings to close the doughnut hole.

In Congress’ lame-duck session, and in years to come, it also could build on McClellan’s record of trying to move the nation toward a results-based payment system for health care, not the current service-based system.

The lame-duck session will consider bills to prevent cuts in reimbursements for physicians who treat Medicare beneficiaries. It should tie pay increases to requirements that doctors keep records on their patients’ health progress.

McClellan has introduced a system whereby hospitals report on treatment outcomes, with the results posted online for patients to see. There’s a pilot program for physicians, but he said pay-for-results should be the rule across-the-board.

He also has introduced an incomes-based premium schedule for part of the Medicare system to begin coping with its “unsustainable” long-term cost. It’s an alternative to straight means-testing of Medicare, which is anathema to Democrats.

John Rother, national policy director of the AARP, told me that McClellan rates as “one of the all-time best administrators the program has ever had. He’s guided it through a very ambitious set of reforms. ... He’s a very creative guy and has maintained bipartisan support for most of his agenda. He gets very high marks.”

Congress should see to it that the reform agenda advances and that doctors, health plans, drug companies and hospitals have incentives to compete on the basis of their ability to keep people healthy — not just treat sick people at government-set prices. If they do take control, Democrats need to reform not only health care, but their own thinking.

Scholarship Fund Gets A Big Check For Its 20th Birthday (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, October 12, 2006

When the Federal Employee Education & Assistance Fund began 20 years ago, it was a place for federal and postal employees to turn for help when they got behind on their bills or needed a plane ticket to attend to a family crisis. The fund has steadily grown and got a big boost yesterday from the National Treasury Employees Union.

At a breakfast marking the fund's 20th anniversary, NTEU President Colleen M. Kelley announced that the union had given it $726,363. The donation came from administrative funds that had not been spent during a 22-year class-action lawsuit, dubbed the special rates case, brought by the NTEU against the government.

The union donation will create an endowment for five annual scholarships of $5,000 each, she said.

"I have seen the difference that FEEA makes in the lives of federal employees caught up in a disaster or who need help paying for the ever-increasing costs of higher education," Kelley said. "I am thrilled that this new scholarship will help federal families achieve their educational goals."

Donating the leftover funds from the lawsuit "was not a hard decision to make," Kelley said, in part because the union is one of the FEEA's founders.

FEEA describes itself as the only nonprofit organization dedicated solely to helping federal and postal employees. For the past 20 years, the fund has distributed more than $6.5 million in scholarships to federal employees and their dependents and more than $5.5 million in emergency assistance, including $1.8 million to federal families hit hard last year by hurricanes Katrina, Rita and Wilma.

Robert M. Tobias , president of the fund's board of directors, said the nonprofit group was created with the thought that federal employees would help their fellow workers if they had a way to channel their charitable giving. "They have, in extraordinary ways," he said.

Much of FEEA's budget comes from federal employee contributions made through the Combined Federal Campaign, the government's annual charity drive. The fund also receives donations from Geico, the Blue Cross and Blue Shield federal program, and the Wright & Co. insurance firm.

DOJ_NMG_0079546

Tobias credited G. Jerry Shaw , then-counsel at the Senior Executives Association, with coming up with the idea to create FEEA in 1986. Shaw, who once worked for the Internal Revenue Service, said he seen too many instances of IRS employees taking up collections in the workplace for a colleague in need. He also thought children of federal families deserved the same kind of scholarship opportunities as some corporations provided to the children of their employees.

Shaw recruited Tobias, then-president of the NTEU; Stephen D. Bauer , then-president of the National Council of Social Security Management Associations; and the late Jim Pierce , then-president of the National Federation of Federal Employees; to join him in founding the organization. Since 1989, Bauer has been executive director of FEEA.

Over the years, FEEA has created special programs to provide emergency grants for families of federal employees killed or injured in the 1995 bombing of the Oklahoma City federal building and in the 2001 terrorist attacks on the World Trade Center and Pentagon.

College scholarships also are being provided to children who lost a parent in the attacks, and that project will continue until the youngest, now 7, has completed her undergraduate education. More than $2 million has been paid out for scholarships, and FEEA estimates that more than 200 children in Oklahoma and about 65 families who lost loved ones on Sept. 11, 2001, will receive the aid.

At yesterday's anniversary celebration, Juan and Veronica Cruz , retired Defense Department employees, paid tribute to FEEA. Juan Cruz was severely injured in the attack on the Pentagon and spent four years undergoing facial reconstruction. FEEA became "like family" during Juan Cruz's recovery, Veronica Cruz said. Their daughter is attending Brown University on a FEEA scholarship.

America's Population Set To Top 300 Million (WP)

By Blaine Harden

The Washington Post, October 12, 2006

Clicking upward at a rate of one person every 11 seconds, the U.S. population will officially surpass 300 million in the next week or so.

The milestone is a reminder that the United States remains a remarkable demographic specimen, 230 years old (since the Declaration of Independence) and still in a growth spurt.

Behind only China and India, it is the planet's third most populous nation. For a rich, highly developed country, it is anomalously fertile, with a population that is increasing briskly, in sharp contrast to anemic growth or decline in Western Europe and Japan. Some demographers say this continued growth is essential to support an aging population in retirement and a sign of the continued allure of the United States even at a time when its image around the world has been sullied by the war in Iraq.

Yet, how will the momentous 300-million marker be celebrated in Washington?

"Those plans, believe it or not, are still being finalized," said Robert B. Bernstein, a Census Bureau spokesman. "I don't yet know what, if anything, we are going to do in the way of an event."

When the U.S. population surpassed 200 million on a census clock in 1967, cheers rang through the lobby of the Commerce Department, and applause interrupted President Lyndon B. Johnson's celebratory speech.

Four decades later, however, 300 million seems to be greeted more with hand-wringing ambivalence than chest-thumping pride.

"When we hit 100 million, it was a celebration of America's might in the world," said Dowell Myers, a professor of urban planning and demography at the University of Southern California. "When we hit 200 million, we were solidifying our position. But at 300 million, we are beginning to be crushed under the weight of our own quality-of-life degradation."

One reason for anxiety may be that U.S. population growth is fueled in large measure by immigrants and their children, a circumstance that increasingly worries native-born Americans and makes politicians jumpy, especially four weeks before an election.

Immigrants, legal and illegal, account for about 40 percent of population growth. Immigration is also an important reason the "natural increase" in the population -- excess of births over deaths -- is significantly higher in the United States compared with

DOJ_NMG_0079547

Europe or Japan. Hispanics from Latin America, by far the largest share of recent immigrants, are driving the natural increase here. On average, Hispanic women have one more child than non-Hispanic white women.

Three hundred million is also a discomfiting reminder of a nation that, on its east and west coasts, at least, is running noticeably low on elbow room. More humanity is stirring up more traffic, more sprawl, more rules against growth, more protests against anti-growth rules, and more of the greenhouse gas emissions that cause global warming. A surging population in the arid Southwest is also straining the supply of water. The growth is adding to a country that represents 4 percent of the world's population but consumes 25 percent of the planet's oil.

"We are not the wide-open spaces anymore," said Martha Farnsworth Riche, who headed the Census Bureau in the mid-1990s and is now a research demographer at Cornell University. "Our choices are constrained."

In Los Angeles, the nation's most densely populated metropolitan region and its most heavily Latino area, 300 million will be yet another confirmation that congestion is out of control, Myers predicted.

"I don't think people view population growth as a plus anymore," he said, noting that Angelenos are punished by it "every single day" when they go out in freeway traffic.

The 300-million milestone, it should be noted, is an educated guess by the Census Bureau, not an actual people count. It emerges from a formula that crunches births and new immigrants against deaths. The 300-millionth person, therefore, will never win a trip to Disneyland because he or she will not be identified.

The 100-million markers are also coming more quickly. From the Declaration of Independence in 1776, it took the country 139 years to get to 100 million in 1915, then 52 more years to reach 200 million in 1967 and 39 more years to hit 300 million. The 400 million mark, according to census projections, will be reached in about 37 years. That, of course, could change if the current anxiety about immigration were to result in the closing of the country's borders. Without immigration, the U.S. population could go into a European-style stall.

It was a change in immigration law in 1965, when Congress abolished a national-origins quota system, that unintentionally reignited immigrant-led population growth, according to William H. Frey, a demographer with the Brookings Institution. "It made family reunification an important criteria for immigration and it led to a chain reaction of higher fertility," he said.

The relative presence of immigrants, about 12 percent of the total population, is more than double what it was when the population topped 200 million. Immigrants are also more visible than ever, having fanned out from gateway cities such as New York and Los Angeles to parts of the rural South and Midwest where they had not been seen in substantial numbers before. Still, the foreign-born share of the population remains lower than between the melting-pot years of 1860 and 1920, when it was about 14 percent.

Many demographers believe it is shortsighted to be anxious about the 300-million marker. They regard it as a symbol of an economically dynamic democracy that remains popular in much of the world.

"As almost nothing else can, immigration-led growth signals the attractiveness of the American economy and polity," said Kenneth Prewitt, a former head of the Census Bureau and now professor of public affairs at Columbia University. "You don't see large numbers of immigrants clamoring to move to China."

Indeed, lots of good news is embodied in the lives of the 300 million. Longevity has jumped from 55 years in 1915, to 71 years in 1967, to 78 years now. Over that time frame, the percentage of the adult population with a high-school diploma has jumped from 14 percent to 85 percent. Homeownership has risen from 46 to 69 percent. The death rate from tuberculosis has fallen from 140 to 0.2 per 100,000 people. While houses are 4.5 times as expensive (in constant dollars) as they were in 1915 and twice as expensive as in 1967, a gallon of milk in 2006 costs less than half what it went for in 1915 and in 1967.

After this year's election rhetoric cools, Frey hopes that Americans will see a silver lining in immigration: Foreign-born residents and their children will surge into the workforce, and their payroll taxes will help reduce funding shortfalls for Social Security and other social programs that benefit older people.

"So many middle-aged baby boomers who oppose immigration may be biting the hand that could feed them," Frey said.

This assumes, though, that immigrant children, especially Hispanics and blacks, will be educated well enough in American schools to find competitive jobs in the global economy.

DOJ_NMG_0079548

Poverty rates for children have exceeded poverty rates for the elderly for more than 40 years, according to Linda A. Jacobsen, director of domestic programs at the Population Reference Bureau, a nonpartisan research group.

Hispanic and black children are between three and four times as likely to live in poverty as whites, so their growing numbers may not translate into growing national wealth. In addition, the divide between aging baby boomers in retirement and the younger workers who are supporting them with payroll taxes will have a racial, as well as a generational, dimension.

"Unless we can reduce age, racial and ethnic disparities in poverty," Jacobsen warns, "children from minority groups may be less able and less willing, as they grow up, to support the predominantly white elderly population."

Robert D. Novak: Key Republicans Remain Addicted To Pork Barrel Gluttony (ULC)

By ROBERT D. NOVAK

Union Leader, October 12, 2006

STARING INTO the abyss of minority status in Congress, Republicans signaled dedication to pork barrel spending before recessing for midterm election campaigning. Behind closed doors, the GOP's King of Pork dressed down the party's leading foe of earmarks. In the open, the last bill passed before the election was filled with carefully hidden pork.

In a caucus of Republican senators, 82-year-old, six-term Sen. Ted Stevens charged that freshman Sen. Tom Coburn's anti-pork crusade hurts the party. Stevens then removed from the final version of the Defense Department appropriations bill Coburn's "report card" requiring the Pentagon to grade earmarks. The House passed, 394 to 22, the bill, stripped of this reform and containing some 2,800 earmarks worth $11 billion. That made a mockery of a "transparency" rule passed by the House earlier this year, supposedly intended to discourage earmarks.

"You would think that with a war and all the controversy surrounding earmarks that the appropriators would hold back a little," said Steve Ellis of the non-partisan Taxpayers for Common Sense. "But with an election just weeks away, they dug into the trough to find pearls to send home to their districts."

Stevens, the Senate's president pro tempore and its senior Republican, reflects a majority in both parties defending pork. He has been enraged by Dr. Coburn, the obstetrician from Muskogee, Okla., challenging his seniors. But after an angry Stevens took Coburn to task for undermining party unity, the rookie was supported by the front- runner for the 2008 Republican Presidential nomination. Sen. John McCain asserted that the people backed Coburn, who then made clear he was not intimidated by Stevens.

But as the leading Senate conferee determining the final version of Defense appropriations, Stevens stealthfully pulled out Coburn's Senate-passed report card. It would require the Pentagon to assign a letter grade, from "A" to "F," on the desirability of each unrequested earmark.

The earmark process enables the congressional-industrial complex to fund projects the military does not want. This year's bill appropriates money to buy 10 unrequested C-17 Globemaster cargo planes from Boeing. It also funds 60 F-22A Raptor stealth fighters, not supported by the Pentagon and opposed by McCain and Sen. John Warner, Senate Armed Services Committee chairman. F-22A appropriations are guaranteed for three years, reducing leverage with contractor Lockheed Martin.

Incredibly, page 336 of the bill's conference report says that under the new House rule purportedly revealing sponsors of earmarks, there were zero earmarks in this year's Defense money bill. That suggests the transparency rule is as big a sham as its critics have claimed.

The rule's biggest loophole restricts earmarks to "non-federal" spending, which would absolve the larcenous former Rep. Duke Cunningham from earmarking. By definition, all Defense expenditures are "federal." But in reality, many such appropriations end up in the hands of a private beneficiary. Thus, $4.6 million in the current bill goes to the Army Center of Excellence in Acoustics at the Jamie Whitten Center (named for a legendary congressional porker) at the University of Mississippi.

Despite the plethora of unwanted expenditures, President Bush on Sept. 29 signed the Defense bill because its overall spending is within his budget. But it requires transferring funds from needed military programs to politicians' pet projects.

DOJ_NMG_0079549

Clueless Republicans are personified by Sen. Conrad Burns, trailing for re-election in Montana. Burns said opposition to all earmarks by his Democratic opponent, State Sen. Jon Tester, "showed us how reckless and out of touch he is." Burns then issued a press release listing over $775 million of his earmarks, including more than $60 million for the Fort Peck Fish Hatchery.

Tom Coburn, backed in the Senate by a few Republicans and one or two Democrats, is not giving up on earmarks. He will press his Defense report card as a freestanding bill in the lame-duck session. No matter who controls the Senate next year, Coburn will not grant unanimous consent on spending measures and thus require 60 votes to end debate. The question is whether Republican leaders, perhaps chastened by election returns, will join him.

OTHER NEWS:

Fed Minutes: Unease About Inflation Lurks (USAT)

By Sue Kirchhoff

USA Today, October 12, 2006

WASHINGTON — While a slowing economy is expected to reduce inflation over time, there is a "substantial risk" that forecast might not pan out, according to minutes of a Sept. 20 Federal Reserve meeting issued Wednesday.

"Most participants thought that the most likely outcome was a reduction in inflation pressures," the minutes said. But the meeting notes added the decline was expected to be "only gradual," and the uncertainties around that forecast were skewed toward higher inflation rates.

"Members continued to see a substantial risk that inflation would not decline as anticipated," the minutes said.

The policymaking Federal Open Market Committee voted Sept. 20 to keep its target for short-term interest rates steady at 5.25%. The minutes said the decision was "somewhat less difficult" than the Fed's August call to end two years of increases that pushed rates up from a low of 1%.

The September vote took place amid a decline in oil prices and a steep drop in the housing market. Since the meeting, data have been mixed. Core consumer inflation, which excludes food and energy, has run at a 2.8% pace in the past 12 months, near the 1% to 2% range informally favored by the Fed.

"The linchpin of the Fed forecast is economic growth in the second half of the year," says Stephen Stanley of RBS Greenwich Capital Markets. If growth slows and inflation moderates, the Fed can stay on hold, he says. If higher than expected, it might have to raise rates.

But judging from the minutes, a cut in rates soon is unlikely.

"If you had any thought that the Fed was going to cut rates, you pretty much had a change of heart after reading these minutes," says Rich Yamarone of Argus Research.

During the Sept. 20 meeting, Fed officials "focused especially" on housing, noting that the drop in housing activity had not "spilled over significantly" into other areas of the economy. Housing starts are down about 20% from year-ago levels. Fed officials noted considerable uncertainty about the depth of the downturn and the degree to which it could affect consumer spending.

Several officials worried Fed credibility could suffer if inflation did not moderate.

In a Washington speech Wednesday, Richmond Fed President Jeffrey Lacker said he didn't expect a "catastrophic collapse" in housing. Lacker has voted to raise rates in the past two meetings, the sole opponent to holding rates steady, calling inflation too high. "Should inflation persist around the current elevated level, firmer monetary policy would be required," he said.

Fed Minutes Offer Little To Suggest Imminent Rate Cut (WSJ)

By Greg Ip

The Wall Street Journal, October 12, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Federal Reserve officials remain concerned about inflation, but they can't "rule out" a significant economic slowdown, minutes to their meeting last month show.

Despite the acknowledgment of risks to the economy, there was little in the minutes, released yesterday with the customary three-week lag, to suggest Fed officials are prepared to cut rates in the next six months, as markets expected until recently.

DOJ_NMG_0079550

Policy makers expect the economy to expand below its long-term trend rate "in the near term," then strengthen "over time." But "significantly more sluggish performance than anticipated could not be entirely ruled out," the minutes said.

The minutes made clear officials' predominant focus, though, remained inflation. Despite some signs of moderating "core" inflation (which excludes food and energy costs), officials said that high energy prices, an economy nearing capacity constraints and a "possible acceleration in labor costs," meant that they "continued to see a substantial risk that inflation would not decline as anticipated."

At its Sept. 20 meeting, the policy-setting Federal Open Market Committee left its target for the federal-funds rate, charged on overnight loans between banks, at 5.25% for the second-consecutive meeting. The decision to remain on pause was "somewhat less difficult than it was in August, when it was seen as a particularly close call," the minutes said.

The minutes are the latest evidence that the Fed's view of the outlook is evolving to become a bit less tilted to inflation alone. They reinforce a speech last week in which Fed Vice Chairman Donald Kohn said that while he saw downside risks to growth, the upside risks to inflation were of "greater concern."

Tom Gallagher, a Fed analyst at brokerage firm ISI Group, predicts that after the Fed's next meeting, on Oct. 24 and 25, it will release a statement citing risks to both weaker growth and higher inflation, rather than inflation alone as its statement did last month, while saying inflation risks predominate. He said markets would have to decide what that meant for interest rates.

Since Mr. Kohn's speech, and remarks by Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke on the same day, futures markets have tempered their rate-cut expectations. They now expect one quarter-percentage-point cut by the middle of next year and about even odds on another by the end of next year. A few weeks ago, markets saw at least two and possibly three rate cuts by the end of next year.

In an important development, the Fed's influential professional staff further lowered their estimate of the economy's "potential" growth rate, which is the rate at which it can expand without straining available capital and labor and fueling inflation. While the minutes don't disclose the new figure, they say that as a result of the new estimate, the slowing in growth the staff predicts won't significantly reduce the pressure on the economy's productive capacity. The minutes show, however, that some policy makers were more optimistic on potential growth.

No Hurry To Cut Rates At The Fed (NYT)

By Jeremy W. Peters

The New York Times, October 12, 2006

Despite indications that inflation pressures may be starting to ease, the Federal Reserve is not inclined to lower short-term interest rates anytime soon, minutes from its most recent meeting show.

The reason is uncertainty: uncertainty about the housing market, uncertainty about economic growth and most of all, uncertainty about inflation.

The minutes, released Wednesday after the customary three-week lag from the Sept. 20 meeting of the Federal Open Market Committee, which makes Fed policy, showed that most monetary policy makers expected the economy to slow “in the near term” but pick up speed later.

Nonetheless, committee members remained wary of inflation, with the minutes indicating that officials “continued to see a substantial risk that inflation would not decline as anticipated.”

“Most participants thought that the most likely outcome was a reduction in inflation pressures,” the minutes said. “But the anticipated decline was only gradual and the uncertainties around that forecast were skewed toward higher rather than lower inflation rates.”

The word “uncertainty” or some variation of it appears five times in the minutes.

The decision to leave the overnight benchmark lending rate unchanged at 5.25 percent reflected the belief that falling energy prices and more than two years of previous interest rate increases would help hold inflation down.

While the minutes noted that Fed members believed that their decision last month to leave interest rates unchanged for a second consecutive month was “somewhat less difficult” than their decision in August, it was not a unanimous vote. One of the 10 voting members, Jeffrey M. Lacker, favored a quarter-point rate increase instead.

DOJ_NMG_0079551

Yesterday in Washington, Mr. Lacker, president of the Federal Reserve Bank of Richmond, Va., expanded on the reasons for his dissent. In a speech to the District of Columbia Chamber of Commerce, he said he was concerned that Americans might learn to accept higher inflation as the rule rather than an exception.

"If the Fed were to allow inflation to remain above target for too long, inflation expectations could become centered around the higher rate," he said.

For the last two Fed meetings, Mr. Lacker has been the sole dissenter when the committee voted to leave interest rates unchanged.

"We don't have any perfect measures of inflation expectations," he said, "but what we do have suggests that market participants do not foresee a rapid fall in core inflation. That is why I have argued for further policy actions to convincingly restore price stability."

Many investors have been betting that the Fed will keep rates unchanged for now and eventually cut them. Bond yields, which move in the opposite direction from their price, had been falling since early July, indicating that investors thought the Fed's next move would be to cut rates. When interest rates fall, so do bond yields, making them less attractive investments.

But late last month, bond yields began to rise; after a speech last week by Donald L. Kohn, the Fed's vice chairman, the trend was reinforced. Yesterday the yield on the benchmark 10-year Treasury closed at 4.78 percent, up from 4.75 on Tuesday. The stock market also fell after the Fed released its minutes in mid-afternoon.

Trading in futures markets suggests that most investors now see only a slight chance that the Fed will cut rates by March.

"The Fed itself, while firmly on hold in the near term, is more biased toward tightening than easing," said Dean Maki, chief United States economist for Barclays Capital. "In the minutes, there was no discussion of the possibility of rate cuts, while they did reference the possibility of additional firming."

Joshua Shapiro, chief United States economist at MFR, a consulting firm, wrote in a research report, "The overall message of these minutes is that the F.O.M.C. is in no hurry at all to ease monetary policy."

Wall Street Down On Earnings Fears (FT)

By John O'doherty

Financial Times, October 12, 2006

US stocks closed lower on Wednesday as investors grew cautious following a mixed batch of corporate earnings.

Legg Mason, the mutual fund manager, sank 17.2 per cent to $87.15 after it warned that its second-quarter earnings would come in well below analysts' estimates, partly due to a shift away from equity funds and towards less profitable fixed income funds.

The warning caused Merrill Lynch to cut its rating on the stock from "buy" to "sell". Its shares have dropped 27 per cent this year.

"Given few strong equity products at Legg right now, equity net outflows are likely to continue," said Merrill's Guy Moszkowski in a note to investors. "Without equity net inflows, and after three [quarters of] earnings disappointments, Legg is likely to trade at a 10 per cent discount to the peer average."

The news dented shares in brokerages that were also suffering after Bank of America announced that it would give 30 free trades a month to customers with $25,000 in deposits at the bank.

Charles Schwab fell 4.7 per cent to $17.22 while TD Ameritrade lost 11.9 per cent to $16.82 and E*trade shed 8.8 per cent to $22.31. The AMEX Securities Broker Index sank 4.2 per cent, its worst day in four months.

Aluminium producer Alcoa, the first Dow component to report earnings, lost 5.1 per cent to $26.85. Late on Tuesday, it announced an 86 per cent increase in third quarter profit, significantly less than analysts had ex-pected. Alcoa attributed the results to lower aluminium prices and weakness in the home-building and car- manufacturing markets.

At the close, the S&P 500 was down 0.3 per cent, or 3.47 points, at 1,349.95, while the Nasdaq Composite was down 0.3 per cent, or 7.16 points, at 2,308.27. The Dow Jones Industrial Average slid 0.1 per cent, or 15.04 points, to 11,852.13.

Crude oil futures sank to $57.59 a barrel – their lowest level so far this year – denting energy stocks. Schlumberger dropped 3 per cent to $57.46, while Weatherford International tumbled 3 per cent to $40.52.

DOJ_NMG_0079552

Drugstore CVS rose 4.9 per cent to $31.16 after it reported better-than-expected profit in its preliminary third quarter earnings statement, thanks to a strong back-to-school season.

Fertiliser and agricultural biotechnology group Monsanto slid 5.3 per cent to $43.95 after it announced its third quarter losses were greater than analysts had expected.

Phelps Dodge rose 3.5 per cent to $90.84 after investment group Atticus Capital said it had met with potential buyers of the copper producer to gauge their interest.

Advanced Micro Devices climbed 4.9 per cent to $24.27 after ThinkEquity raised its rating on the stock from "sell" to "buy", saying fourth quarter demand for semiconductors in Asia and Europe should be strong.

Stocks Retreat Despite Drop In Oil Futures (WSJ)

By Peter A. Mckay

The Wall Street Journal, October 12, 2006

Disappointing earnings by the aluminum giant Alcoa pushed the stock market lower -- despite a drop in oil prices to their lowest point this year.

After having hit another record high Tuesday, the Dow Jones Industrial Average yesterday fell 15.04 points, or 0.1%, to 11852.13, up 10.6% on the year.

The worst-performing stock among the Dow's 30 components was Alcoa, which fell more than 5% on the heels of posting earnings well below Wall Street expectations. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index shed 0.3%, or 3.47 points, to 1349.95, up 8.1% on the year. The tech-stock-heavy Nasdaq Composite Index fell 0.3%, or 7.16 points, to 2308.27, up 4.7% on the year.

The Dow briefly dropped nearly 75 points late in the day after the crash of a small aircraft into a New York City building, but bounced back following indications the crash wasn't terrorism-related.

The Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries confirmed it will cut production at the end of the month by one million barrels a day, which is less than 4% of the cartel's current output.

For several days before the announcement, such a move had already been debated on Wall Street. Many analysts remain skeptical of the cartel's resolve to stick to a cutback plan. Crude futures tumbled 93 cents, or 1.6%, to $57.59 a barrel, off 5.7% on the year at the New York Mercantile Exchange and 25% below the Nymex record hit in July.

In economic news, the Federal Reserve released the minutes of its Sept. 20 meeting, reflecting lingering but moderate inflation fears among most Fed officials. The lone dissenter at the meeting, at which the central bank left its key interest-rate target unchanged at 5.25%, was Richmond Fed President Jeffrey Lacker. In a speech yesterday, he reiterated that he thinks the Fed should raise its key rate target.

Some Wall Street pros harbor similar concerns. "You're getting close to the point where we're running at relatively full capacity," said Gordon Fowler, chief investment officer at Philadelphia money-management firm Glenmede Trust.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks and bonds fell. The 10-year note slipped 7/32 point, or $2.1875 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield up to 4.782%. The 30-year bond fell 10/32 to yield 4.907%.

The dollar was mixed. Against the Japanese currency, the dollar fell to 119.72 yen, compared with 119.73. The euro fell against the dollar to $1.2524, compared with $1.2537.

OPEC Vows Output Cut, But Market Is Skeptical (WSJ)

By Steve Levine

The Wall Street Journal, October 12, 2006

Oil markets brushed off OPEC's declaration of its intent to cut petroleum production by one million barrels a day and drove crude prices to a low for the year, as the cartel continued horse-trading behind the scenes over critical details of the deal.

OPEC President Edmund Daukoru, who is also Nigeria's oil minister, yesterday said the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries would cut production by one million barrels a day. He said all that remained was to apportion the reductions. "The cut itself is agreed," Mr. Daukoru said.

DOJ_NMG_0079553

The oil market, however, appears skeptical of OPEC's resolve. Yesterday, crude-oil futures on the New York Mercantile Exchange fell 93 cents, or 1.6%, to $57.59, their lowest level since Dec. 19. Crude prices have plunged from a nominal settlement high of $77.03 on July 14. They remain well below an inflation-adjusted high of $99.56, reached in April 1980.

Deciding on how to divvy up the output cuts is a pivotal detail. Mr. Daukoru's statement differed little from remarks he made last week, and many analysts think the only consensus in the organization is for a need to stop the plunge in prices -- not on how to do so.

Larry Goldstein, president of the New York-based Petroleum Industry Research Foundation, said Mr. Daukoru appeared to be assuming the role of a "cheerleader to try to stop the precipitous selloff, to try to talk the market back up."

The 10 OPEC nations in the cartel's quota system pump an estimated 27.5 million barrels a day of crude, about a third of the world's daily demand.

At their meeting last month in Vienna, OPEC members discussed a formal production cut. But in the end, they went the other way, abandoning their formal quota system, in which each country was held, at least technically, to a specific volume. Instead, the organization decided to allow members to change output based on market conditions.

If the organization does cut production now, its members appeared poised to do so from their current production, rather than from the now-notional quotas, said Roger Diwan, an analyst with Washington-based PFC Energy. Thus far, OPEC members have publicly differed on this point. Analysts regarded that divergence as a significant point because some OPEC members, such as Algeria, are producing more than their quotas and probably would oppose having to cut from their former quota levels and lose far more in oil proceeds.

The group is scheduled to meet next in December in the Nigerian city of Abuja. Industry analysts had expected OPEC members to finally agree at that meeting on how to cut production in the face of a potential glut of global crude oil. The unexpected plunge in prices forced the issue to be hashed out early.

That the discussion has dragged on, and in a public way, has made oil markets jittery. Saudi Arabia, by far the largest OPEC crude producer, at about 9.1 million barrels a day, has stayed silent. The Saudis have privately taken measures to reduce output by adjusting the price of their oil rather than changing production, thus attempting to reduce demand for their crude.

First Lady Launches Four-state Campaign Swing (AP)

By Dan Sewell

The Associated Press, October 12, 2006

CINCINNATI - Laura Bush, a popular campaign-booster for Republicans across the country, began a four-state swing Wednesday with a fundraiser for an Ohio congressman in a heated re-election battle.

After helping raise some $170,000 at a luncheon for six-term Rep. Steve Chabot, Mrs. Bush headed to Knoxville, Tenn., to raise money for Republican Senate candidate Bob Corker. She planned to be in Indiana and Missouri on Thursday for GOP candidates.

Party officials say she has raised nearly $14 million for Republican candidates for the Nov. 7 election. And Mrs. Bush's visits usually don't carry the baggage of the president's sagging approval ratings.

"Everybody respects and admires her," said H.C. "Buck" Niehoff, a longtime Cincinnati area Republican activist. "And she's an attractive fundraiser, as you can see from the turnout today."

Chabot has tried to emphasize his independence and his representation of his constituents in Washington, while Democratic challenger John Cranley, a Cincinnati city councilman, has tied Chabot to Bush. In one Cranley commercial, the voice of a Bush impersonator is heard supposedly telephoning Chabot, whom he calls "Chabby" and concludes: "Steve, I know I can always count on you."

"She may well be one of the most popular first ladies in American history," Chabot said while introducing Mrs. Bush at Cincinnati's historic Union Terminal and museum center.

Chabot said afterward he'd welcome the president's campaign help, too. He noted Vice President Dick Cheney came to Cincinnati to raise funds for him in August.

"We're not distancing ourselves from the administration at all," Chabot said in an interview. "That's certainly not the case."

DOJ_NMG_0079554

He said he agrees with Bush more often than not, but has disagreed with the president on such issues as immigration.

Mrs. Bush praised Chabot as "a wonderful leader for Ohio" to some 150 people in an event that was rescheduled from August because it conflicted with the funeral of Marine Cpl. Timothy Roos of the Cincinnati area, killed in Iraq.

Among Wednesday's audience were parents of three other Ohio Marines - Sgt. David Kreuter, Lance Cpl. Michael J. Cifuentes and Lance Cpl. Christopher Dyer - killed in Iraq and of Army Sgt. Benjamin Moore, killed in an accident while training in Texas for Iraq duty.

The crowd rose in a standing ovation when Mrs. Bush thanked them.

After the luncheon, Mrs. Bush toured the children's museum at the center, posing for photos with giggling children and their parents, and then quietly viewed a special exhibit of children's drawings, letters, quilt squares and other artwork about the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

Also on Mrs. Bush's schedule were a Helping America's Youth event in Knoxville and a tree-planting ceremony and a breast cancer awareness event in St. Louis on Thursday.

NRA Backs Both Sides Of Aisle (WSJ)

By Gary Fields

The Wall Street Journal, October 12, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The National Rifle Association has a simple agenda in Washington: protecting gun ownership. But it faces a complex challenge this campaign season: supporting Republican control of Congress while staying loyal to Democratic candidates who supported the gun lobby.

"We will endorse regardless of party," says Chris Cox, executive director of the NRA's Institute for Legislative Action. "However, gun owners are very concerned and do not want as speaker Nancy Pelosi, who has been consistently vocal against their rights. They understand the significance of these elections."

That means the NRA, which sits on a campaign war chest of $20 million, is expecting to endorse as many as 60 Democrats in House and Senate elections, about the same number it endorsed in every national election since 2002 and three times the 20 or so Democrats it supported in races during the early 1990s. At the same time, the NRA wants to make sure Republicans keep control of Congress.

The NRA's balancing act stands out in a year when other Republican-leaning industry and trade groups are working to keep Congress in Republican hands while not turning their backs on Democrats who have been helpful and who might control one or both chambers in January.

In the past five years, the NRA and its allies have notched a host of political gains on Capitol Hill. At the urging of the NRA, Congress in 2004 allowed the ban on assault weapons to lapse when no legislation was produced to extend it, although President Bush had said he would have signed such a measure. In another reversal of the gun-control lobby's heyday, the amount of time the Federal Bureau of Investigation can hold records of gun sales has been reduced to 24 hours from three days. Even protests from the FBI that it should be allowed to hold the records 72 hours to ensure that gun dealers and buyers hadn't found a way to circumvent the system were rejected.

And in a landmark win for the industry, the House and Senate easily passed a law limiting the ability of municipalities and cities to hold the firearms industry liable for some acts of violence. The lobby's power also has moved into appropriations language. Riders have been attached to appropriations for the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives budget since 2003 preventing the agency from releasing firearms-tracing data collected by various law-enforcement agencies. Before heading home recently for midterm elections, the House voted 277-131 to pass a bill that would limit the ATF's ability to sanction gun dealers who are shoddy with their records keeping even though only about 100 of the more than 104,000 federally licensed dealers have their licenses revoked annually.

Behind the gun lobby's winning streak is support not only from Republicans but also from some Democrats, especially those in swing states, who remember that the backlash over the 1994 assault-weapons ban played a role in defeating several Democratic members of Congress that year. Gun control doesn't figure prominently in the Democratic platform, and beyond debates over extending the assault-weapons ban, there has been no traction for gun-control proposals.

DOJ_NMG_0079555

The NRA has returned the favor. In this year's election, the group is backing Nebraska Sen. Ben Nelson, Oklahoma Rep. Dan Boren, Tennessee Rep. John Tanner and West Virginia Rep. Alan Mollohan, among others. In gubernatorial races, the NRA has endorsed Democrats in Oklahoma, Tennessee and Wyoming, and Bill Richardson, the former Clinton energy secretary and cabinet member, in New Mexico.

"The NRA is not an affiliate of the Republican party," said Grover Norquist, a conservative activist who also is an NRA board member. "They endorse incumbent Democrats who have voted with them on their issue. They understand that the first time they oppose a Democrat who has been supportive of the gun issue, they lose that D vote."

The NRA is still rallying its more than 20 million members and associates with the prospect of liberal Democrats, such as California Rep. Pelosi and Michigan Rep. John Conyers, controlling Congress, with Ms. Pelosi in line to be speaker and Mr. Conyers a possible chairman of the House Judiciary Committee.

"While a lot of other people look at Pelosi and Chairman Conyers as sound bites, for us it's a real-life nightmare," said Wayne LaPierre, NRA executive vice president and chief executive.

Stacey Paxton, spokeswoman for the Democratic National Committee, says firearms aren't on the list of priorities Democrats would address if they gain control of committees on Capitol Hill. "This isn't anything that's on the radar screen right now," she said. Using the gun issue to frighten voters is "more of a desperate attempt to try to distract people from the real issues facing Congress right now and the choice people have before them in November."

Mr. Conyers earned the opposition of the NRA when -- more than 30 years ago -- he proposed banning handgun ownership by private citizens, in part because of gun violence in his district. In the intervening three decades, Mr. Conyers has participated in the debate on gun control, backing the measures passed in the 1990s and co-sponsoring the failed 2004 proposal to reauthorize the assault-weapons ban to include a wider range of guns. In recent years, though, he has focused more on questioning the Bush administration's war on terrorism, including challenging the intelligence used to invade Iraq, the secret wiretapping program and the administration's stance on torture.

In a statement, Mr. Conyers said, "If I become chairman of the Judiciary Committee, I certainly will not support or forward to the House any legislation to ban handguns. Any suggestion to the contrary represents last-minute desperation on the part of rubber-stamp, 'stay the course' Republicans frantically trying to find a way to motivate their base."

For now, the NRA plans to run radio and television advertisements similar to spots it ran in 2005 in Virginia, where it supported Republican gubernatorial candidate Jerry Kilgore in his failed race. However, those methods are just part of a campaign that will include direct mailing to NRA members and associates, as well as ads on Web sites.

House GOP Revamps TV Ad Campaign Plans (NOVR)

By David Espo

Newsobserver.com, October 12, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) - House Republicans are scaling back television advertising reserved for four Democratic-held seats in Ohio, South Carolina and West Virginia, officials said Wednesday, fresh evidence of the party's struggles as it tries to retain its majority.

At the same time, GOP strategists signaled they intend to spend nearly $1 million in an attempt to hold the seat recently vacated by Rep. Mark Foley. The Florida Republican quit Congress last month after being confronted with sexually explicit computer messages he sent to teenage male pages.

Democrats, who must gain 15 seats to win House control, said the moves were evidence that time was running out on the GOP majority. "The fact is, defending a failed economy for the middle class and the disaster in Iraq was always going to be too expensive a proposition for Republicans," said Bill Burton, a Democratic spokesman.

Carl Forti, a spokesman for House Republicans, countered, "We'll find out who's winning on election day."

Democrats, too, were rearranging their plans as the campaign headed into its final stages.

While some of their changes reflected confidence, that did not appear to be the case in Arizona, where the party has pared back plans to advertise against Republican Rep. J.D. Hayworth.

DOJ_NMG_0079556

The maneuvering unfolded as Republicans struggled to regain their balance after more than a week of Foley-related controversy and persistent questions about when GOP congressional leaders learned of the issue and how quickly they acted.

The House ethics committee and the FBI are both investigating, Foley is in an alcoholic recovery program after resigning from Congress, Speaker Dennis Hastert has come under fire for his handling of the matter - and public surveys indicate Republicans are paying a price in the polls.

Compounding the sense of confusion, a prominent conservative activist said Hastert's tenure as speaker would likely soon be over - one way or another.

"In all probability Speaker Hastert will be replaced next year, whether it's because the Democrats take over or it's because Republicans retain control and they decide he's been Speaker long enough," said Paul Weyrich.

In an interview, Weyrich said he was basing his prediction on recent conversations with GOP lawmakers, from "so many Republicans who are now defending the Speaker who are saying if some miracle we should hold onto the majority, 'I think we need another Speaker.'"

Last week, Weyrich stirred controversy when he called for Hastert to resign, then changed his mind. In making his most recent comments, he said he doesn't agree with those calling for Hastert to be replaced.

With Republicans scuffling, President Bush campaigned from the Rose Garden. He predicted his party would retain control of Congress and said the election would turn on the economy and the war on terror - not on the scandal spawned by Foley.

At a nationally televised news conference, he said six times in the space of a few moments that Democrats who support a timetable for a troop withdrawal from Iraq advocate a strategy of "cut and run."

Turning to another familiar campaign theme, he said the Democrats would raise taxes more than they will admit. "Now, I know they say only on the rich people, but that's ... just code word. They're going to raise them on whoever they can raise them on," he added.

Bush also took a jab at former President Clinton for his handling of North Korea, the Communist regime that claimed earlier this week it had conducted a nuclear test.

"I appreciate the efforts of previous administrations. It just didn't work," he said, after mentioning that under Clinton, the United States had engaged in one-on-one talks with North Korea.

Democrats quickly hit back on both counts.

"North Korea's apparent nuclear test is clear evidence of the failure of the Bush administration when it comes to nuclear proliferation," said Sen. Dick Durbin of Illinois, the No. 2 Senate Democrat. He accused the president's team of giving up on the "successful diplomacy" begun by Clinton.

As for taxes, House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi of California responded with a statement. "President Bush and his rubber stamp Republican Congress can't seem to grasp that Democrats have long fought for middle-income tax cuts. This is in stark contrast to the Republican tax breaks for the super rich that have led to a budget that is grossly out of balance and a national debt that is morally indefensible."

In an interview last week, she said Bush-era tax cuts would have to be rolled back for those above "a certain level." She mentioned annual incomes of $250,000 or $300,000 a year and higher, and said tax rates for those individuals might revert to those of the Clinton era. Details will have to be worked out, she emphasized.

Both political parties have Washington-based committees that spend millions helping their candidates in both House and Senate races, often by paying for hard-hitting television ads or campaign mail, and usually in the final weeks of a campaign.

The GOP moves reflect pessimism about the party's ability to defeat Democratic Reps. John Spratt in South Carolina or Alan Mollohan of West Virginia, or capture either of two seats held by Democrats running for statewide office in Ohio.

Betty Sutton is running to succeed Rep. Sherrod Brown in one of the two; and Charlie Wilson is the Democratic candidate in the district currently represented by Rep. Ted Strickland. Brown is running for the Senate, and Strickland is the Democrats' gubernatorial candidate.

In Florida, Republicans reserved nearly $1 million in television advertising time through Election Day to aid their replacement candidate, state Rep. Joe Negron. The Democrat in the race is Tim Mahoney. Under state law, Foley's name will remain on the ballot, and any votes cast for him will be credited to Negron.

DOJ_NMG_0079557

Because their money is limited, the committees customarily concentrate on the races they deem the most competitive, and a change in plans can be significant.

Despite the moves, Republicans are continuing to contest three Democratic-held seats in Iowa and Georgia, as well as the Vermont seat that independent Rep. Bernie Sanders is giving up to run for the Senate.

Democrats have scaled back advertising plans in Indiana, Illinois and Texas recently, but officials said that reflected confidence they would pick off two Republican-held seats, rather than a decision to accept defeat.

In Indiana, Republican Rep. John Hostettler trails his Democratic challenger in the polls, and in the other, former Rep. Nick Lampson is running against a write-in challenger to replace former Rep. Tom DeLay.

The Fight For Congress: I've Seen This Movie Before (RC)

By Stuart Rothenberg

Roll Call, October 12, 2006

Three weeks ago, some people were talking about a Republican surge that never really existed. Now, others mistakenly are talking as if the page scandal surrounding ex-Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) hasfundamentally changed the election cycle. It hasn't. What we are seeing, increasingly, is 1994, with the parties reversed.

The midterm elections overwhelmingly remain a referendum on President Bush and the Republican Congress. The Foley scandal makes it more difficult for GOP candidates across the country to cut through the media coverage of the controversy and to localize their races and discredit their Democratic opponents. But the Republicans were in a hole even before the most recent flap.

Clearly, the scandal has allowed Democrats to return to the party's "culture of corruption" argument that it largely dropped during the summer. That feeds into the Democrats' larger "change" argument, an argument that apparently resonates with voters who disapprove of the job the president and Congress are doing, and who think that the country is headed in the wrong direction.

Democrats now deserve to be solid favorites to win control of the House of Representatives. They already have six to nine GOP seats in the bag, with another two dozen serious opportunities.

The fallout from the Foley scandal does increase the possible size of an already substantial Democratic wave. That means that low second- and third-tier Democratic challengers must now be taken more seriously, and it increases the chances that entrenched Republicans in marginal districts — even those without particularly credible Democratic opponents — could find themselves in jeopardy on Nov. 7.

The problem for Republican Members of Congress is that the election cycle isn't about them as individuals, or their opponents. It's a referendum on the president and the direction of the country. True, the GOP still has more than three weeks to "localize" individual House and Senate races, but the burden remains on Republican candidates to change the focus of the midterms.

The major impact of the Foley scandal potentially is to further depress Republican turnout. If turnout is down, it also will increase Democrats' chances of winning the Senate. Republican prospects in both Virginia and Tennessee have eroded, and while Democrats Jim Webb (Va.) and Rep. Harold Ford Jr. (Tenn.) still have plenty of work to do to win their Senate contests, both races clearly have become competitive.

Personally, I'm skeptical about all of the talk about evangelical voters deserting the GOP in droves, and I thought David Kirkpatrick hit the nail on the head in Monday's New York Times.

For most evangelicals, politics is about where the two parties stand on cultural issues, not whether House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) goes to church, whether Foley has a serious personal problem or whether the Republican Congressional leadership mishandled the page scandal issue. Still, overall turnout is a big GOP problem because of the president's and Congress' standing, and that includes evangelical Republicans.

No matter what the final results, Republicans will suffer serious losses next month. Losing just a dozen House seats would be a resounding victory for the GOP, since losses in excess of 20 seats are possible. In the Senate, most Republicans would be content if the party loses only four or five seats, thereby keeping control.

DOJ_NMG_0079558

If Republicans lose even one chamber of Congress, I expect allies of the president to cite Congressional GOP scandals and paint the results as a rejection of Capitol Hill Republicans, not of President Bush. If that's ultimately the White House line, I hope nobody swallows it.

Clearly, the elections so far have been, and continue to be, about Bush and the administration's performance, not about the GOP Congressional leadership. And if Republicans get spanked by voters, it won't be the fault of the National Republican Congressional Committee, which is once again doing everything it can, given the cards that it holds.

But with Bush still having two years left to govern, the White House is going to have to try to pass the buck, and the blame, to Foley, Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) and anyone else it can think of. And that won't be the extent of the GOP infighting. You can bet that conservatives will complain that moderate voters proved unreliable, just as you can expect moderates to complain that conservatives were intolerant and too ideological.

The 2006 elections increasingly resemble those of 1994, when Republicans ran as the party of change against then-President Bill Clinton. This cycle, Democrats are running to check Bush much as Republicans ran against Clinton a dozen years ago. Unpopular presidents tend to produce difficult, often disastrous, midterms for the party in power. That's what is happening to the GOP this year, pure and simple.

Will Voters Pull The Trigger? (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, October 12, 2006

The old theater adage demands that if you show a pistol in Act 1, you'd better fire the gun in Act 3. That same wisdom applies to politics.

The voters have been pointing a symbolic gun at the Republican regime in Washington for many months now. All that remains is for them to pull the trigger on Election Day.

When you examine the latest round of preelection polls, what is striking is the stability of public attitudes over the preceding months. In this week's Post-ABC News poll, for example, President Bush has a job approval score of 39 percent, with 60 percent disapproving. Eleven months earlier, in November 2005, the scores were identical.

In between, Bush got up as high as 47 percent and fell as low as 33 percent. But at no time did more Americans approve of his job performance than disapprove.

The public has shown similar consistency with party support for Congress. In the latest poll, Democrats lead Republicans, 54 percent to 41 percent, among registered voters. In November 2005 the Democrats led 52 percent to 37 percent. The margins are almost identical.

To take one more example, look at the broad question of the overall direction of the nation -- right path or wrong track. In this latest poll, by a margin of 66 percent to 32 percent, people said "wrong track." Last November the comparable numbers were 68 and 30 percent.

What all this suggests is a settled judgment on the part of the majority of Americans that the current leadership of the nation is not doing the job that people expect. This is the government the people chose in 2004, but now they are showing clear signs of buyer's remorse.

The disillusionment is not the product of the Foley scandal, which is shifting few votes, as far as I can judge. And it also reflects more than the continuing bad news from Iraq, though that has had a large effect on public opinion.

What is driving public opinion is an overall impression that those in office -- meaning mainly Republicans -- have let things slide out of control and need to be relieved.

What voters may not know is that the same judgment has been reached by a significant number of people who are part of -- or close to -- the Republican majority. If I have heard it once, I have heard it a dozen times: Major Republican figures, including top officials of several past GOP administrations and Congresses, say, "We deserve to lose this election."

The failure is most evident at the Capitol end of Pennsylvania Avenue. The one measure of opinion that has shifted significantly in the past year is the public judgment of Congress. In the latest poll, it is negative by a 66 to 32 percent margin. Last November the gap was much smaller, with 59 percent disapproving and 37 percent approving.

DOJ_NMG_0079559

The failure of this Congress to act meaningfully on immigration, energy, health care or other vital needs has left the public frustrated -- and members of Congress feeling embattled.

But there is also a palpable sense of weariness in the executive branch and a need for relief there as well.

Fortunately, the voters have the power -- if they pull the trigger on Election Day -- to create a new plot for the Washington drama. This election campaign has been a learning experience for candidates of both parties, incumbents and challengers alike. They have been bombarded with messages from their constituents, telling them that the public is tired of the partisan bickering, tired of the gridlock and eager to elect people who will focus on the real problems and work together to find solutions.

If that lesson is reinforced by the election results, Washington will change. Congress will be run by people who talk with each other, across party lines. And even the White House may learn that it needs to end its isolation and engage more broadly at home and abroad if it is to salvage some substantial accomplishments from Bush's final two years in office.

That kind of fundamental change in the political environment is possible -- indeed, it is imminent and will be welcomed. But it will happen only if voters pull the trigger. Elections do matter, and this one matters more than most.

Â·

R.W. "Johnny" Apple, the New York Times political reporter who died last week, set the standard for our business for all of his working life. He covered the beat -- and wined and dined -- better than anyone else, and the joyfulness of his life was infectious.

Around Pentagon, Referendum On War (WP)

By Tim Craig

The Washington Post, October 12, 2006

Virginia's U.S. Senate race could become the nation's marquee referendum on President Bush's Iraq policy as George Allen and James Webb offer voters stark differences about a war that polls show is increasingly unpopular.

Though the candidates have been sidetracked for weeks by questions about character, the war is a major issue in a state that is home to the Pentagon, the world's largest naval station, at Norfolk, and tens of thousands of veterans. The Democratic candidate in the Virginia Senate race is one of the few running this fall who is a decorated Vietnam War hero whose son is serving in Iraq with the Marine Corps.

The war is dominating Senate races across the country, but Bush easily won Virginia in 2004 and Democrats are hoping to prove that public attitudes about the war are changing.

"Webb and Allen are essentially reflecting what seems to be the two national party positions on the war," said Mark Rush, a political science professor at Washington and Lee University. "You essentially have Allen saying 'Stay the course.' . . . The Democrat is saying, 'We can do it better and differently,' but doesn't really say how."

Republican Sen. Allen, who in 2002 voted to authorize the use of force against Iraq, has been a steadfast supporter of Bush's decision to invade, remove Saddam Hussein and turn the country over to an elected government. Allen, who won't rule out sending more troops to Iraq, said the United States cannot afford to withdraw without a decisive victory that guarantees that the country will not become a haven for terrorists.

Webb, a former Marine, opposed the conflict before it began. He calls the war a "strategic blunder of historic proportions" and wants to reposition troops to other Arab nations, out of harm's way. "We didn't go into Iraq because of terrorism. We have terrorism in Iraq because we went in there," Webb says.

But beyond the contenders' backgrounds and TV sound bites, foreign policy and political analysts say neither candidate has provided comprehensive plans for either a victory or a quick withdrawal. Absent those, voters could be left to make decisions based on each candidate's position before the war started in 2003 and which of the two offers the best hope for getting the troops out as quickly as possible, foreign policy analysts say.

"It is really a referendum on decisions made years ago rather than presenting the voters with two different, viable set of options," said Nathan J. Brown, a senior associate at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace.

Webb wants the United States to involve Iraq's neighbors, including Iran and Syria, in discussions about how to bring stability to the region. Allen chides the idea, saying the United States should not talk to sponsors of terrorism.

DOJ_NMG_0079560

On the campaign trail, Allen, who says he keeps a slain Virginia soldier's dog tags on his mirror at home, is fond of saying "there is no substitute for victory" and troops need to come home in "victory, not defeat." Webb says the troops have a victory because they deposed Hussein and concluded the hunt for weapons of mass destruction.

Webb, who says that the U.S. presence is inciting attacks on American troops, has also called for a clear statement from Bush that the country has no plans to occupy Iraq. Webb has accused Allen of supporting plans to build four permanent military bases in Iraq.

Allen counters that the bases are needed to protect troops, but he discounts Webb's assertion that the bases are there to stay. Allen notes that he recently voted for a congressional resolution stating that the bases are not permanent.

The candidates' positions on Iraq have been evolving.

Allen has embraced Bush's sound bite that the United States cannot "cut and run" in Iraq. He says troops can start withdrawing when Iraqi forces are capable of protecting the country.

In the past week, Allen has been trying to link himself to Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.). Warner, the chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, returned last week from a trip to Iraq and said the United States may have to change course if the level of violence does not decrease within the next several months. Iraq is "drifting sideways," he said.

Webb seized on Warner's assessment, saying Warner proves that Allen is out of touch on the war. Allen tried to deflect Webb's attack by appearing with Warner on a conference call with reporters during which the two senators tried to play down any differences between them.

"I'm working in the Senate with Senator Warner on this issue," Allen said of the war. "I have said on many occasions I am concerned about it. I have seen how tough it is for families. . . . But these terrorist threats we face are real."

Allen then accused Webb of playing a "political game" by trying to make an issue of the war, which polls show is a top concern of voters. In an interview later, Warner declined to criticize Webb, a former Republican who served on his staff when Warner was secretary of the Navy in the early 1970s. In the 1980s, Webb was secretary of the Navy.

Webb was drafted into the race by antiwar bloggers who thought his military rÃ©sumÃ© and background as an author gave their movement credibility in relatively conservative Virginia.

Webb has shied away from embracing calls for a timetable for troop withdrawal and he opposes Congress cutting off funding for the war.

Webb instead says he thinks the United States can be out of Iraq within two years "with the right kind of leadership."

"The people who failed to prevent this disaster are not the ones you can count on to fix it," Webb says in a television commercial he is airing that tries to link Allen to Bush on the war issue.

Lawrence B. Wilkerson, a Republican who worked as chief of staff to then-Secretary of State Colin L. Powell between 2002 and 2004, said Webb's approach is one of "diplomacy because bombs, bullets and bayonets aren't going to work anymore."

"A lot of this insurgency is anti-occupation," said Wilkerson, who has endorsed Webb and has criticized Bush.

James Jay Carafano and James A. Phillips, two analysts at the conservative-leaning Heritage Foundation, published an article last week predicting chaos in Iraq if U.S. troops leave without finishing the war.

They say the ensuing civil strife would strengthen Iran and Al-Qaeda, escalate energy prices and cause a catastrophe for the Iraqi people.

"There is an assumption if we pull out, we won't have to go back in," Phillips said in an interview. "But I will argue we will have to go back in again and again not only to fight al-Qaeda, but if full-scale civil war breaks out, there will be calls for humanitarian intervention."

Richard K. Betts, director of the Saltzman Institute of War and Peace Studies at Columbia University, said there is no good option for those wanting a quick end to the war, which has claimed the lives of more than 2,700 service personnel and wounded 20,000.

"The people who got us into this and the people who were against this from the beginning are stuck with a situation they can't find a way out of where it doesn't look as if it's going to pose severe damage to our interests as well as Iraq's," Betts said.

Betts says this year's Virginia Senate race bears a resemblance to past presidential races.

DOJ_NMG_0079561

In 1968, Republican Richard M. Nixon successfully ran for president railing against two successive Democratic administrations that he blamed for entangling the United States in the Vietnam War. Nixon pledged to end the war but did not spell out how he planned to succeed. The last U.S. troops left Vietnam in 1975. In the 2004 presidential race, Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.), a Vietnam veteran, argued that voters should trust him instead of Bush to resolve the war in Iraq but declined to set a timetable for withdrawal.

Unlike Kerry, who voted to authorize the use of force against Iraq, Webb spoke out against the war six months before it started. Webb wrote an editorial in The Washington Post in which he warned that U.S. troops in Iraq "would quickly become 50,000 terrorist targets."

"If voters send Webb to the Senate, especially if the Democrats have a majority in the Senate, they may be forming a national spokesperson for the party on Iraq," said Brown of the Carnegie Endowment.

Phillips said that would only undermine the effort to finish the job in Iraq.

"It would be total paralysis if you had 100 secretaries of state," he said, referring to the number of U.S. senators.

Talent, McCaskill Put Contrasts On Display During Debate (SLPD)

By Jo Mannies

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, October 12, 2006

U.S. Sen. Jim Talent, R-Mo., and his Democratic rival, state Auditor Claire McCaskill, sparred over familiar differences and took on some new ones Wednesday during their third debate.

The familiar ones: Iraq, renewable fuels and stem cell research.

Among the new ones: how best to serve the black community and how to confront North Korea's efforts to become a nuclear power.

Wednesday's hourlong session at Clayton High School was the first of three prime-time televised debates between the two candidates to be held in the state within a week.

McCaskill repeatedly portrayed Talent and the Republicans who control Washington as out of touch with average Americans and allowing "steadfastness to turn into stubbornness."

Talent, in turn, asserted that McCaskill was too negative. "Opposing something because your opponent is for it isn't changing Washington - that is Washington," he said.

Talent painted McCaskill as "taking positions of weakness" when it comes to confronting and combating terrorists. He reaffirmed his support for the Bush administration's electronic surveillance of communications between Americans and suspected terrorists overseas.

McCaskill contended that Talent had been too weak as a member of the Armed Services Committee in challenging administration policies. "Strength is asking the tough questions," she said.

The candidates also zeroed in on their chief campaign themes:

Talent emphasized his record, during his four years in the Senate, of pushing for alternative fuels, battling methamphetamine production and supporting the new prescription drug program. He also reiterated that he believed the United States must keep its military forces in Iraq "until the mission is complete."

McCaskill promoted her record as state auditor and her call for change in Washington and overseas. She emphasized her opposition to the Bush administration's tax breaks, saying they were weighted too much to the wealthy, and her objection to the federal energy bill, which she said is "too much of a handout to big oil."

On Iraq, Talent repeated his view that "completing the mission in Iraq will be a tremendous benefit to us," and make it less likely that the United States will see terrorist attacks at home.

McCaskill re-emphasized her view that "we must change course" and move troops over the next two years into other parts of the Middle East. "We must re-engage," she said.

Both also offered different takes on North Korea claim to have exploded a nuclear bomb on Monday. McCaskill called for bilateral talks and blamed President George W. Bush's administration for isolating the United States from potential allies.

DOJ_NMG_0079562

Talent asserted that former President Bill Clinton's administration had been too soft on North Korean leader Kim Jong Il, who, Talent said, "took us in."

When asked who was best equipped to represent minority concerns, Talent and McCaskill - both white suburbanites - emphasized their key philosophies. Talent said he would be better at advancing policies to empower minorities with more opportunities, while McCaskill said she would protect certain government programs - such as college grants and loans - that would offer minorities the tools to get ahead.

On stem cell research, Talent reaffirmed his opposition to Amendment 2, the ballot proposal to protect in Missouri all forms of stem cell research allowed under federal law. He quipped that he doesn't want to "see myself coming in the other direction."

McCaskill accused Talent of mischaracterizing the amendment, which she noted had provisions to ban human cloning and to prevent the sale of human eggs for research. She emphasized her support for the amendment. "My faith dictates we should heal the sick," she said.

On eminent domain, both promised to protect the rights of property owners.

Wednesday's debate was before an audience of several hundred people, including about 100 students from Clayton High School. Relatives and supporters of Talent and McCaskill sat in the front rows. It was televised live on KSDK (Channel 5), a co-sponsor of the debate, along with the Clayton Chamber of Commerce, the St. Louis Business Journal and the law firm of Husch & Eppenberger. It was broadcast live on radio station KWMU (90.7 FM).

The debate excluded the two third-party candidates, Libertarian Frank Gilmour and Progressive Party candidate Lydia Lewis. Neither is included in the next televised debates, which will be aired live next Monday from Springfield, Mo., and on Wednesday from Kansas City.

McCaskill Casts Self As Truman; Talent Claims She's Weak (KCS)

By David A. Lieb

The Kansas City Star, October 12, 2006

CLAYTON, Mo. - Democratic Senate candidate Claire McCaskill cast herself as the next Harry Truman on Wednesday night as she sought to wrest Truman's old Missouri Senate seat away from Republican Sen. Jim Talent. But Talent claimed McCaskill was weak, not Truman-tough.

McCaskill focused on the war in Iraq and against terrorists, criticizing Talent for his unquestioning support of what she described as President Bush's stubborn foreign policy.

Talent countered that McCaskill "supports consistent positions of weakness in the war on terror." Every chance he could, Talent turned the debate toward domestic issues, noting his successful support for such things as alternative fuels and a Medicare prescription drug benefit for seniors.

Although Republican- and Democratic-funded TV ads have been blaring with negativity in Missouri for weeks, the debate before about 500 people at Clayton Senior High School remained civil - calm tones, smiles and no finger-pointing. Even the rival Talent and McCaskill demonstrators outside the auditorium posed no problems, police said.

McCaskill used her opening statement to compare herself to one of Missouri's most beloved and enduring political figures. She noted that Truman, as a member of the Senate Armed Services Committee, asked tough questions about war profiteering, waste and abuse during World War II - even though a fellow Democrat controlled the White House.

Yet she said Talent remained silent - not asking a single question - on four separate occasions over several years when Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld appeared before the Armed Services Committee, of which Talent is a member. Other senators, both Republican and Democrat, quizzed Rumsfeld intensely, she noted.

"Strength is the ability to ask questions and get to the bottom of the problems we have in Washington," McCaskill said. "I will be that kind of senator."

Her assertion was a pre-emptive rebuttal of Talent, who has repeatedly characterized McCaskill's foreign policy positions as weak. Among other things, McCaskill has called for U.S. troops to be redeployed from Iraq over the next two years or so.

Talking with reporters after the debate, Talent defended his assertiveness as a member of the Armed Services Committee.

DOJ_NMG_0079563

"I've asked thousands of questions at Armed Services hearings," Talent said. "Now are there hearings where I have not asked a question? Sure. There's hearings where every committee member does not ask a question."

Talent, meanwhile, suggested during the debate that McCaskill opposed all the measures he touts: the energy bill containing a renewable fuels standard, the Medicare drug benefit, an anti-methamphetamine bill and a bill targeting payday lenders who profit from military members.

"I don't know a politician in the country who opposed all four of them, except my opponent in this race," Talent said.

McCaskill said she opposed the energy bill because it contained billions of dollars of tax breaks for "big oil." She has criticized the prescription drug bill for not doing enough to lower the prices seniors pay for medicine and has claimed the payday loan bill didn't go far enough. She has insisted she supports the anti-methamphetamine legislation.

The candidates answered 10 questions Wednesday, including one not asked in either of their two previous debates about their positions on eminent domain. Both decried abuses of the power to take private property for redevelopment by others.

But they differed slightly in their interpretation of a 2005 U.S. Supreme Court ruling upholding the use of eminent domain to transfer property from one private owner to another who could generate more tax revenues by redeveloping it.

McCaskill said the ruling essentially left the issue to local governments. Talent said the Supreme Court "made a mistake in basically abdicating what I saw as its responsibility to ensure that private land is not taken for private uses."

Talent, however, cut short his eminent domain response to rehash his support for domestic issues that he claimed McCaskill opposed. McCaskill then followed that line of debate.

That prompted the moderator to remind the candidates to respond to the question asked.

"I'm sorry," Talent said.

McCaskill quipped: "He did it first."

Talent and McCaskill are to debate again Monday in Springfield and Oct. 18 in Kansas City.

Big Sky Country Gets Smaller (WSJ)

By Frank D. Miele

The Wall Street Journal, October 12, 2006

KALISPELL, Mont. -- "Are you tired of business as usual in our state and federal government?" began a letter to the editor in the Daily Inter Lake last week. Joani Young was driven to despair by Montana's U.S. Senate race, which pits Conrad Burns, a three-term Republican incumbent from Billings, against Jon Tester, the Democratic president of the state Senate. Ms. Young's despondency probably speaks not only for a lot of Montanans, but for voters across the board on the condition of American politics.

The Burns-Tester race is indeed a sorry sight: A campaign run from Washington that has probably offended every decent Montanan with its advertising blitz, its finger-pointing, its name-calling -- and, more significantly, with its cynicism, anger and disrespect. This, after all, is Big Sky Country, where there used to be room enough for ideas all across the political spectrum and where a man used to be respected as much for what he didn't say as what he did. But Big Sky Country has been made smaller -- and meaner -- by this campaign.

A few weeks ago, for instance, the high-school auditorium in the town of Hamilton (pop. 4,500) was the scene of an embarrassing scrap. A debate between Messrs. Tester and Burns degenerated into an unruly shout-down in which an audience packed with Tester supporters heckled and cursed Mr. Burns, one even calling him a "psycho."

Of course, during this no-holds-barred campaign, Conrad Burns has been accused of all manner of foolishness and scandal. He may, in fact, be the only Republican member of Congress who considers the Mark Foley sex scandal a welcome diversion. Mr. Burns's alleged indiscretions don't drift toward the salacious, of course. Rather, his problem is that he's been in Washington for 18 years. Back in 1988, Mr. Burns ran as a conservative, just-plain-folks government outsider, commanding the field to such a degree that he helped create an updraft for other Montana Republicans. The 71-year-old still cusses and chews tobacco like the former Marine and live-auctioneer he was back then, but today his down-home lovable rascal act may be long on rascal and short on lovable.

DOJ_NMG_0079564

Nationwide, Mr. Burns topped the list of all congressmen who took money from the disgraced Jack Abramoff, at nearly $150,000. But he's best known around these parts for taking money from Congress rather than from lobbyists. He is a proud participant in the "culture of pork" and loudly trumpets his accomplishments, along with fellow Democratic Sen. Max Baucus (five terms in Washington), in winning appropriations for a variety of water projects, highways, research grants, farm subsidies, etc. In Montana, we have come to measure our representation in Washington by dollar amounts.

Mr. Burns's mastery of that kind of practical politics seems to be the central message of his campaign: My vote in Congress in support of the president's agenda is more important than any unproven allegation of wrongdoing. His skill in Washington has helped him survive gaffes, blunders and scandal that would have rocked a senator from a big-media state (e.g., George Allen). Just in the past year, he has reportedly insulted working women and firefighters, and implied that he may have an illegal immigrant on his home payroll.

But Mr. Burns is nonetheless highly vulnerable this year. The electorate is not in a forgiving mood, even in a state that went 59% for George W. Bush in 2004. Mr. Tester, a burly, flat-topped, 50-year-old rancher from Big Sandy (pop. 700 and change), has for his part capitalized on Mr. Burns's blunders to take a four- to seven-point lead in the latest polls.

The national focus on Montana will increase dramatically in the last three weeks of the campaign. It's no secret that control of the Senate could hinge on the outcome of this and a couple of other key races; and money from both national parties and their associated committees has been pouring into the state. Mr. Burns, so far, has raised $6.8 million for his re-election campaign, Mr. Tester only $1.7 million, although a massive amount of money has been spent on advertising by non-campaign forces such as national political action committees.

If Mr. Tester wins, a great deal of attention will be focused on a supposed lurch to the left -- especially in a state with emerging Democratic star Brian Schweitzer as governor -- but that's not precisely the issue. Montana has a long tradition of quirky bi-partisanship, so there is room for both liberals and conservatives. But Mr. Burns no longer seems genuinely conservative to some, aside from sticking to the script on the usual hot-button issues, and has instead "gone native" in D.C.

The national media attention is also starting to grate on small-town Montana. The tightening web (noose?) of the Internet, the cable news and the blogs on the body politic is a huge turnoff. And the fundamental lack of seriousness is unworthy of the gravity of the challenges facing us.

That, at least, is the way it looks to Joani Young and others like her -- no one is willing to clean up a system that seems worse than ever. Montanans are affronted by a culture of saying one thing and doing another, in a state where people pride themselves on simple, straightforward truth-telling. It's all the more galling in this particular race, with its national resonances.

If these two can't keep focused on what they want to accomplish for our nation, instead of what's wrong with each other -- if they can't put partisan politics aside -- then what hope is there for real change, and real progress? Ms. Young's letter expressed a typical sentiment -- the floating sense of discontent with national politics -- but proposed a novel solution: "None of the above."

Sen. Burns and Mr. Tester, take note. Democratic National Committee, take note. Republican National Committee, take note. Many voters have had enough -- at least in Montana.

2008: The Prequel (NYT)

By David Brooks

The New York Times, October 12, 2006

There are always a lot of retirees at campaign events in places like Mansfield, Ohio, and the most telling question you can ask them is: Where are your kids living?

Most of the factories have shut down in Mansfield. The old Westinghouse plant sits silent and archaic like a medieval castle near the center of town. And the retirees have seen their kids go off somewhere else. If they've gone to college, they're in New York, California, Georgia or Arizona. They're Christmas Ohioans. At holiday time they visit home.

This is the economic backdrop to the most important political race in the country, the Senate campaign between Sherrod Brown, a Democrat now in the House, and Mike DeWine, the Republican incumbent. It's important because each candidate comes from the most vibrant strain in his own party. Brown is a full-bore economic populist. DeWine is an independent

DOJ_NMG_0079565

McCainiac conservative. In two years, the national parties will be talking in just these ways, and we're seeing a preview of that battle today.

Sherrod Brown is a natural political animal, with the ability to dominate the space around him. At a campaign rally in Mansfield, he pulls a chair into the center of the room while others are speaking, so everyone can see him listening and reacting. He wears a wrinkled, cheap suit, and his raspy voice and plain manners evoke the local diner or union hall more than his alma mater, Yale University.

Terrorism and national security issues don't come up spontaneously around Brown. He focuses on the problem that is at the core of his career and mission: the hollowing out of Ohio's manufacturing base and the slow destruction of a way of life.

"They've sold out our country and betrayed the middle class," he says of the Republicans and the big corporations who worked together to write the tax laws, the energy bill and the prescription drug bill.

He vociferously opposes free trade. In his defining TV ad, he stands in front of a closed factory and blasts DeWine for supporting trade agreements that cost America jobs. His lapel pin shows a canary in a cage, a symbol of his solidarity with coal miners and workers everywhere. At a time when many Democrats are merely against things, Brown has a coherent approach to globalization and stagnant wages.

DeWine is Brown's opposite. He's short and unassuming, the least senatorial-looking man in the U.S. Senate. When he ambles modestly into a rally at Rocky River, almost nobody notices. As Tom Ridge, the former Pennsylvania governor, sings his praises, DeWine slips offstage to the back of the room. He grabs some chicken, finds a table and tucks meditatively into his dinner. Only one person at the table even looks up.

And yet he's one of the toughest and most widely respected senators. Anti-abortion and pro-tax cut, he angered his evangelical base by supporting the Gang of 14 compromise on judicial filibusters. He voted against the president's last budget because he thought it had the wrong priorities on children's health (he lost a daughter in a car accident). On the stump he touts law after law he has co-sponsored with liberal Democrats.

He wasn't in Congress when Nafta passed, but he rattles off statistics on how many Ohio jobs derive from exports and global trade. If Ohio's going to rebound, he says, its going to come from skills and entrepreneurialism not trade protectionism.

In a normal year, DeWine could probably hold off Brown's formidable challenge. DeWine, who is incapable of grandstanding, embodies the trans-partisan, conversational politics the country longs for.

But this year he faces an uphill fight. Voter frustration with Republican rule blots out the distaste many may have for liberal Democrats. DeWine has tried to portray Brown as an out-of-step liberal, to little effect.

More important, President Bush's polarizing political strategy has made it hard for independent Republicans to distinguish themselves from their party's national brand. As the Catholic University political scientist John K. White points out, we seem to be amid a parliamentary election this year, with voters making decisions about national parties, not local candidates. There is a yawning 19-point gap between those who say they like DeWine personally and those who say they plan to vote for him.

Ohio is crucial to winning the presidency. If Brown wins this year, he'll be the model for Democrats nationally. If DeWine pulls this out, Republican will copy him. This is what politics looks like as conservatism wanes: feisty economic liberals against independent, party-bucking Republicans.

A Gilded Path To Political Stardom, With Detours (NYT)

By Danny Hakim

The New York Times, October 12, 2006

There could hardly be a more perfect road map to becoming a rich lawyer than the bullet points laid out on Eliot Spitzer's formidable résumé. There was high school at prestigious Horace Mann, then Princeton and Harvard Law, followed by stints as a prosecutor for Robert M. Morgenthau, the Manhattan district attorney, and at top law firms like Paul, Weiss and Skadden, Arps.

But along the way, Eliot Spitzer would deviate from that gilded path: at age 20 and while still at Princeton, he set off for a summer in the Deep South to dig ditches and mop rooms at Georgia Tech, before going to pick tomatoes in upstate New York, a trip that he said "opened my eyes into a part of life I hadn't seen."

DOJ_NMG_0079566

Fifteen years later, at age 35, he took the biggest gamble of his life, giving up his job as a corporate lawyer to run for New York attorney general, a bid many considered preposterous.

What his opponents did not count on were twin weapons in the Spitzer arsenal: a fearsome ambition to win, and the millions of dollars that his father, Bernard Spitzer, brought to bear on his son's early campaigns.

The money led to accusations, later dismissed by election officials, that Mr. Spitzer was circumventing campaign finance laws to buy the race.

He finally prevailed in his second run, and would transform the position to take on corporate fraud and propel himself to national renown with his prosecutions of Wall Street investment firms and the insurance industry.

Now, with a commanding lead in the polls in the race for governor, Mr. Spitzer stands at the brink of taking over a state government that is legendary for its dysfunction and backroom deal-making.

He has pledged to overhaul Albany much the same way he used his current job to expose corporate wrongdoing, telling Democrats after they nominated him, "The crowd in charge in Albany is out of touch, out of ideas and, come Jan. 1, they'll be out of time," adding that "on Day 1, everything changes."

His record as attorney general suggests he may have the relentless personality to bring change to the state capital. But his sharp-elbowed, smartest-man-in-the-room demeanor could also undermine his own agenda in Albany, a clubby place where slights have a years-long shelf life in the memories of lawmakers who jealously guard their power.

For his own part, Mr. Spitzer says he is driven by the sort of Progressive impulse that fueled Theodore Roosevelt, whose picture hangs in his office. But when Roosevelt took on Albany after becoming governor in 1899, he was driven out of town by party bosses who persuaded William C. McKinley to put him on the ticket as his vice presidential candidate.

Mr. Spitzer is undeterred. "You don't change the world by whispering," he often says.

Some business leaders, rather than viewing his battles with Wall Street as noble or even civic minded, instead see a gigantic, calculating ego run amok. Mr. Spitzer is unapologetic, saying the way to strengthen business is by keeping it honest. "I'm here to protect the true competitors," he says, in the way Roosevelt wanted "a square deal" both for citizens and business. He also cites Alexander Hamilton, a chief architect of American capitalism, as another political role model.

Not a moving orator, Mr. Spitzer is a loud one, exuding a prosecutorial demeanor reinforced by his chiseled chin and steely blue eyes. His off-the-cuff remarks veer from sizzling bluntness — like calling the redevelopment of Lower Manhattan an "Enron-style debacle" — to impenetrable policy whirlwinds spruced with words like "promulgate" and "out-migration."

Mr. Spitzer brings edgy confidence to all his endeavors, a trait to be expected from a home that produced a neurosurgeon brother and a sister who is a lawyer. At the center of it all were parents who fostered intellectual probing and social awareness, and who follow their son to this day on the campaign trail as he seeks to return the Democrats to the Governor's Mansion after 12 years of exile.

His Father's Son

Dinner at the Spitzer household was more like a bout of intellectual pyrotechnics, visitors recalled. Bernard Spitzer, who built a real estate empire worth several hundred million dollars from scratch, had his three children bring weighty topics to the dinner table for rollicking discussions.

"He would ask, 'How thick is the Earth's crust?'" recalled Joey Low, a childhood friend of Eliot's. "And each one of them gave an answer, and Bernie would look at them and see if their answer was up to par."

"He expected a lot from all of their kids and they produced," he added.

Bernard, now 82, is the son of Austrian immigrants who came to the country in the 1920's. His is a classic immigrant rags-to-riches story, having grown up on the Lower East Side in railroad flats with no hot water. He met his future wife, the former Anne Goldhaber, now 78 and a former teacher, at a Catskill resort.

Bernard graduated from City College at 18 with a degree in engineering. When he returned from his World War II service in the Navy, he got work as a contractor and then eventually struck out on his own, building a real estate empire that now includes several high-rise apartment buildings on the East Side of Manhattan, including the 57-story Corinthian in Murray Hill.

"The philosophy of my own life was imparted by me to my children," he said. "I wanted to do something that would interest me and I didn't want to abhor going to work in the morning."

DOJ_NMG_0079567

Of his father, the younger Mr. Spitzer said, "There is a little bit of what I guess would traditionally be called a Germanic nature to him, but also a really good sense of humor. But there isn't a lot of tolerance just for wasted time and such, so we didn't sit around the dinner table talking about the weather and gossip."

If his parents imbued him with a sense of intellectual purpose, it seemed to strike some as wonkish. Jason Brown, a friend and now a lawyer at Ropes & Gray, recalls running against Eliot for the presidency of Horace Mann's seventh-grade class.

"My campaign winning slogan was, "Don't be a dope when things are down, there's still hope if you vote for Brown," he recalled with a laugh. "That clever rhyme beat out Eliot's economic platform."

Eliot was something of a jock at Horace Mann, captaining the tennis team and playing soccer. When his teams played Trinity, he crossed paths with John McEnroe, who plays tennis with the same abrasive intensity with which Mr. Spitzer approaches politics. Mr. Spitzer has often told the story of going home after seeing Mr. McEnroe whiz serves past one of his classmates and telling his parents "I had seen the kid play who would be No. 1 in the world."

"My parents said, 'Eliot, just because he beat you doesn't mean that he's the best in the world," he remembered.

Along the way, Eliot suffered setbacks, or what for him counted as setbacks. His ambitions of going to Harvard were derailed when he was not accepted, so he went to Princeton instead. In an interview, his father also let forth a family secret: that his son had scored a perfect 1,600 on the SAT. Confronted with this, Mr. Spitzer winced, and conceded imperfection.

"I think it was 1,590," he said, adding that his father must have confused the SAT with his perfect LSAT score.

At Princeton, he was very much the same precocious and confident person, elected president of the student body — as a sophomore.

"I remember — I still bust his chops for this — it was sophomore year and we were walking back to our dorm, Holder Hall, and he said, 'That's a remarkable fenestration,'" said William Taylor, a college friend. "And I had no idea what that meant. His father is a builder, so maybe that's a term of art. Yes, he has a very wide-ranging vocabulary." (Fenestration is, according to Merriam-Webster, "the arrangement, proportioning, and design of windows and doors in a building.)

Him, a Politician?

Twenty-three years ago, two Harvard Law students were wandering through a gay bathhouse in Boston with their professor. The men were meeting with the bathhouse operator, who claimed to have information relating to drug deliveries made to the house of Sunny von Bülow, a socialite who had gone into a coma, and whose second husband, Claus, had recently been convicted of trying to murder her.

"If my mother and father knew what kind of education their tuition was buying, they'd transfer me to business school," one of the students said, according to the book "Reversal of Fortune," while the other replied, "If they saw the number of business school graduates that are clients here, they'd send you to divinity school."

One of the students was Eliot Spitzer, and the other was Cliff Sloan, now the publisher of Slate. Mr. Spitzer's professor, Alan Dershowitz, was handling Claus von Bülow's appeal, and was the author of "Reversal of Fortune."

Mr. Spitzer's involvement in the case showed how he had a knack for good timing, finding himself a ringside seat on one of the most publicized cases of the day. But his name does not even appear in Mr. Dershowitz's book, and young Eliot's role was supplanted in the film version by more comely legal assistants played by Annabella Sciorra and Felicity Huffman.

And that was the role many of his friends thought Eliot would play — brilliant, talented, but not necessarily the guy in front of the cameras.

"He was just off-the-charts brilliant," Mr. Dershowitz said recently, but added, "The last thing anyone in my office thought was that he was going to become a politician."

Mr. Spitzer agreed.

"I didn't think I was well suited to it," he said of the political life. "When I say that to people now, they say, 'Yeah, yeah, yeah,' because they say you were student body president of Princeton, which is obviously true, but it really is the case," he added.

He saw himself as "an assistant secretary of this, that or the other thing, because I love the policy." But in his later campaigns for office, he was known to methodically build ties to key reporters and power players in the state capital, suggesting a good political instinct.

DOJ_NMG_0079568

It was while attending Harvard that Eliot Spitzer also met his future wife, Silda Wall, on a skiing trip to Vermont. Mr. Spitzer and Silda would date for several years, in both Boston and New York, before getting married. In New York in the mid-1980's, Silda worked far longer hours at Skadden, Arps than he did clerking for Robert Sweet, a federal district court judge. She now runs a charity that encourages children to volunteer.

Mr. Spitzer is Jewish, but his parents were not particularly religious and he did not have a bar mitzvah; Ms. Wall Spitzer was raised Southern Baptist. The couple celebrate the holidays of both religions with their three daughters but do not adhere rigorously to either.

On the campaign trail, Ms. Wall Spitzer, a slim, blond North Carolinian, plays the smiling political wife to perfection. But the two Harvard-trained lawyers have their policy disagreements. She opposes the death penalty; he supports it for terrorists and killers of police officers.

"Eliot has a very reasoned basis for his position, but one problem with that position is it assumes that you don't make mistakes," she said in an e-mail message. "I think he is deeply troubled by cases in recent years in which mistakes have been made."

She also seconds her husband's professed lack of presidential ambitions: "That would not be my choice, that he run," she said. "It's a real sacrifice for the family and the girls."

Mr. Spitzer said his legal career unfolded like "an extraordinarily predictable résumé."

"The clerkship, the big firm" — it was Paul, Weiss — "you spend a few years as a prosecutor, then I went to Skadden, enjoyed it, thought I would become a partner, then would end up in the family business unless some governmental opportunity emerged."

He spent six years as a prosecutor in the office of the Manhattan district attorney, Mr. Morgenthau. His most prominent case involved breaking the mob's stranglehold on trucking in the garment district, an inquiry that took three years and involved an elaborate sting. It forced Thomas Gambino and his associates out of the business, and gave Mr. Spitzer a taste of the public limelight.

Mr. Spitzer called it "a great black bag job."

"We set up a trucking company, we ran the sweatshop, we had wiretaps, bugs," he said. "It was a blast, and we ended up making the antitrust case against the trucking companies, each of which had organized crime tentacles or direct control, and we got amazing tapes."

He said the outcome of the case foretold the controversial strategy he would later use on Wall Street — to forgo jail time for settlements, fines and reforms.

"People see this as a premonition," he said "There was no jail time but they got out of the business, sold the companies, paid $12 million, which for them was big money."

In the spring of 1994, while at Skadden, Arps, Mr. Spitzer approached his supervisor, Thomas Schwarz, who ran the firm's litigation department.

"He said 'I've decided to run for attorney general,' and I just about fell off my chair," recalled Mr. Schwarz, now president of the State University of New York in Purchase. "I said, 'What do you mean, do you have any money?' "

When Mr. Spitzer told him he did, and how much, Mr. Schwarz told him to use half his money on the campaign "and give me the other half."

"The result will be just the same," he added. "We both laughed about it."

From Last to First

If it seemed preposterous for an unknown private lawyer to run for attorney general, his family's money made it less far-fetched. To this day, Mr. Spitzer and his family live rent-free in a Madison Avenue apartment owned by his father, requiring Bernard to pay gift taxes. During his first campaign, Eliot borrowed $4.3 million from J. P. Morgan to vastly outspend his three rivals, who were suspicious about how he could finance bank loans without family help.

"He spent $4 million and came in fourth, but he got a lot of votes for someone who was totally unknown," said G. Oliver Koppell, a New York City councilman. Mr. Koppell was appointed attorney general in 1993 after his predecessor left office. Both he and Mr. Spitzer lost to Karen S. Burstein in the Democratic primary in 1994. The Republican candidate, Dennis Vacco, ultimately won.

DOJ_NMG_0079569

Mr. Spitzer ran again in 1998 and repeatedly denied the extent to which he was using his father's money or that he was violating family contribution limits. But shortly before the election, he conceded that his father actually had lent him millions of dollars to repay the 1994 bank loan.

The family appear to have pressed the limits of elections law. If such loans are not repaid before an election, they are considered contributions, but Bernard Spitzer's loan was not even made until after the election. Mr. Koppell unsuccessfully sued over the issue. The Board of Elections declined to investigate, partly because the law has a two-year statute of limitations.

Bernard called the whole episode "very painful."

"In my naïveté, I couldn't believe that there was any objection, could be any objection, to a father lending money to a son who wants to enter the political world," he added. "It was just unheard of, to me anyway. I was completely taken aback by that. I couldn't understand it."

When Mr. Spitzer ran again in 1998, he prevailed in another four-way Democratic primary. He continued to overwhelm his rivals with his spending, but Mr. Koppell said Mr. Spitzer had also learned some lessons.

"He knew that he couldn't just do it with TV, like he tried to do in '94," he said. "He went around the state and did more than just TV, mailings, a lot more personal campaigning."

In the general election, Mr. Spitzer faced a far more difficult fight against Mr. Vacco. In that race, Mr. Vacco portrayed Mr. Spitzer as a product of his father's fortune and criticized him for a lack of candor, while Mr. Spitzer accused Mr. Vacco of incompetence.

On election night, Mr. Spitzer led by 18,000 votes out of more than 4 million cast. Mr. Vacco did not concede until Dec. 15.

At age 39, Mr. Spitzer was New York's new attorney general. And there was no hint of the national agenda to come. In an interview last month, he tried to explain what compelled him to run again after finishing last in 1994.

"I watched as the office moved in directions that could rightfully be improved upon and said maybe this is worth a second shot," he said. "And there was also the stomach, pit in the stomach sort of response. The only way to overcome a loss is to win. You don't quit."

Governor Gets 'Tonight' Slot, So Rival Seeks Equal Time (NYT)

By Jennifer Steinhauer

The New York Times, October 12, 2006

BURBANK, Calif., Oct. 11 — The Democrat who hopes to replace Arnold Schwarzenegger as governor of California says he faxed a letter to Jay Leno. He also says he sent Mr. Leno an overnight letter.

And still, the Democrat, Phil Angelides, has not been invited to appear on "The Tonight Show With Jay Leno" on NBC, and this has made the candidate angry.

Mr. Schwarzenegger, a Republican, has had no such problem. The governor chatted up Mr. Leno on the air Wednesday night, just as he did some three years ago when he first ran for governor in California's recall election.

With this Election Day just weeks away, and Mr. Angelides trailing rather substantially in the polls, his campaign has decided to make an issue of the unequal treatment. At the campaign's behest, Representative Xavier Becerra, a Democrat from Los Angeles, wrote a letter of complaint to Kevin J. Martin, the president of the Federal Communications Commission.

The Angelides campaign wrote a letter to NBC affiliates appealing to them to not broadcast Mr. Leno's show with the governor.

Mr. Angelides's communications director, Amanda Crumley, accused Mr. Leno of giving Mr. Schwarzenegger a leg up among late-night television viewers in violation of F.C.C. rules.

"As absentee ballots are currently hitting homes in California," Ms. Crumley said in a prepared statement, "the governor is getting what amounts to millions in free airtime from the network."

A spokesman for the commission, David Fiske, declined to comment, as did Mr. Schwarzenegger's re-election campaign.

DOJ_NMG_0079570

During his "Tonight Show" interview on Wednesday — before which Mr. Leno made a few Marshmallow Fluff-like jokes at the governor's expense — Mr. Schwarzenegger never mentioned his campaign rival.

But the governor did note, in this order, that Heidi Klum looked "gorgeous," that his current job was the best he has ever had, that he spent his 20th anniversary stashing his children at the neighbors' while he plied his wife with diamonds, and that linking him to President Bush was "like linking me to an Oscar." He also strongly suggested that the House speaker, J. Dennis Hastert of Illinois, ought to resign as a result of the scandal engulfing the Republican Congress.

It is Ms. Crumley's view that Mr. Leno's invitation to Mr. Schwarzenegger — who, it so happens, announced his candidacy for governor (along with unrelated details of a bikini wax) on "The Tonight Show" in 2003 — violates the equal time provision written into the nation's Communications Act in 1959. The provision prohibits media programs, with the exception of news interviews, documentaries or newscasts, from giving an unfair share of broadcast time to a candidate without making available equal time to the other candidates running for that office.

"We've always thought the Schwarzenegger administration is a joke," Ms. Crumley said. "And apparently so does Jay Leno. Perhaps that's why Leno invited Schwarzenegger to appear for a few laughs on his program alongside supermodel Heidi Klum and a Las Vegas circus act."

A spokeswoman for NBC, Tracy St. Pierre, said "The Tonight Show" had never received a request from Mr. Angelides. Ms. St. Pierre, in a prepared statement, said the network was "following the news guidelines for interviewing a political candidate."

It is not the first time that Mr. Leno has come under fire for his friendship with Mr. Schwarzenegger.

In 2003, to counter claims that he was essentially giving prime air time to his pal, Mr. Leno invited on his show more than 80 people who claimed to be running for governor in the recall election, including a porn star and a candidate who showed up dressed as Rocky Balboa. Mr. Leno began that show with, "Welcome to California, now a division of Ringling Brothers."

Mr. Schwarzenegger appeared that year on many other television and radio shows as well, and an F.C.C. ruling regarding one of them might presage the end to Mr. Angelides's battle.

In a ruling about Mr. Schwarzenegger's appearance on "The Howard Stern Show," the agency declared the show was exempt from the equal time provision, calling it a "bona fide news program."

If a show that regularly features women in various stages of undress, sometimes engaged in lewd acts with fruit, was declared a news program, some legal analysts suggested Mr. Leno's show might likely pass the same test.

From Schwarzenegger, A Veto For Voters' Good (WP)

By George F. Will

The Washington Post, October 12, 2006

California's governor has demonstrated virtue, understood as the good we do when no one is watching. With his state and the nation paying no attention to an anti-constitutional campaign to alter the way presidents are chosen, Arnold Schwarzenegger has vetoed a bill that, had it become law, would have imparted dangerous momentum to a recurring simple-mindedness.

The bill would have committed California to cast its electoral votes -- today, 55 -- for whichever candidate receives the most popular votes nationally. The commitment would have been contingent on a compact with other similarly committed states, all having a combined total of at least 270 electoral votes.

Such legislation has been introduced in six states and passed by Colorado's Senate. Advocates offer two rationales:

First, California and other states that are not closely contested battlegrounds are not "relevant." (A state with more than one-fifth of the electoral votes needed to win the presidency is "irrelevant"? Please.) What is meant is that uncontested states are "neglected" by presidential campaigns, so direct popular election of presidents -- the point of the multi-state compact -- would increase voter interest in the many states (by one count, 37, 34 and 37 in the past three elections) that are not considered swing states.

But it is disproportionate to traduce, by simplification, sophisticated constitutional arrangements just to make campaigns more stimulating for some states. Furthermore, the electoral vote system is a wholesome political market: It provides steady incentives for parties to change the attributes that make them uncompetitive in many states. How long will the GOP be content not to contest California?

DOJ_NMG_0079571

The system aims not just for majority rule but rule by certain kinds of majorities . It encourages candidates to form coalitions of states with various political interests and cultures. Such coalitions can be assembled only by a politics of accommodation. So the electoral college system discourages attempts to build narrow ideological or geographical majorities. Today the system is helping the Democratic Party by nudging it to be less of a coastal party -- less reliant on a risky 20-state strategy in presidential elections.

The second argument for the multi-state compact is: The possibility of the winner of the popular vote losing the electoral vote contest violates the value that trumps all others -- majoritarianism. Well.

Never mind that in 42 of the 46 elections since 1824 (all but 1824, 1876, 1888 and 2000) for which we have popular vote totals, that did not happen. Which suggests that the assault on the electoral vote system is driven by simplistic majoritarianism, which would shatter the two-party system that is conducive to temperate politics.

That electoral vote system (combined with the winner-take-all allocation of votes in all states but Maine and Nebraska) makes it very difficult for third-party presidential candidates to be competitive. In 1992 Ross Perot won 18.9 percent of the popular vote but no state and therefore no electoral votes. Direct popular election of presidents would be an incentive for fragmentation of the electorate by the proliferation of factional candidacies.

Imagine 2008 with independent candidacies by, say, Colorado Rep. Tom Tancredo (deport illegal immigrants), Pennsylvania Rep. John Murtha (out of Iraq immediately), New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg (independence from the two parties is a virtue) and Jesse Jackson (he would think of a reason). None could win, but cumulatively they could prevent the major-party winner from reaching even 40 percent.

And the multi-state compact cannot include a runoff provision. That would require a constitutional amendment; 34 senators can prevent a constitutional amendment from being sent to the states for ratification, and many more than 17 of the smaller states benefit from the additional weight the electoral vote system gives them.

It is perverse that the 2000 election, which culminated with the lawyers' riot in Florida, is cited to undermine an electoral vote system that prevented 2000 from being a calamity. If, in presidential elections, popular votes were poured into one national bucket, a close election such as the one in 1960, which was decided by fewer votes (118,574) than there were precincts (166,064), would unleash a coast-to-coast frenzy of litigation -- about ballot design, voting hours, alleged voting-machine malfunctions, etc. The electoral vote system quarantines electoral disputes to a few closely contested states.

Under the multi-state compact, Californians, who in 2004 supported John Kerry by a popular vote margin of 1.2 million, would have seen their electoral votes swell President Bush's winning margin. In 1960 and 1976, too, California's electoral votes would have gone to candidates rejected by Californians.

They should understand what their governor has demonstrated: Sometimes the loveliest word in America's political lexicon is "veto."

Judges Can Solicit Election Funds, Court Rules (NYT)

By Adam Liptak

The New York Times, October 12, 2006

Kentucky may not prohibit judicial candidates from personally soliciting campaign contributions, a federal judge ruled on Tuesday.

The judge, Karen K. Caldwell of Federal District Court in Frankfort, said the ban violated the First Amendment.

Judge Caldwell rejected the state's argument that its interest in preserving the appearance of judicial impartiality justified the ban. Kentucky law, she noted, already allows judges' campaign committees to solicit contributions.

That may be a problem, Judge Caldwell wrote, but adding the element of personal solicitation by the candidate does not make it measurably worse.

"If the public does not believe that elected judges favor their contributors," Judge Caldwell wrote, "then the committee serves no purpose in preserving that appearance of impartiality. If, on the other hand, the public believes that elected judges favor their contributors, then the fact that contributors are solicited by a committee instead of the judge himself does nothing to dispel that perception."

DOJ_NMG_0079572

Judge Caldwell said that the ban on personal solicitation might make "direct shakedowns by a corrupt judicial candidate" less likely "because it eliminates the moment when a judicial candidate can say, 'Contribute to my campaign, and I will rule in your favor.' " But such corruption, she wrote, is already prohibited by other ethics rules and by criminal laws.

Judge Caldwell also struck down an ethics rule that prohibited judicial candidates from advertising their political affiliations.

The suit was filed in June by Marcus Carey, a candidate for the Kentucky Supreme Court, against several state officials. It is one of many challenges to canons of judicial ethics around the nation after a decision of the United States Supreme Court in 2002, Republican Party of Minnesota v. White.

That decision struck down an ethics rule barring judicial candidates from announcing their views on disputed legal or political issues. The case left open whether judges have to disqualify themselves from cases involving issues that they discussed.

It is not unusual for judicial candidates in the 39 states that elect judges to raise and spend more than $1 million. Judges seldom recuse themselves from cases involving their contributors. Although many judges acknowledge that large majorities in public opinion surveys believe that campaign contributions influence judicial decisions, almost all judges insist that their decisions are independent and impartial.

Judge Caldwell declined to rule on Mr. Carey's challenges to several other ethics rules, including one concerning disqualification, saying Mr. Carey had not shown that he was injured by the rules and so lacked standing to sue. Indeed, she questioned whether compelled recusal is properly viewed as an injury at all.

James Sample, a lawyer at the Brennan Center for Justice at New York University School of Law, said the erosion of judicial canons of ethics after the White decision meant that "states and litigants are left with few reliable mechanisms to safeguard the constitutional right to due process." A remaining mechanism, Mr. Sample said, is "more rigorous application of existing recusal rules."

A lawyer for Mr. Carey, James Bopp Jr., said in a statement that the rules Judge Caldwell struck down "served as a unconstitutional restriction on judicial candidates' free speech." Judicial candidates, Mr. Bopp added, "have a right to announce their views by stating their political affiliation and to solicit funds for their campaigns for office."

No Solo Talks With N. Korea, Bush Insists (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang And Maggie Farley, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, October 12, 2006

He says the U.S. won't tolerate a nuclear North, but he stresses multi-nation diplomacy over force. Pyongyang threatens more tests.

WASHINGTON — President Bush rejected calls Wednesday for one-on-one talks with North Korea and indicated he was not contemplating military action in response to Pyongyang's announcement this week that it had conducted a nuclear test.

Bush, speaking at a news conference in the White House Rose Garden, reaffirmed his long-held stance that the U.S. would not tolerate a nuclear-armed North Korea. But he emphasized that his focus was on the use of diplomacy through multinational talks.

The president's comments followed a threat Wednesday by North Korea to conduct more nuclear tests, while Japan unilaterally banned North Korean nationals and exports from entering Japan for the next six months.

At the United Nations, where the Bush administration is pursuing sanctions against the North Korean regime, Secretary-General Kofi Annan urged Bush to consider bilateral negotiations.

North Korea's statement, issued through its U.N. mission, warned that sanctions could trigger "physical countermeasures" and would be considered "as a declaration of war."

The remarks by Bush were his first public comments on North Korea since the regime in Pyongyang announced Monday morning that it had carried out a successful nuclear test. U.S. officials said they were still trying to determine whether it was a nuclear device that North Korea tested or some other large explosive. Whichever it was, Bush said, "this claim itself constitutes a threat to international peace and stability."

However, the president appeared to go out of his way to avoid inflammatory language, even as he insisted that North Korea must stand by previous commitments to dismantle its nuclear program.

DOJ_NMG_0079573

The toned-down approach seemed intended both for potential partners at the United Nations, and, fewer than four weeks before the midterm U.S. congressional elections, for an American electorate weary of the Iraq war. It also appeared to reflect a dearth of palatable options after weeks of harsh rhetoric by the administration, since military action to destroy North Korea's nuclear facilities could prove difficult and could also result in a regionwide war.

"We want to make sure that we solve this problem diplomatically," Bush said, repeating the word "diplomatically" seven more times and using the term "diplomacy" on an additional 10 occasions during the 62-minute news conference.

But Bush struck a defensive tone in explaining his opposition to direct negotiations. Echoing comments by other Republicans in recent days, he cited the one-on-one approach to North Korea taken by former President Clinton resulting in a 1994 agreement that collapsed in 2002, two years after Bush took office.

"Bilateral relations didn't work," Bush said, although adding, "I appreciate the efforts of previous administrations."

The 1994 agreement froze North Korea's plutonium activities and mothballed its nuclear plants, putting its nuclear program under international inspectors. In exchange, Washington agreed to provide fuel oil and build two light-water breeder reactors. In 2002, after Bush's inclusion of North Korea in his "axis of evil," North Korea admitted it was still working to develop nuclear weapons.

Bush said he learned from that experience that it takes several countries to influence the reclusive and unpredictable government in Pyongyang. Consequently, he proposed a system of six-nation talks involving South Korea, Japan, China and Russia, in addition to the United States and North Korea, which began in 2003.

"It was said that the Bush administration goes it alone too often in the world, which I always thought was a bogus claim to begin with," Bush said. "And now, all of a sudden, people are saying the Bush administration ought to be going alone with North Korea. But it didn't work in the past, is my point. The strategy did not work."

A spokesman for Clinton responded Wednesday that Republicans were attempting to "rewrite history."

After the 1994 agreement, North Korea produced no nuclear weapons during Clinton's time in the White House, and the Clinton approach was endorsed by Colin L. Powell, then Bush's secretary of State, in 2001, said Ben Yarrow of the Clinton Foundation.

"For eight years during the Clinton administration, there was no new plutonium production, no nuclear weapons tests and therefore no additional nuclear weapons developed on President Clinton's watch," Yarrow said.

"The Clinton administration's approach has been turned on its head, and North Korea now has demonstrated its nuclear weapons capability to the world," Yarrow added.

At the United Nations, Annan urged North Korea not to escalate the situation any further, and said Washington should talk directly to Pyongyang.

"I have always argued that we should talk to parties whose behavior we want to change, whose behavior we want to influence. And from that point of view I believe that the U.S. and North Korea should talk," Annan said. "Whether it is done in the context of the six-party talks or separately, one must talk."

The U.N. Security Council continued negotiations on a sanctions resolution, aiming for a vote Friday. The North Korean government statement issued by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs on Wednesday declared that "if the U.S. increases pressure … [North Korea] will continue to take physical countermeasures, considering it as a declaration of a war."

China said it would support "prudent" sanctions focused mainly on banning the transfer of nuclear and missile technology, but still opposed a provision that could open the door to military action to enforce the sanctions.

China would also support a travel ban for senior North Korean officials, diplomats said. Russian negotiators said they had no instructions from Moscow on the latest revision, but Russia was expected to vote with China.

The U.S.-backed resolution includes a financial freeze similar to current American economic sanctions to shut down alleged counterfeiting, money laundering and drug trafficking that has reportedly helped fund North Korea's weapons programs.

The resolution, cosponsored by Japan, also includes specific provisions to ensure that civilians and aid groups would not be directly affected by the punitive measures.

Negotiations are stalled on several points, including a measure authorizing the inspection of all cargo going in and out of North Korea in an effort to detect weapons-related material.

DOJ_NMG_0079574

Meanwhile, the Japanese government declared that it would not wait for the Security Council to act against Pyongyang. It announced its six-month ban on North Korean nationals and exports, which would cut off some of North Korea's access to cash and bartered goods.

The move was mostly symbolic. Japan's trade with North Korea is minuscule compared with the economic ties Pyongyang has with China and South Korea, the key lifelines that many observers argue are all that sustain dictator Kim Jong Il's regime.

Tokyo had already shut down the flow of money from North Korean nationals living in Japan to friends and relatives back home.

North Korea threatened more nuclear tests Wednesday, saying Washington's squeeze on the North Korean economy and its global financial transactions "compelled" the country to test-fire a nuclear weapon.

"The issue of future nuclear tests is linked to U.S. policy toward our country," said Kim Yong Nam, North Korea's No. 2 official, in an interview with Japan's Kyodo News service.

"If the United States continues to take a hostile attitude and apply pressure on us in various forms, we will have no choice but to take physical steps to deal with that."

The pressure Kim cited includes the U.S.-led clampdown on foreign banks that do business with the North Korean regime. Washington accuses the North Korean government of state-sponsored financial crimes including money laundering and the counterfeiting of American currency.

At his news conference in Washington, Bush blamed North Korean leader Kim Jong Il for the failure of diplomacy.

"It's the intransigence of the North Korean leader that speaks volumes about the process," Bush said. "It is his unwillingness to choose a way forward for his country — a better way forward for his country. It is his decisions."

Bush said the six-nation approach to talks protected Washington from being singled out as what amounts to a "fall guy."

Otherwise, Bush said, "we become the issue."

*

james.gerstenzang@latimes.com

maggie.farley@latimes.com

Gerstenzang reported from Washington and Farley from the United Nations. Times staff writers Bruce Wallace in Tokyo and Richard Simon in Washington contributed to this report.

Retreating To Small Talk When The News Isn't So Good (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, October 12, 2006

President Bush needed to change the subject.

"If I might say, that is a beautiful suit," he told NBC News correspondent Kevin Corke at yesterday's news conference in the Rose Garden.

"My tailor appreciates that," replied Corke, wearing a $1,500 custom pinstripe number by Tom James with bright-red tie and pocket square.

"And I can't see anybody else who even comes close," Bush added, drawing laughs from the assembled scribes in wrinkled navy blazers.

Then the president spied CNN's Suzanne Malveaux, pointing at her Benetton suit with pink pinstripes. "Suzanne, I take that back," Bush amended with chivalry. Moments later he bestowed on her the day's "best-dressed" honors.

"Kevin and I coordinated," she explained.

CBS News's Jim Axelrod was feeling left out. "My best suit's in the cleaners," he told the commander in chief.

Bush eyed Axelrod's slacks with disdain. "That's not even a suit," he said, before chalking up the whole thing to "high-priced news guys."

It was about the only fun Bush had all morning. North Korea is exploding, Iraq is imploding, and congressional Republicans are self-destructing. Reporters weren't about to let the president forget about that, even if he looked natty in his gray suit and dark-blue tie.

DOJ_NMG_0079575

"Do you ever feel like the walls are closing in on you?" Axelrod tormented.

Bret Baier of Fox News asked Bush about "the tide turning, according to several polls, towards the Democrats."

USA Today's David Jackson noted the "shelf full of books" about Iraq and their claims that "administration policies contributed to the difficulties there."

"There's a lot of books out there -- a lot," the president agreed. "I guess it means that I've made some hard decisions."

Actually, the books say he and his aides made a lot of bad decisions: too few troops in Iraq, no reconstruction plan, ignored insurgency warnings, and keeping Donald Rumsfeld at the Pentagon while pushing Colin Powell out of the State Department.

The underdressed reporters peppered Bush with 15 questions about Iraq and North Korea; only near the end did the Chicago Tribune's Mark Silva mention some guy named Foley. Pressed to defend his foreign policy, Bush instead cited the "stakes" involved in the Middle East and North Korea -- 13 times.

"I understand the stakes," Bush announced. "I'm going to repeat them one more time. As a matter of fact, I'm going to spend a lot of time repeating the stakes."

He made good on that promise. Five times he said "the stakes are high," occasionally adding that "the stakes are really high" and even that, "as a matter of fact, they couldn't be higher."

"I know this sounds [as if] I'm just saying it over and over again," Bush admitted. But repetition is crucial to learning; to that end, Bush also said four times that the enemy is trying to establish a "caliphate."

Dissatisfied with the reporters' prickly questions, Bush went about answering his own. He said abandoning Iraq would allow terrorists to launch new attacks on America. "How do I know that would happen?" Bush asked himself. "Because that's what the enemy has told us," he answered.

When a questioner asked about the credibility of the administration's threats toward North Korea, Bush said: "I thought you were going to ask . . . 'How come you didn't use military action?' " Bush then replied: "My answer is that I believe the commander in chief must try all diplomatic measures."

"I'll ask myself a follow-up," Bush continued. "If that's the case, why did you use military action in Iraq?" His answer to himself: "Because we tried the diplomacy."

It's dicey for a president to hold a news conference when his support is below 40 percent and there is little good news to share. Bush started off by pointing out that the federal budget deficit has been shrinking faster than expected. But his questioners, perhaps heeding Vice President Cheney's admonition that "deficits don't matter," didn't ask any questions on the subject.

The president's opening statement, though heavily qualified, contained some of his trademark sanguinity: "We're on the move. We're taking action. . . . We accomplished that mission."

But the mood darkened when the first questioner asked "is your administration to blame" for North Korea's getting nuclear weapons. On cue, a sudden breeze sent willow leaves fluttering onto the party.

No, Bush answered, the Clinton administration is to blame.

This provoked a challenge from ABC News's Martha Raddatz. "How can you say your policy is more successful, given that North Korea has apparently tested a nuclear weapon?" she asked.

Off to the side sat four Bush aides who had been with him through his entire presidency: Josh Bolten, Karl Rove, Steve Hadley and Dan Bartlett. Grayer and thinner on top than they were six years ago, they watched expressionlessly as Bush entered with a spring in his step and a wave to the cameras, then as he left an hour later with less good cheer.

"Thank you for your interest," the president said curtly, skipping the usual pleasantries. As he walked back into the Oval Office, he shot a glance in the direction of his aides that showed he was not pleased.

Bush Focuses On Diplomacy With North Korea (MCT)

By Ron Hutcheson And Jonathan Landay

McClatchy Newspapers, October 12, 2006

WASHINGTON - President Bush stressed diplomacy over military action in the standoff over North Korea's nuclear weapons program Wednesday as North Korea threatened more weapons tests.

DOJ_NMG_0079576

At the United Nations, Secretary General Kofi Annan said the world faces "an extremely difficult situation" and called for direct talks between the United States and North Korea. Bush rejected one-on-one negotiations, but said he remains committed to diplomacy. He urged the U.N. to impose stiff economic sanctions on North Korea.

North Korea said it would consider international economic sanctions a declaration of war.

"The more they push us, the stronger our response will be," an unidentified North Korean official told the South Korean news service, Yonhap. Other North Korean officials raised the possibility of additional weapons tests.

U.S. intelligence officials were still trying to confirm North Korea's claim Sunday that it had successfully tested a nuclear weapon.

At a White House news conference, Bush reiterated previous statements that he would not tolerate a nuclear-armed North Korea. At the same time, he downplayed the possibility of military action.

"We have no intention of attacking North Korea," he said. U.S. officials are pushing the U.N. Security Council to approve a package of sanctions intended to throttle North Korea's ability to buy or sell high-tech weaponry. The United States is also seeking authority to stop and search North Korean vessels.

"I suspect the council will come together and take a firm action against North Korea," Annan told reporters at the U.N. "It's important for the whole world."

Bush said his goal is to convince North Korean leader Kim Jong Il that abandoning nuclear weapons is the only way to end North Korea's international ostracism and revive its failed economy.

"We'll give diplomacy a chance to work," Bush told reporters. "There's a way forward for the North Korean leader to choose."

Japan, rattled by unconfirmed rumors of more North Korean weapons tests, announced a six-month ban on imports from North Korea. The Japanese sanctions also prohibit North Korean ships from entering Japanese ports and effectively ban visits by North Korean citizens.

Military analysts said the United States has few good military options if diplomacy fails.

Former Defense Secretary William Perry said the Pentagon prepared a plan to take out North Korea's main nuclear research facility during the Clinton administration, but decided not to use it.

In a teleconference call with reporters Wednesday, Perry said an air attack might have been effective at the time because all of North Korea's plutonium was stored at the facility in Yongbyon.

"I had a detailed plan in front of me. I could have snapped my fingers and done it in a minute. It would have been effective. The point is that I never recommended to the president doing it," he said. "The military option was truly the option of last resort."

Perry said North Korea's Stalinist regime has almost certainly scattered its stocks of plutonium bomb fuel to secret locations around the country by now, ruling out the use of air strikes to destroy them. The teleconference was arranged by the Center for American Progress, a liberal policy institute.

Bush, who also might have had a chance to order an effective air strike early in his administration, said he considered "all options" but chose diplomacy.

In the context of a hotly contested congressional election campaign, North Korea's claim that it had successfully tested a nuclear weapon sparked some partisan finger pointing.

Democrats said the development showed the fallacy of Bush's approach of relying on North Korea's neighbors to apply pressure on the reclusive regime rather than engaging in direct talks. They also criticized the president for listing North Korea, along with Iraq and Iran, as an "axis of evil" - a designation that gave North Korea another reason to claim that it needs nuclear weapons to prevent a U.S. attack.

Bush and his defenders said North Korea's failure to live up previous agreements with the Clinton administration indicated that it was time for another approach.

"It didn't work in the past, is my point. The strategy didn't work," Bush said. But Bush's approach of engaging Pyongyang in negotiations that also include South Korea, Japan, Russia and China hasn't had much success either. The so-called six-party talks broke down after a fifth round in November 20005, with the United States and North Korea blaming the other.

DOJ_NMG_0079577

"Diplomacy is a difficult process because everybody's interests aren't exactly the same," Bush said. "It takes a while to get people on the same page, and it takes a while for people to get used to the consequences."

Bush Calls For Action On N. Korea (CHIT)

By Mark Silva

Chicago Tribune, October 12, 2006

WASHINGTON -- With North Korea warning of additional nuclear tests and calling any new international sanctions against it an act of war, President Bush insisted Wednesday that the regime of Kim Jong Il will face "serious repercussions" if it doesn't shelve its nuclear ambitions.

Nonetheless, the president said, "The United States remains committed to diplomacy" while reserving "all options to defend our friends and our interests in the region against the threats from North Korea."

Bush said at a Rose Garden news conference that any diplomatic solution to the standoff with North Korea depends on the U.S. and Asian allies maintaining a united front in negotiations with the regime of Kim Jong Il. The president steadfastly refused the idea of engaging in direct talks with Pyongyang, which he said "did not work" during the Clinton administration.

In the region Wednesday, South Korea said it is preparing its troops for possible atomic warfare by building up its conventional forces, and Japan imposed new economic sanctions aimed at impeding North Korea's million-member military, the world's fifth-largest. Japan banned all North Korean imports—such as clams and mushrooms—and barred the nation's ships from its ports.

Democratic leaders in Washington, blaming the North Korean showdown on the president's "confrontational" stance against a nation he once termed part of an "axis of evil," called on Bush to resume direct talks with Kim's government. Outgoing United Nations Secretary General Kofi Annan also called for bilateral talks.

North Korea issuedits first formal comment since its reported underground testing of a nuclear device Monday, saying it had successfully detonated a nuclear bomb and insisted that any attempts to penalize the nation would be deemed an act of aggression. "If the U.S. keeps pestering us and increases pressure, we will regard it as a declaration of war and will take a series of physical corresponding measures," the government said in a North Korean news agency statement Wednesday.

North Korea's second-ranking official, Kim Yong Nam, indicated his government will conduct additional tests if the U.S. does not alter its "hostile attitude" toward the nation.

"The issue of future nuclear tests is linked to U.S. policy toward our country," Kim told Japan's Kyodo News Service. "If the United States continues to take a hostile attitude and apply pressure on us in various forms, we will have no choice but to take physical steps to deal with that."

France maintained Wednesday that North Korea's test produced such a small blast that it must have failed. France's Defense Minister Michele Alliot-Marie said French, American and other scientists had detected a blast of "relatively limited size…. In any case, if this was a nuclear explosion, it would be a case of a failed explosion."

Some experts say it's possible that the world never may never fully determine whether North Korea succeeded in its test.

"It is possible with a relatively small underground blast that there would be no significant release of radiation," said Hideshi Takesada of the National Institute for Defense Studies, a branch of Japan's Defense Agency. The White House has said it still is trying to determine what was detonated, but considers even North Korea's boast to have done it a provocation.

Bush, maintaining that the U.S. will "give diplomacy a chance to work," said he is not contemplating any attack against North Korea. But, with China signaling support for limited UN sanctions against North Korea, Bush said he will press for sanctions in an attempt to persuade the Kim regime to return to stalled "six-party" negotiations.

"We're working with our partners in the region and the United Nations Security Council to ensure there are serious repercussions for the regime in Pyongyang," Bush said.

As the U.S. presses for tough sanctions, the five permanent Security Council members {ndash} the U.S., China, Russia, Britain and France — and Japan, which holds the council presidency this month, were meeting Wednesday in an attempt to settle differences over possible measures.

DOJ_NMG_0079578

"There are a number of disagreements," U.S. Ambassador John Bolton said. "We think the fact that North Korea has conducted a nuclear test does amount to a clear threat to international peace and security and warrants action … as well as a variety of strong measures. There's not agreement on all of those points."

Richard Bush, director of Northeast Asian Policy studies at the Brookings Institution, a Washington think tank, suggested that "it's going to require a serious effort to sort of squeeze [North Korea]— to change their whole mentality," if the Kim regime is to return to negotiations.

"That, in turn, is going to require more fortitude on the part of China and South Korea than we have seen," Brookings' Bush said. "They have North Korea on their border and they have a legitimate concern that if you squeeze too hard it brings down the whole regime and then it becomes a domestic problem."

Annan, who is stepping aside and will be succeeded as secretary general by South Korean Foreign Minister Ban Ki Moon, has called on North Korea "not to escalate the situation any further…. We already have an extremely difficult situation."

While maintaining that North Korea's Kim "has not paid attention to the will of the international community and all the appeals that have been made to him," Annan also suggested that the U.S. could do more with direct talks: "I have always argued that we should talk to parties whose behavior we want to change, whose behavior we want to influence."

But President Bush said he believes the six-party forum, not direct talks with North Korea, holds the best hope for a resolution of a crisis that now has North Korea's neighbors worried about war.

Bush, who has been criticized for taking the U.S. to war in Iraq in 2003 before diplomatic measures were exhausted, suggested that the same critics are questioning his stance with North Korea today.

"I can remember the time when it was said that the Bush administration goes it alone too often in the world, which I always thought was a bogus claim to begin with," Bush said. "And now all of a sudden people are saying, 'The Bush administration ought to be going alone with North Korea.' But it didn't work in the past."

Former Secretary of State Madeleine Albright, who attempted to negotiate with North Korea during the Clinton administration, disputed Bush's contention that direct talks had not worked.

"During the two terms of the Clinton administration, there were no nuclear weapons tests by North Korea, no new plutonium production and no new nuclear weapons developed in Pyongyang," Albright's office said in a statement issued Wednesday. "Through our policy of effective, constructive engagement, the world was safer. President Bush chose a different path, and the results are evident for all to see."

Powers Are Split Over How To Punish Pyongyang (WSJ)

By Yochi J. Dreazen And Evan Ramstad

The Wall Street Journal, October 12, 2006

Bush Seeks Tough Measures, But Seoul Weighs Options; Japan Pursues Compromise

President Bush said the U.S. will work with China, Japan and South Korea to craft a package of tough sanctions against North Korea following its claim of a nuclear-weapon test. But the administration and its partners are divided over how soon to act against Pyongyang and precisely what measures to impose.

Speaking to reporters in the Rose Garden, Mr. Bush reiterated that the U.S. wouldn't accept North Korea's emergence as a nuclear power and said the administration would work with Asian powers to "ensure there are serious repercussions for the regime" of North Korean leader Kim Jong Il if it refuses to abandon its nuclear-weapons program.

The administration has drawn similar lines in the sand before, only to watch as Pyongyang pressed ahead with its program. Despite global outrage over North Korea's purported nuclear test Sunday, the U.S. and other countries are likely to take several months to agree on sanctions. And it is far from certain that China -- the country widely seen as having the most leverage over North Korea -- will ultimately be willing to sign off on strong measures.

In a sign of emerging divisions, South Korean President Roh Moo Hyun said yesterday his government could take "a couple of months" to decide how to respond to North Korea's claim of a nuclear test. South Korea has chosen a different approach from Japan, which imposed sanctions on North Korea immediately after claims of the nuclear test. At the United Nations Security Council, meanwhile, China continued to rebuff U.S. calls for language that could set the stage for military action against North Korea if it doesn't abandon its program.

DOJ_NMG_0079579

President Bush discusses2 the situation in North Korea, the war in Iraq and the U.S. economy. WSJ reporter Jake Schlesinger3 discusses the press conference, including the different strategy the president is taking with North Korea, compared with Iraq.

Mr. Bush alluded to the diplomatic challenges ahead in remarks at the White House, which came as Democrats and Republicans sparred over which party deserves blame for failing to prevent North Korea from acquiring nuclear weapons.

"It's a difficult process because everybody's interests aren't exactly the same," he said. "It takes awhile to get people on the same page, and it takes a while for people to get used to consequences."

Mr. Bush said the U.S. remains committed to finding a diplomatic solution, but said the U.S. "reserves all options" and would increase its military cooperation with countries like South Korea and Japan. "Diplomacy hasn't run its course," he said.

Indeed, diplomatic maneuvering -- at the U.N. and in several Asian capitals -- appears just under way.

In Tokyo, the Japanese government prohibited North Korean ships from entering Japanese ports, banned imports from the impoverished nation and barred most North Korean nationals from entering Japan. In Seoul, by contrast, Mr. Roh said South Korea wouldn't act unilaterally. The South Korean president said immediately after claims of the test that the South would change its policy of financial incentives to encourage political and economic change in the North, but has declined to explain how or when the policy will change.

"This is not a matter that can be decided in a couple of days or a couple of months. We have to look at it comprehensively," he said.

Mr. Roh will travel to Beijing tomorrow for a summit with Chinese President Hu Jintao and Premier Wen Jiabao as Chinese diplomats at the U.N. discuss with officials from the U.S. and its allies what types of sanctions to impose on North Korea. Diplomats familiar with the proceedings say China thus far has declined to support calls for international inspections of all cargo entering and leaving North Korea. China also wants the sanctions resolution to refer to Article 41 of the U.N. charter, which authorizes only nonmilitary penalties, rather than the U.S.-preferred Chapter 7, which could set the stage for U.N.-authorized military strikes.

Japan is leading the effort to draft compromise resolutions and hopes to have an agreement in place by the end of the week, diplomats say. John Bolton, U.S. ambassador to the U.N., said the U.S. plans to introduce today a revised resolution to impose sanctions on North Korea, and hopes it will be adopted by the end of the week.

Meanwhile, U.S. intelligence agencies said it could be an additional week to 10 days before Washington has more certainty about the test North Korea conducted. American intelligence agencies are assuming North Korea used some fissile material in the test, but they also aren't ruling out the possibility that the test only involved conventional explosives, say officials involved in the probe. They also haven't dismissed the possibility that the test was a ruse to make it appear that Pyongyang has nuclear capability.

"All we really have right now is a statement" from North Korea, a senior U.S. intelligence official said.

---- Jay Solomon in Washington contributed to this article.

China Says It Will Back Sanctions On N. Korea (WP)

By Colum Lynch And Maureen Fan, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, October 11, 2006

Beijing Stresses Limits on U.N. Action Against Ally

UNITED NATIONS, Oct. 10 -- China on Tuesday expressed a rare willingness to support U.N. sanctions against its ally North Korea, but it said any punitive action would have to be narrowly targeted at the country's ballistic missile and nuclear weapons programs.

The United States and Japan continued to press the U.N. Security Council to support far stronger economic and trade measures that would permit international inspections of all North Korean cargo to search for weapons and to strangle Pyongyang's ability to finance its nuclear program.

DOJ_NMG_0079580

Varied responses to the nuclear test that North Korea apparently conducted early Monday emerged as the Bush administration sought to assuage fresh worries by its foreign counterparts that the tough strategy may cause hardship for the country's impoverished population or topple the government. France, for instance, voiced concern that a Japanese proposal to ban all North Korean exports could fuel a humanitarian crisis.

John R. Bolton, the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, insisted that the U.S. sanctions plan calls for the exemption of food, medicine and other humanitarian goods for civilians. State Department spokesman Sean McCormack, meanwhile, specifically ruled out any attempt at regime change. "We have made it very clear that the United States has no intention to attack North Korea. That element of our policy still stands," he told reporters. "What we have sought is a change in the behavior of the North Korean regime."

China's tougher stance against North Korea came as officials in Beijing faced criticism at home over their diplomatic strategy, which relies primarily on the now-stalled six-nation talks to contain North Korea's nuclear program.

The talks have been "a total failure," said Zhang Liankui, a professor at the influential Central Party School's Institute for International Strategic Studies. "North Korea's reaction is a challenge to the whole world. Every country should have a clear and definite attitude, including China.

"If peaceful means can't stop North Korea from conducting a nuclear test, then there should be other means," Zhang added. "The appeasement policy was very popular in the international community, and I think that's very dangerous. Within 10 years, people will suffer from this attitude."

Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesman Liu Jianchao acknowledged that North Korea's action "will undoubtedly exert negative impact" on the two countries' relations. But he said the six-party talks remain "the best and practical way and effective way to resolve this issue, so I don't think it's a failure of China's diplomacy."

Still, Wang Guangya, China's U.N. ambassador, conceded that the council would have to impose "some punitive actions" on Pyongyang to persuade it to heed international demands. He added, however, that "these actions have to be appropriate" and "more specifically targeted toward the nuclear- and missile-related areas."

U.S. officials welcomed China's willingness to consider punishing a traditional ally and a neighbor that it has shielded from international pressure for decades. White House spokesman Tony Snow said China's announcement suggested that North Korea's ability to use "bluff and bravado" to obtain concessions may have ended.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice told CNN that "I've never seen universal condemnation of the kind that North Korea is now facing, and condemnation, by the way, not just from the United States and Europe and Japan but from its closest supporters, those who are the ones who give them assistance."

The United States has told the North Koreans "that there is no intention to invade or attack them," Rice added. "So they have that guarantee." The president "never takes any of his options off the table," she said. "But the United States, somehow, in a provocative way, trying to invade North Korea? It's just not the case."

But other U.S. officials made it clear that they think tougher measures are required to ensure that North Korea will not ignore another unenforceable council dictate. They note that a U.N. measure that was passed in July, Resolution 1695, already bans international trade in ballistic missiles and nuclear technology with North Korea. But it lacks any enforcement provision.

The United States supports a resolution under Chapter 7 of the U.N. Charter, which can be enforced by sanctions or military action.

The U.S. draft resolution calls for imposing stringent financial penalties on North Korea and providing broad powers to foreign governments to inspect all trucks, trains, vessels and planes traveling in and out of the country. The U.S. text would also confront North Korea with a 30-day deadline to reverse course or face further penalties.

Japan has introduced a series of amendments that would ban North Korean exports and prohibit the arrival of North Korean ships or planes in foreign countries.

China opposes any deadlines or trade restrictions that would undercut North Korea's struggling economy.

It also insists that any resolution must exclude the possibility, however remote, that force could be used against North Korea. China proposed that a sanctions resolution refer simply to a provision in Chapter 7, known as Article 41, that would authorize only the imposition of sanctions.

DOJ_NMG_0079581

"We have not reached agreement -- do not misunderstand me," Bolton told reporters after meetings with China and other major council powers. "I know when you're making progress and I know when you're not making progress, and I'm still pleased with the directions things are going."

Fan and researcher Jin Ling reported from Beijing; staff writer Glenn Kessler in Washington contributed to this report.

U.S. Aims To Pass Resolution On N. Korea (AP)

By Nick Wadhams, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 12, 2006

The United States hopes to pass a new draft U.N. Security Council resolution on Friday to punish North Korea over its claimed nuclear test, U.S. Ambassador John Bolton said.

The new draft, which the U.S. will formally introduce on Thursday, is part of American and Japanese efforts for a quick Security Council rebuke to the North for its alleged test Monday, which raised tension surrounding Pyongyang's clandestine nuclear program and drew near-universal condemnation from around the world.

"There are still a lot of comments that have been made, and areas of disagreement, but as we've said repeatedly, we think this requires a strong and swift response," Bolton said Wednesday after a meeting with the ambassadors of Britain, France and Japan.

"Now, we're certainly prepared for further discussion but today is late Wednesday and to have a vote by the end of the week, we need to move expeditiously tomorrow, which we're going to try to do," he said.

Earlier Wednesday, Secretary-General Kofi Annan urged the United States to hold bilateral talks with North Korea and called on the communist nation not to escalate an "extremely difficult" situation.

"I have always argued that we should talk to parties whose behavior we want to change, whose behavior we want to influence, and from that point of view I believe that ... (the) U.S. and North Korea should talk," Annan said.

The United States has refused to talk one-on-one with North Korea except on the margins of six-party talks aimed at persuading the North to abandon its nuclear program. Bolton was quick to dismiss Annan's remarks, saying only: "I think we've expressed our view on that."

The Americans' new offering introduces significant changes to a previous draft resolution, circulated by the U.S. on Tuesday. The latest draft was expected to be circulated later Wednesday, when details were likely to be made known.

The previous draft would prohibit trade in materials that could be used to make or deliver weapons of mass destruction, and require states to ensure that North Korea not use their territory or entities for proliferation or illicit activities. Financial transactions that North Korea could use to support those programs would also be banned, under the previous draft.

The main impediment to the American draft so far has been China, which wants a far more limited package of sanctions, connected solely to the North's nuclear program. While it says its neighbor should be punished, officials want the scope of the sanctions to be focused more narrowly.

Another issue of dispute is how strongly to enforce the resolution. The United States and Japan want the resolution passed under Chapter 7 of the U.N. Charter, which would allow the council to enforce it with sanctions, a blockade or even military force.

Yet China wants to invoke only Article 41 of Chapter 7, which removes the threat of a blockade or military force. Article 41 would allow "complete or partial interruption of economic relations and of rail, sea, air, postal, telegraphic, radio and other means of communication, and the severance of diplomatic relations."

China's U.N. Ambassador Wang Guangya left a morning meeting with only one comment — that Chapter 41 "serves our purpose."

A U.N. Security Council diplomat said the latest draft would probably retain the full mention of Chapter 7 — clouding prospects that the document could be passed on the American schedule. The diplomat spoke on condition of anonymity because the document has not been released.

South Korean Foreign Minister Ban Ki-moon, the Security Council's nominee for the secretary-general, backed a quick resolution. He was in New York to meet with diplomats before the General Assembly vote that will formally name him Annan's successor.

DOJ_NMG_0079582

"My government has expressed our strong support for the speedy action to be taken by the Security Council and we'll have a close consultation with the members of the Security Council," he told The Associated Press.

The debate — with the U.S., Britain and France facing off against China and Russia — echoes the arguments made during Security Council negotiations over how sternly to rebuke Iran for its suspect nuclear program. In that case, because of Chinese and Russian resistance, the council agreed to invoke Chapter 7's Article 40, which is even weaker.

The Chinese stance drew frustration from Japan which, more than anyone else, wants tougher sanctions.

"We do recognize, acknowledge that they have made some effort, but in our view, we would have to ask them to make further efforts," Japan's U.N. Ambassador Kenzo Oshima said.

Sanctions Would Focus On Blocking Weapons Exports (LAT)

By Peter Spiegel And Julian Barnes

The Los Angeles Times, October 12, 2006

WASHINGTON — The sanctions demanded by U.S. officials in response to North Korea's announcement this week that it had tested a nuclear device would focus on closing pathways to proliferation of weapons technology.

But U.S. officials say any such effort would have to focus on the air and land routes through China and Russia that the government in Pyongyang has used in response to American monitoring on the high seas.

Since the 1990s, the Pentagon has used naval ships and aircraft to track and even intercept weapons shipments coming out of North Korea.

"Our folks pay very close attention to the vessels they are using and where they go; we stay on top of this one," Adm. William J. Fallon, the U.S. military's top officer in the Pacific, said last month. "One thing we can't do anything about is the air movement, because it goes over Chinese or Russian airspace. It's up to those countries to do things."

The new United Nations sanctions resolution proposed by the United States would direct all members "to undertake and facilitate inspection of cargo to or from" North Korea. In effect, it would require China to help close the gap in American efforts.

It's a challenge unlike any yet faced by U.S. diplomats and military officials. Until now, nations that have developed a nuclear capability have not viewed their new weapons as potential export commodities, as many believe Pyongyang does.

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld still would not say today whether U.S. defense intelligence agents had conclusive information that North Korea had set off a nuclear bomb. But he pointed out that it had taken quite some time for the United States to confirm that India and Pakistan had successfully tested nuclear devices.

He said he was concerned by attempts by North Korea and Iran to develop a nuclear bomb because both countries had sold weapons technology.

"Their programs point to increasing risks of lethal weapons possibly ending up in the hands of non-state entities, folks that tend not to be deterred the way a nation-state would because they don't have to worry about protecting real estate, population and leadership," Rumsfeld said.

At the U.N., Chinese and Russian diplomats resisted tougher proposals by the Americans and Japanese, and U.S. Ambassador John R. Bolton dismissed a North Korean threat to launch a nuclear-tipped missile if Washington refused direct talks. Diplomats hope for a vote on a response to North Korea by Friday.

Past international efforts to block exports and enforce embargoes have had limited and short-lived success. But North Korea's use of Chinese routes for conventional weapons exports raises the concern that it may attempt to use similar means to transship nuclear technologies.

"In the early days, it is absolutely true that the North Koreans sent both missiles and missile fuel and components to the Iranians and the Syrians by sea," said David Kay, a former U.N. weapons inspector who specialized in nuclear proliferation issues. "But they now know that's not a good way to do it, so most of it goes overland via China."

Kay said that, from China, the weaponry probably is flown to places such as Iran and Syria. North Korea also has sold missile technology to Yemen and Pakistan.

DOJ_NMG_0079583

The Bush administration has complained repeatedly that Beijing has not lived up to agreements to stop North Korea's shipments of weapons technologies. In testimony last month before a U.S. government commission, State Department officials said they "remain deeply concerned" over China's lack of commitment to its nonproliferation promises.

Thus far, however, U.S. proliferation concerns have centered on Pyongyang's trade in parts for long- and medium-range missiles. By some estimates, North Korea is the world's dominant exporter of ballistic missiles. An evaluation by the London-based International Institute for Strategic Studies estimated that missile sales had earned the North Korean government hundreds of millions of dollars, making it a significant source for hard currency.

But deliveries of missile components have begun to shrink in recent years as North Korea's traditional customers, particularly Iran, have developed their own capabilities. Experts fear that Pyongyang will view nuclear technology, and nuclear material such as plutonium, as a replacement revenue source.

"The thing that worries most people is actually the export of fissile material itself," Kay said.

"I don't think people are worried at this stage about North Korea sending weapons to Iranians or terrorists," Kay added, "although there is virtually nothing on the face of the Earth that the North Koreans have gotten their hands on that they haven't been willing to sell."

China has let North Korea ship missile parts through its territory and airspace and has exported missile systems to rogue governments itself. But U.S. officials consider Beijing less likely to tolerate North Korean nuclear shipments because such exports could undermine China's status as the only nuclear power in East Asia.

"North Korea is China's neighbor, so they, in a sense, have a more proximate cause for worry than even the United States," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said.

Nonetheless, enforcing any tightened counter-proliferation regime, even with Chinese cooperation, would be challenging, U.S. officials and arms experts said. The Pentagon can track ships, but it is nearly impossible to determine precise cargoes.

"The ability to recognize every single thing that's on every ship is a challenge," Adm. Fallon said.

The administration's proposed U.N. resolution would essentially establish an international agreement to allow the boarding of ships suspected of carrying prohibited items to or from North Korea.

Pentagon officials, however, said that any large-scale effort would be many times more complicated than tracking the vessels, and would require the participation of other countries. As a result, tactical planning has not begun for a U.S. blockade of North Korea, a Defense Department official said.

"The presumption is this would have to be an international effort," said the official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the issue. "You can't willy-nilly stop every ship; you need to search methodically."

Similarly, China's ability to monitor North Korean deliveries across its border may be limited. Beijing polices the border, but experts say the frontier remains somewhat porous and that China may not be employing the most modern sensors and other detection equipment.

"It's like moving drugs into the United States from Mexico," Kay said. "The Chinese could do a far better technical job than they've been doing. Radiation detectors along the Yalu River" - between North Korea and China - "would be a good thing, but they can be beaten."

China Still Values The Survival Of Communist Regime In North Korea (MCT)

By Tim Johnson

McClatchy Newspapers, October 12, 2006

BEIJING - North Korea's nuclear test deeply rattled China because it has more at stake in the survival of the isolated Pyongyang regime than it likes to admit.

Moreover, some of those vital interests are conflicted. Their balancing places China's policymakers in a quandary as they play a pivotal role at the U.N. Security Council in deciding how to punish North Korea for its nuclear test.

China values being seen as a responsible rising power interested in shouldering global issues and maintaining peace and stability in East Asia. Its leaders also regard soaring economic ties with the United States as a vital interest.

DOJ_NMG_0079584

"China doesn't want to severely hurt relations with the United States over the North Korean issue," said Shi Yinhong, an international relations specialist at People's University in Beijing.

Since 2003, when China first began hosting six-nation talks on the North Korean nuclear issue, it has won international praise. But Chinese hosts preferred to preach restraint rather than enter the fray and twist arms, and in the end they obtained little.

"China never played a real mediator role," said Jin Linbo of the China Institute of International Studies in Beijing, adding that China doesn't feel threatened by North Korea's nuclear program.

"I don't think Chinese leaders believe North Korea's nuclear weapons will immediately affect China's national interests," he said.

At the same time, as China's leaders frequently point out, they need peace abroad so that they can focus on economic growth and reforms and sort out a myriad of domestic problems, such as widening disparities of income and tattered social safety nets.

China also does not want to face the possible collapse of the Kim Jong Il regime and the need to explain to China's citizens the failure of an allied one-party state like its own, scholars say.

"If the regime (in Pyongyang) collapses, that could be a big shock to the Chinese system," said Wu Guoguang, a former editorial writer for the People's Daily who is now a political scientist at the University of Victoria in Canada's British Columbia.

It took China's leaders years after the collapse of the Soviet empire in the early 1990s to rebuild confidence in the Communist Party and tell people, "Look, the party survived. Communism is okay," Wu said.

China has a historic friendship with North Korea, tempered by the spilled blood of hundreds of thousands of Chinese troops during the 1950-1953 Korean War. China's older generation strongly supports North Korea, a historic if troublesome ally, and prefers a divided peninsula to a reunified, more powerful Korea on its borders.

Moreover, say analysts, Pyongyang plays a strategic role for Beijing.

Kim Jong Il's million-man army occupies the attention of U.S. forces on the Korean Peninsula, and could rattle the cage and divert the Pentagon if Beijing ever were to deploy troops in a blitz attack on Taiwan, a self-governed island it claims as its own.

"Taiwan is a priority for Beijing," said Wu, noting that China's leaders routinely believe that if they bend to Washington on the North Korea issue, it gives them leverage on Taiwan.

Even so, there is no denying Beijing's real frustration at Pyongyang for what it sees as a reckless escalation of tensions, reflected in its angry denunciation Monday of the "brazen" nuclear test and its willingness to support punitive U.N. sanctions.

China knows that a nuclear-armed North Korea deeply unsettles Japan and could spark an arms race in East Asia. It also raises the possibility of an eventual U.S. limited military strike on North Korea, making Kim's future less certain.

"The present situation is quite dangerous. North Korea faces more and more isolation," Shi said. "The possibility of collapse has increased."

China maintains leverage on Pyongyang by supplying more than half of its vital energy supplies, yet it believes it affects events in North Korea less than ever, Shi said.

"China's relations with North Korea already are at the lowest point in many years, and influence is at the lowest level," he said.

While China's leaders juggle differing concerns, they also keep an eye on the public mood. Chinese are at once unhappy with Kim for embarrassing their nation and deeply averse to kowtowing to Washington's demands to punish Pyongyang.

China is most likely to want to deal with the crisis like a family dispute, chastising North Korea in public but stopping short of inflicting real pain, Wu said.

"You want to punish your brother but you want to maintain the brotherhood," he said.

Seoul Will Take Its Time Crafting A Response (WSJ)

By Evan Ramstad

The Wall Street Journal, October 12, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0079585

SEOUL -- South Korea may take months to decide how to respond to North Korea's apparent test of a nuclear device, President Roh Moo Hyun said, in a sign of the difficult position his country is in as it seeks to penalize the northern regime without causing its sudden collapse or a war.

The U.S. and other countries believe South Korea possesses the most economic and political power, after China, over the North and the regime of leader Kim Jong Il. Japan yesterday imposed a host of sanctions on Pyongyang, and the United Nations Security Council is expected to impose new sanctions on North Korea for Monday's underground test explosion. But the price Pyongyang pays for carrying out the test will be influenced greatly by the severity of penalties imposed by Seoul and Beijing.

Mr. Roh said immediately after the test that the South would change its policy of using financial incentives to encourage political and economic change in the North. But he hasn't said precisely how much the policy will change.

Yesterday, before a meeting with leaders of businesses that have operations in the North, Mr. Roh said, "Whichever direction this does take, this is not a matter that can be decided in a couple of days or a couple of months."

He added: "We have to look at it comprehensively, [including] the prospect, outcome and impact. We'll have to take steps one by one in a calm manner, combined with careful review."

Indeed, the decision could be the most important of Mr. Roh's presidency, because it may set the course of relations on the peninsula for years to come.

Meanwhile, Tokyo prohibited North Korean ships from entering Japanese ports, banned imports from the impoverished nation and barred North Korean nationals from entering Japan, with some exceptions.

Japan, which doesn't share a border with North Korea, may feel it has has a freer hand than Seoul when it comes to punishing Pyongyang. However, Japan has been losing some leverage over North Korea in recent years because of the gradual decline in their bilateral trade. Five years ago, Japan was North Korea's second-biggest trading partner after China, with $475 million in annual two-way volume. By 2005, that had declined to less than $200 million, and Japan trailed China, South Korea, Thailand and Russia in trade with the North.

Mr. Roh said yesterday that South Korea wouldn't act unilaterally, only in coordination with other countries. Tomorrow, he will travel to Beijing for a summit with Chinese President Hu Jintao and Premier Wen Jiabao. On Tuesday, he met with leading Korean politicians, including chiefs of opposition parties and several former presidents, to discuss options.

-- Lina Yoon in Seoul and Sebastian Moffett in Tokyo contributed to this article.

UN Struggles To Agree On N Korea (FT)

By Mark Turner, Guy Dinmore And Dan Dombey

Financial Times, October 12, 2006

The US is expected to introduce on Thursday a revised resolution on sanctions to be imposed on North Korea over its nuclear test announcement, as leading powers are struggling with negotiations on the precise scope of the punitive action.

Washington hopes the UN Security Council will adopt the revised resolution by the end of this week. Although members of the Council, including the previously reluctant China, appear to agree that punitive action is necessary, talks have slowed a mid disagreement over the legal basis for it, while Pyongyang warned it would consider the measures an act of war.

Leading powers also disagree on whether the claimed nuclear test should be deemed an international threat to peace and security, and exactly how far sanctions should go.

The US, Europe and Japan are pushing for a Chapter 7 resolution, under which the UN can take tough enforcement action. George W. Bush, US president, on Wednesday urged “serious repercussions”.

But China has argued for using only Article 41 of that chapter – which cannot be used to authorise force. African and European diplomats from the non-permanent 10 countries on the Council were said to have asked that if a nuclear test were not worthy of Chapter 7, what was?

More difficult will be the debate on whether the sanctions should focus narrowly on measures to stop states from helping North Korea’s missile and nuclear programme – on which all could agree – or extend powers to inspect vessels travelling to and from the country and to cut off financial flows.

DOJ_NMG_0079586

Japanese proposals for an almost total embargo did not attract widespread support. Kenzo Oshima, the Japan's ambassador, said China was willing to impose some punitive measures "but in our view we would have to ask them to make further efforts."

Japan on Wednesday night imposed draconian unilateral sanctions on Pyongyang, banning all ships, all imports and most North Korean nationals from entering the country. But officials in Tokyo said the unilateral measures must be distinguished from the efforts of Japan, current chair of the Security Council, to build an international consensus on North Korea.

An explicit call by Japan on UN members to inspect cargos to and from North Korea was now unlikely to survive. Russia and China were said to be concerned with the idea, with Moscow warning that inspections at sea could allow North Korea to spark a confrontation.

But some diplomats added that the US could still send ships into international waters off Korea to deter Pyongyang from exporting nuclear-related materials.

There is also debate on a proposed ban of luxury goods to North Korea. Some Europeans were said to have joked that some wines were most certainly not luxurious.

There are also questions over how sanctions should be monitored.

Kofi Annan, the UN's outgoing secretary-general, said on Wednesday that he believed the Council would "come together and take firm action", but added that dialogue was essential.

"We should talk to parties whose behaviour we want to change. The US and North Korea should talk."

Additional reporting by David Pilling in Tokyo

Bush Faults Clinton Policy, But The Debate Is Complex (WP)

By Glenn Kessler, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 12, 2006

President Bush asserted yesterday that the administration's strategy on North Korea is superior to the one pursued by his predecessor, Bill Clinton, because Clinton reached a bilateral agreement that failed, while the current administration is trying to end North Korea's nuclear programs through multi-nation talks.

"In order to solve this diplomatically, the United States and our partners must have a strong diplomatic hand," Bush said at a news conference. "And you have a better diplomatic hand with others, sending the message, than you do when you're alone."

As Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice put it on Tuesday: "The United States tried direct dialogue with the North Koreans in the '90s, and that resulted in the North Koreans signing onto agreements that they then didn't keep."

But the reality is more complicated, according to former and current U.S. officials and a review of the diplomatic history.

Bush's current policy, in fact, envisions direct, bilateral negotiations with North Korea on certain issues in the six-nation talks, such as missile proliferation and normalizing relations. That commitment to direct talks is enshrined in the agreement of principles guiding future negotiations that was reached in Beijing in September 2005. Indeed, Rice was prepared to authorize her chief negotiator to travel to Pyongyang in November 2005, provided that North Korea shut down its nuclear reactor as a sign of good faith. It refused that condition, and the trip was scrubbed.

By the same token, it is not fully accurate to describe the negotiations that led to a 1994 agreement between the United States and North Korea as purely the result of one-on-one negotiations. During talks that produced the Agreed Framework, in which North Korea said it would freeze its nuclear program, U.S. negotiators briefed Japanese and South Korean officials every day. South Korea and Japan agreed to bankroll much of the cost of the light-water reactors that were to be provided to North Korea under the deal.

Robert L. Gallucci, the chief negotiator of the accord and now dean of the Georgetown School of Foreign Service, said it is a "ludicrous thing" to say that the Clinton agreement failed. For eight years, the Agreed Framework kept North Korea's five-megawatt plutonium reactor frozen and under international inspection, while North Korea did not build planned 50- and 200-megawatt reactors. If those reactors had been built and running, he said, North Korea would now have enough plutonium for more than 100 nuclear weapons.

DOJ_NMG_0079587

By Gallucci's account, North Korea may have produced a small amount of plutonium for one or two weapons before Clinton came into office -- during the administration of Bush's father -- but "no more material was created on his watch." When Clinton left office, officials saw signs that North Korea may have been attempting to create a clandestine uranium enrichment program, but nothing was definitive.

Such a program would violate the Agreed Framework. When the Bush administration decided it had conclusive proof of that enrichment in July 2002, it confronted North Korea and terminated fuel oil deliveries promised under the Agreed Framework. In response, North Korea evicted the inspectors, restarted the reactor and retrieved weapons-grade plutonium from 8,000 fuel rods that had been kept in a cooling pond. Intelligence analysts now think that, before Monday's apparent nuclear test, North Korea had enough plutonium for as many as a dozen weapons.

While the Bush administration accused Pyongyang, North Koreans complained bitterly that the United States was the chief violator of the pact because the reactors were years behind in construction and because promises to end hostile relations and normalize ties were not fulfilled.

Before the crisis in 2002, the Bush administration was prepared to hold bilateral talks with North Korea, though it took nearly two years after Bush came into office to arrange them. Afterward, administration insiders argued over the best approach before settling on meeting with the North Koreans only in the presence of officials from other nations.

Then-Secretary of State Colin L. Powell pressed China to host three-way discussions because it was clear that Bush was opposed to direct talks, according to the new book "Soldier: The Life of Colin Powell," by Washington Post Associate Editor Karen DeYoung. Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld adamantly opposed any dialogue, arguing in a series of memos that the goal should be the collapse of North Korea's government, the book says.

The talks were expanded to include Japan, South Korea and Russia. During a flight to Africa in July 2003, Powell won Bush's agreement to allow U.S. negotiators to meet with the North Koreans on the sidelines of the talks, in part to assuage the Chinese, who wanted more direct engagement between the United States and North Korea.

Conservatives opposed to negotiations came to embrace the six-party format because they thought that it was so cumbersome that it would not achieve much, and because North Korea's behavior grated on other participants.

Michael Green, a former White House aide who is now at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, said some bilateral negotiations will take place if a final agreement to dismantle the program is reached. But he said that the four other nations can provide incentives on trade and energy that the United States cannot, and that the other countries have much greater ability to inflict pain on North Korea.

Japan Imposes Sanctions On N Korea (FT)

By David Pilling In Tokyo And Anna Fifield In Seoul

Financial Times, October 12, 2006

Japan imposed draconian sanctions on Pyongyang last night, banning all ships, all imports and most North Korean nationals from entering the country.

The measures, while severe, are not likely to have a big extra economic impact, given that Japan has already drastically reduced trade and financial transfers to North Korea, experts said.

Officials in Tokyo also said that Japan's unilateral measures must be distinguished from its efforts to build an international consensus on appropriate global sanctions against North Korea.

As chair of the United Nations Security Council, Japan had to act as a responsible mediator between different positions, said Hiroshi Suzuki, deputy cabinet secretary.

The administration of Shinzo Abe, the newly installed prime minister, is also keen to find a common position with China and South Korea, the only countries with remaining economic leverage over Pyongyang.

Mr Abe last weekend launched a bold diplomatic initiative to rebuild positive relations with Japan's most important two neighbours and wants to use the North Korean nuclear issue as a way of cementing closer ties, officials said.

According to official estimates reported by Kyodo, a Japanese newswire, North Korea's exports totalled about $1.3bn in 2005, of which shipments to Japan comprised about 10 per cent, making it the third-largest importer of North Korean goods after

DOJ_NMG_0079588

China and South Korea. Seafood, including crab and sea urchin, accounted for about one-quarter of imports from North Korea, with anthracite coal, imports of which were recently suspended, making up nearly 15 per cent.

Japan took its unilateral measures last night after a meeting of its Security Council. Earlier, Mr Abe had told a parliamentary committee that North Korea could expect "harsh measures" from his administration, given his reputation for not compromising with the Pyongyang regime.

Tokyo's sanctions come as Pyongyang outlined its continued defiance on Wednesday when it said, on two separate occasions, that it would carry out another nuclear test if it came under increased pressure from Washington.

"If the US keeps pestering us and increases pressure, we will regard it as a declaration of war and will take a series of physical corresponding measures," the North's foreign ministry said in a statement published by the official Korean Central News Agency.

"We were compelled to conduct a nuclear test because of the US nuclear threat and pressure of sanctions," it said, in the isolated country's first comment since it announced Monday's test. "We are ready for both dialogue and confrontation."

This coincided with a similar threat from North Korea's number two leader, Kim Yong-nam, president of the Supreme People's Assembly.

Japan Slaps Pyongyang With Trade Sanctions (WT)

By Andrew Salmon

The Washington Times, October 12, 2006

SEOUL -- Japan halted trade with North Korea yesterday, while the United States and other nations sought additional penalties against the communist state for reportedly conducting a nuclear test.

President Bush demanded tough sanctions against North Korea, but he vowed to find a diplomatic solution to Pyongyang's defiance and said there were no plans for a military attack.

North Korea threatened unspecified "physical measures" against the United States and its allies, while South Korea said it was reviewing its defenses against a nuclear attack.

Japan's sanctions were the most substantive steps against the North since Monday's reported nuclear test at an underground site north of Pyongyang.

It banned all imports from North Korea and prohibited North Korean ships from entering Japanese ports.

"We cannot tolerate North Korea's actions if we are to protect Japanese lives and property," Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe said after an emergency security meeting. "These measures were taken to protect the peace."

Meanwhile at the United Nations, the United States is expected to push for a vote on North Korea by the end of the week despite opposition from China to some of the sanctions aimed at punishing Pyongyang for its reported nuclear test.

One controversial provision in the U.S.-drafted resolution was authorization for international inspections of cargo moving into and out of North Korea to detect weapons-related material. China, diplomats said, had rejected it, but that provision is still in the text circulated among the 15 Security Council members.

John R. Bolton, U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, who acknowledged there were "a number of disagreements," said he intends to introduce a new draft resolution formally to the Security Council members today with the aim of calling a vote a day later.

Among the imports from North Korea expected to face closed doors in Japan are mushrooms and seafood valued at about $50 million each year, a modest amount but a significant source of foreign currency for the impoverished nation.

Japan also prohibited North Korea nationals from entering Japan, with limited exceptions.

Reports early yesterday morning that North Korea may have tested a second nuclear device were later dispelled. But they underscored a deep insecurity gripping the region.

In Seoul, outgoing Foreign Minister Ban Ki-moon said South Korea would take a "considered and strategic approach" on whether to join the U.S.-led Proliferation Security Initiative (PSI), according to Yonhap news agency.

Mr. Ban is scheduled to become the next U.N. secretary-general when Kofi Annan's term ends in December.

DOJ_NMG_0079589

PSI is a program designed to halt the spread of weapons of mass destruction by sharing intelligence and intercepting suspect cargoes. Some 70 nations have signed up, but South Korea has previously declined for fear of antagonizing the North.

The PSI made headlines in 2002 when a Spanish ship, acting on information from U.S. intelligence, intercepted a North Korean ship with a load of Scud missiles headed for Yemen.

South Korean President Roh Moo-hyun said yesterday threats cited by North Korea for its belligerent policies were either "non-existent or greatly exaggerated."

It was an unusually blunt statement for the South Korean president, whose government is typically more accommodating toward the North.

Mr. Roh's policy of trade, tourism and engagement with the North has long been under pressure and his public approval ratings were at an all-time low even before Monday's test.

Mr. Bush told reporters in Washington: "In order to solve this diplomatically, the United States and our partners must have a strong diplomatic hand. And you have a better diplomatic hand with others, sending the message, than you do when you're alone."

Speaking in the Rose Garden at the White House, Mr. Bush repeatedly sought to reassure North Korea he wanted a peaceful outcome.

"We have no intention of attacking North Korea," the president said.

On the streets of North Korea's capital, it seemed like business as usual. Video from Associated Press Television News showed people milling about Kim Il-sung Square in Pyongyang and rehearsing a performance for the 80th anniversary of the "Down With Imperialism Union." The union was an anti-Japanese movement founded at a time when Korea was under Japanese occupation.

North Korea, in its first formal statement since Monday's blast, warned that it would counter further pressure from the international community with force.

"If the U.S. increases pressure upon [North Korea], persistently doing harm to it, it will continue to take physical countermeasures, considering it as a declaration of a war," said a statement by the North's Foreign Ministry and carried by the official Korean Central News Agency. It did not say what those measures could be.

North Korea's No. 2 leader Kim Yong-nam threatened in an interview with a Japanese news agency that there would also be more nuclear tests if Washington continued what he called its "hostile attitude."

Mr. Kim, second to North Korean leader Kim Jong-il, told Kyodo news agency that further nuclear testing would hinge on U.S. policy toward his government.

South Korea's military, meanwhile, was checking its readiness for nuclear attack, Yonhap reported. The Joint Chiefs of Staff recommended improving the military's defenses, possibly with state-of-the-art weapons to destroy nuclear missiles, it said.

Defense Minister Yoon Kwang-ung said Seoul could enlarge its conventional arsenal to deal with a potentially nuclear-armed North Korea.

The top U.S. general in South Korea said that American forces are fully capable of deterring an attack.

"Be assured that the alliance has the forces necessary to deter aggression, and should deterrence fail, decisively defeat any North Korean attack against" South Korea, Army Gen. B.B. Bell said in a statement to troops. "U.S. forces have been well trained to confront nuclear, biological and chemical threats."

About 29,500 U.S. soldiers are deployed in the South, a remnant of the 1950-53 Korean War.

This article is based in part on wire service reports

Japanese Back Prime Minister In Handling Of Nuclear Crisis (NYT)

By Martin Fackler

The New York Times, October 12, 2006

TOKYO, Oct. 11 — In office three weeks, Prime Minister Shinzo Abe is facing his first crisis, North Korea's claimed nuclear test, with a mix of soothing diplomacy and tough sanctions, scoring high marks with his nation's anxious voters.

DOJ_NMG_0079590

Mr. Abe has called on the United Nations to punish North Korea, and on Wednesday his government announced its own sanctions, including a ban on imports. At the same time, he has shown greater flexibility than his predecessor toward China and South Korea, joining them in criticizing the North during hastily arranged summit meetings this week.

Mr. Abe, who rose to popularity by taking a hard line on North Korea, has used the crisis to showcase his more assertive brand of foreign policy. He and other conservatives have used the North Korea threat to advance long-held goals of rearming their nation and giving it an international voice more in line with its economic might.

So far, Mr. Abe's blend of nationalist appeals and diplomatic pragmatism has proved popular with the Japanese public, which greeted the North's test announcement with outrage and fear. An editorial in Nihon Keizai Shimbun, a leading daily, compared the level of shock here to that after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks in the United States.

An opinion poll of voters published Wednesday in Asahi Shimbun, another leading daily, indicated 83 percent approved of Mr. Abe's visits to Beijing and Seoul, which were arranged before the crisis. The poll, of 1,023 people contacted by telephone, showed 82 percent seeing the North as a threat, a boon for Mr. Abe, whom the poll gave an approval rating of 63 percent.

"For now, the North Korea crisis has put the wind at Mr. Abe's back," said Hiroshi Nakanishi, a professor of international politics at Kyoto University. "His longstanding position of putting pressure on North Korea makes him look good at the moment."

But Mr. Nakanishi and other analysts also point out that Japan's deep-seated problems with the rest of Asia remain unresolved. The biggest is the belief among former victims of Japanese World War II-era aggression that Tokyo remains unrepentant about its wartime deeds.

In particular, Mr. Abe has remained purposefully vague on whether he will visit the Yasukuni Shrine, a Shinto memorial that honors Japan's war dead, including executed war criminals. His predecessor, Junichiro Koizumi, insisted on paying annual visits, outraging China and South Korea.

For now, Seoul and Beijing seem to accept Mr. Abe's stance of not stating whether he will go to the shrine. But if he should respond to pressures from his political base on Japan's right and pay a visit, he risks undoing his progress in mending ties, analysts say.

Mr. Abe has been sending mixed signals about his views on Japan's war responsibility. In Parliament last week he said wartime leaders, including his grandfather, Nobusuke Kishi, then the munitions minister, had made a mistake in going to war. But he also questioned the rulings of the United States-led Tokyo War Crimes trials after Japan's defeat.

His avowed goal of revising Japan's pacifist Constitution to allow full-fledged armed forces has also stirred regional concerns of resurgent militarism.

So far, though, such issues have been overshadowed by North Korea's reported nuclear test, an opportunity Mr. Abe has seized. In Parliament on Wednesday he called the test unacceptable, saying it was Japan that "faced the biggest threat from North Korea," which is about 200 miles away. His tough stance has led many here to call him Japan's "fighting prime minister."

On Wednesday, Japan imposed economic sanctions, including a ban on North Korean ships in Japanese harbors and greater restrictions on visits by North Korean citizens, in addition to the ban on imports. There has also been talk of tougher steps, like Japanese warships joining with the United States fleet if a naval blockade is imposed on North Korea.

At the same time, Mr. Abe has seen the crisis as a chance to improve ties with China and South Korea, both increasingly important trading partners. In Seoul on Monday, he appeared with the South Korean president, Roh Moo-hyun, to condemn the North's test. A day earlier he met with China's president, Hu Jintao, during the first visit to Beijing by a Japanese prime minister in five years.

Mr. Abe has also appealed to voters with his vision of a more equal military alliance with the United States, Japan's postwar protector. He has said he wants to increase Japan's participation in the United States-led development of a missile shield.

Analysts said his efforts at reconciliation with Seoul and Beijing might also have been made with an eye on Washington. American officials have shown concern over Japan's growing isolation in East Asia because of Yasukuni and other issues, including territorial disputes.

"The Yasukuni problem is on the shelf for now, but it will come back to plague Mr. Abe," said Mr. Nakanishi of Kyoto University. "Future tensions with South Korea and China are almost unavoidable."

DOJ_NMG_0079591

North Korea Warns Of More Nuclear Tests (NYT)

By Norimitsu Onishi

The New York Times, October 12, 2006

SEOUL, South Korea, Oct. 11 — North Korea said Wednesday that it would consider sanctions a "declaration of a war" and vowed to carry out further nuclear tests if the United States maintained a "hostile attitude." The North seems to be following a clear strategy that experts say has allowed it, a small, isolated, nearly bankrupt nation, to keep the attention of the United States for more than a decade.

In the country's first remarks since its reported nuclear test on Monday, North Korea said it felt compelled to prove its nuclear capacity to "protect its sovereignty and right to existence from the daily increasing danger of war" from the United States.

North Korea's official news agency quoted an unidentified Foreign Ministry spokesman as saying, "If the U.S. increases pressure on North Korea, persistently doing harm to it, it will continue to take physical countermeasures, considering it as a declaration of a war."

This characteristically defiant tone was sounded as the five permanent members of the United Nations Security Council prepared to discuss what type of sanctions to mete out.

In a rare interview, Kim Yong-nam, the North's second most powerful leader, said, "The issue of future nuclear tests is linked to U.S. policy toward our country."

"If the United States continues to take a hostile attitude and apply pressure on us in various forms," Mr. Kim told a Japanese news agency, "we will have no choice but to take physical steps to deal with that."

At the United Nations, ambassadors from Britain, China, France, Russia, the United States and Japan met to settle differences over a resolution to impose sanctions on North Korea. Ambassador John R. Bolton said the United States intended to circulate a revised draft Thursday in the hope of having a vote by Friday.

The United States is seeking international inspections of all cargo into and out of North Korea to intercept weapons-related material and a resolution drafted under Chapter VII of the United Nations Charter that poses the possibility of military enforcement. China and Russia are resisting that, though they say they favor strict punishments for North Korea's defiance of Council warnings not to conduct weapons tests.

Secretary General Kofi Annan called the apparent nuclear test "unacceptable" and said he expected the Council to take "a firm action.

Asked whether the United States should deal directly with North Korea, Mr. Annan said: "I have always argued that we should talk to parties whose behavior we want to change, whose behavior we want to influence. And from that point of view, I believe that the U.S. and North Korea should talk. They did talk in the past."

That may well be North Korea's aim. Despite a carefully cultivated reputation as a volatile, capricious leader, Kim Jong-il has pursued a consistent, even canny, strategy in his pursuit of nuclear arms.

As Kim Yong-nam's remarks indicate, North Korea — an increasingly isolated country that has battled famine, a collapsing economy and desertion across its borders — has seen nuclear weapons as a form of defense as well as a potential threat. Its leaders have used that threat as way to wrest concessions from Western powers, and gain protection against what they see as hostile nations determined to topple their government.

North Korea embarked on this course in 1993, when it announced that it was pulling out of the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty and then won an agreement from the Clinton administration for help in building two nuclear power reactors in exchange for freezing its nuclear activities. Over the ensuing years, despite disastrous economic conditions that led to famine in the mid- to late-1990's, the North succeeded in getting the world's attention through a series of crises of its own making, from declarations that it had nuclear weapons to missile launchings.

"Every time they've played this crisis escalation strategy with us before, it's worked," said Scott Snyder, a Korea expert with the Asia Foundation in Washington and the author of "Negotiating on the Edge: North Korean Negotiating Behavior."

"The mind-set was that if you're a small state like North Korea and there are many other problems in the world, the only way to get the United States' attention is to escalate things in such a way as to force the Bush administration to deal with North Korea directly," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0079592

Joining the club of nuclear powers was in keeping with North Korea's strategy to be treated on equal terms with Washington, Mr. Snyder said.

The North made its intentions explicit in March 2005 declaring that, as a nuclear power, it wanted the six-nation talks over its nuclear program to focus instead on "disarmament talks where participants can solve the issue on an equal basis."

The nuclear test was also the product of North Korea's sense of insecurity — one that grew keener over the past decade because of its troubled economy and the leadership's inability to control a population that began spilling out, by tens of thousands, across the border into China and some to South Korea. In the past few years, as North Korea began liberalizing its economy and trade boomed with China, new threats of money-making and corruption materialized.

Many North Koreans still depend on international food aid because of the collapse of the state's food rationing system, though life is less precarious than in the 1990's. Those living near the porous border with China, and even those in remote areas, have increasing access to information from the outside world and contact with it.

At the same time, the North is confronted by a Bush administration that described its leader, Kim Jong-il, as a "pygmy" and lumped it into an "axis of evil." The toppling of Saddam Hussein magnified the threat.

"The nuclear test is a response to the threat that North Korea feels," said Bruce Cumings, a professor of history at the University of Chicago and an expert on North Korea. "It's entirely real. It's not a figment of their imagination. They were put in the axis of evil. We have nuclear weapons pointed at them, and we have for decades."

North Korea is "a garrison state of astonishing proportions," he said. "It's not going to commit suicide by attacking South Korea or Japan with nuclear bombs. It knows it will lose. Their fundamental orientation is being hunkered down for defense."

The test, experts said, also grew out of the North's frustrations at the stalled six-nation talks and what it perceived as the Bush administration's reluctance to engage in genuine negotiations. Last year, the United States offered security and economic incentives in return for the North's freezing of its nuclear program, but the deal quickly fell apart over its sequence. What is more, Washington imposed economic sanctions around the same time, leading the North to withdraw from the talks.

"North Korea has nothing to show for its diplomatic efforts," said Peter Beck, the Northeast Asia project director at the International Crisis Group, adding that North Korea had also engaged in recent years in fruitless diplomacy with Japan and Europe. "That makes the military perspective much more appealing."

But for North Korea's closest neighbors, experts said, its leverage comes from its weakness. For South Korea and China, the prospects of the North's collapse and a flood of refugees, as well as the possibility of an even more intractable successor to Mr. Kim, are perhaps even more worrisome developments than nuclear weapons.

In recent days, President Roh Moo-hyun of South Korea has indicated a willingness to be tough on the North by casting doubts about the South's policy of engaging North Korea. He suspended aid and said the two major projects — industrial and tourist zones operated by South Koreans inside the North — would be put under review. But it is not clear how long the tough stance will last.

"We're under a lot of pressure both domestically and internationally to give up on engagement," said a senior South Korean official. "But we really don't have an alternative other than the engagement policy."

N. Korea's No. 2 Official Warns Of Further Tests (WP)

By Anthony Faiola, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, October 12, 2006

SEOUL, Oct. 11 -- North Korea's second most powerful political figure, Kim Yong Nam, indicated Wednesday that the communist state would carry out further nuclear tests if the United States did not change what he called its "hostile attitude."

In an interview with Japan's Kyodo news service in Pyongyang, the North Korean capital, Kim also dismissed the impact that any economic sanctions imposed by the U.N. Security Council would have on his impoverished country. "Even as economic sanctions increase by day, our economy in general has entered a rising trend," he was quoted as saying.

Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe, declaring that his country is "in gravest danger," moved Wednesday to ban imports from North Korea and stop North Korean ships and citizens from coming to Japan.

DOJ_NMG_0079593

Kim's remarks were the first public comment from a high-ranking North Korean official since the secretive government announced a nuclear test on Monday. He added that North Korea would refuse to return to stalled six-party talks aimed at its nuclear disarmament unless the United States dropped sanctions imposed in September 2005 that target North Korea's alleged counterfeiting and other illegal businesses.

The Foreign Ministry, meanwhile, said North Korea would consider increased U.S. pressure "a declaration of a war."

Analysts have said the explosion detected in North Korea's barren northeast on Monday was small enough to suggest that the test partially failed or was not in fact nuclear. Japanese Foreign Minister Taro Aso told a parliamentary panel that Japan had unconfirmed information that another test might be coming.

"The issue of future nuclear tests is linked to U.S. policy toward our country," Kim told Kyodo on Wednesday. "If the United States continues to take a hostile attitude and apply pressure on us in various forms, we will have no choice but to take physical steps to deal with that."

As president of the presidium of the Supreme People's Assembly, North Korea's one-party parliament, Kim is considered second in influence only to the country's absolute ruler, Kim Jong Il.

Across northeast Asia, the nuclear issue continued to keep people on edge, particularly after seismic activity on Wednesday was initially reported as a possible second nuclear test. It was later found to have been generated by an earthquake in northern Japan.

Japan has joined the United States in leading the call for more pressure on Pyongyang. Sanctions that were approved by Japan's national security council are on track to be formally adopted by the cabinet on Friday, and would likely precede any action by the U.N. Security Council.

In September, Japan began limiting money transfers from 16 entities suspected of having ties with North Korea's nuclear and weapons development programs. The scope of those sanctions is expected to be widened to include remittances to North Korea from Japan that analysts say total as much as $900 million a year.

"Japan will be most affected security-wise by this North Korean issue," Chief Cabinet Secretary Yasuhisa Shiozaki told reporters in Tokyo. "We decided on this sanction based on Japan's independent thinking and judgment, taking into consideration the significance" of the professed nuclear test.

Tokyo has taken steps in recent years to curb financial dealings with Pyongyang over various disputes. Total trade of about $180 million in 2005 was about half the figure in 2002, according to Japan's Finance Ministry.

Japanese leaders dismissed fears that their country might now engage in a nuclear arms race. That continues to be politically untenable in Japan, given World War II memories of the U.S. atomic bombings of Hiroshima and Nagasaki. "There will be no change in our nonnuclear arms principles," Abe told reporters in Tokyo. "We want to seek a solution through peaceful and diplomatic means."

In South Korea, President Roh Moo Hyun -- long counted among the North's most staunch defenders -- continued to distance himself from the Pyongyang government. "North Korea says the reason it is pursuing nuclear [weapons] is for its security, but the security threat North Korea speaks of either does not exist in reality, or is very exaggerated," the semiofficial Yonhap news agency quoted him as saying.

The South Korean government announced late Wednesday that it would consider joining the U.S.-led Proliferation Security Initiative, launched in 2003 and aimed at stopping ships at sea suspected of smuggling weapons of mass destruction. North Korea has been considered a main target of the initiative.

Defense Minister Yoon Kwang Ung told parliament that Seoul might enlarge its conventional arsenal if North Korea is ultimately proved to have nuclear weapons.

North Korea Threatens More Nuclear Tests (AP-Y)

By Hans Greimel

AP-Yahoo, October 12, 2006

North Korea threatened more nuclear tests and said Wednesday it would consider additional sanctions an act of war, stoking tensions in an already jittery Asia.

DOJ_NMG_0079594

Unfazed by the latest threats, Japan banned all North Korean imports — such as clams and mushrooms — and barred the North's ships from its ports.

South Korea said it was making sure its troops were prepared for atomic warfare and said it may bolster its conventional forces as well. The top U.S. general in the South said American soldiers were poised to repel any attack.

"I would urge the North Korean authorities not to escalate the situation any further," U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan said at the United Nations. "We already have an extremely difficult situation."

On the streets of North Korea's capital, it seemed like business as usual. Video by AP Television News showed people milling about Kim Il Sung square in Pyongyang and rehearsing a performance for the 80th anniversary of the "Down with Imperialism Union."

North Korea, in its first formal statement since it announced an atomic bomb test Monday, hailed the blast as a success and warned that it would counter further pressure from the international community with physical retaliation.

"If the U.S. increases pressure upon the DPRK, persistently doing harm to it, it will continue to take physical countermeasures, considering it as a declaration of a war," said a statement by the North's Foreign Ministry and carried by the official Korean Central News Agency. It did not say what those measures could be. DPRK is shorthand for the Democratic People's Republic of Korea.

North Korea's No. 2 leader Kim Yong Nam threatened in an interview with a Japanese news agency that there would also be more nuclear tests if Washington continued what he called its "hostile attitude."

Kim, second to North Korean leader Kim Jong Il, told Kyodo News agency that further nuclear testing would hinge on U.S. policy toward his communist government.

"The issue of future nuclear tests is linked to U.S. policy toward our country," Kim Yong Nam was quoted as saying when asked if Pyongyang will conduct more tests.

At the White House, President Bush demanded stiff sanctions on North Korea but said the U.S. has "no intention of attacking" the regime despite its claims that it needs atomic weapons to guard against such a strike.

South Korean President Roh Moo-hyun said the security threat cited by North Korea "either does not exist in reality, or is very exaggerated," according to the country's Yonhap news agency. It was a rare direct criticism of the communist regime from the South's leader.

Japan announced a crackdown meant to impact the North's 1-million-member military, the world's fifth largest.

The new measures ban North Korean imports and prohibit ships from the impoverished nation from entering Japanese ports. North Korean exports like clams and mushrooms earn precious foreign currency on the Japanese market.

North Korean nationals will also be barred from entering Japan, with limited exceptions, the Cabinet Office said after an emergency security meeting.

"Japan is in gravest danger, if we consider that North Korea has advanced both its missile and nuclear capabilities," Prime Minister Shinzo Abe told reporters following the meeting. "These measures were taken to protect the peace."

Ferries have long served as a major conduit of communication and cash between Japan and North Korea, which have no diplomatic relations.

South Korea's military, meanwhile, was checking its readiness for nuclear attack, Yonhap reported. The Joint Chiefs of Staff recommended improving the military's defenses, possibly with state-of-the-art weapons to destroy nuclear missiles, it said.

Defense Minister Yoon Kwang-ung said Seoul could enlarge its conventional arsenal to deal with a potentially nuclear-armed North Korea.

The top U.S. general in South Korea said that American forces are fully capable of deterring an attack.

"Be assured that the alliance has the forces necessary to deter aggression, and should deterrence fail, decisively defeat any North Korean attack against" South Korea, Army Gen. B.B. Bell said in a statement to troops. "U.S. forces have been well-trained to confront nuclear, biological and chemical threats."

About 29,500 U.S. soldiers are deployed in the South, a remnant of the 1950-53 Korean War.

Rice Says U.S. Will Not Invade N. Korea (AP-Y)

DOJ_NMG_0079595

By Foster Klug, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 12, 2006

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice says the United States would not attack North Korea, rejecting a suggestion that Pyongyang may feel it needs nuclear weapons to stave off an Iraq-style U.S. invasion.

Rice said that President Bush has told the North Koreans that "there is no intention to invade or attack them. So they have that guarantee. ... I don't know what more they want."

Rice told CNN Tuesday that Bush "never takes any of his options off the table. But is the United States, somehow, in a provocative way, trying to invade North Korea? It's just not the case."

But she also said that the decision by Pyongyang to go ahead with its nuclear program means it likely will see "international condemnation and international sanctions unlike anything that they have faced before."

Asked whether North Korean leader Kim Jong Il may have felt that he needed to stage an apparent nuclear test this week to prevent an invasion similar to the U.S.-led attack on Saddam Hussein, Rice said Iraq "was a very special situation."

"Iraq was a desire to finally deal with a threat that had been there for too long," she said.

North Korea's No. 2 leader threatened further nuclear tests if the United States continues its "hostile attitude."

In an interview Wednesday with Japan's Kyodo News agency, Kim Yong Nam, second to North Korean leader Kim Jong Il as president of the Presidium of the Supreme People's Assembly, threatened further nuclear tests if the United States continues its "hostile attitude."

"The issue of future nuclear tests is linked to U.S. policy toward our country," Kim was quoted as telling Kyodo when asked whether Pyongyang will conduct any more nuclear tests.

Kim also suggested that Pyongyang was ready to return to stalled six-party talks if sanctions against the reclusive regime are lifted, Kyodo reported.

Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., said Wednesday there are plenty of avenues for talks to resolve the issue.

"We have plenty of ways of talking with the North Koreans. The problem is, they don't like what we say and we certainly don't like what they do," he said on NBC's "Today" show.

McCain called the latest statements from Pyongyang "one in an unending series of threats and bullying and attempts to get aid and assistance from the West."

Rice rejected direct talks with North Korea, saying that if Kim "wants a bilateral deal, it's because he doesn't want to face the pressure of other states that have leverage," referring to China, South Korea and the other members of stalled six-nation nuclear negotiations.

"What Kim Jong Il should understand is that if he verifiably gives up his nuclear weapons program, there is a better path," Rice said. "There's a better path for his people, who are oppressed and downtrodden, and hungry for that matter."

Her comments came as John Bolton, U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, said the United States would not be intimidated by a reported threat from Pyongyang that it could fire a nuclear-tipped missile unless the U.S. acts to resolve the standoff.

"This is the way North Korea typically negotiates by threat and intimidation," Bolton said. "It's worked for them before. It won't work for them now."

The White House said, meanwhile, there is a "remote possibility" that the world never will be able to fully determine whether North Korea succeeded in conducting a nuclear test Monday. While acknowledging that the action was provocative, White House press secretary Tony Snow suggested that it's possible that the test was something less than it appeared.

"You could have something that is very old and off-the-shelf here, as well, in which case they've dusted off something that is old and dormant," he said. The comment appeared to indicate that the White House was attempting to play down the significance of the test, but Snow said later that he was merely posing a hypothetical question.

While opposition Democrats claimed the test was evidence of a failed U.S. policy, Snow argued that the test has left the nations involved in the six-party negotiations with the communist regime more unified and determined to persuade Pyongyang to accept incentives to give up its nuclear weapons ambitions. He also denied that the demands of the war in Iraq hampered the Bush administration's ability to dissuade North Korea from developing nuclear weapons.

DOJ_NMG_0079596

"The Chinese, the South Koreans, the Japanese — they all have more direct leverage over the North Koreans than we do," Snow said. "The people who have the greatest ability to influence behavior are now fully invested in equal partners in a process to deal with the government of North Korea."

In response to North Korea's purported nuclear test, the United States is pressing at the United Nations for stringent sanctions on Pyongyang, including a trade ban on military and luxury items, the power to inspect all cargo entering or leaving the country, and freezing assets connected with its weapons programs.

International Pressure Key To Pressure North Korea: Rumsfeld (AFP-Y)

AFP-Yahoo, October 12, 2006

US Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld said it was "probably" possible to pressure North Korea to get off its current nuclear path without the threat of military action.

"I guess time will tell. I think the answer is: Probably yes, but one can't be certain," he said at a news conference here.

While it was possible to marshall sufficient pressure to deal with the North Korean threat by "non-kinetic" means, it would require international action, he said.

The international community would have to decided that "action during this period, when the threat is not immediate, is the time to do it; rather than when the threat becomes more immediate in whatever number of years that may be," he said.

Intelligence Failure Cited In Korean Crisis (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, October 12, 2006

Recent U.S. intelligence analyses of North Korea's nuclear and missile programs were flawed and the lack of clarity on the issue hampered U.S. diplomatic efforts to avert the underground blast detected Sunday, according to Bush administration officials.

Some recent secret reports stated that Pyongyang did not have nuclear arms and until recently was bluffing about plans for a test, according to officials who have read the classified assessments.

The analyses in question included a National Intelligence Estimate a consensus report of all U.S. spy agencies produced several months ago and at least two other classified reports on North Korea produced by senior officials within the office of the Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte.

The officials said there were as many as 10 failures related to intelligence reporting on North Korean missile tests and the suspected nuclear test that harmed administration efforts to deal with the issue.

According to officials familiar with the reports, the failures included judgments that cast doubt about whether North Korea's nuclear program posed an immediate threat, whether North Korea could produce a militarily useful nuclear bomb, whether North Korea was capable of conducting an underground nuclear test and whether Pyongyang was bluffing by claiming it could carry one out.

The failures would be the latest in a string suffered by U.S. intelligence in recent years, as described in a series of government and nongovernment reports. Past stumbles have included missing chances to detect or stop the September 11 attacks, faulty assessments of Saddam Hussein's weapons programs, the failure to predict the 1998 round of nuclear tests by India and Pakistan, and overly optimistic predictions of the Iraqi reaction to a U.S. invasion.

Intelligence officials are hoping President Bush will make a comment supporting U.S. intelligence agencies' performance on North Korea, something he has not done to date.

Another analytical shortcoming involved the failure to predict that North Korea would fire its July 4 salvo of seven missiles. One report said North Korea would test a single long-range Taepodong-2 and also did not predict that Pyongyang would fire the missile, which failed 42 seconds into flight, toward an area of the Pacific near Hawaii, the officials said.

The analyses also predicted that China would agree to impose tough U.S. sanctions on North Korea's arms exports and imports, something that has not occurred. However, the lack of clarity about the issue was one reason both Mr. Bush and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice did not make stronger appeals to officials in China to press North Korea not to conduct the test, the officials said.

DOJ_NMG_0079597

"It was an intelligence failure," said one administration official close to the issue.

Additionally, the weak assessments undermined the recent visit to China by Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe, who did not have good enough intelligence to persuade Mr. Hu that a test was imminent and that he should use his government's influence on North Korea to stop it. Aides to Mr. Abe are said by U.S. officials to be upset that they could not help Mr. Abe better understand the nuclear test plans before the meetings.

China in 2003 temporarily cut off oil shipments to North Korea, an action Beijing has refused to use again either to prevent the missile tests or the nuclear test.

Carl Kropf, a spokesman for Mr. Negroponte, dismissed as false claims by officials who say U.S. intelligence analysis on North Korea was flawed. "That is absolutely wrong, that we were not tracking this issue for some period of time," he said.

Rep. Peter Hoekstra, Michigan Republican and chairman of the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence, said he was not surprised when the nuclear test was carried out, based on his access to intelligence reports.

Mr. Hoekstra said his panel would conduct a review of intelligence analyses before North Korea's recent reported weapons test, but he noted that intelligence analysts have difficulty in making clear predications about the future, and that past failures, such as those on Iraq's weapons programs, affected current reporting.

"I think the community is a little bit gun shy," Mr. Hoekstra said. "They're being held to a strict standard and as a result are going to caveat everything in the aftermath of Iraq."

According to officials familiar with the reports, the weak analysis on North Korea is being blamed on Thomas Fingar, the most senior U.S. intelligence analyst within the office of the Director of National Intelligence.

Mr. Fingar, now deputy Director of National Intelligence for analysis, was the lone dissenter in a 2002 national intelligence assessment that stated Iraq had large stockpiles of chemical weapons and carried over the skeptical viewpoint to North Korea's arms programs.

Kim Jong-il's Suicide Watch (NYT)

By B. R. Myers

The New York Times, October 12, 2006

Seoul, South Korea

HOURS after Monday's nuclear test, President Bush issued a stern warning to North Korea — but only against the passing of nuclear technology to other states or non-state entities. The president's declaration thus reflected a confident consensus in Washington that while Kim Jong-il may try selling his nukes, he would never dream of using them himself. Why not? The explanation was given by a former national security adviser, Donald Gregg, on Monday: "Don't panic. Kim Jong-il's objective is survival ... not suicide."

The same soothing logic could be applied to President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad of Iran, but of course it won't be. These long-term diagnoses of Mr. Kim's psyche are a roundabout way of saying that because he is not a fundamentalist Muslim, he is unlikely to do anything really crazy.

This sort of cultural profiling, however, can get us into real danger. Japan's emperor during World War II, Hirohito, was neither religious nor suicidal, and he led his nation into a war that no rational leader could have hoped to win. The point is relevant, because although journalists persist in calling North Korea a Stalinist state, its worldview is far closer to that of fascist Japan.

Like the Japanese in the 1930's, the North Koreans trace the origins of their race back thousands of years to a single progenitor, and claim that this pure bloodline makes them uniquely virtuous. The country's mass games — government-choreographed spectacles with a cast of more than 100,000 — are often mistaken by foreign journalists as exercises in Stalinism. They are in fact celebrations of ethnic homogeneity. "No masses in the world," the state-run Cheollima magazine reminded readers in 2005, "are purer and more upright than our masses."

In state propaganda, Kim Jong-il is often linked, as Hirohito once was, to images of white horses, snow-capped mountain peaks and other symbols of racial purity. South Korea, on the other hand, is regarded as contaminated by too close contact with other races. At a recent meeting between generals from both Koreas, the North delegation's leader condemned the South for allowing racial intermarriage. "Not a single drop of ink," he intoned, "must be allowed to fall into the Han River."

DOJ_NMG_0079598

Naturally enough, the North Koreans' race theory, like that of the Japanese fascists, actuates a blithe indifference to international law. A uniquely virtuous people has no reason to obey its moral inferiors, be they allies or enemies. China has now learned that despite decades of military and economic assistance it can draw on no residue of good will in dealing with Pyongyang.

Neither can the South Koreans, whom the North Koreans will revile for their ethnic treason no matter how much cash they pump northward. This utter imperviousness to gestures of friendship and conciliation bears obvious implications for the prospect of normal relations between North Korea and America.

The northern regime has so far restricted its racial propaganda to the home audience, because it wants the world to go on misperceiving it as a Stalinist state. This way we continue to pin our hopes on the kind of trust-building dialogue that worked so well with Communists in the 1980's — and failed so disastrously with the pure-race crowd a half-century earlier.

While the North Koreans could kill a lot of people, they do not pose as great a threat to world security as imperial Japan did. Never have they shown any interest in forging an empire. All the same, the irrationality of their worldview is such that we should, at the very least, stop assuming that they would never use their own weaponry.

While Kim may not be suicidal himself, he shares Hirohito's penchant for encouraging this quality in his people: "Defense until Death" is an increasingly popular slogan. In 2003 a colorful poster was disseminated to the foreign press showing a fat missile in flight with a suicide-readiness slogan on it: "Yankee, take a good hard look." That isn't bad advice.

The Squeeze On North Korea (WP)

By Jim Hoagland

The Washington Post, October 12, 2006

North Korea has, in its own inimitable fashion, paid tribute to a little-noticed U.S. push to get the world's bankers to isolate regimes that promote nuclear proliferation and terrorism. Who else would claim to have conducted a nuclear weapons test and then threaten more blasts to get their way in a $24 million banking dispute?

Don't they have any good lawyers in Pyongyang?

North Korea's efforts to blame its crossing of the nuclear-testing threshold on U.S. "economic hostility" would be laughable if the regime weren't led by world-class paranoids and fantasists capable of believing their own odious propaganda. Americans do not have to believe it, however.

Such a regime may be beyond reasoning with or, even worse, deterring in a conventional sense, as the Bush administration seems to believe.

But Pyongyang's threats -- if not its excuses -- must be taken seriously and met with new forms of containment and pressure. The same is true of Iran, the other major target of the Treasury Department's efforts "to isolate bad actors from the global financial system" by calling attention to their use of banks for rogue operations.

That description comes from Stuart Levey, Treasury undersecretary for terrorism and financial intelligence. I happened to call on him yesterday a few hours after Pyongyang had threatened more nuclear and verbal blasts if the United States continued its "sanctions" policy.

"If the objective was to put pressure on North Korea, well, we succeeded," said Levey, who has joined Deputy Treasury Secretary Robert Kimmitt in traveling the globe to persuade other governments to examine and, where appropriate, cut financial links to the two remaining members of President Bush's "axis of evil."

But the purpose of this effective new effort at using soft power as pressure is much broader. According to Levey, Treasury is targeting people who are eminently deterrable: "People who are in business are very concerned about their reputations and do not want to get involved in illicit activity that is under scrutiny. They will make the decisions about whether they continue doing business or not. We don't make the decision for them."

DOJ_NMG_0079599

So Levey disputes North Korea's characterization of U.S. policy as being one of politically driven "sanctions." Treasury's efforts are targeted at specific illicit transactions, such as the counterfeiting of U.S. currency; the transfer of funds involved in the smuggling of drugs, arms or even nuclear-weapons components; and the financing of terrorist operations.

"The United States effectively lifted sanctions against North Korea in 2000, and the Bush administration has not reimposed them," Levey asserted. "What we are doing is calling attention to the risks involved in being involved in these transactions."

The first use of the heavy U.S. financial hammer was against the Macao-based Banco Delta Asia, which Treasury identified last year as a "primary money-laundering concern" for Pyongyang. The bank, which operates under the control of the Chinese government, froze an estimated $24 million in North Korean assets rather than risk losing U.S. and other business. Pyongyang is still boiling over this perceived affront, as its angry statements this week indicated.

"It is important to look beyond this week's developments," Levey said, after asking rhetorically if he now needs a security detail. "Look at the receptivity of the world's finance ministers to accepting that they have a major role to play in the area of global security and intelligence. That is the future."

However much its self-imposed isolation might seem to protect it from them, North Korea clearly takes these financial pressures seriously. So must Iran. Squeezing the regime financially is probably the only hope (however forlorn it may turn out to be) of keeping Tehran from going nuclear in a few years.

Iran was forced to announce in August that its oil production will soon begin to decline because of a lack of new investment in the oil industry and the difficulty of getting new technology from abroad for its aging fields.

Access to foreign capital and advanced equipment will not have been helped by the U.S. decision last month to exclude Bank Saderat, one of Iran's largest state-owned banks, from buying or selling dollars and other financial instruments from U.S. banks. This is in response to Bank Saderat's role in transferring millions of dollars to terrorist groups.

In the early days of the Soviet Union, Lenin predicted that capitalists would eagerly sell him the rope he would use to hang them. He lost the bet when Moscow proved unable to pay for ruling an empire. Treasury's sophisticated efforts to deny gangsters in North Korea and Iran access to global capital should not be abandoned because of the nuclear bluster from Pyongyang and Tehran.

jimhoagland@washpost.com

A $2-Trillion Fiscal Hole (WSJ)

By Chris Edwards And Jagadeesh Gokhale

The Wall Street Journal, October 12, 2006

State and local governments are amassing huge obligations in the form of unfunded retirement benefits for their workers. Aside from underfunded pension plans, governments have also run up large obligations from their retiree health plans. While a new Governmental Accounting Standards Board rule will kick in next year and reveal exactly how large this problem is, we estimate that retiree health benefits are a $1.4 trillion fiscal time bomb.

The new GASB regulations will require accrual accounting of state and local retiree health benefits, thus revealing to taxpayers the true costs of the large bureaucracies that they fund. We reviewed unfunded health costs across 16 states and 11 local governments that have made actuarial estimates, and found an average accrued liability per covered worker of $135,000. Multiplying that by the number of covered state and local employees in the country yields a total unfunded obligation of $1.4 trillion -- twice the reported underfunding in state and local pension plans at $700 billion.

To put these costs in context, consider the explicit net debt of state and local governments. According to the Federal Reserve Board, state and local credit market debt has risen rapidly in recent years, from $313 billion in 2001 to $568 billion in 2005. But unfunded obligations from state and local pension and retiree health plans -- about $2 trillion -- are still more than three times this net debt amount.

The key problem is that the great majority of state and local governments finance their retiree health benefits on a pay-as-you-go basis. In coming years that will create pressure to raise taxes as Baby Boomers age and government employees retire in droves. New Jersey's accrued unfunded obligations in its retiree health plan now stand at $20 billion, and the overall costs of its employee health plan are expected to grow at 18% annually for the next four years.

DOJ_NMG_0079600

To compound the problem, defined-benefit pension and retirement health plans are much more common and generous in the public sector than the private sector. Out of 15.9 million state and local workers, about 65% are covered under retirement health plans, compared to just 24% of workers in large firms in the private sector.

The prospect of funding $2 trillion of obligations with higher taxes is frightening, especially when you consider that state politicians would be imposing them on the same income base as federal politicians trying to finance massive shortfalls in Social Security and Medicare. Hopefully, most state policy makers appreciate that hiking taxes in today's highly competitive global economy is a losing proposition.

The only good options are to cut benefits and move state and local retirement plans to a pre-funded basis with personal savings plans. Two states, Alaska and Michigan, have moved to savings-based (defined-contribution) pension plans for their new employees. Alaska has also implemented a health-care plan for new state employees, which includes high-deductible insurance and a Health Savings Account. Expect to see more states following Alaska's lead.

State and local governments also need to cut retirement benefits, which were greatly expanded during the 1990s boom. From a fairness perspective, cutting benefits especially of younger workers is reasonable given the generosity of state and local plans. Federal data shows that state and local governments spend an average of $3.91 per hour worked on employee health benefits, compared to $1.72 in the private sector.

Underfunded -- or more accurately, over-promised -- retirement plans for state and local workers have created a $2 trillion fiscal hole. Every year that policy makers put off the tough decisions, the hole gets bigger. Hopefully, the new GASB rules will prompt them to enact the reforms needed to avert job-destroying tax increases on the next generation.

U.N. Disagrees On Sanctions Against Iran (AP)

By George Jahn, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 12, 2006

The five permanent members of the U.N. Security Council agreed Wednesday to start working on U.N. sanctions against Iran next week, but failed to bridge differences on how harsh the penalties should be, diplomats and officials said.

They told The Associated Press that while the U.S. called for broad sanctions to punish Iran's defiance in pursuing its nuclear program, Russian and Chinese representatives at a top-level Vienna meeting favored less severe measures.

The diplomats and government officials demanded anonymity in exchange for discussing the confidential meeting of the five Security Council countries and Germany — the six powers whose repeated attempts to entice Iran to enter negotiations finally broke down last week over Tehran's refusal to give up uranium enrichment.

In New York, U.S. Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns told the Council on Foreign Relations that package of incentives meant to persuade Iran to halt uranium enrichment remained on the table.

But he said Iran's stance left little choice but to "head back to the Security Council in a couple of days, at the end of this week or early next ... to begin the process of writing and then passing, we hope, a sanctions resolution that will raise the cost to the Iranians of what they are doing in the nuclear round."

Reflecting the importance of the meeting of the six powers, Russia, Britain, France and Germany sent top negotiators directly answerable to their foreign ministers, while the U.S. and China were represented by their chief representatives to the Vienna-based International Atomic Energy Agency. Burns participated via video hookup.

One of the diplomats, who had been briefed on the substance of the meeting, said that while Burns had urged broad sanctions — such as a total ban on missile and nuclear technology sales — the Russians and Chinese backed prohibitions of selected items as a first step.

He also said the Chinese and Russian envoys called for renewed negotiations with the Iranians in parallel to working on sanctions to punish Tehran for defying a Security Council demand that it freeze enrichment, a possible pathway to nuclear arms.

Burns told the Council on Foreign Relations that the countries trying to stop Iran's programs "had come to a fork in the road." Despite a substantial package of incentives and an offer of direct negotiations with the United States, Iran "turned us down," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0079601

"If at any time the Iranians wish to come forward and negotiate with the United States and these other countries, then we'll be very happy to do so," Burns said.

The differences among the Security Council powers reflected continued divisions over how harshly to penalize the Islamic republic for ignoring a Security Council deadline to stop all enrichment activities by the end of August. Russia and China, which have strategic and economic interests in Iran, have recently swung behind the Americans and Europeans in agreeing to the need for sanctions but have publicly opposed attempts to make them too severe.

"All agree for the need for sanctions but there are problems with how harsh they should be," said one of the diplomats, whose country is accredited to the International Atomic Energy Agency, or IAEA.

He said the meeting did not discuss North Korea and its claim to have tested a nuclear bomb, but all participants agreed juggling two nuclear crises complicated international nonproliferation efforts.

Iran, OPEC's No. 2 producer of crude, is apparently ready to face the threat of sanctions because it is confident they will be more symbolic than damaging because of international concerns any tough penalties could prompt Tehran to retaliate by cutting off oil exports.

Restating his country's defiance, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad was quoted by state television Wednesday as saying "the day sanctions are imposed on Iran by its enemies would be a day of national celebration for the Iranian nation."

In separate comments earlier, Ahmadinejad called the prospect of sanctions "a hollow threat."

"These three or four countries are bullying, they have no right to intervene," he said, in reference to the United States, France, Britain and Germany. "The Security Council has no right to intervene."

The Security Council demanded a halt to enrichment after the Iran ignored calls from the IAEA to suspend such activities until doubts about the country's nuclear program have been cleared. Uranium must be enriched before it can be used in either nuclear reactors or atomic weapons. Iran says its nuclear program is for peaceful purposes only.

Senior EU negotiator Javier Solana had met with top Iranian negotiator Ali Larijani over the past few weeks in a new attempt to persuade Tehran to suspend enrichment and start nuclear talks with the six-nation alliance.

But those talks failed last week over Iran's refusal to freeze enrichment even for a limited time.

While the representatives of five of the six nations at the Vienna talks subsequently met with IAEA chief Mohamed ElBaradei, the Americans did not attend, said a U.N. diplomat.

There was no reason given for their absence, but one of the diplomats speculated it could have been a show of U.S. displeasure with ElBaradei, whom Washington in the past has accused of being too soft on Iran.

U.S. To Let Spare Parts Be Sent To Iran (AP-Y)

By Barry Schweid

AP-Yahoo, October 12, 2006

The Bush administration said it is approving exports to Iran of spare parts and other equipment for the country's national airline, despite the standoff with Tehran over its nuclear program.

The State Department cited worries about travel safety in explaining the decision, which will allow the export of items used to repair turbine engines on Airbus aircraft operated by Iran Air.

"We do not want to be in a position of threatening civil aviation," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack told reporters on Wednesday.

McCormack said the General Electric Co. would provide the equipment to Iran. The department announced the decision on Tuesday.

While Iran supports terrorism and is pursuing a nuclear weapons program, McCormack asserted, "the United States is focused on the pressing humanitarian concerns that affect the Iranian people."

The Federal Aviation Administration has questioned whether the aircraft are airworthy and recommended immediate overhaul, he added. The departments of Commerce and State approved a license for the parts Sept. 29, McCormack said.

The administration labels Iran a sponsor of terrorism and has banned virtually all trade between the two countries.

DOJ_NMG_0079602

The decision to grant a license, however, will clear the way for export of spare and replacement parts and technical data to repair and overhaul a "limited number" of engines manufactured in the United States.

U.S. To Sell Tehran Jet Parts (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, October 12, 2006

The Bush administration said yesterday it would let Iran buy spare parts for commercial aircraft as a humanitarian gesture, despite "grave concerns" about the Iranian regime.

The decision came as the United States and five other major powers agreed that the U.N. Security Council will begin next week drafting a list of sanctions against Iran because of its nuclear program.

"We do not want to be in a position of threatening civil aviation," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack told reporters. "The United States is focused on the pressing humanitarian concerns that affect the Iranian people."

The departments of State and Commerce informed Congress on Sept. 29 that they would recommend the Treasury Department issue a license to General Electric Corp. "to permit the exportation of spare and replacement parts, components and technical data for the repair and overhaul of a limited number" of such engines on aircraft operated by Iran Air.

"As conditions for the license approval, all repairs will be performed in third countries and no exports will go directly to Iran," the State Department said.

The State Department has blacklisted Iran as a state sponsor of terrorism, and a long list of sanctions prevents American companies from doing business with the Islamic republic.

"Despite our grave concerns regarding the Iranian regime's activities, we believe this decision is consistent with our commitment to support the Iranian people and to use U.S. sanctions to target the regime, not the Iranian people," the department said.

Senior officials from the five permanent Security Council members -- the United States, Britain, France, Russia and China -- and Germany held a video conference yesterday following their foreign ministers' Friday meeting in London on Iran's nuclear program.

They were not able to narrow down the menu of sanctions and turned the matter over to their U.N. ambassadors, who are expected to meet on the issue next week, diplomats said.

That meeting was supposed to take place this week, but North Korea's apparent nuclear test Monday prompted the Security Council to rearrange its schedule.

A senior U.S. official said on Friday that the first Iran sanctions would target its nuclear industry, rather than oil and gas.

Iran's ambassador to France, Ali Ahani, said in Paris yesterday that Tehran is still interested in negotiations but will not suspend uranium enrichment.

"The door is still open, as long as two important elements are accepted: our well-defined rights under the nonproliferation program, and our guarantees that our nuclear ambitions are not geared toward military use," Mr. Ahani said.

Overflights By Israel Said To Violate Truce (WP)

By Anthony Shadid

The Washington Post, October 12, 2006

BEIRUT, Oct. 11 -- Lebanese Prime Minister Fouad Siniora warned Wednesday that Israeli military flights over his country's territory were endangering a nearly two-month-old truce that ended this summer's war between Israel and Lebanon's Hezbollah movement.

Siniora, speaking in an interview, said the overflights were occurring daily. The United Nations, which considers them a violation of the Aug. 14 truce, said it recorded 10 overflights of warplanes and surveillance drones from Oct. 3 to midnight Oct. 9.

"I am willing to accept whatever any other sovereign country would accept for itself. Would they allow it?" Siniora asked at his office in the Serail, the government headquarters. "I mean, would the United States allow flyovers of Russian planes? If they would allow it, I accept it. Why do you expect me to do something more than what 195 countries would accept for themselves?"

DOJ_NMG_0079603

Israel has said it will continue overflights of Lebanese territory until U.N. Resolution 1701 is, in its view, implemented fully. It says that would require the return of the two soldiers that Hezbollah, a Lebanese Shiite group, captured in a cross-border raid on July 12 and an inspection mechanism to ensure that no weapons cross the Syrian border into Lebanon to resupply Hezbollah guerrillas.

The overflights pose a delicate issue for Siniora, whose government has come under pressure from Hezbollah and followers of a powerful Christian politician, Michel Aoun, to resign in favor of a government they deem more representative.

Since 2000, when Israel ended its occupation of southernmost Lebanon, Hezbollah had represented the main armed presence in that region and had contended that the Lebanese army, vastly outgunned by its Israeli equivalent, was too weak to protect the border. After the August cease-fire, the Lebanese army was deployed to the south for the first time in a generation, a move that Siniora has hailed as one of his government's greatest achievements. Hezbollah has warned, however, that it might act if Israeli violations of the truce continue and the Lebanese army and a newly strengthened U.N. force in the area do nothing to end them.

Siniora said that, in time, the army might have to respond to Israel's actions. "It is the duty of our army to defend the country, and this is what it should do," he said.

But the prime minister acknowledged that the dispute would probably have to be resolved diplomatically. "Now we are exhausting all diplomatic channels and means, and this is how it should be done," he said. He added that even when Hezbollah was effectively guarding the border from 2000 to 2006, Israeli overflights were routine but the Shiite militia was largely powerless to stop them.

Siniora's government, which is backed by the United States and European countries, is at the center of a growing polarization in Lebanese politics that sometimes breaks along sectarian lines, sometimes along those of ideology. The tension, often most pronounced between the country's Sunni and Shiite Muslim communities, has left many here gloomy about what lies ahead.

Aoun and, to a lesser extent, Hezbollah have demanded that Siniora's cabinet resign in favor of what they call a "national unity government" that would give them more power. Corruption, rife in Lebanese public life, is one of their biggest complaints. So is what they view as the government's ineffectiveness.

At another level are two views of the war's end: Hezbollah contends its military prowess deprived Israel of a victory; Siniora said the government's diplomacy was responsible for the U.N. resolution that ended the fighting.

If Hezbollah wants "to bring the government down, this is a legitimate objective of the opposition," said Siniora, who assumed his position in July 2005. "But it is a legitimate right of the other side to defend this position and to prove to the other that they are wrong, and that is what we are doing.

"The government," he added, "is not the place for dialogue."

Rice: Palestinians Deserve Better Life (AP)

By Barry Schweid

AP, October 12, 2006

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Wednesday that Palestinians deserve a better life "free of the humiliation of occupation" and in a state of their own.

"I promise you my personal commitment to that goal," Rice said at a dinner marking the third anniversary of the American Task Force on Palestine.

"There could be no greater legacy for America," Rice told the group, which describes itself as nonpartisan and supportive of a Palestinian state living side by side with Israel.

"The Palestinian people deserve a better life ... free of the humiliation of occupation," she said.

Rice has made five trips to the region as secretary of state, looking for ways to promote President Bush's call for a two-state solution to the decades-long conflict between Israel and the Palestinians.

But peace talks are in suspension, and Hamas, which calls for the destruction of Israel, plays a leading role in Palestinian affairs.

DOJ_NMG_0079604

And yet, Rice said "things are changing," that moderates are coming to the fore. She praised Mahmoud Abbas, the president of the Palestinian Authority with whom the Bush administration deals while boycotting Hamas.

The militant group, which the United States and European governments have labeled a terrorist organization, must choose between remaining what it is or turning into a peaceful political party, Rice said.

"You cannot be both," she said.

U.N. Notes Increase In Israel Roadblocks (AP)

By Karin Laub, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 12, 2006

Israel's network of military checkpoints and road barriers in the West Bank has grown by 40 percent in the past year, part of an increasingly sophisticated system of controls that disrupts all aspects of Palestinian life, a U.N. agency said Wednesday.

These physical obstacles are carving up the West Bank into separate parts, with travel between them becoming more and more difficult, said David Shearer, head of the U.N.'s Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs in Jerusalem.

U.N. officials in Geneva, meanwhile, expressed concern about the ongoing closure of the Gaza Strip, including the crossing between Gaza and Egypt.

"It cannot continue like it is now without a social explosion that will hurt everybody, including Israeli security," said Jan Egeland, the U.N. humanitarian chief.

The tightened travel restrictions come at a time of continued deadlock — both in efforts to restart an Israeli-Palestinian dialogue and a bid by Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas to form a more a pragmatic government that is acceptable to the international community.

The Hamas-led Palestinian Authority has reiterated in recent days that it will not recognize Israel or renounce violence — key conditions for the lifting of an international aid boycott.

In Brussels, Belgium, the EU said Wednesday it had given $816 million in aid to the Palestinians this year, bypassing the Hamas government.

EU spokeswoman Emma Udwin said a two-day meeting of European experts agreed to expand the aid to cover 60,000 additional people in the Palestinian territories, from the 100,000 currently receiving help through the international fund overseen by the World Bank.

Jacob Walles, the U.S. consul general in Jerusalem, said the United States is prepared to work with any Palestinian government that meets the international demands.

With Hamas refusing to compromise, it should make room for others, Walles said. "They should let another government come in, in some way, and accept the conditions," Walles told Palestinian reporters.

In the current climate, a meeting between Abbas and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert also appeared increasingly unlikely, despite pledges by both a month ago that they are ready to meet without preconditions.

Abbas confidant Saeb Erekat said the Palestinian leader wants concrete achievements in such a meeting, including the release of some of the thousands of Palestinian prisoners Israel holds.

However, Israeli government spokeswoman Miri Eisin said Wednesday that she expects Olmert and Abbas to meet "toward the end of November" despite the current difficulties.

In Jerusalem, the U.N. agency, OCHA, said it has seen an increase of nearly 40 percent in the number of army checkpoints and physical barriers in the West Bank, from 376 in August 2005 to 528 in September of this year.

The West Bank's Jordan Valley is now entirely off limits to Palestinians who are not residents of that area, except for those with permits to work in the valley's Jewish settlements, Shearer said.

Israel is also pushing ahead with the construction of its separation barrier along, and in many areas inside the West Bank. The barrier eventually will run for 437 miles; 252 miles have been completed, including 27 miles in the past five months, Shearer said.

Some 50,000 Palestinians have found themselves on the wrong side of the barrier, meaning they are separated from the rest of the West Bank, Shearer said.

DOJ_NMG_0079605

"We are seeing a continuing closing down, locking down of Palestinian areas," he said.

Tight travel restrictions also were in place during the height of the Palestinian uprising from 2000 to 2003, when dozens of suicide bombers carried out attacks in Israel.

"Since then it's become much more systematic, much more sophisticated in terms of monitoring Palestinian movement and closing Palestinian movement," he said.

"The West Bank, for example, is effectively being chopped up into three big areas ... and there are pockets within those areas where people also can't move."

Capt. Adam Avidan, spokesman for the military's civil administration in the West Bank, said in a statement that Israel tries "as much as possible to preserve the Palestinians' way of life and to avoid hurting innocent civilians in its war against terrorism."

US, Dominican Presidents To Discuss Stalled Free Trade Deal (AP)

AP, October 12, 2006

SANTO DOMINGO, Dominican Republic U.S. President George W. Bush and Dominican President Leonel Fernandez will hold talks this month aimed at jump-starting a delayed free trade agreement between the two countries, officials said Wednesday.

The Oct. 25 meeting in Washington will also focus on Dominican participation in Venezuela's regional oil program, Petrocaribe, as well as programs to increase the use of alternative and renewable fuels, White House spokesman Frederick Jones said in a telephone interview.

Fernandez will meet with financial officials and members of Bush's cabinet, his office said in a statement. It will be his third visit to the United States this year.

The visit "is aimed at strengthening cooperation between the United States and the Dominican Republic in themes of common interest, with the obligation to expand free trade and economic, security and energy growth," the statement said.

The Dominican Republic is one of six Latin American signatories to the Central American Free Trade Agreement, or CAFTA-DR. The pact was supposed to take effect in the Caribbean nation on Jan. 1, but the country has not passed legislation needed to implement parts of the deal.

Some of the delays stem from conflicts between U.S. and Dominican intellectual property law, including issues related to pharmaceutical manufacturing. A Dominican delegation was scheduled to visit Washington this week to discuss the problems.

Guatemala, Honduras, Nicaragua and El Salvador entered the pact this year after delays. Costa Rica is yet to ratify the accord.

U.S. Cuts Economic Aid For Colombia Area (AP)

By Joshua Goodman, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 12, 2006

The United States is quietly cutting back economic aid in a region where cocaine production is surging, a strategy critics say hurts Washington's $4 billion effort to try to wean Colombia off the illegal drug trade.

In an internal memo obtained by The Associated Press, the U.S. Agency for International Development blames unacceptable security risks for its workers and a lack of private investment partners for its pullout from Caqueta, a former rebel stronghold in impoverished southern Colombia.

Six years and more than $4 billion in American tax dollars after Plan Colombia was launched in Caqueta, Colombia's army is still fighting rebels here, and coca, the raw ingredient of cocaine, is still the region's No. 1 cash crop.

But the alternative development programs meant to provide farmers with a profitable alternative to growing coca are vanishing in the state — a symptom, critics say, of how Plan Colombia has failed to persuade enough coca growers to switch to legal crops even as coca production reaches volumes unseen in years.

Washington spends $70 million annually on development projects in drug-producing areas of Colombia. While such projects win praise, the United Nations and development groups lament their limited scope.

DOJ_NMG_0079606

Caqueta and neighboring Putumayo state produced 24 percent of the 356,000 acres of coca detected by the most recent U.S. survey — contributing to a 26 percent surge last year nationwide. Yet Caqueta has seen only a trickle of U.S. development aid — $5.6 million since 2000.

And now even that is drying up.

As part of the U.S. strategy to win over coca growers, almost 20 percent of annual assistance is devoted to nonmilitary social programs and development projects. Managing this "soft side" of diplomacy is USAID, whose mission in Colombia is its biggest in the hemisphere.

But under the agency's new five-year $350 million plan for development projects, Caqueta and four other Amazonian states where coca production is rising won't receive a penny.

"It's a complete contradiction of Plan Colombia," said Luis Fernando Almario, a congressman from Caqueta who supports President Alvaro Uribe's aerial eradication drive. "Instead of investing generously to eliminate dependency on the illegal drug trade, we're being shunned."

A USAID official at the U.S. Embassy in Bogota said resources from Caqueta would be channeled to other areas with a greater likelihood of sustaining development long-term. He spoke on condition of anonymity because he is not authorized to comment publicly on the issue.

But critics say that by writing off the south, the U.S. and Colombian governments are leaving the region with little alternative to coca.

Despite USAID's pessimism about the region's economic prospects, at least some foreign investors are still committed: the multinational Nestle SA, with aid from the United Nations, plans to double the capacity of a dairy plant in Caqueta.

"It makes no sense for residents of a historical guerrilla stronghold to be subjected to a strategy of all stick and no carrot — combats, mass arrests, searches and fumigation, but no aid," said Adam Isacson, an analyst at the Washington-based Center for International Policy.

The drying up of development aid is in contrast with the tens of millions spent on aerial eradication efforts that have barely curtailed coca cultivation in the region.

Some 400 coca farmers gathered here recently for a coca-growers' congress. In sweltering heat, normally tight-lipped peasants railed for hours against the lack of government aid even as a U.S.-supplied crop duster dumped clouds of the herbicide glyphosate on nearby fields.

Since June, when the latest round of spraying began, six peasants in the area have been arrested for having coca on their land.

"All the government ever does is fumigate and fumigate — it's their own fault we grow coca because they never show their face to offer alternatives," said Juan Carlos Mazabel, one of the organizers.

Instead of more spraying, Caqueta's 450,000 residents want financial support, their representatives say.

The war on drugs was expanded in 2001 to target rebels who profit from the cocaine trade. A legion of U.S. soldiers and contractors have since passed through Caqueta to train and assist 20,000 counterinsurgency troops.

The rebels have largely retreated into the mountains, restoring a dose of safety to cities and roads. But that hasn't led to new jobs for impoverished residents.

The U.S. Embassy says security constraints and limited private interest are also thwarting its work in Putumayo, at $65 million the top recipient of Plan Colombia economic aid among Colombia's 32 states.

Some projects already have faltered. In the town of Orito, an animal-food concentrates plant has been idle for nearly a year, its machinery rusting since the U.S. abandoned the project.

"We're worried," says Putumayo congressman Orlando Guerra, "because we have no idea what is going to happen."

China Makes Commitment To Social Harmony (NYT)

By Joseph Kahn

The New York Times, October 12, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0079607

BEIJING, Oct. 11 — China's Communist Party, devoted in recent years to expanding the economy at any cost, on Wednesday endorsed a new doctrine that puts more emphasis on tackling the severe side effects of unrestrained growth.

The annual meeting of the ruling party's Central Committee formally adopted President Hu Jintao's proposal to "build a harmonious socialist society," a move some analysts said was one of most decisive shifts in the party's thinking since Deng Xiaoping accelerated the push for high growth rates in the early 1990's.

The leadership declared that a range of social concerns, including the surging wealth gap, corruption, pollution and access to education and medical care, must be placed on a par with economic growth in party theory and government policy.

"There are many conflicts and problems affecting social harmony," the Central Committee said in a statement released Wednesday after the close of its four-day planning session. "Our party has to be more proactive in recognizing and dissolving these contradictions."

China's economy has recently been expanding at better than 10 percent annually, faster than any other major economy in the world, and the party shows no signs of trying to sharply reduce that rate soon.

China needs much higher growth rates than most developed countries to absorb tens of millions of surplus workers, and even the plans for addressing environmental woes and creating a sounder welfare system assume surging tax revenues to pay for them.

"A harmonious society above all needs development," the statement said.

But the "harmonious society" theme contains a multitude of political positions that reflect Mr. Hu's agenda as he has consolidated his power.

He has campaigned doggedly to reduce the party's addiction to state-backed investment projects, politically driven expansion of industry and infrastructure and conversion of state-owned land for speculative real estate development. The fear is that many such projects generate poor economic returns and add to China's pollution, already among the worst in the world.

Local officials have tended to ignore central directives on creating a more sustainable and less speculation-driven economy, partly because they still believe that they will not be promoted unless they can show stellar production results in their domains.

Officials have also used their access to state money and loans from state-owned banks to pour investment into projects that benefit themselves or their friends and family members. Vital sectors such as finance, transportation and energy remain closely held by party-appointed officials and the children of the elite.

Hand-in-hand with the "harmonious society" drive, Mr. Hu and Zeng Qinghong, the vice president and the leader of the party's secretariat, have undertaken the most sustained crackdown on official corruption since the party first embraced market-oriented economic measures nearly three decades ago.

The anticorruption sweep has already resulted in the detention of Chen Liangyu, the powerful party boss of Shanghai, as well as senior officials in Beijing, Tianjin, Fujian, Hunan and other places.

But party officials acknowledge that corruption is endemic in the one-party system. The mass accumulation of wealth by people who have political power has helped transform China from one of the most egalitarian societies in the world to one of the most unequal, with a yawning urban-rural wealth gap.

Because many people believe that wealth flows from access to power more than it does from talent or risk-taking, the wealth gap has incited outrage and is viewed as at least partly responsible for tens of thousands of mass protests around the country in recent years.

The Central Committee statement did not commit the leadership to specific targets in reducing the gap beyond stating that it would need to see improvement by the year 2020.

But analysts say the new platform should result in significant increases in government spending on education and health care, which tend to be expensive and inaccessible to peasants, migrant workers and retirees, who make up the overwhelming majority of China's population.

Energy efficiency and pollution controls have also become a greater policy focus, though experts say there are still few signs that party leaders have the resolve to fight pollution at the expense of growth.

DOJ_NMG_0079608

"For most of the past 15 years, the leadership has put G.D.P. growth above everything else," said Mao Shoulong, a public policy expert at People's University. "Now, they want to make G.D.P. one of a series of social priorities that will determine whether or not you get promoted."

Mr. Mao said Mr. Hu would probably continue to face obstacles in putting his plans into effect. Among the problems are that government revenues as a share of the total economy remain relatively low. Local officials still care far more about generating growth than abstract goals like social equality.

"China is still a poor country that faces many of the problems of rich countries with far more resources," Mr. Mao said. "It is not so easy to change the focus of the leadership at this stage of development."

China's Party Leadership Declares New Priority: 'Harmonious Society' (WP)

By Maureen Fan, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, October 12, 2006

Doctrine Proposed By President Hu Formally Endorsed

BEIJING, Oct. 11 -- China's Communist Party on Wednesday formally endorsed a political doctrine laid out by President Hu Jintao that calls for the creation of a "harmonious society," a move that further signaled a shift in the party's focus from promoting all-out economic growth to solving worsening social tensions.

The endorsement, made at a closed-door plenary session held by the party's Central Committee, underlined Hu's increasing power. It effectively enshrined his doctrine in the same pantheon as those of Mao Zedong and other predecessors.

China's leaders have become concerned in recent years about problems tied to the country's blistering economic growth. Anger over a growing gap between rich and poor and an inadequate social security system is feared to threaten the party's stability. Retirees increasingly cannot live on their pensions, crime and divorce rates have escalated, and clashes have broken out between security forces and farmers whose fields and villages have been swallowed by development.

The four-day plenary session, which ended Wednesday, was the first in 25 years to focus on social issues rather than on economic or political development.

"This plenary is where the pedal hits the metal," said Kenneth G. Lieberthal, a former Clinton administration official who is now a professor of political science at the University of Michigan. "Hu now wants to get formal endorsement of a set of priorities that will focus both on rapid growth and on ameliorating some of these problems. He is saying, 'This is what I stand for. These are the directions in which I will guide China.' "

A statement released after the plenary said: "China is a harmonious society in general, but there are many conflicts and problems affecting social harmony. We must always remain clear-headed and be vigilant even in tranquil times."

The document was also aimed at setting the agenda for next year's party congress, a meeting at which Hu is likely to indicate who will succeed him. The 17th Party Congress will meet in Beijing in late 2007.

In recent months, authorities have responded to social unrest by tightening controls, drafting laws that clamp down on the news media and launching a high-profile campaign against corruption.

Last month, the Communist Party chief of Shanghai was fired for allegedly helping loot the city's pension fund of hundreds of millions of dollars. Chen Liangyu, a protege of Hu's predecessor, Jiang Zemin, was the first member of the 24-member Politburo to lose his job since 1995.

Analysts have speculated that Chen was targeted because he and other proteges of Jiang advocated unfettered economic growth.

Experts said this year's plenary session was especially significant because initiatives in areas such as health, education and social welfare were more dramatic and comprehensive than usual. The session also focused on rural unrest and the environment.

"Hu has devoted more resources to rural China than was the case five years ago. He has begun to devote serious financial resources to infrastructure projects designed to address environmental degradation," said Lieberthal, who cautioned that the measures appeared to be preliminary.

DOJ_NMG_0079609

Hu's plan calls for significant progress by 2020 in narrowing the wealth gap, increasing employment, improving public service and protecting the environment.

Chinese scholars often worry that the country suffers from an eroding system of beliefs and a lack of common aspirations and values. To help build a new values system, the party's objective "is to try to perfect the socialist democratic legal system," one in which "the rule of law is to be carried out completely, and people's interests and rights are to be respected and guaranteed," the plenary statement said.

Critics said the statement was meaningless.

"Harmonious society means nobody opposes me. No different ideas," said a political analyst in Beijing who spoke on condition of anonymity for fear of reprisal. "If you talk to farmers, you will know what harmonious society means. They're angry. That's why the party needs to crack down. With money, law, jail -- anything in order to reach one society without any conflicts.

"It's propaganda. It's nothing. . . . We Chinese don't believe in these slogans anymore."

But Huang Weiding, deputy editor in chief of the Red Flag Publishing House, insisted that gradual change was occurring and that there was now greater focus on the party system rather than on the power of individual leaders.

"China is such a vast country. There are several million party cadres. How will we unify their thoughts? We need theory," Huang said. "These are not just slogans, they are our goals."

Researchers Jin Ling and Li Jie contributed to this report.

Suffrage Timetable Left For Later (WP)

By K.c. Ng

The Washington Post, October 12, 2006

HONG KONG, Oct. 11 -- Hong Kong's chief executive, Donald Tsang, issued his annual policy address Wednesday without setting a timetable for universal suffrage in the territory, calling the issue "extremely complicated."

In a speech themed "proactive, pragmatic, always people first," Tsang offered few details on his constitutional duty to increase the level of democracy in the former British colony, which returned to Chinese rule in 1997.

Tsang left the issue to a government committee, which is due to release a report on suffrage next year. The committee, dominated by pro-Beijing members, has proposed allowing China to screen the candidates in the chief executive elections as a condition to eventually giving Hong Kong residents universal suffrage.

China has ruled out direct elections in Hong Kong for the next few years, in part because it is concerned that voters might choose leaders willing to challenge China's authority here and because elections might encourage mainland residents to press for democratic reform. But an open election in 2012 remains a remote possibility.

Hong Kong's political development "will have important and far-reaching implications for Hong Kong's existing institutions and way of life," as well as affect the "constitutional powers" of Beijing, said Tsang, who devoted just four paragraphs of his 28-page policy blueprint to the democratization issue.

Hong Kong and China "are determined to achieve the ultimate goal of having the chief executive and the entire Legislative Council elected by universal suffrage," said Tsang, who became Hong Kong's leader, with Beijing's backing, after his unpopular predecessor, Tung Chee-hwa, resigned last year.

Hong Kong's next chief executive will be elected in March by the government committee, and some analysts said Tsang avoided the thorny political issue of suffrage ahead of that vote.

"It is obvious that Mr. Tsang has intentionally avoided the issue," said Ivan Choy, a political scientist at the Chinese University of Hong Kong. "After all, he knows there is little he can do."

Margaret Ng, a Civic Party legislator, said: "He said there would be a report next year. But throughout the speech, he made no indication there would be any development at all."

Emily Lau, a pro-democracy legislator, said she was pessimistic the government committee would work out proposals leading to full democracy. "I fear they would only invite more Beijing intervention by allowing it to screen the candidates," she said.

But Ma Lik of the pro-Beijing Democratic Alliance for Betterment and Progress of Hong Kong said it was a pragmatic approach for Tsang not to touch too much on political development because his term expires in June.

DOJ_NMG_0079610

At a news conference after his address, Tsang said he had tried to focus on issues that had a better chance of yielding results during the rest of his term.

Facing mounting calls for a minimum wage law, Tsang said his administration would launch a campaign to encourage employers to pay cleaners and security guards salaries "not lower than the average market rates of the relevant industries and occupations."

"If that system does not work, we will set out to consider a minimum wage law," he said.

Tsang also highlighted the importance of family harmony, which he said was the foundation of social harmony. He said he would set up a new commission to work out family-friendly policies, a move that critics said was not aimed at solving problems but instead would create another bureaucracy.

China Vs. My Husband (WP)

By Yuan Weijin

The Washington Post, October 12, 2006

A Dissident's Ordeal

DONGSHIGU, China -- On Aug. 20, the Yinan County People's Court in Shandong province sentenced my husband, Chen Guangcheng, to four years and three months in prison on charges of "intentionally destroying property" and "assembling a crowd to disturb traffic."

Local officials punished my husband because he provided advice about the law and human rights to village women who were forced to undergo abortions. Officials in charge of birth control were afraid that they would be disciplined as a result of his peaceful activities.

I have not seen my husband since March, when he was formally detained after we both had been under house arrest and residential surveillance for six months. I have been banned by local government officials from visiting him, first at the detention center and now in prison. I never received notification about the date and location of my husband's court hearing. When I finally learned from a fellow villager about the hearing schedule, naturally I wanted to attend. But I was physically constrained by local officials, so I could not go.

Instead of attending his trial I was detained at the local police station. Officers threatened me, saying that unless I stopped speaking up about the case, I could also face charges and prosecution for intentionally destroying property and assembling a crowd to disturb traffic.

I did not receive any legal documents from the Yinan Court until almost a month after the court announced its verdict in my husband's case. When I had a chance to read the verdict, which was sent to me through e-mail by someone who took the trouble to record every word, I was overcome with indignation and grief. But I must hold myself together, for I have to take care of our two small children and my mother-in-law, who is ill from the fear caused by threats from officials. I left the house and buried myself in farm work. Security guards hired by local officials to follow me came along and kept an eye on me in the fields from just a few yards away.

Three fellow villagers who had been detained and who faced the same charges as my husband were released on Aug. 20. They were each sentenced to seven months, with the start of their terms deferred for one year. I asked them about what they had been through. They felt embarrassed, but they told me that they simply could not endure the torture during interrogation. And so they repeated back to authorities what they were ordered to say, and it was later used as evidence against my husband.

The police threatened them with death if they did not testify against him. They said that police officers had bound their hands behind their backs for at least three days. They were deprived of sleep for 15 days. The police pulled their hair and beat and kicked them whenever they fell asleep. One of them told me: "I was terrified of death. My kid is very young." I begged them to testify to Chen's innocence at the appeal. They refused. They said, "We were set free because we said and did something against our will and conscience. That was the price we paid for our release. We dare not do anything that has to do with Chen Guangcheng from now on. Our families have to survive."

I sympathize with these villagers and understand their fear. I can only lament the miserable situation of my fellow peasants in China.

DOJ_NMG_0079611

Before I married Chen Guangcheng I was an English teacher. My parents disapproved of our marriage because Chen is blind. Now they want me to move back to live with them, but I have declined. Since I am still under residential surveillance, however, I have no choice but to let them take care of one of my children, who can then attend school there. I have no regrets at having chosen Chen Guangcheng to be my husband.

In September 2005, the local government set up a guard post in our front yard to monitor our daily activities. Since the police took Chen to the detention center in March, the guards have been watching and following me around all day long.

I want to send a message to my husband: One day the truth will come to light. Even though they put you in jail, they cannot imprison your thoughts and spirit. You must take good care of yourself so that you can continue your unfinished work.

Rising Son For Chinese Tycoon, Solar Power Fuels Overnight Wealth (WSJ)

By Andrew Batson

The Wall Street Journal, October 12, 2006

WUXI, China -- When he arrived in Australia 18 years ago as a physics student, Shi Zhengrong scraped by on a meager stipend from the Chinese government that he supplemented by working at a restaurant.

A doctorate, several patents, two solar-power companies and a $455 million initial public offering later, Dr. Shi is now one of the richest people in China.

Suntech Power Holdings Co., the company he founded in 2001 in the flat, green lands of the Yangtze River Delta, has quickly become one of the world's largest producers of photovoltaic equipment, which converts sunlight into electricity. The company's combination of first-world technology and developing-world prices has helped it gain market share from more-established, and expensive, producers.

Dr. Shi's wealth, made up almost entirely of his holdings of Suntech stock, has fluctuated in value along with company's volatile share price, from a low of about $1.3 billion to a peak of just over $3 billion; his stake currently is valued at around $1.7 billion. It is, by some estimates, the largest private fortune of anyone living in mainland China.

The story of his journey from China to Australia and back shows how important China's growing openness has become to its people. Nearly three decades after market reforms began, the network of personal, educational and financial ties between China and the rest of the world is reaching a new level. And the Chinese government's willingness to underwrite both advanced education abroad and technology startups at home is starting to pay dividends.

Close to 800,000 Chinese students have gone abroad since the government first started sponsoring them for overseas study in 1978. Drawn by job opportunities overseas, less than a third have come back so far, but the rate at which they are arriving is accelerating. Last year, about 35,000 students returned, three times the amount in 2000, according to official statistics that almost surely underestimate the real number.

Many of those returnees, armed with cutting-edge technical and managerial skills, have helped kick-start new technology businesses. At the same time, foreign venture capitalists are flooding the country with unprecedented amounts of money, and Chinese companies are finding they can raise money from stock offerings abroad. Combined with the heady opportunities from an economy expanding at 10% annually, the result has been the creation of private wealth on an unprecedented scale.

There are now probably 320,000 U.S.-dollar millionaires in China, according to estimates by Merrill Lynch and CapGemini, and many of them are newly minted. On a list of the 500 richest people in China, compiled by the Chinese-language New Fortune magazine, nearly one-quarter appeared on the list for first time this year -- including Dr. Shi. He debuted this year at No. 1.

Good Timing

A small, intense man with a round face, Dr. Shi admits to having no real hobbies and speaks often of the importance of focus and hard work. Yet he credits good timing for many of the changes that have brought him so far from his childhood on a Chinese farm.

"I got into the solar industry, in the beginning, by accident," says Dr. Shi. The 43-year-old came of age in China at a time when the government controlled where people worked and lived. "In our generation we didn't have the freedom to choose. We just accept whatever we are given. So it's hard to plan," he says.

DOJ_NMG_0079612

Yet Dr. Shi has also shown a knack for challenging the status quo. His plan to start a solar-power company in China drew skepticism from colleagues, but he managed to obtain government funding. Though trained as a scientist, he put aside technical perfection to find cheaper manufacturing techniques. Despite many years of absence from China, he has shown surprising savvy in local politics, convincing his original government backers to sell out before the IPO that made him a rich man.

Suntech's success has come from its ability to tap into the global boom in solar power, not from the Chinese market, which remains small. Industry executives estimate that about 90% of the solar equipment produced in China is sold elsewhere, usually to countries such as Germany and Japan that offer generous incentives for solar use.

Suntech faces competition from deep-pocketed large firms such as Japan's Sharp Corp. and Kyocera Corp., and the solar division of oil-and-gas giant BP PLC. Suntech is bulking up quickly to try to ride out any industry consolidation, and building global connections.

Dr. Shi, who switches easily between Chinese and English, keeps close ties to Australia. He sits on the international advisory board of the New York Stock Exchange, where Suntech's stock trades.

He is living once again in his birth province of Jiangsu, on China's prosperous eastern seaboard. His home, and Suntech's base, is not far from his birthplace on an island in the Yangtze River called Yangzhong. As the oldest of four children, Dr. Shi was the focus of his parents' hopes for a better life through education. Though mainly agricultural, Yangzhong was blessed with a good school system.

He headed to college in 1979, shortly after the universities had reopened after the chaos of the Cultural Revolution, and as a new leader named Deng Xiaoping had begun to break down China's isolation. His high scores in math and physics got him slotted into the optical-science department at Jilin University, in China's chilly northeast.

He found working in a lab preferable to working in the fields. He focused on improving his English so he could read scientific materials. He would study while standing in line at the school cafeteria, memorizing vocabulary scribbled in a notebook.

After graduating in 1983, he entered a master's program at the Shanghai Institute of Optics and Fine Mechanics. The institute had access to a small quota of coveted government-sponsored spots for overseas study. Although he was told he could go to the U.S., that turned out to be a bureaucratic mix-up. He wound up in Australia instead. In 1988 he enrolled in the physics department of the University of New South Wales, in Sydney.

At the end of his one-year program, Dr. Shi realized he didn't want to return to China. The year 1989 was a dark time, as the Chinese government brutally put down the demonstrations in Beijing's Tiananmen Square. A classmate suggested he head to the engineering department, where Martin Green, a prize-winning specialist in solar power, was looking for students with a background in optics.

Though he had no experience in solar-cell research, Dr. Shi talked his way into getting funding to do a doctorate under Dr. Green. And in his first six months, Dr. Shi made some breakthroughs, often working alone well into the night. Finishing his Ph.D. in 1992, he ultimately became research director in a company founded to market some of the lab's technologies. He gained citizenship and bought three houses with savings from a generous salary. Mr. Shi, his Chinese wife and his two Australia-born sons settled into a comfortable life -- but he felt he could do more.

Then, over dim sum one day at a restaurant in a Sydney suburb, he heard of opportunity from an unexpected quarter. Samuel Yang, a businessman from his hometown of Yangzhong who regularly traveled to Australia, told Dr. Shi that the gray, regimented China he remembered had changed. It was booming, attracting billions of dollars of foreign investment, and recruiting overseas Chinese with technical skills to come back home.

In April 2000, Dr. Shi went to China to see for himself. He came back to Australia afire with ideas for a China-based solar-power company, and sat down and put together a 200-page business plan. It was the first thing he had written in Chinese for years. "That conversation was at the right time," Dr. Shi says. "If that conversation had occurred two years or three years earlier, I don't think it would have happened."

Dr. Shi shopped his proposal to several Chinese cities with ambitions to attract high-tech businesses. Wuxi, a fast-growing city near Shanghai, offered $6 million as a start-up investment. Government funds and state companies would own 75% of the company, and a local official would serve as chairman. Dr. Shi would put in the technology he owned and $400,000 of his own money for a 25% stake, and get a free hand to run the company. He agreed, and Wuxi Suntech Power Co., as it was then called, was registered on Jan. 21, 2001. The company's Chinese name, "shang de," is a reference to a traditional saying meaning "upholding virtue."

DOJ_NMG_0079613

Tackling New Problems

Dr. Shi now found himself tackling problems outside of science: making payroll and occasionally browbeating suppliers into accepting late payments. His biggest puzzle was finding ways to grow on a shoestring budget. The company started producing in September 2002, but by April 2003, it had sold its entire inventory and needed to expand further.

It was under these pressures that Dr. Shi came up with his signature innovation, which he likes to call simply "low-cost expansion." After having used mainly expensive imported parts to build Suntech's first production line, he couldn't afford to buy another one off the shelf. The only way out was to come up with a cheaper design.

"Coming from a scientist background, I always pursued high efficiency, as high as possible," he says. Instead, Dr. Shi reorganized the manufacturing process to reduce automation, taking some processes from machines and putting them into the hands of workers, who in China were cheaper. He cobbled together parts from different suppliers, including little-known Chinese companies. He bought used gear from an Italian laboratory and new equipment from a Japanese startup.

The new line was ready in December 2003, just in time to catch a boom in the global solar-power market. Suntech's revenue zoomed to $226 million last year, from just $14 million in 2003. First-half revenue this year was $218 million. Suntech's cost advantages have endured: It is now selling its solar modules for $3.78 per watt, well below the average global market price of $4.30 estimated by Photon Consulting.

"His timing has worked out perfectly," says Dr. Green, Dr. Shi's former academic adviser.

By 2004, Suntech's government owners had also taken note of Suntech's improving fortunes, and wanted a more active role in the company. That put chairman Li Yanren, the government's representative, into conflict with Dr. Shi. The internal strife consumed several months, but eventually the board threw its backing to Dr. Shi, making him chairman as well as chief executive. Mr. Li, who received a compensation package upon leaving, declined to comment.

That was a turning point. It had become clear that Suntech's combination of government capital and private management was no longer ideal. "The Chinese shareholders couldn't provide a lot of support. They were just having meetings," says Zhang Weiguo, a Suntech director who previously ran a Wuxi government venture-capital fund.

Dr. Shi wanted new backers from overseas who could put Suntech on the road to becoming a public company, but it wasn't easy to explain this to the founding shareholders. Mr. Zhang says it's not hard to see why: "I have helped you through so many difficulties, and now that you are starting to make money you push me out?"

Dr. Shi argued that getting the state shareholders out of the company would allow Suntech to grow faster, hire more people and pay more taxes. That swayed city government officials, who helped Dr. Shi work on convincing the corporate shareholders. Here, Dr. Shi's willingness to offer generous terms helped. Mr. Zhang says his old fund made a return of 20 times its initial investment.

After six months of negotiations, the shareholders, which included appliance maker Jiangsu Little Swan Group Co. and pharmaceutical firm Wuxi Shanhe Group, agreed to take their money and step aside. In May 2005, an $80 million sale of shares to venture capitalists, including Goldman Sachs Group Inc., financed their exit.

Once again, Dr. Shi's timing was good. With oil prices hitting new highs and solar-panel sales booming, the buzz in the financial community over alternative energy was becoming a roar.

Suntech's investors saw their enthusiasm for solar power validated with the October IPO of Q-Cells AG, a Suntech competitor in Germany. The rapturous market reception convinced Suntech's bankers, Credit Suisse Group and Morgan Stanley, to rapidly push through an IPO. On Dec. 14, 2005, Suntech debuted on the New York Stock Exchange. The company was valued at more than $5 billion at its peak stock price, though that has since come down substantially.

Dr. Shi hasn't left his academic past behind. His office is piled with technical papers and decorated, if that's the word, with photographs of silicon crystals. He can still unconsciously switch to a professor's chalkboard style when he has to explain technical concepts.

He has already started giving his money away, an unusual move in a country where private philanthropy is largely undeveloped. Recently his family trust gave donations to a nursing home and a school in Shanghai. For now, however, his main focus remains on the business. Having just bought a company in Japan, Dr. Shi says his goal is to turn Suntech into a true multinational.

DOJ_NMG_0079614

"The time is right, the soil is rich," he says. "Now, there's already a lot of Chinese dreams being realized. And I think there are a lot more to come."

Europe Faces Threat Of Power Shortages (FT)

By Ed Crooks

Financial Times, October 12, 2006

Europe faces the growing threat of electricity shortages because growth in demand has outstripped investment in new power stations, a leading consultancy has warned.

Capgemini, the consultancy, said operating at such low margin levels raised the risk of power shortages, including interruption of supply to large industrial users, "brownouts" – reductions in supply voltage – and blackouts.

Colette Lewiner of Cap-gemini said the study should be a "wake-up call" for the energy industry, governments and regulators.

"We are in a dangerous zone now," she said. "We could have power cuts."

The average margin – the excess of available electricity supply over peak-load demand – dropped to just 4.8 per cent in the winter of 2005-06, down one percentage point from the previous year.

The UK, France, Belgium and Greece are among the countries with the lowest levels of spare capacity.

Capgemini argued that the more competitive and commercial environment for European energy had in part been responsible for the erosion of the capacity margin.

For decades European energy industries maintained high levels of excess capacity. But in the past five years generators in most European Union member states have been failing to invest enough to keep pace with the rise in demand.

Spain was the worst case last year, with supply capacity rising by just 8 per cent while peak load demand rose by 15 per cent, but in many other countries the margin has been squeezed. Only Ireland, where capacity rose by 36 per cent, has comfortably increased its margin.

European energy companies' investment as a share of their sales has fallen from almost 18 per cent in 2000 to less than 10 per cent in 2004, although it picked up slightly last year.

Electricity generators across Europe have become more exposed to commercial pressures by the spread of liberalisation and private ownership.

In the past, the generators could have predicted their future demand with reasonable certainty. They were assured of being able to finance the investment needed to meet that demand with enough of a margin to guard against power shortages. Today they will typically need to justify those investments as commercial decisions.

Capgemini said investment in new power stations was also being hampered by ever more complex planning procedures and by governments' persistent tinkering with the regulatory frameworks.

Ms Lewiner said: "How can companies plan for a 10 or 20-year return on investment when governments keep changing the rules of the game?"

"It should be for national governments and the European Commission to encourage power investment in the energy industry."

The tight supply position is being exacerbated by hotter summer weather and the growing use of air conditioning, which have shifted the traditional seasonal pattern of electricity demand.

In Spain, for example, the peak in demand is now in the summer. In France, generators have been forced to rethink their practice of shutting down nuclear power plants in the summer for maintenance.

Many of Europe's recent blackouts have also occurred during the summer.

French Police Face Muslim 'Intifada' (WT)

By David Rennie

The Washington Times, October 12, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0079615

BRUSSELS -- Radical Muslims in France's housing estates are waging an undeclared "intifada," or uprising, against the police, with violent clashes injuring about 14 officers each day.

As the Interior Ministry announced that nearly 2,500 officers had been wounded this year, a police union declared that its members were "in a state of civil war" with Muslims in the most depressed "banlieue" estates. Banlieue, which means outskirts, is the commonly used euphemism for the low-income housing projects heavily populated by unemployed youths of North African origin.

The police union said it had asked the government to provide police with armored cars to protect officers in the estates, which it said were becoming no-go zones.

The number of attacks has risen by a third in two years. Police representatives told the newspaper Le Figaro that the "taboo" of attacking officers on patrol has been broken.

Instead, officers -- especially those patrolling in pairs or small groups -- are facing attacks when they try to arrest locals.

Senior officers insisted that the problem was essentially criminal in nature, with crime bosses on the estates fighting back against tough tactics.

Interior Minister Nicolas Sarkozy, who also is the leading center-right candidate for the presidency, has sent heavily equipped units into areas with orders to regain control from drug-smuggling gangs and other organized crime rings.

However, not all officers on the ground accept that essentially secular interpretation of the problem. Michel Thoomis, the secretary general of the hard-line Action Police trade union, has written to Mr. Sarkozy warning of an "intifada" on the estates and demanding that officers be given armored cars in the most dangerous areas.

"We are in a state of civil war, orchestrated by radical Islamists. This is not a question of urban violence any more. It is an intifada, with stones and Molotov cocktails," he said last week. "You no longer see two or three youths confronting police, you see whole tower blocks emptying into the streets to set their 'comrades' free when they are arrested."

However, Gerard Demarcq, of the largest police unions, Alliance, dismissed talk of an uprising as representing the views of a minority.

Mr. Demarcq said the increased attacks on officers were proof that the policy of "retaking territory" from criminal gangs was working.

Mayors in the worst-affected suburbs, which saw weeks of riots and car burning a year ago, have expressed fears of a vicious circle, as attacks by locals lead the police to harden their tactics, further increasing resentment.

As if to prove that point, there were angry reactions in the western Paris suburb of Les Mureaux after dawn raids in search of youths who had attacked a police unit last week. The raids led to one arrest.

Scores of youths had attacked seven officers who had tried to arrest a man for not wearing his seat belt while driving. The driver refused to stop and later rammed a police car trying to block his path.

Les Mureaux Mayor Francois Garay criticized aggressive police tactics that left "the people on the ground to pick up the pieces."

Lawmakers Urge Denial To Mexico Of Bounty Hunter (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, October 12, 2006

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has been asked by 29 members of Congress to deny an extradition request by the Mexican government for Duane "Dog" Chapman, the Honolulu-based bounty hunter who faces charges there for his capture of a fugitive convicted rapist three years ago.

"Just days before the Mexican statute of limitations on prosecuting Chapman were set to expire, it seems the State Department is proceeding with efforts to extradite Mr. Chapman back to Mexico to face criminal prosecution," the House members said.

"It makes no sense. It seems that Mexican authorities are pressing this case only because they are so stung by the embarrassment of failing where Mr. Chapman succeeded," they said.

DOJ_NMG_0079616

Mr. Chapman, 53, who stars on the television show "Dog the Bounty Hunter," was arrested last month by U.S. marshals in Hawaii on charges of illegal detention and conspiracy in his June 18, 2003, capture in Mexico of cosmetics heir Andrew Luster. Also arrested were Mr. Chapman's son, Leland, 29, and an associate, Timothy Chapman, 41, no relation.

Bounty hunting is illegal in Mexico, and Mexican Consul General Martha Lara told CNN that Mr. Chapman was not permitted to enter the country to pursue fugitives.

After spending a night in a Honolulu jail, Mr. Chapman was released on $300,000 bail. The others were released after posting $100,000 bail. The three have been ordered to appear at an extradition hearing, which has not been scheduled.

Charges have been pending against the three in Mexico since their arrest of Luster. They posted bail but never returned for a July 15, 2003, court hearing. Mexican authorities had demanded that Mr. Chapman transfer Luster to their custody, but he refused.

A spokeswoman for the Chapman family, Mona K. Wood, described the arrest as "shocking" and declared that Mr. Chapman's file will be cleared.

"This was a shock, and is obviously a very upsetting time for the Chapman family," she said. "Chapman is a true modern-day hero. He arrests the bad guys -- he is definitely not one of them. He shall be vindicated."

Luster, 39, was taken into custody by the bounty hunters at a Puerto Vallarta nightclub more than five months after fleeing the United States while on trial on charges he raped three women. He was returned to California to begin serving a 124-year prison sentence.

He is the great-grandson of Max Factor, who built a cosmetics empire in the 1920s that catered to the movie industry.

Luster was convicted in absentia with raping the women after drugging them with GHB, the so-called date rape drug. Prosecutors said investigators found videotapes of Luster having sex with the unconscious women.

A U.S. couple spotted the fugitive in Puerto Vallarta and contacted the bounty hunters. They also had called the FBI, and a legal liaison for the FBI was en route from Guadalajara, Mexico, to Puerto Vallarta to follow up on a tip.

Unprovoked Onslaught (WSJ)

By Mikheil Saakashvili

The Wall Street Journal, October 12, 2006

TBILISI -- The past week was a trying one for Georgia. Air, rail, sea, land and postal links were severed unilaterally by our largest neighbor, the Russian Federation. Immediately thereafter, Georgians living in Russia were subjected to a form of ethnic targeting not seen in Europe since the Balkans in the 1990s -- and the harassment is tinged with even more sinister historical overtones. Hundreds are being deported; business owners are being harassed; schoolchildren are being forcibly registered with local police; women are being gratuitously tested for sexually transmitted diseases; and children are being torn from families.

It is easy, amidst these bleak headlines, to lose sight of an even more important story: In just three short years, my country has been transformed from a gangster-run economic and political basket case into a budding democracy with one of the world's fastest-growing economies. The World Bank recently lauded Georgia as the No. 1 reformer in the world and the least corrupt transitional democracy. Just last month NATO admitted Georgia into a new stage of membership talks, recognizing our political, economic and military progress. And just last week we completed an action plan with the European Union that charts our irrevocable course toward a fully Western future.

It is this remarkable metamorphosis -- capped last week by fully fledged, free and fair local elections, hailed by the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe (OSCE) for their "professional and inclusive manner" -- that gives us strength in this moment of crisis. All of our gains have been hard-fought. Our citizens have long suffered privations, and only now are tasting the sweetness of liberty: the opportunity to vote, to lead fruitful lives, to speak their voice, and to chart a future for their children untrammeled by poverty, mafias or discrimination.

We will not jeopardize the progress we have made by any rash acts. It is not inconceivable that Moscow is trying to taunt us into a self-destructive response, one which would provide an excuse for Russia to smite the success story to its south. After all, democracy can be contagious. But there is no risk of our acting irresponsibly, despite the caricatures of our government, spread by ill-wishers, of being impetuous. Our actions in recent weeks fly in the face of this. We are constrained by democratic instincts, and by our responsibility to citizens and allies.

DOJ_NMG_0079617

In fact, the most puzzling aspect of Russia's latest onslaught is that it was unprovoked. A week ago, after holding a group of Russian intelligence officers for just 72 hours after they were caught red-handed spying on Georgia, my government released them. Regrettably, this was not the first instance when individuals involved in similar -- even lethal -- acts were detained and handed over to Russian authorities.

We believed this latest gesture of goodwill, magnanimous by any measure, would mark a hopeful turning point in our troubled relations with the current Russian government. For far too long, we have been subjected to Moscow's economic sanctions, its mortal meddling in our breakaway provinces, and its contempt for our democratic institutions. We wanted to mark a break from this history of distrust. Little could we have imagined that, instead, Moscow would unleash a wave of retribution that many in Russia have labeled ethnic cleansing. Still, even while Russian police were hunting down Georgians, I have been heartened by the courage of many ethnically Russian citizens who have taken to the streets wearing a yellow star with the words: "I am Georgian."

Despite this downward spiral, conditions exist for a peaceful resolution to the present impasse. Georgia poses no physical threat to Russia -- how could a nation of less than five million souls challenge a nuclear-armed power over 30 times its size? But for us to stand tall, our friends must stand tall beside us. If any one of us gives in to bullying or tolerates the politics of ethnic hatred, we are all at risk. The values that hold together the international order are like a chain -- only as strong as its weakest link. To jeopardize or neglect this link implies peril for the entire trans-Atlantic community. Today, Georgia has become an integral part of the Western security fabric.

The essential question confronting the international community is this: Is Moscow reacting to a specific, unique threat it perceives from Georgia? Or is Georgia a target of opportunity, a chimerical foil created by some politicians for domestic purposes? Put another way, does the malignancy reside in Georgia, or Russia? A misdiagnosis could have dire consequences for Western security. Because if the international community downplays the current rift -- or worse, if it pressures Georgia to back down on all counts, shunting aside its hard-earned principles and values -- then the problem will simply metastasize to another place.

Russia's vital place in the international order is secure. It is a veto-wielding member of the U.N. Security Council. Its natural resources fuel the European and global economy. It owns a fierce nuclear force. No one, let alone Georgia, should ever call for isolating Russia in the manner of a North Korea or Zimbabwe. At the same time, however, we must not turn a blind eye to what is happening to human rights and the norms of international behavior. * * *

We will do all that is necessary to ease the current tensions. In the past few weeks, we have been especially vigilant in consulting with our allies in Europe. Georgia is a small country that takes its obligations to the international community very seriously, a fact to which our troops in Kosovo and Iraq attest. We do not intend to act precipitously or in defiance of the wishes of our friends. And we have been heartened by the signs of support, in the face of Russia's harsh behavior, that have been expressed by most of the democratic world.

We are more determined than ever to act in concert with our European allies. The coming test of international resolve in the Caucasus revolves around the territorial disputes in our provinces of Abkhazia and South Ossetia. At the U.N. last month, I proposed the creation of a new framework for keeping the peace in these provinces and for negotiating an enduring settlement. The proposal was applauded by the current OSCE chair, Belgian Foreign Minister Karel De Gucht. Together, we must now take concrete steps toward its implementation.

The way forward is not an easy one -- but it is the only direction possible for my country. We cannot look back: The age of imperial overlords and of the Cold War is past.

Mr. Saakashvili is the president of Georgia.

The Age Of Impunity (NYT)

The New York Times, October 12, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0079618

Sudan's leaders sent out a letter last week warning governments against volunteering their troops for a United Nations peacekeeping force for Darfur. Khartoum was obviously feeling cocky. But why shouldn't it? The Security Council — or more to the point, the big powers that run the Security Council — made clear that it won't send in troops to stop the genocide unless Sudan first agrees.

Then there's Iran, which is still defiantly enriching uranium. And the North Koreans, who blew off the rest of the world when they blew off what they said was a nuclear weapon this week.

Welcome to the new age of impunity.

It wasn't supposed to be this way. The Iraq war and President Bush's with-us-or-against-us war on terrorism was supposed to frighten the bad guys so much that they wouldn't dare cross the United States. But the opposite has happened. President Bush has squandered so much of America's moral authority — not to mention our military resources — that efforts to shame or bully the right behavior from adversaries (and allies) sound hollow.

There is plenty of blame to go around when it comes to empowering rogue states. The Chinese have been shielding Sudan and North Korea. The Russians have been shielding Iran. Were it not for Iraq and Mr. Bush's other troubles, there would be ways to shame or bypass those roadblocks. When the Russians blocked U.N. action in Kosovo, President Clinton got NATO to stop the killing.

Mr. Bush appears to care deeply about Darfur. But the United States is so overstretched in Iraq that no one in this White House is even talking about sending NATO to stop ethnic cleansing that has already left more than 200,000 dead and displaced more than two million.

Closing our eyes for another two years isn't an answer. Washington needs to assert its leadership, no matter how tattered, on all these fronts.

We suspect that cargo inspections and a cutoff of military and luxury trade will not be enough to get North Korea to back down. But having started there, Mr. Bush now needs to tell China and Russia that all future relations will be judged on how they hold the North to account.

Beijing and Moscow would find it harder to say no if Mr. Bush made a clear pledge — no caveats and no fingers crossed behind his back — that he would not try to overthrow North Korea's government if it abandoned its nuclear weapons. Mr. Bush needs to make the same unambiguous offer to Iran. As for Darfur, Khartoum might feel less cocky if Mr. Bush announced that he was taking the lead on soliciting troops for a peacekeeping force while asking NATO to start drawing up plans for a possible forced entry should the United Nations fail to act.

In his news conference yesterday, Mr. Bush said that the abuses at Abu Ghraib "hurt us internationally. It kind of eased us off the moral high ground." He quickly added that the world had seen the perpetrators held to account.

We fear it will take a lot more than the trials of a few low-level prison guards to repair the damage, whether from Abu Ghraib, Guantánamo, the secret prisons or the whole mismanaged Iraq war. There can be no impunity at home either.

Reform Run Amok (WP)

The Washington Post, October 12, 2006

The U.N.'s new Human Rights Council makes the old one look good.

A MAJOR piece of the United Nations reform promised by Secretary General Kofi Annan was a new Human Rights Council. The idea was to replace the Commission on Human Rights, which had been hijacked by rogue states such as Libya and Sudan, with a body that could refocus attention on serious human rights violations around the world -- and in so doing remove what Mr. Annan said was "the shadow" cast by the old organization on "the United Nations system as a whole."

When the Human Rights Council was approved by the General Assembly in March, we were among the skeptics who doubted that it would be much of a change, mainly because the membership rules still allowed for the election of human rights violators. As it turned out, we were wrong: The council, which completed its second formal session last week in Geneva, has turned out to be far worse than its predecessor -- not just a "shadow" but a travesty that the United Nations can ill afford.

For all its faults, the previous U.N. commission occasionally discussed and condemned the regimes most responsible for human rights crimes, such as those in Belarus and Burma. China used to feel compelled to burnish its record before the annual meeting. The new council, in contrast, has so far taken action on only one country, which has dominated the debate at both of its regular meetings and been the sole subject of two extraordinary sessions: Israel.

DOJ_NMG_0079619

Western human rights groups sought to focus the council's attention on Darfur, where genocide is occurring, and on Uzbekistan, where a dictator refuses to allow the investigation of a massacre by his security forces. Their efforts have been in vain. Instead, the council has treated itself to report after report on the alleged crimes of the Jewish state; in all, there were six official "rapporteurs" on that subject in the latest session alone. One, Jean Ziegler, is supposed to report on "the right to food." But he, too, delivered a diatribe on Israeli "crimes" in Lebanon.

This ludicrous diplomatic lynch mob has been directed by the Organization of the Islamic Conference, which accounts for 17 governments on the 47-member council and counts on the support of like-minded dictatorships such as Cuba and China. Council rules allow an extraordinary session to be called at the behest of just one-third of the membership, making it easy for the Islamic association to orchestrate anti-Israel spectacles. Several Muslim governments that boast of a new commitment to democracy and human rights -- including Jordan and Morocco -- have readily joined in this willful sabotage of those values.

Human rights groups that supported the creation of the council, such as Human Rights Watch and Amnesty International, admit to being appalled by the outcome; they nevertheless argue that the panel should be given time to right itself. That could happen, they say, if the democratic members of the council organize and work with the same cohesion as the "unfree" states. They also suggest that the United States, which refused to join the council, reconsider.

Perhaps that strategy would work -- though once again, we're skeptical. If there is no turnaround, the council's performance ought to invite consideration of the measure that was applied to the U.N. cultural organization, UNESCO, when it ran amok in the 1980s: a cutoff of U.S. funding. If this ill-formed body is to become an exclusive forum for anti-Zionist rants, the principal victim will be not Israel but the United Nations.

Armies Of Children (NYT)

The New York Times, October 12, 2006

The recruitment of child soldiers is one of the most heinous war crimes, and among the most forgotten. Perhaps a quarter-million children — most in their teens but some as young as 7 — are forced to serve in government or insurgent armies in 20 countries around the world. Not only are they ordered to kill and torture, they often become victims of physical and sexual abuse. When they do return to civilian life, they are walking ghosts — damaged, uneducated pariahs.

But now something has happened that may force guerrilla leaders and government officials who recruit children to think again. The new International Criminal Court, established to bring the most serious international criminals to justice, is beginning its first prosecution — of a defendant charged with the use of child soldiers. He is Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, leader of a Congolese militia responsible for ethnic massacres, torture and rapes in the eastern part of the country.

At the height of the violence in eastern Congo, in 2003, around 30 percent of militia fighters were children. Many were forcibly recruited, but others enlisted, seeking protection or food. About 30,000 have been demobilized nationwide, and groups like Unicef and Save the Children are helping them get back into school and rejoin their communities. But the militias that are still fighting are still using child soldiers, sometimes forcing demobilized children back into the war.

Much good can come from the court's focus on child soldiers. The decision by the international tribunals for Rwanda and Yugoslavia to treat rape as one of the most serious international crimes has changed legal attitudes and practice worldwide. The International Criminal Court is now drawing attention to another widespread, yet widely ignored, horror. Guerrilla leaders in Colombia, Sri Lanka, West Africa and elsewhere, and government officials in Myanmar, should pay close attention.

DOJ_NMG_0079620

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: THURSDAY, OCTOBER 12, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

SoCal Man Indicted On Federal Charges Of Aiding Al Qaeda (LAT) ... 4
American In Videos Charged With Treason (USAT) ... 5
Treason Charge For California Man Seen In Al Qaeda Videos (CHIT) ... 6
American In Qaeda Tapes Accused Of Treason (NYT) ... 6
U.S. Supporter Of Al-Qaeda Is Indicted On Treason Charge (WP) ... 7
American In Al Qaeda Charged With Treason (WT) ... 8
U.S. Indicts American In Al-Qaida Video (AP) ... 9
American Al-Qaeda Member Gadahn Charged With Treason (Update1) (BLOOM) ... 10
Al-Qaida Spokesman Indicted For Treason (UPI) ... 10
US Files First Treason Charges In 50 Years Against Accused Al-Qaida Member (VOA) ... 10
Terror Funding Trial Set To Begin (CHIT) ... 11
German Court To Weigh Whether To Retry Moroccan On Terror Charges (MCT) ... 12
Texas Man Sentenced For Dealings With Terrorist (FINDLAW/AP) ... 14

Homeland Response:

An Anthrax Blackout (RC) ... 14
7-year Term For Trying To Make Ricin (AZREP) ... 16
Bioweapon Charge Gets Man 7 Years (AP) ... 16
The ACLU's Man From The FBI (WP) ... 16
Small Plane Strikes New York High-Rise (LAT) ... 18
Small Plane Hits High-Rise In N.Y. (WP) ... 19
Yankee Killed When Plane Hit N.Y. Building (WT) ... 20
Crash Exposes Limits Of Post-9/11 Security Steps (WSJ) ... 22
Manhattan Plane Crash Kills Yankee Pitcher (NYT) ... 23
NYC Tragedy Echoes 9/11, Raises Small-plane Questions (USAT) ... 25
Small Planes Aren't Big Risk (USAT) ... 25
Report: Few Cities Prepared For Evacuation Procedures (USAT) ... 26
Strategizing On Disaster Relief (USAT) ... 26
TSA Secrecy Rules Eased (WP) ... 28
Insurers Get An Earful From Senator (NYT) ... 28

War News:

Bush Open To Change In Tactics (LAT) ... 29
Bush Stands Firm On Policies (WP) ... 31
For Bush, Many Questions On Iraq And North Korea (NYT) ... 32
Bush Rejects Direct Talks With North Korea (USAT) ... 33
Bush Hits Democrats On N. Korea Talks (WT) ... 34
Army Plans Same Troop Levels In Iraq Until 2010 (USAT) ... 35
Pentagon To Maintain Troop Levels In Iraq (FT) ... 35
Army: Troops To Stay In Iraq Until 2010 (AP-Y) ... 36
Army Plans To Maintain Current Troop Levels In Iraq (MCT) ... 37
Kerry Defends Troop Withdrawal Proposal In Las Vegas (BOS) 38
Sacrifice Of The Few (NYT) ... 38
Top U.S. Officer In Iraq Sees Spike In Violence (NYT) ... 39
'Tough' Time In Iraq To Continue, Casey Says (WP) ... 40
'All-time High' In Baghdad Violence (USAT) ... 41
2,660 Iraq Civilians Killed In September (AP) ... 42
Insurgents Cause Ammo Explosions (LAT) ... 43
Iraq Death Toll Study Has Mixed Reaction (AP) ... 44
Iraq Disputes Claim Of 600,000 War Dead (LAT) ... 45
In Victory For Shiite Leader, Iraqi Parliament Approves Creating Autonomous Regions (NYT) ... 46
Parliament Approves Measure Allowing Autonomous Regions (WP) ... 47
U.S. Agency Cites Flaws In Another Iraqi Construction Project (NYT) ... 48
Afghanistan Five Years Later: Charting The Reconstruction (CSM) ... 48

Corporate Scandals:

Options Scandal Snares Tech Chiefs (FT) ... 49
2 More Executives Resign Over Options (NYT) ... 50
As Companies Probe Backdating, More Top Officials Take A Fall (WSJ) ... 51
Two Tech Companies Shake Up Leadership (USAT) ... 53
Scandal Grows Over Backdating Of Options (WP) ... 53
McAfee, Cnet Chiefs Leave As Options Scandal Deepens (Update2) (BLOOM) ... 54
CEOs Swept Out By Stock Options Scandal (FINDLAW/AP) ... 56
Stock-option Probes Lead To Exit Of Top Execs At McAfee, CNet (MERCN) ... 57
CNET General Counsel Steps Down Over Stock Options Probe (LAW) ... 58
Court Denies United Request To Stop State's Options Probe (MINNST) ... 59
Backdating To The Future (WSJ) ... 59

Enron's Skilling Asks To Remain Free On Bail During His Appeal (WP) ... 60
Filings Illuminate IPO's Bumpy Ride (WP) ... 60
Money Rules Behind Soaring Executive Pay, Decades Of Failed Restraints (WSJ) ... 62

Criminal Law:

Blagojevich Friend Faces Fraud Charges (SLPD) ... 66
Top Aide To Illinois Governor Is Indicted In Kickback Inquiry (NYT) ... 67
Top Blagojevich Adviser Indicted (CHIT) ... 68
Gov's Pal Indicted In Kickback Scheme (CHIST) ... 70
Illinois Governor's Aide Indicted (LAT) ... 71
As The Foley Case Unfolds, Hastert Gets A More Enthusiastic Nod From Bush (NYT) ... 72
Hastert Aides Interest Ethics Panel (WP) ... 73
Ethics Panel Questions Page Supervisors (AP-Y) ... 74
Boehner Asked By Ethics To Testify On Foley (RC) ... 75
Page: Foley Touched Page On House Floor (MDAy) ... 76
Scandal Sidelines Hastert, Reynolds (WP) ... 77
Polls: GOP Put Politics Ahead Of Pages (AP-Y) ... 78
National GOP Fights To Keep Foley Seat (NSDY/AP) ... 78
Foley Case Snags Incumbent In Ohio Race For House Seat (NYT) ... 79
Foley Scandal Exposes The GOP's Gay Identity Crisis (USAT) ... 81
FBI Seeks Help In Wales Case (SEAPI) ... 82
Five Years Later, FBI Still After Wales' Killer (SEATIMES) ... 83
FBI Seeks Help Identifying Man (OREG) ... 84
FBI: Strange Man Was Reported In Wales' Neighborhood Before Death (AP) ... 84
How To Make US Schools Safer (CSM) ... 85
Code Blue At Schools Rattles Nerves (WP) ... 86
Fake Threat Puts Schools On Alert (WT) ... 87
Seven Search Warrants Issued In School Shooting Investigation (AP) ... 88
Man Accused Of Call That Closed Schools (WP) ... 88
Arrest Made In Culpeper Bomb Threat (CULCIT) ... 89
Former Middletown Twp. Mayor Gets 43 Months For Bribery (NSL) ... 89
Former Mayor Of A Monmouth County Town Is Sentenced In A Corruption Case (NYT) ... 90
Menendez Denies Kean's Subpoena Claim (AP) ... 91
Question Of Victim Buttons Comes Before Supreme Court (LAT) 92
Court Weighs Effect Of Victim's Image On Trial (USAT) ... 92
Buttons' Influence On Jury At Issue For Justices (WP) ... 93
Justices Ponder Relationship Of Federal And State Courts (NYT) ... 94
Plea Deal Ends Federal Trial For Hells Angels Accused In Deadly Brawl At Vegas Casino (AP) ... 95
Republicans Call For Inquiry In Documents Case (NYT/AP) ... 96
Lawmakers Seek Probe Of Berger's Theft (WT) ... 96
Prosecutor: Rove Didn't Sway Spam Probe (AP-Y) ... 96
Ex-fugitives Plead Guilty In $31 Million Investor Scam (VAPILOT) ... 97
Why Farm Belt Sees Rising Crime Wave (CSM) ... 98
DOJ Eyes Donor Reimbursement (RC) ... 99
Mosque Suit Says Manager Embezzled $300,000 (WP) ... 100
Florida Judge Wants To See 'Bully' In Court (WP) ... 101
Deal In Brooklyn Corruption Case (NYT) ... 102
British Court Ruling Gives Boost To Serious Journalism (WSJ) 102
High Court In Britain Loosens Strict Libel Law (NYT) ... 104
A Libel Landmark (WSJ) ... 105
Two U.S. Pilots Criticized In Brazil (WP) ... 105
O.C. Man Gets 50 Years To Life For Molesting Relative On Videotape (LAT) ... 106

Civil Law:

Medicare Saves $2 Bln By Fighting Fraud In U.S. Health Programs (BLOOM) ... 107
GSA Asks Court To Rethink Ruling On FedBizOpps.gov (GCN) 107
RJR Douses Flavored Smokes Criticized As A Lure For Teens (WSJ) ... 108

Civil Rights:

States Are Growing More Lenient In Allowing Felons To Vote (NYT) ... 109
Manassas Irate That Inquiry Is Escalated (WP) ... 110
3 Charged In Hate Crimes; Brooklyn Victim Is In A Coma (NYT) 111
Black Employees' Foundation Sues LOC (RC) ... 112
9th Circuit: UPS Can't Refuse To Consider Hearing-Impaired Drivers (LAW) ... 113
South Dakota's Stark Abortion Choice (CSM) ... 113
Report: 5 U.S. States Use Dogs To Control Inmates In Cells (FINDLAW/AP) ... 115

Antitrust:

Justice Department Criticized For Approving Big AT&T Deal (WSJ) ... 115
AT& T Deal Wins A Key Go-Ahead (WP) ... 116
BellSouth Deal Faces FCC Fight (USAT) ... 117
Justice Department Approves AT&T-BellSouth Merger Plan (AP) 118
BellSouth's Final Call; AT&T Set To Take Over (AJC) ... 120
AT&T-BellSouth Deal Delayed As FCC Postpones Vote (Update1) (BLOOM) ... 121
Justice Department Clears AT&T Takeover Of BellSouth (AFP-Y) ... 121
Will Approved AT&T-BellSouth Deal Help Company Against Cable Providers? (AP) ... 122
FTC Ramps Up Actions Against Real Estate (INMAN) ... 123
Healthways To Buy Axia Health For $450M (AP-YBIZ) ... 124
Antitrust Law's Delicate Dance (WSJ) ... 124
Transmeta Sues Intel Over Chip Patents (WSJ) ... 125
Citigroup Purchase Rocks Legg Mason (WP/BLOOM) ... 126
Firms Sweeten Offer For Harrah's, But Bid May Not Be Rich Enough (WSJ) ... 126
MAN Buys At Least 5% Of Scania (WSJ) ... 127

Environment:

Lawyer In BP Case Ordered To Turn Over Evidence (HC) ... 128
BP CEO Ordered To Give Deposition (AP) ... 129
Renewable Energy Meeting Kicks Off With Ethanol Criticism (DJ) ... 129

DOJ_NMG_0079622

Execs Tout Renewable Fuels At Conference (AP)..... 130
Talkin' Energy At The Energy Conference (SLPD)..... 131
Big Oil Fine With Ethanol As Additive (FWST) 132
Emboldened States Take Charge Of Energy Issues (WSJ)..... 133
US Pandemic Flu Plan: Hole Up At Home (AP) 134
Mulch Madness (opinion) (NYT) 135
Maryland's Environment (WP) 135
Foolish Vaccine Exemptions (NYT) 136
Bad Salad (WP) 136
Doubting Inhofe (NYT) 137

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Ex-ATF Chief Had Staff Give Homework Aid (AP-Y) 137
Audit Critical Of Former ATF Director's Expenditures (USAT) .. 138
Report Criticizes Ex-ATF Chief (WP)..... 139
Ex-ATF Director Blamed For Unnecessary Upgrades (WT) 140
Federal Cases Land Four In Jail _ Foil Murder Plot (AP)..... 141
Arrests Foil Murder Plot, Feds Say (NOTP) 141
Hearing Set On Suit Over Plants Destroyed As Marijuana (AP)142
Inside The Beltway (WT)..... 143
Doctor Will Remain In Prison Until Retrial (WP) 144
U.S. Cuts Economic Aid For Colombia Area (AP)..... 144
County Offers Reward In Accokeek Arson Inquiry (WP)..... 145
Proposal Urges Citizens To Arm For City Growth (NYT) 146

Immigration:

President Bush Reaffirms Support For A Fence On The Mexican Border (MCT)..... 147
Bush Vows To Build Fence (WT)..... 148

Congress-Administration:

Bush Proclaims Deficit Halved, Three Years Early (WT) 149
Federal Deficit Now Lowest In 4 Years (AP-Y)..... 150
President Sees Signs Favoring G.O.P. Victory (NYT)..... 151
U.S. Deficit Is Smallest In Four Years (LAT) 152
GOP Promotes News Of Lower Budget Deficit (USAT)..... 153
Bush Claims Victory Over Debt Reduction (FT) 153
Budget Deficit Shrinks On Strong Tax Receipts (WSJ)..... 154
Declining Debt (WSJ)..... 155
What Not To Wear In Front Of Bush (LAT) 155
Tony Snow Knows How To Work More Than One Room (WP) 155
AP Exclusive: Reid Got $1M In Land Sale (AP-Y) 157
Reid Got $1.1 Million In Land Sale (WT/AP) 160
Reid Land Deal Under Scrutiny (WP)..... 161
Senator Offers To Amend Financial Forms (NYT) 162
Speaker Duped By Evangelist? (RC) 162
Former Justice Descends Judicial Ladder, To Lower Court (NYT) 163
Medicare To Reassign Some Californians' Drug Plans (LAT)... 164
Democrats Should Build On Bush's Drug Plan, Not Wreck It (RC)..... 165
Scholarship Fund Gets A Big Check For Its 20th Birthday (WP)167
America's Population Set To Top 300 Million (WP)..... 167
Robert D. Novak: Key Republicans Remain Addicted To Pork Barrel Gluttony (ULC) 169

Other News:

Fed Minutes: Unease About Inflation Lurks (USAT)..... 170
Fed Minutes Offer Little To Suggest Imminent Rate Cut (WSJ) 170
No Hurry To Cut Rates At The Fed (NYT)..... 171
Wall Street Down On Earnings Fears (FT)..... 172
Stocks Retreat Despite Drop In Oil Futures (WSJ) 172
OPEC Vows Output Cut, But Market Is Skeptical (WSJ) 173
First Lady Launches Four-state Campaign Swing (AP) 174
NRA Backs Both Sides Of Aisle (WSJ) 174
House GOP Revamps TV Ad Campaign Plans (NOVR) 176
The Fight For Congress: I've Seen This Movie Before (RC)..... 177
Will Voters Pull The Trigger? (WP)..... 178
Around Pentagon, Referendum On War (WP) 179
Talent, McCaskill Put Contrasts On Display During Debate (SLPD) 180
McCaskill Casts Self As Truman; Talent Claims She's Weak (KCS) 181
Big Sky Country Gets Smaller (WSJ) 182
2008: The Prequel (NYT)..... 183
A Gilded Path To Political Stardom, With Detours (NYT)..... 184
Governor Gets 'Tonight' Slot, So Rival Seeks Equal Time (NYT)188
From Schwarzenegger, A Veto For Voters' Good (WP)..... 188
Judges Can Solicit Election Funds, Court Rules (NYT) 189
No Solo Talks With N. Korea, Bush Insists (LAT) 190
Retreating To Small Talk When The News Isn't So Good (WP) 192
Bush Focuses On Diplomacy With North Korea (MCT) 193
Bush Calls For Action On N. Korea (CHIT) 194
Powers Are Split Over How To Punish Pyongyang (WSJ)..... 195
China Says It Will Back Sanctions On N. Korea (WP) 196
U.S. Aims To Pass Resolution On N. Korea (AP) 198
Sanctions Would Focus On Blocking Weapons Exports (LAT). 199
China Still Values The Survival Of Communist Regime In North Korea (MCT) 200
Seoul Will Take Its Time Crafting A Response (WSJ)..... 201
UN Struggles To Agree On N Korea (FT)..... 202
Bush Faults Clinton Policy, But The Debate Is Complex (WP) . 202
Japan Imposes Sanctions On N Korea (FT)..... 203
Japan Slaps Pyongyang With Trade Sanctions (WT) 204
Japanese Back Prime Minister In Handling Of Nuclear Crisis (NYT) 205
North Korea Warns Of More Nuclear Tests (NYT)..... 206
N. Korea's No. 2 Official Warns Of Further Tests (WP) 208
North Korea Threatens More Nuclear Tests (AP-Y)..... 209
Rice Says U.S. Will Not Invade N. Korea (AP-Y) 210
International Pressure Key To Pressure North Korea: Rumsfeld (AFP-Y) 211
Intelligence Failure Cited In Korean Crisis (WT)..... 211
Kim Jong-il's Suicide Watch (NYT)..... 212
The Squeeze On North Korea (WP)..... 213
A $2-Trillion Fiscal Hole (WSJ)..... 214
U.N. Disagrees On Sanctions Against Iran (AP) 214
U.S. To Let Spare Parts Be Sent To Iran (AP-Y) 215
U.S. To Sell Tehran Jet Parts (WT)..... 216
Overflights By Israel Said To Violate Truce (WP)..... 216
Rice: Palestinians Deserve Better Life (AP) 217

DOJ_NMG_0079623

U.N. Notes Increase In Israel Roadblocks (AP)..... 218
US, Dominican Presidents To Discuss Stalled Free Trade Deal (AP)..... 219
U.S. Cuts Economic Aid For Colombia Area (AP)..... 219
China Makes Commitment To Social Harmony (NYT)..... 220
China's Party Leadership Declares New Priority: 'Harmonious Society' (WP) 221
Suffrage Timetable Left For Later (WP)..... 222
China Vs. My Husband (WP)..... 223
Rising Son For Chinese Tycoon, Solar Power Fuels Overnight Wealth (WSJ)..... 224
Europe Faces Threat Of Power Shortages (FT)..... 226
French Police Face Muslim 'Intifada' (WT) 227
Lawmakers Urge Denial To Mexico Of Bounty Hunter (WT)..... 228
Unprovoked Onslaught (WSJ) 229
The Age Of Impunity (NYT) 230
Reform Run Amok (WP) 230
Armies Of Children (NYT) 231

TERRORISM NEWS:

SoCal Man Indicted On Federal Charges Of Aiding Al Qaeda (LAT)

By Greg Krikorian

The Los Angeles Times, October 12, 2006

A Southern California convert to Islam who has appeared in five incendiary Al Qaeda videos became the first American since the World War II era to be charged with treason, law enforcement sources said today.

In a federal grand jury indictment handed down in Orange County, Adam Yahiye Gadahn, 28, also was charged with providing material support for a terrorist group.

Gadahn, who is believed to be overseas, has emerged in recent months as the most significant American convert to radical Islam. Although he showed up on an Al Qaeda video in October 2004, it is his recent appearances with the terrorist organization's second-in-command, Ayman Al-Zawahiri, that has cemented his reputation as a significant new propagandist for terrorism.

As one senior U.S. official told The Times in recent days: "It is not some masked guy with a rifle saying, 'Death to America.' It is an American. And his target audience is the U.S."

In May 1997, Gadahn was arrested for allegedly attacking a well-known leader at the Islamic Society of Orange County in Garden Grove. He later pleaded guilty to a misdemeanor count of assault and battery.

By then, records and interviews show, Gadahn had become close to two radical Muslims who were followers of the radical cleric Sheik Omar Abdel Rahman, the so-called blind sheik who is serving a life sentence in federal prison for his role in the 1993 bombing at the World Trade Center.

Though FBI counterterrorism officials were aware of Gadahn for years, his name did not surface publicly until May 2004, when it was announced that they were seeking information on his whereabouts and considered him armed and dangerous. At the time, they said they believed that he had attended an Al Qaeda training camp in Afghanistan and worked as a translator for several of the organization's leaders, including senior lieutenant Abu Zebeida.

Months after the FBI announced its search for Gadahn, the CIA said it believed he was the menacing, masked figure making threats against the U.S. in a October 2004 videotaped message from Al Qaeda.

In that hourlong tape, released just before the U.S. presidential election, a young man hidden behind a head scarf identified himself as "Azzam the American" and said that American "streets will run red with blood."

"When his face was covered up, it initially worried people in the intelligence community," said the high-ranking U.S. law enforcement official. "Because we knew who it was and we figured he knew that ... so the question was whether it was a martyrdom tape."

That concern evaporated when Gadahn appeared in another video in September 2005 on the eve of the anniversary of the 9/11 attacks.

In that tape, he invoked the name of the most infamous Sept. 11 attacker, Mohammed Atta, and warned about new attacks in the U.S. and Australia.

"Yesterday, London and Madrid," he said, referring to two cities that had recently been bombed by terrorists. "Tomorrow, Los Angeles and Melbourne."

DOJ_NMG_0079624

This past July, Gadahn appeared in a third video that also carried statements from Zawahiri and Al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden. In that video, Gadahn referred to the recent capture of two American servicemen in Iraq and said, among other things: "So after all the atrocities committed by America ... why should we target their military only?"

In the two most recent videos broadcast last month, Gadahn urged U.S. soldiers to "escape from the unbelieving Army and join the winning side." He later referred to the U.S. as "enemy soil."

"Adam Gadahn is a U.S. citizen who made a choice to join and act as a propagandist for Al Qaeda, an enemy of this country responsible for the horrific deaths of thousands of innocent Americans on Sept. 11, 2001," Deputy Atty. Gen. Paul J. McNulty said in a statement after the indictment was announced.

"The war on terror is a fight for hearts and minds, and Gadahn gave himself to our enemies in Al Qaeda for the purpose of being a central part of their propaganda machine. By making this choice, we believe Gadahn committed treason - perhaps the most serious offense for which any person can be tried under our Constitution."

FBI Executive Assistant Director Willie Hulon of the National Security Branch added that Gadahn "represents a new breed of homegrown extremist, who has chosen to betray the country of his birth, and align with the Al Qaeda terrorist network."

U.S. Atty. Debra Wong Yang, whose Los Angeles office prosecuted the case, said: "By aligning himself with Al Qaeda, by moving overseas to be closer to Al Qaeda's base and leadership, and by joining in advocating Al Qaeda's terrorist agenda, an agenda that includes the overthrow of the United States government and the murder of American citizens, Adam Gadahn has committed treason against the United States of America.

She added: "The charges returned today by a federal grand jury demonstrate that the criminal justice system will not sit passively by while a United States citizen engages in such activities." Raised on a goat farm in rural Riverside County, Gadahn is the grandson of a Jewish doctor, Carl Pearlman. His father, Phillip, changed the family name to Gadahn before Adam was born.

In a November 1995 Web posting, the then 17-year-old Gadahn wrote that his father grew up agnostic or atheist but "became a believer in one God when he picked up a Bible left on the beach." He also said his father was a butcher, who slaughtered animals according to Islamic dietary practices and sold the meat to an Islamic food mart in downtown Los Angeles.

Gadahn said that his mother was raised Catholic and leaned toward Christianity and that he and his siblings were schooled at home. After exposure to various religions and a period where he was admittedly "obsessed" with demonic music, Gadahn said in the 1995 Web posting that his spiritual quest ended with his conversion to Islam.

"Having been around Muslims in my formative years," he wrote as convert Yahiye Adam Gadahn, "I knew well that they were not the bloodthirsty, barbaric terrorists that the news media and the televangelists paint them to be."

Within two years of that statement, Gadahn had gone from a pious Muslim to an unabashed extremist. It was a transformation that propelled him onto the list of the FBI's most wanted terrorists.

The Justice Department said that a treason charge carries penalties ranging from five years in prison to the death sentence. The charge of providing material support to a designated foreign terrorist organization is punishable by up to 15 years in prison.

American In Videos Charged With Treason (USAT)

By Kevin Johnson

USA Today, October 12, 2006

WASHINGTON — A 28-year-old American who has appeared in a series of propaganda videos linked to al-Qaeda was indicted Wednesday on terror-related charges, including treason. It marked the first time the U.S. government has brought such a treason case in more than 50 years, the Justice Department said.

Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty said Adam Gadahn, introduced in a 2004 al-Qaeda video as “Azzam the American,” betrayed the USA and faces a possible death sentence for allegedly joining Osama bin Laden's network.

The announcement was the latest chapter in Gadahn's journey from a Southern California convert to Islam to one of the world's most wanted terrorism suspects. Gadahn, who McNulty said is believed to be hiding in Pakistan, is accused of encouraging attacks against the USA in at least five al-Qaeda videotapes, beginning in October 2004.

In the first video, court papers say, Gadahn declared allegiance to al-Qaeda and warned that America would “have to pay for its crimes. … The magnitude and ferocity of what is coming your way will make you forget all about Sept. 11. The streets of America shall run red with blood … and the next wave of attacks may come at any moment.”

McNulty suggested that the increasingly significant role Gadahn has appeared to play in encouraging attacks and recruiting for al-Qaeda warranted the treason charge. The government rarely pursues treason charges, in part because they are difficult to prove.

DOJ_NMG_0079625

Under U.S. law, proving treason requires the testimony of two witnesses who saw the accused perform an "overt act" of treason, or a confession by the accused in court. It's unclear how prosecutors would prove treason in Gadahn's case, if he is caught and tried. However, McNulty suggested the videos offer compelling evidence.

"A charge of treason is exceptionally severe," he said during a briefing. "It is not done lightly. This is the right case."

In the most recent al-Qaeda video featuring Gadahn, released last month, he called the USA "enemy soil" and praised the 9/11 suicide hijackers. In a separate video earlier in September, Ayman al-Zawahiri, bin Laden's top aide, called Gadahn "our brother Azzam the American," court papers say.

McNulty said the government had no evidence that Gadahn had helped to plan or carry out any attacks. However, FBI Executive Assistant Director Willie Hulon said Gadahn represents a threat "as a communicator for al-Qaeda."

Gadahn is one of the FBI's most wanted terrorism suspects. There is a $1 million reward for information resulting in his capture.

The Justice Department said Gadahn, who also faces charges of providing material support to a terrorist organization, was the first U.S. citizen to be charged with treason since Tomoya Kawakita in 1952. Kawakita was sentenced to death for helping the Japanese and abusing U.S. prisoners of war during World War II. His sentence later was commuted, and he was deported to Japan.

Treason Charge For California Man Seen In Al Qaeda Videos (CHIT)

By Andrew Zajac

Chicago Tribune, October 12, 2006

WASHINGTON -- A 28-year-old California man who has appeared in five Al Qaeda propaganda videos was charged with treason Wednesday, becoming the first U.S. citizen charged with the offense since World War II.

Adam Gadahn, also known as Azzam al-Amriki or Azzam the American, "gave Al Qaeda aid and comfort…with intent to betray the United States" through his appearances in the videos, including two released last month by the terror network, according to an indictment handed up by a grand jury in Orange County, Calif.

Gadahn, who could face the death penalty if convicted, is at large and believed to be in Pakistan. As a result of the charges, which also include providing material support to the terrorist group, Gadahn's name was added to the FBI's terrorist most wanted list and a $1 million bounty was offered for his capture.

Deputy Atty. Gen. Paul McNulty, who announced the indictment at the Justice Department, acknowledged that Gadahn is not charged with planning to attack the U.S., but solely with serving as a propagandist.

"This is a very significant piece of the way the enemy does business: to demoralize the troops, to encourage the spread of fear," McNulty said.

Gadahn originally had been charged in a sealed indictment in October 2005.

An American-born convert to Islam, Gadahn has been publicly linked to Al Qaeda by the FBI since mid-2004.

The decision to publicly detail a new set of charges against Gadahn resulted from stronger evidence against him gleaned from the three videos he made this year, and a desire "to discourage anybody else who might be tempted…to join Al Qaeda," McNulty said.

Asked to address skeptics who might view the timing of the indictment as intended to influence the Nov. 7 congressional elections, McNulty said it was driven by the evidence and was "in the best interests of the American people."

The U.S. has rarely brought treason charges, in part because the Constitution requires two witnesses to corroborate it, said Jonathan Hafetz, of New York's Brennan Center for Law and Justice.

"It's difficult to prove, and there are other statutes that can be used against alleged terrorists," said Hafetz, who represents terror war detainees at the Guantanamo Bay Naval Station in Cuba.

One of the last treason cases involved Iva Toguri, an American who in 1949 was convicted on what proved to be coerced evidence of being a voice of the Japanese government's "Tokyo Rose" during World War II.

After reporters unearthed the coercion, President Gerald Ford pardoned Toguri in 1977. She died last month in Chicago.

American In Qaeda Tapes Accused Of Treason (NYT)

By Eric Lichtblau

The New York Times, October 12, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 11 — The Justice Department on Wednesday charged an American with treason for the first time in more than a half-century, accusing a former Southern California man of giving "aid and comfort" to Al Qaeda by appearing in a series of highly publicized videotapes urging violence against the United States.

DOJ_NMG_0079626

At the same time, the State Department posted a $1 million reward for information leading to the capture of the man, Adam Yahiye Gadahn, 28. A convert to Islam who left the United States in the late 1990's, Mr. Gadahn is the leading American fugitive linked to Al Qaeda.

The Federal Bureau of Investigation has been looking for Mr. Gadahn, who is believed to be in hiding in Pakistan, since 2004.

American officials said he has appeared in three Qaeda videos since July, and five total. In the most recent, a tape released on the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11 attacks, he praised the hijackers and declared the United States "enemy soil." In a videotape released last month that was apparently taped in Pakistan, Mr. Gadahn was introduced by Ayman al-Zawahri, the second-in-command of Al Qaeda.

"Escape from the unbelieving army and join the winning side," Mr. Gadahn said. "Time is running out, so make the right choice before it's too late and you meet the dismal fate of thousands before you."

American officials said that Mr. Gadahn had become an important propagandist for Al Qaeda.

The young man "chose to join our enemy and to provide it with aid and comfort by acting as a propagandist for Al Qaeda," said Paul J. McNulty, the deputy attorney general, in announcing the charges.

Mr. Gadahn was secretly charged some months ago in a sealed indictment in a federal court in Southern California, and a grand jury returned a superseding indictment on Wednesday. Mr. McNulty said the decision to bring new charges and announce them publicly was driven not by election-year politics but by the frequency and stridence of the recent videotapes.

"It's time now to get the message out to get this person in our custody," he said.

Officials said they had no indication that Mr. Gadahn had taken part in the actual planning or execution of terrorist attacks. A charge of treason, which carries a possible death sentence, requires the testimony of two witnesses, a standard of proof so high, officials said, that no treason charges have been brought since the World War II era.

The last treason charges on record, Justice Department officials said, were brought against Tomoya Kawakita, an American-born man convicted in 1952 of moving to Japan and aiding the Japanese war effort. Hans Haupt, the father of a German saboteur, was convicted of treason in 1943, and Anthony Cramer was accused of aiding a German saboteur in 1945. While Mr. Kawakita's treason conviction was upheld, the cases against Mr. Haupt and Mr. Cramer were overturned on appeal by the Supreme Court.

With Mr. Gadahn, "there's a real issue here as to whether they have met the two witnesses requirement," said Peter S. Margulies, a law professor at Roger Williams University who studies terrorism prosecutions. "You need witnesses who are actually familiar with the terms of cooperation of the person charged — whether they were coerced, whether they were paid — and that seems to be lacking here in this case."

Mr. Gadahn grew up in a rural part of Southern California in Riverside County, the son of a goat farmer who slaughtered animals according to Muslim religious practices so he could sell the meat in an Arabic market in Los Angeles.

Mr. Gadahn, then an avowed pacifist, converted to Islam in the mid-1990's and worked in a mosque in Orange County, south of Los Angeles. In an essay posted on the Internet while he was apparently still living in the United States, he wrote: "Having been around Muslims in my formative years, I knew well that they were not the bloodthirsty, barbaric terrorists that the news media and the televangelists paint them to be."

But in the late 1990's, he left the United States for Pakistan to study and work among Muslims, and American officials say his views became more radical. By 2004, he was making public videotapes for Al Qaeda, officials say, and declaring that "the streets of America shall run red with blood."

U.S. Supporter Of Al-Qaeda Is Indicted On Treason Charge (WP)

By Dan Eggen And Karen Deyoung

The Washington Post, October 12, 2006

A California native who has appeared in al-Qaeda propaganda videos has been indicted for treason, making him the first American to be charged with that crime in half a century, the Justice Department announced yesterday.

Adam Gadahn, a 28-year-old fugitive believed to be living in Pakistan, could be sentenced to death if convicted of treason, which has been alleged only about 30 times in U.S. history and has not been used since the aftermath of World War II.

Gadahn, allegedly "gave al Qaeda aid and comfort . . . with intent to betray the United States" by appearing in videos calling for attacks on U.S. targets, according to the indictment, which was handed up by a federal grand jury in Santa Ana, Calif. Gadahn is also charged with providing material support to terrorists, which carries a penalty of up to 15 years in prison.

Gadahn was also added to the FBI's official list of "Most Wanted Terrorists," officials said.

In a Washington news conference announcing the charges, Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty said that the treason charge "is not one that we bring lightly" but that "this is the right case for this charge."

DOJ_NMG_0079627

"Adam Gadahn is an American citizen who made a choice -- he chose to join our enemy and to provide it with aid and comfort by acting as a propagandist for al-Qaeda," McNulty said, adding later: "Today's indictment should serve as notice that the United States will protect itself against all enemies, foreign and domestic. . . . Betrayal of our country will bring severe consequences."

McNulty said the government had no information indicating that Gadahn was directly involved in planning or carrying out terrorist attacks.

The treatment of Gadahn is notably different from the Justice Department's approach to other U.S. citizens accused of working on behalf of al-Qaeda since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, who have been charged with lesser crimes than treason or have been designated as enemy combatants outside the normal criminal justice system.

California native John Walker Lindh, for example, was sentenced to 20 years in prison for providing support to al-Qaeda and aiding the Taliban in Afghanistan. Former Chicago gang member Jose Padilla was held as an enemy combatant for years and now faces charges in Miami of participating in a North American terrorist cell and traveling to the Middle East for military training.

McNulty dismissed questions from reporters about the timing of the indictment, which comes as the Bush administration and other Republicans are seeking to focus attention on national security issues for the midterm elections. McNulty said that authorities are concerned over the growing number of videos from Gadahn and hope to use publicity to capture him. He added that the latest video finally provided enough evidence for him to be indicted. A previous indictment against Gadahn, without the treason charge, had been sealed.

One of the offenses alleged in the new indictment occurred "on or about Sept. 11, 2006," when Gadahn appeared in an al-Qaeda video montage released to mark the fifth anniversary of the attacks. He had made a far longer and more substantive appearance on Sept. 2, in a production titled "An Invitation to Islam," which made a direct appeal to American soldiers and citizens to turn against their government.

Gadahn publicly emerged as a terrorism suspect in May 2004, when FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III and then-Attorney General John Ashcroft named him in a press conference as one of seven alleged al-Qaeda agents planning imminent attacks on the United States. Relatives in Southern California's Riverside County expressed astonishment that the young man named Adam Pearlman, who had converted to Islam in 1995 and moved to Pakistan in 1998, was the same person who appeared in a terrorism video that month with his face wrapped in a kaffiyeh, and who provided English-language voice-over for Osama bin Laden.

Gadahn was born in Northern California and moved south with his parents at a young age to a wooden cabin in rural Riverside, southeast of Los Angeles, where the family operated a goat farm. According to relatives interviewed in 2004, he grew into a teenager enamored of heavy-metal music and, eventually, Islam.

In addition to his May 2004 video debut, he appeared in a video on the eve of the fourth anniversary of the Sept. 11 attacks. This time, his face was only partially covered, and he was identified on the tape as "Azzam the American." The American people, he said, could expect "unpleasant consequences" if they continued to support their government.

The last person convicted of treason was Tomoya Kawakita, a Japanese American sentenced to death in 1952 for tormenting American prisoners of war during World War II; President Dwight D. Eisenhower commuted his sentence to life imprisonment.

The Gadahn case bears at least surface similarities to the prosecution of "Tokyo Rose," the Japanese propagandist convicted of treason in 1949. It later emerged, however, that she had secretly plotted against Japan, prompting President Gerald R. Ford to pardon her.

American In Al Qaeda Charged With Treason (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, October 12, 2006

A federal grand jury in Los Angeles yesterday indicted a self-proclaimed American jihadist and al Qaeda operative on charges of treason and aiding terrorists.

Adam Yehiye Gadahn, 28, who has become an English-language spokesman for al Qaeda and has appeared in terrorist propaganda films, has been sought by the FBI since 2004. He is thought to be in Pakistan, where authorities think he attended al Qaeda training camps.

Gadahn has become known by his nom de guerre, Azzam al-Amriki, or "Azzam the American."

In May 2004, Attorney General John Ashcroft described Gadahn as one of seven al Qaeda members who were planning to strike new targets in this country during the summer and fall.

DOJ_NMG_0079628

Citing "credible intelligence from multiple sources," Mr. Ashcroft said the seven operatives -- some of whom were thought to be in this country -- intended to "hit the United States hard." He said they "posed a clear and present danger to America."

In a 48-minute al Qaeda video released last month, Gadahn called on non-Muslims -- especially those in the United States -- to convert to Islam.

"To Americans and the rest of Christendom, we say either repent misguided ways and enter into the light of truth or keep your poison to yourself and suffer the consequences in this world and the next," he said in English while dressed in a white turban and seated in front of a computer and books.

Al Qaeda's second-in-command, Ayman al-Zawahri, made a brief statement at the beginning of the tape, urging viewers to listen carefully to the message, which was titled "An Invitation to Islam."

It was the second time that Gadahn has appeared in a video with al-Zawahri. In a July 7 video marking the first anniversary of the terror attack on London commuters, Gadahn appeared briefly, saying no Muslim should "shed tears" for Westerners killed in al Qaeda attacks.

Gadahn -- who was raised on a Riverside, Calif., goat farm and is of Jewish descent -- also is thought to be the masked man in two videos not officially from al Qaeda. One was given to ABC television in 2004, and the network received another a few days before the fourth anniversary of the September 11 attacks.

Authorities said that after the ABC broadcast, a member of Gadahn's mosque in California told the FBI that he thought the man in the video was Gadahn. In the 2005 video, the American identified by U.S. intelligence officials as Gadahn criticized U.S. foreign policy and military activity, particularly in Iraq and Afghanistan, and said there could be more al Qaeda attacks.

"Yesterday, London and Madrid. Tomorrow, Los Angeles and Melbourne, God willing. At this time, don't count on us demonstrating restraint or compassion," the man said.

Authorities said Gadahn converted to Islam and worshipped at the Islamic Society of Orange County in 1997 before being expelled for attacking one of its leaders. In 2004, he was added to the FBI's "Seeking Information -- War on Terrorism list," on which he remains.

They said Gadahn is the son of musician Phil Pearlman, who changed his surname before Adam's birth. His grandfather, Carl Pearlman, was a prominent surgeon and on the board of directors of the Anti-Defamation League.

U.S. Indicts American In Al-Qaida Video (AP)

By Jeremiah Marquez, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 12, 2006

The charge of treason was used for the first time in the United States' war on terrorism Wednesday, filed against a California man who appeared in propaganda videos for al-Qaida.

Adam Yehiye Gadahn, 28, could be sentenced to death if convicted of the charge, which has been used only a few dozen times in U.S. history and not at all since the World War II era. He also was indicted on a charge of providing material support to terrorists.

Gadahn "knowingly adhered to an enemy of the United States, namely, al-Qaida, and gave al-Qaida aid and comfort ... with intent to betray the United States," according to the indictment, handed up by an Orange County grand jury.

The suspected al-Qaida operative has been sought by the FBI since 2004. Based on the indictment, the FBI added Gadahn to its list of most wanted terrorists and offered a $1 million reward for information leading to his arrest or conviction.

Gadahn, who is believed to be in or near Pakistan, is suspected of having attended the terrorist group's training camps in Pakistan and serving as one of its translators. He has become known by his nom de guerre, Azzam al-Amriki, or "Azzam the American."

Gadahn appeared last month in a 48-minute video along with al-Qaida's No. 2 leader, Ayman al-Zawahri, calling on his countrymen to convert to Islam and for U.S. soldiers to switch sides in the Iraq and Afghan wars.

It was the second time he appeared in the same video with al-Zawahri. In a July 7 video marking the one-year anniversary of the terror attack on London commuters, Gadahn appeared briefly, saying no Muslim should "shed tears" for Westerners killed by al-Qaida attacks.

Beyond that, authorities believe he is the masked figure who appeared in two previous videos from al-Qaida, one given to ABC television in 2004 and another a few days before the fourth anniversary of the Sept. 11 attacks.

According to the indictment, Gadahn announced in the 2004 video that he had joined al-Qaida, "a movement waging war on America and killing large numbers of Americans."

"Fighting and defeating America is our first priority," he said, according to the indictment. "... The streets of America shall run red with blood."

DOJ_NMG_0079629

The treason charge carries penalties ranging from a five-year prison sentence to the death penalty, while the charge of providing material support to a designated foreign terrorist organization carries a possible 15-year sentence.

Raised in Southern California on a Riverside goat farm, Gadahn converted to Islam and worshipped at the Islamic Society of Orange County in 1997 before being expelled for attacking one of its leaders.

His mother last spoke to him by phone in March 2001. At the time he was in Pakistan, working at a newspaper, and his wife was getting ready to have a child.

Gadahn's aunt, Nancy Pearlman, declined to comment.

Associated Press writer Lara Jakes Jordan contributed to this story from Washington.

American Al-Qaeda Member Gadahn Charged With Treason (Update1) (BLOOM)

By Robert Schmidt

Bloomberg, October 12, 2006

Oct. 11 (Bloomberg) -- Adam Gadahn, a U.S.-born member of the al-Qaeda terrorist group, was indicted on a treason charge by a federal grand jury in Santa Ana, California.

Gadahn, whose last known address was in Orange County, California, is considered a fugitive and is believed to be living in Pakistan, the Justice Department said. He is the first American to be charged with treason since the World War II era, the department said.

``A charge of treason is exceptionally severe and it is not one we bring lightly," said Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty at a news conference in Washington. ``But this is the right case for this charge."

Gadahn, 28, has appeared in five videotapes distributed by al-Qaeda, including two last month, making threats against the U.S., according to the indictment. He calls himself ``Azzam the American."

In the first video in 2004, Gadahn said he had joined al- Qaeda and pledged that ``the streets of America shall run red with blood." His most recent message was timed to coincide with the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11 attacks, prosecutors said. On the tape, Gadahn praised the pilots involved and called the U.S. ``enemy soil."

Authorities announced a $1 million reward for information leading to Gadahn's arrest or conviction. The Federal Bureau of Investigation also placed him on its list of most wanted terrorists.

The indictment, which supersedes previous charges filed under seal, also accuses Gadahn of providing material support to terrorists. The charge of treason carries a maximum penalty of death.

Al-Qaida Spokesman Indicted For Treason (UPI)

UPI, October 12, 2006

A U.S. citizen believed to be a fugitive in Pakistan was indicted in California Wednesday on charges of treason and aiding al-Qaida.

The U.S. Justice Department said Adam Gadahn, 28, is the first U.S. citizen charged with treason since the World War II era. A conviction on treason carries penalties up to the death penalty.

Gadahn, a former Orange County, Calif., resident, is also known as Azzam al-Amriki or Azzam the American. Of Jewish-American ancestry, he converted to Islam as a teenager. He has been out of the country since 1998.

He appeared in several videotapes broadcast between October 2004 and Sept. 11 of this year, the department said. In the first tape, Gadahn said he had joined al-Qaida, and that "the streets of America shall run red with blood."

Al-Qaida has taken responsibility for the Sept. 11, 2006, terror attacks on the World Trade Center in New York and the Pentagon near Washington.

In September 2005, Gadahn called the attacks "the blessed raids," referred to other attacks and said, "Tomorrow, Los Angeles and Melbourne, Allah willing."

Earlier this summer, Gadahn appeared in another videotape that also contained statements from Osama bin Laden and Ayman al-Zawahiri.

The indictment was handed down in Santa Ana, Calif.

US Files First Treason Charges In 50 Years Against Accused Al-Qaida Member (VOA)

Voice of America, October 12, 2006

U.S. prosecutors have filed treason charges against an American citizen for the first time in 50 years.

Justice Department accuses 28-year-old alleged al-Qaida member Adam Gadahn of treason, which carries a maximum penalty of death. He also is charged with providing material support to a terrorist group.

DOJ_NMG_0079630

Prosecutors say Gadahn is a California-born convert to Islam who appears in several al-Qaida propaganda videos. Some of those videos have threatened attacks against the United States and have contained messages from top al-Qaida official Ayman al-Zawahri.

Gadahn is believed to be living in Pakistan and has been sought by the FBI for questioning since May 2004. His parents say he converted in Islam in his late teens in the 1990s and later moved to Pakistan.

Terror Funding Trial Set To Begin (CHIT)

By Rudolph Bush, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, October 12, 2006

After winning a series of key pretrial battles, federal prosecutors say they will lay out a "crush of evidence" against a Bridgeview businessman accused of funding terrorism as a member of the militant Islamic Palestinian group Hamas.

Attorneys for Muhammad Salah, meanwhile, argue that the government—which has dropped a key charge and decided not to call its main witness—is left with a gutted case hinged on a coerced confession.

The trial of Salah and his co-defendant Abdelhaleem Ashqar begins Thursday with jury selection. A conviction would be a significant win for the Bush administration, which in 2004 announced the men's indictment as a legal battle in the war on terror.

The prosecution has withstood several challenges to its case by Salah's lawyers and won two major victories. The defense has had to accept that jurors will see details of a 1993 confession Salah provided to Israeli agents. And the trial will involve the testimony of disguised and anonymous Israeli agents in a closed courtroom.

Similar terrorism cases involving the funding of foreign extremist groups have caused trouble for prosecutors and the courts, experts say. At this point, U.S. law isn't fully equipped to deal with the unusual circumstances of such cases, said Karen Greenberg, executive director at the Center on Law and Security at New York University Law School.

"Since [the terrorist attacks of] 9/11, the need to coordinate court systems globally is of paramount importance, and what this case is doing is trying to make that happen," said Greenberg.

In 1993, when Salah was arrested in Israel and confessed to authorities there, coercive interrogation tactics were a legal practice. Salah's lawyers argued unsuccessfully that the confession should not be permitted in a U.S. court.

How jurors interpret what happened to Salah while he was in Israeli custody could well spell the difference between conviction and acquittal.

Although prosecutors have suffered some widely publicized setbacks in similar cases, they have achieved considerable success, said Bobby Chesney, a law professor at Wake Forest University Law School in North Carolina and an expert in terror cases.

"Numerically speaking, the government is winning far more often than it is losing," he said.

For example, the case of Florida professor Sami Al-Arian— widely reported as a loss when a jury hung on many of the charges—actually ended in prosecutors' favor when he pleaded guilty to lesser charges and was ordered deported from the U.S., Chesney said.

Among defendants in terrorism trials, however, Salah is unique. He is both a U.S. citizen and a "specially designated terrorist," according to the U.S. government.

From 1993 to 1997, Salah was jailed in Israel after he was convicted in a military court of being a Hamas leader who carried funds to the occupied territories. He was allowed to return to Bridgeview in 1997, already dubbed a terrorist by the U.S. and lived freely, albeit under investigation, until his arrest in 2004.

The U.S. alleges that since 1988, Salah and Ashqar conspired to aid Hamas and obstructed justice. Salah is accused of being a top Hamas leader, an "outside" member who used his U.S. citizenship to travel the globe and deliver money to Hamas operatives for the purchase of weapons.

Ashqar is accused of being an archivist for the group who collected key documents and helped staged a 1993 "convention" of Hamas leaders in the U.S. A third man, Mousa Mohammed Marzook, is also accused in the case of supplying aid to Hamas while in the U.S. during the 1980s and 1990s.

The head of Hamas' political bureau and one the group's highest-ranking members, Marzook is a fugitive living in Syria, where Hamas is headquartered. The group has controlled the Palestinian government since February.

Unlike Marzook and Ashqar, Salah has been the subject of considerable publicity since his arrest by Israeli authorities at a checkpoint in the Gaza Strip in 1993.

Born in a suburb of Jerusalem in 1953, Salah moved to the U.S. in 1971 "for many reasons," according to his wife, Maryam.

He became a citizen in the mid-1970s, married his wife, a native of Iran, and over the years became involved in a number of businesses, including a grocery and a car dealership.

DOJ_NMG_0079631

The father of five children and a deeply religious man, Salah has been a longtime active member of the Bridgeview Mosque, located not far from his home.

Prosecutors charge it was at the mosque where a religious leader recruited Salah into Hamas. He joined the group in 1988, the year it was formed with a charter that espoused violence and embraced the destruction of Israel, prosecutors allege.

According to the charges, beginning in 1989, Salah began traveling between the United States, England and the Palestinian territories to deliver money to Hamas operatives.

His last trip, in January 1993, led to his arrest. According to an FBI affidavit, he was carrying $97,000 in cash.

Salah's attorneys have argued that he was not providing funds to support violence. They have also pointed out that, at the time of his arrest, it was not illegal in the U.S. to provide funds to Hamas. The U.S. government did not designate the group a terrorist organization until 1995.

After nearly two months in custody and under regular interrogation, Salah provided a detailed confession to Israeli agents acknowledging he was a leader of Hamas who provided money to militants.

His confession is replete with names of other Hamas operatives and details of their activities. Journalist Judith Miller also viewed a portion of his interrogation and wrote about it in the New York Times and a book about militancy in the Middle East.

Salah's attorney, Michael Deutsch, fought earlier this year to keep the confession out of the trial, arguing it was coerced.

But U.S. District Judge Amy St. Eve decided to let jurors see it after she heard testimony from two anonymous Israeli agents in a courtroom closed to the public.

Deutsch intends to convince jurors that Salah provided statements to Israeli agents after he was deprived of sleep, forced to sit in painful positions and put under other extreme stress.

He is also expected to call into question whether Salah provided all of the information in his confession. Some of the statements he signed were in Hebrew, a language he does not speak or write, Deutsch argued.

While Salah is accused of supporting Hamas through the time of his arrest in 2004, much of the evidence in the trial is likely to date to the early 1990s and late 1980s, when prosecutors allege Salah personally transferred funds from his bank account in the U.S. to Hamas.

The fight over Salah's innocence or guilt has already reached a fever pitch with the defense accusing prosecutors of misconduct and prosecutors responding that the defense is desperate to cast attention away from their client's deeds.

Maryam Salah, meanwhile, wrote in a brief note to the Tribune that she and her husband are preparing for trial by seeking to protect their children from its impact.

"The truth will eventually prevail—my hope is that it is in my lifetime," she wrote.

rrbush@tribune.com

German Court To Weigh Whether To Retry Moroccan On Terror Charges (MCT)

By Matthew Schofield

McClatchy Newspapers, October 12, 2006

HAMBURG, Germany - There's no dispute that Mounir el Motassadeq was close to the men who carried out the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks on the Pentagon and the World Trade Center.

He spent three months at an al-Qaida training camp in Afghanistan. He lived near lead hijacker Mohammed Atta in Hamburg, Germany, and signed as the witness to Atta's will. He held power of attorney over the bank account of another hijacker, Marwan al Shehhi. He transferred $2,500 to plotter Ramzi Binalshib. He even sent money to the United States used to help finance the hijackers' pilot training.

German authorities charged him with 3,066 counts of accessory to murder, and in February 2003, he was convicted - the first person to stand trial for the Sept. 11 attacks.

But that conviction was overturned by a German appeals court in 2004. Earlier this year, he was ordered released pending resolution of the appeals.

Now Motassadeq, who is free on bond, is about to learn whether U.S. security policy will help him walk away from criminal charges in the worst terrorist attack in American history.

A German court on Thursday will begin a hearing into whether the accessory to murder charges should be restored. The German government is seeking a third trial in the matter. Among the issues is whether the United States will allow German attorneys to question two key figures in the Sept. 11 plot - alleged mastermind Khalid Sheikh Mohammed and co-conspirator Ramzi Binalshib.

At the time of Motassadeq's trials and appeals, Mohammed and Binalshib were being held in secret at an undisclosed location by the Central Intelligence Agency. Despite two visits to the United States by the German prosecutor, U.S. officials declined to make the two men available for questioning.

DOJ_NMG_0079632

But in September, Mohammed and Binalshib were transferred to U.S. military custody and are now being held openly with other terrorist suspects at the U.S. naval station at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

Representatives of the International Committee of the Red Cross have traveled there to talk to the men, and U.S. military attorneys will soon be appointed to represent them under a just-passed law authorizing the Bush administration to try them and other terror suspects before military tribunals.

It's unclear, however, whether the military will make Mohammed and Binalshib available to assist in Motassadeq's case. The German prosecutor's office won't comment on whether it will renew efforts to question them - German law forbids prosecutors from commenting outside of court - and spokesmen for both the U.S. Justice Department and the Pentagon said they had no information on the subject.

German prosecutors, however, say they'll ask the court to reinstate the accessory to murder charges. They'll argue that even though Motassedeq may not have known precisely when and what Atta and his companions were planning, he knew enough to be found guilty of helping them.

"We have reason to come back to the accessory to murder charges dismissed in the previous trial," said one prosecutor on condition of anonymity. "What needs to be clarified is to what degree is someone involved who may not have known the venue, time and dimension of the planned crime, but was aware of the plan being made."

Whether testimony from Mohammed and Binalshib would help prosecutors convict Motassadeq is unclear - one of the issues in this case is that he claims it would clear him.

Mohammed is believed to have first suggested the hijacking plan to Osama bin Laden. Binalshib, who roomed with Atta in Hamburg, is suspected of becoming the plot's principal logistician after the U.S. refused him a visa, eliminating him as a potential hijacker.

Motassadeq says their testimony will show that he knew little of the plot. His first trial statements that the CIA delivered to the prosecutors appeared to confirm this.

Even so, the court refused to accept the statements after Motassadeq's attorney suggested they might have been the result of torture. U.S. officials declined then to discuss the conditions under which the two men were questioned, and an FBI agent, Matthew Walsh, didn't help the case when he was dispatched to testify.

At the time, the judge expressed frustration that Walsh "was not particularly helpful" as he primarily testified that information sought in the case was "not available" or that he was "not authorized to answer such questions."

Any future German questioning of Mohammed and Binalshib would be likely also to focus on how they were treated during the years they were held by the CIA. In announcing their transfer to military custody, President Bush acknowledged that both had been subjected to harsh interrogation practices. The United States has insisted that the interrogation techniques did not amount to torture, but Bush administration officials have refused to say what those techniques were.

Meanwhile, the former German prosecutor, Kay Nehm, who twice flew to the United States in an effort to win U.S. cooperation in prosecuting Motassadeq, has expressed frustration at the U.S. attitude.

"You have to differentiate between justice and secret services," he recently told Der Spiegel magazine, referring to the CIA. "Apparently, the secret services' interests have priority there. They were not primarily interested in the judicial investigation of the terror attacks."

And Motassadeq's attorney is predicting that in a relatively short period of time his client will be free of all charges - either in Germany or more likely in his native country, Morocco.

Gerhard Strate, whose office walls are covered by photo-realist cityscapes of New York, said he expects his client's conviction on charges of membership in a terrorist organization will stand ("The case has been very well made," he explained.)

That conviction came in a second trial after the first case was overturned where prosecutors showed that Motassadeq had ties to both Atta, who was at the controls of American Airlines Flight 11 when it crashed into the World Trade Center's north tower, and Shehhi, who was piloting United Flight 175 when it struck the south tower moments later.

In addition, prosecutors presented evidence that Motassadeq trained at an al-Qaida camp in 2000 and that he arrived in Germany to study engineering in 1993 - the same year Atta enrolled at the Technical University of Hamburg-Harburg.

But Strate, one of Germany's best known defense attorneys, said none of that proves that his client was involved in the Sept. 11 plot, though he stops short of saying that his client should be declared innocent. "Let's say, rather, that they do not have sufficient evidence in this matter," he said.

Without better evidence tying him to knowledge of the plot, Strate predicts that at worst his client will serve a few years of the seven-year sentence he was given on the membership conviction and then be expelled from Germany for overstaying his expired student visa. Because of this, while Motassadeq is free in Hamburg, he is not able to work or study. Strate said that he is limited to waiting for the final decision in this case.

DOJ_NMG_0079633

"It is possible he will have to spend time in prison here, on the existing sentence, before he is expelled," he said. "But the accessory to murder charge still appears to lack the necessary evidence."

As for the German prosecutors who have pursued this case, this is expected to be their last chance to make the Sept. 11 charges stick.

Texas Man Sentenced For Dealings With Terrorist (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, October 12, 2006

(AP) - DALLAS-The former chief executive of a computer company was sentenced Wednesday to seven years in prison for funneling money to an official of the militant Palestinian group Hamas.

Bayan Elashi and two of his brothers were convicted last year in federal district court of financial dealings with a terrorist.

Prosecutors said the men tried to hide a $250,000 (â‚¬200,000) investment in their Richardson computer company by the Hamas official, Mousa Abu Marzook, by making it look like his wife's money.

Judge Sam A. Lindsay is scheduled to sentence Ghassan Elashi on Thursday. A jury found Ghassan and Bayan Elashi guilty on 21 counts of conspiracy, money laundering and dealing in property of a terrorist.

Basman Elashi, who was found guilty on three conspiracy counts, was scheduled for sentencing Friday.

Lawyers for the Elashis argued during the trial that the transactions were business deals with Marzook, who was married to the Elashis' cousin.

Marzook and his wife were also indicted but never captured. Marzook was deported from the United States in 1995, when the federal government named him a terrorist. He is believed to be living in Syria.

The Elashis were active in the Holy Land Foundation for Relief and Development, a Muslim charity that was shut down in 2001 after the government accused it of funneling more than $12 million (â‚¬9.6 million) to Hamas. Holy Land and several of its officials, including Ghassan Elashi, are scheduled to go on trial in February in federal court in Dallas.

The Elashis and two of their brothers also were convicted in 2004 of conspiring to ship technology to countries that the U.S. government considers supporters of terrorism.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

An Anthrax Blackout (RC)

By Paul Kane

Roll Call, October 12, 2006

The FBI has completely shut Congress out of its now five-year investigation into anthrax attacks on Capitol Hill and around the nation, with accusations flying up and down Pennsylvania Avenue about the probe into the worst biochemical attacks in U.S. history.

The FBI and Justice Department have not briefed two key players in the attacks — former Sen. Tom Daschle (D-S.D.) and Sen. Patrick Leahy (D-Vt.), the Senators who were targeted by anthrax-laden letters — in at least two and a half years. Other Members involved in the attacks, such as Rep. Rush Holt (D-N.J.), whose district was home to the postal box where the letters originated, have gone three and a half years without receiving any briefings or updates.

And Senate Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), who took over the panel in 2005 after the FBI began withholding information from the Hill, has never been briefed about the status of the investigation into terrorist attacks that left five people dead and dozens of others injured or facing lengthy courses of dangerous drug therapy.

Late last month, in a letter to Holt, the bureau officially stated that it has been withholding all information about the attacks from Congress because of alleged leaks to the media following briefings on the Hill. The FBI laid the blame for the blackout squarely at the feet of current and former Members and their staffs from briefings that apparently occurred in 2003.

“After sensitive information about the investigation citing Congressional sources was reported in the media, the Department of Justice and the FBI agreed that no additional briefings to Congress would be provided,” wrote Eleni Kalisch, assistant FBI director for Congressional affairs, to Holt in what appears to have been the first official recognition of leak allegations.

This briefing shutdown has left some Members furious with the FBI, leading them to publicly and privately conclude that the investigation clearly has stalled.

“I would like to think that they know a lot more than they did five years ago, but I have no basis to make that judgement,” said Daschle, the Majority Leader at the time of the attacks, in a recent interview. “From what little they have shared with us, I can only assume that things haven’t gone well in the investigation these past five years.”

DOJ_NMG_0079634

In addition, Sen. Chuck Grassley (R-Iowa), a senior member of Judiciary and sometime critic of the bureau, is preparing a letter to the FBI in which he will formally request that agents provide a briefing on the attacks, which paralyzed the Capitol for weeks.

The FBI currently has 17 special agents working on the case, according to the "Amerithrax" page on the bureau's Web site, and two more agents are joining the probe this month. The agents have conducted more than 9,100 interviews, issued more than 6,000 subpoenas and executed 67 searches across the globe.

"There's a lot of good to be said about the investigation," said Debra Weierman, spokeswoman for the FBI's Washington, D.C., field office. "We have made progress, and it's an incredibly active and productive investigation."

For now, however, an extraordinary situation remains, in which Congress is not receiving any information about an investigation in which its own Members were among the handful of principal targets of the attacks.

By the time the anthrax attacks officially hit Capitol Hill — Oct. 15, 2001, a Monday morning when an intern in Daschle's Hart Building office partially opened a letter containing the deadly chemical — one death had already occurred in relation to the biological agent, a photographer in the offices of the parent company of the National Enquirer. In addition, then-NBC News anchor Tom Brokaw and the New York Post had already received letters that proved to be laced with anthrax, mailed the same day, Sept. 18, with the same Trenton, N.J., postmark.

In the wake of the Sept. 11 attacks, Congressional offices had begun preparing for the possibility that they might be next, with Leahy's office having gone so far as to stop receiving any mail at all. The previous week, Daschle's office had briefed interns and staff assistants who performed the tedious task on opening mail on how to manage a suspicious package.

Once the Daschle letter was discovered, it set off a firestorm of reaction on Capitol Hill. After rounds of "nasal swabbing" for exposure to the deadly agent, 28 people tested positive, including 20 Daschle aides, a few Capitol Police officers and several aides to Sen. Russ Feingold (D-Wis.), whose office neighbored Daschle's on the fifth floor of Hart.

The Leahy letter wouldn't be uncovered for several more weeks by investigators perusing all federal mail, because it was mistakenly delivered to the State Department.

Fortunately, no staffer or Capitol Police officer who responded to the initial call was seriously injured, as they were put on at least 60-day rounds of the antibiotic Cipro, and most also eventually received an anthrax vaccine.

But the deadly ripple effects were felt up and down the East Coast, as a pair of postal workers in the Brentwood facility in Washington, where the Daschle and Leahy letters were processed, died from developing the worst form of full-blown inhalation anthrax. And a pair of women — one a New York City hospital worker whose office was in a former mail room, and an elderly Connecticut woman with no obvious connection to anthrax — died in the following month from inhalation exposure to the agent.

The FBI took the lead in the "Amerithrax" investigation. Thousands of agents initially fanned across the nation interviewing high-level scientists who had some form of expertise with anthrax or other deadly biochemical agents. The initial days and weeks were confusing even to the investigators themselves, as reports varied as to the quality of anthrax that had been sent, with some calling it "weapons-grade" and others using the phrase "militarized" — meaning that it had been purified to increase its deadliness.

Reports continued to conflict over the years about the level of toxicity of the anthrax in the Daschle and Leahy letters, which were postmarked the same day, Oct. 9, 2001, from the same post office as the Brokaw and New York Post letters. Two months ago, however, an FBI scientist, writing in the obscure journal Applied and Environmental Microbiology, definitively stated that the anthrax involved was not as complex as originally suspected, meaning the attacker did not necessarily have to have access to U.S. or Soviet weapons plants.

That discovery produced an angry reaction on Capitol Hill, where Grassley raised the question of whether the investigation had gone "cold" because of an investigative fixation on people like Steven Hatfill, a former U.S. military germ expert who was described as a "person of interest" in the probe by then-Attorney General John Ashcroft in August 2002.

"It appears the FBI has done little to investigate theories beyond a select few of what happened during the anthrax attacks," Grassley said in a statement. "I'm concerned that the FBI spent too much time on one theory, and after five years, maybe it's time they go back and take a serious look at other areas they may have dismissed too quickly."

Ashcroft's aides agreed seven weeks ago to a lengthy interview with Roll Call about the anthrax attacks and the investigation. The interview was canceled, with aides citing a busy book tour. The cancellation happened on Sept. 25, before the publication of his book and the same day that The Washington Post reported on the science journal story.

But the FBI maintains that the perception of the "militarized" anthrax was something that was created in the media, according to Kalisch, the FBI's Congressional affairs aide, saying the bureau has "never been under any misconceptions about the character of the anthrax used in the attacks."

Throughout 2001, 2002 and 2003, agents from the FBI and Justice Department provided regular briefings. According to sources familiar with Daschle's office, he received at least three personal, detailed briefings on the investigation, and there were at least four staff-level briefings, which often included Leahy aides and sometimes GOP aides from senior Judiciary Committee members.

DOJ_NMG_0079635

However, in late 2003, former Washington Post reporter Gary Matsumoto wrote a story about the investigation in the journal Science, which, according to an administration source, contained highly sensitive information.

At that point, briefings were halted. Daschle, in his recent interview, said they were not given specific information about why they were refused in requests for further briefings. “We were told that they felt sharing information with us could jeopardize, in some way, their legal standing,” he said.

Daschle recently asked for another briefing from the FBI after media reports last month about the FBI scientist’s declaration in the scientific journal about the quality of anthrax involved, but was denied.

Leahy, who has been chairman and ranking member of Judiciary throughout the probe, declined to comment for this story. Aides confirmed his most recent briefing was around the time of Daschle’s last update.

Weierman, the FBI spokeswoman, refused to comment about the nature of the 2003 leak, saying to do so would further endanger the investigation. However, the Kalisch letter to Holt clearly cited reports that were based on “Congressional sources.”

Hatfill has filed suit against Ashcroft, the Justice Department and the FBI, citing what his lawyers allege were a series of leaks that invaded his privacy and ruined his life.

“Leaks that embarrass the DOJ are treated seriously and lead to criminal referrals ... while leaks the DOJ and FBI view as helpful (by placing the organizations in a good light) are ignored,” the Hatfill suit alleges.

In early 2004, Daschle said he received his final update from the FBI, what a former aide described as an informal talk with FBI Director Robert Mueller after a different Senators-only briefing on anti-terror efforts.

At one of his final two briefings in late 2003 or early 2004 — he’s not sure which — Daschle asked FBI officials point blank about the investigation’s probability of success.

“I was becoming more concerned about this investigation going cold,” he recalled saying. “So I asked them what their estimation for the success of this investigation was, and they boldly pronounced 100 percent.

“So I’m still waiting.”

7-year Term For Trying To Make Ricin (AZREP)

By Dennis Wagner

Arizona Republic, October 12, 2006

A Phoenix man who was convicted of trying to manufacture the deadly biological toxin known as ricin was sentenced Monday to more than seven years in prison.

Denys Ray Hughes, 59, was convicted by a federal jury in June on the ricin charge and possession of explosives and a silencer.

Hughes was arrested in July 2005 after investigators found castor beans and chemicals in his Wisconsin cabin.

A search of his Phoenix apartment uncovered a pipe bomb, silencer, nine castor plants, thousands of beans and numerous chemicals.

Ricin, derived from the castor bean, is so poisonous that injecting an amount that would fit on the head of a pin would kill an adult.

Hughes, who worked at a Valley steakhouse, had no known terrorist affiliation, and investigators never uncovered a specific plot.

U.S. District Judge Earl Carroll, who sentenced Hughes to 87 months in prison, said the case was among the most serious he had ever tried, according to prosecutors.

U.S. Attorney Paul Charlton described the defendant as "a home-grown threat," adding, "We may never know his motive, but his intent was clear."

Bioweapon Charge Gets Man 7 Years (AP)

AP, October 12, 2006

A Phoenix man convicted of attempting to produce a biological weapon was sentenced Monday to more than seven years in prison.

Denys Ray Hughes, 59, was arrested in July 2005 after police found a large number of castor bean plants, which can be used to make ricin, in his Phoenix apartment. Ricin is a poisonous protein that can be used as a biological weapon.

Hughes also was convicted last June in federal court on charges of possessing a pipe bomb and illegal gun silencers.

The ACLU's Man From The FBI (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0079636

By Judy Sarasohn

The Washington Post, October 12, 2006

The American Civil Liberties Union, often viewed as a bastion of liberalism, has not been reluctant to work with conservatives and libertarians or take up controversial causes. So how odd is it for the ACLU to hire a former FBI agent as a policy counsel?

In the case of Michael German , probably not as strange as one might think.

German is the FBI agent -- an undercover specialist who once infiltrated a white supremacist group of skinheads -- who resigned in 2004 after charging that the agency retaliated against him for complaining about a botched anti-terrorism investigation. The Justice Department's inspector general later basically substantiated his claim.

"I am convinced that they are on the right side of all the issues that are important now for national security," German said in an interview about joining the ACLU.

He said Bush administration policies allowing warrantless wiretapping and internments without trials, as well as the use of torture in interrogations of terrorism suspects, are ineffective and can worsen national security.

"As an FBI agent, I was sworn to protect the Constitution, and I still am," German said.

Caroline Fredrickson , director of the ACLU's Washington legislative office, said German will be important because he "has real inside knowledge of how the FBI operates" and "what actually works to find a terrorist." His expertise, she said, will "help balance the claims of people who want to limit the right of privacy."

She noted that the ACLU has worked with former House member Robert L. Barr Jr. (R-Ga.) on privacy issues and changes in the USA Patriot Act, as well as with others on the right.

"We are principled, not partisan," she said.Lobby Firm Boosts Education Expertise

Education practices are among the hot lobbying and consulting specialties in town, and the pending reauthorization next year of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act, which includes President Bush's signature No Child Left Behind legislation, has some shops bulking up their education expertise.

One such company is B&D Consulting , the lobbying and consulting affiliate of Baker & Daniels law firm. B&D Consulting has hired two senior education specialists: Rene Islas , most recently chief of staff in the Office of Elementary and Secondary Education at the Department of Education, and Mary Jo Dare , assistant superintendent for academic affairs for Indianapolis public schools.

Islas and Dare will be involved in policy development, lobbying and advising school systems on compliance.

While the firm has had a solid higher-education practice for about 10 years, K-12 is a growth area because of No Child Left Behind and education disability issues, said David R. Zook , B&D Consulting's chief executive. "There's a lot of change going on," he said.

B&D Consulting's education specialists also include former congressman William F. Goodling (R-Pa.), who chaired the House Committee on Education and the Workforce. Clients include the Knowledge University, a private company involved in early education; Purdue University; and Indiana State University.DHS Bigwig Moves to Private Sector

The revolving door is spinning at the Department of Homeland Security this week, and will be stopping at the law firm of Preston Gates Ellis & Rouvelas Meeds .

Cresencio "Cris" Arcos , DHS assistant secretary for international affairs, is leaving the department Friday and starting Tuesday at Preston Gates as a counselor for government affairs. Government ethics rules will limit his lobbying capabilities for the next year.

Before joining the DHS in 2003, Arcos was managing director of international public affairs for Latin America and Canada at AT&T Corp. Earlier, he was a career foreign service officer whose postings included a stint as U.S. ambassador to Honduras. He retired in 1995 after 25 years.

Asked why he was leaving government, Arcos said: "It was about time."

At Preston Gates, he'll be working with Steve McCain , director of the defense and homeland security practice; Michael J. O'Neil , a former general counsel of the CIA; and former senator Slade Gorton (R-Wash.).Here and There

Also moving about town . . . Thomas B. Chapman is leaving Southwest Airlines, where he has been legislative counsel, for US Airways, where he will be vice president for congressional and federal affairs, effective Monday. He succeeds Rosemary G. Murray , who retired after 17 years.

Jeffrey Miller , former senior vice president for government and industry affairs for ACC Capital Holdings Corp., has joined McKenna Long & Aldridge as a managing director. Miller had worked for Rep. Bill Thomas (R-Calif.) and was chief financial officer of the California Republican Party. ACC Capital Holdings is the parent company of Ameriquest Mortgage Services.

Brooke McNally , former press secretary for Rep. John F. Tierney (D-Mass.), has joined Hoopes Strategies as a communications and political strategist.

Teresa D. Schofield , previously public affairs counsel at the Mortgage Bankers Association and a veteran of the Office of Legislative Affairs in the Clinton White House, has joined the Herald Group , a public affairs firm. She also was an aide to Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin (D-Md.).

Small Plane Strikes New York High-Rise (LAT)

By Thomas S. Mulligan And Ellen Barry

The Los Angeles Times, October 12, 2006

NEW YORK — A small airplane carrying New York Yankees pitcher Cory Lidle and his flight instructor slammed into a luxury high-rise on Manhattan's Upper East Side on Wednesday afternoon, exploding in a fireball that killed both men and engulfed two floors of the building.

Authorities termed the 2:42 p.m. crash an accident, but it evoked emotional reactions from New Yorkers who vividly recall the terrorist attacks on the World Trade Center a little more than five years ago.

President Bush was alerted to the crash, and Air Force jets were scrambled over several cities as a precaution.

Residents of the 42-story, red-brick building were quickly evacuated, streaming down the stairwells into a crowd of fire and emergency crews trained for fast response after Sept. 11.

The impact at the 30th and 31st floors rained flaming debris down the north side of the Belaire building, at 72nd Street and York Avenue, overlooking the East River. The building is just down the block from Sotheby's, the famous auction house.

The bodies of both victims were found on the street, Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg said at a news conference. CNN, citing an FBI official, reported that Lidle's passport also was found on the street.

Eleven firefighters were treated for minor injuries. Two people escaped unharmed despite being inside a residential unit that was penetrated by parts of the aircraft. The two were "a little bit shaken," Bloomberg told reporters. "They were sitting there and they heard a noise, glass breaking, and they ran out the door and into the hall." He said the plane's engine was later found in one of the residences.

Lidle, 34, of West Covina, had earned his pilot's license less than a year ago. It was not clear whether he or the instructor, whose identity was not released, was at the controls. Lidle owned the plane, which was identified as a Cirrus SR20, a single-engine four-seat aircraft made of lightweight composite materials.

The plane is noteworthy for what its manufacturer, Cirrus Design Corp. of Duluth, Minn., calls "a final level of defense" — a parachute for the entire plane. It is not known whether any attempt was made to deploy the parachute before the crash.

Newsday reported that the SR20 had been involved in 20 accidents, accounting for at least 15 deaths, in the last seven years.

Bloomberg did not identify either of the passengers during his news conference, but he said the student pilot — presumably Lidle — had about 75 hours of flying time.

The two had taken off at 2:29 p.m. from Teterboro Airport, about 12 miles away in New Jersey, and had circled the Statue of Liberty before turning north up the East River, Bloomberg said. The weather was threatening but did not give way to rain until after the crash.

Federal Aviation Administration officials said the pilot didn't need to radio air traffic controllers in New York because Visual Flight Rules, under which he was flying, don't require such contact. Bloomberg said private aircraft were allowed to fly over the rivers but had to seek permission before crossing into Manhattan airspace.

A witness, identified as Zenel Perezic, told CNN that the airplane seemed to be in distress moments before the crash.

Joanne Hartlaub was on a stationary bike in the gym in the building opposite the Belaire when she saw something falling; it looked like metal, she said.

"I didn't see wings. I just saw a big engine." At that moment, she said, "I was insane with fear that we were being attacked."

She saw the plane "smash into the side of the building and blow out all the windows. Then all sorts of debris was falling down on the street." She looked down and saw that the fuel had splashed on the street and ignited. "There was fire all over the ground within seconds."

Three hours later, Hartlaub said, she was still shaking. "I've been shaking all day."

She was near the World Trade Center on Sept. 11, 2001, she said, and saw the first plane fly into one of the towers.

Former Bloomingdale's Chairman Marvin Traub and his wife, Lee, have lived on the top floor of the Belaire since the building went up in the early 1990s. He said he was at the office of his Manhattan consulting business when friends alerted him to the crash about 3 p.m.

"Mrs. Traub was in the building…. After she walked down, she knew I'd be concerned, so she called me," he said.

Elias Taveras, 13, was in his science class three blocks away when smoke started blowing in the windows. It felt as close, he said, "as if the fire was actually in our school."

DOJ_NMG_0079638

His classmates had a variety of responses, he said. "Some people got nervous, some people got excited."

Although most of the students dispersed, Elias wandered to the scene to take a look. "I was like, oh my God, it's like what happened at the world trade tower."

Scott M. Stringer, the Manhattan borough president, was at the scene. He said the initial reports had been chilling. "Every time you hear about an aircraft crashing into a building, [terrorism] is something you think about," he said.

Along the streets, in the minutes after the crash, people looked dazed, anxious and hurried. Many talked on cellphones, glancing over their shoulder at the plume of smoke while they described it. A few people ran down the sidewalk. One woman, several blocks south of the fire, was weeping while she tried to reach someone on her cellphone. Mothers pulled children along, and children looked worried. Approaching the scene, the smell was acrid and artificial. Half a dozen helicopters hovered in the air above the building.

A young woman in a pale blue trench coat was trying to force her way past a police officer, who was holding her back. She was crying and saying, "What can I do? My baby is there!" A neighbor reassured her that everyone on that floor had escaped the building, and the young woman suddenly fell silent, relief apparent on her face.

Department of Homeland Security officials learned of the crash about 2:50 p.m., and Secretary Michael Chertoff spoke with New York Gov. George E. Pataki minutes later to convey that the department had no information that suggested a credible threat, spokesman Russ Knocke said.

"At this time there's no indication of a terror nexus; all indications are this is a truly unfortunate accident," Knocke said.

The department had no plans to change the color-coded national terrorism alert level.

A spokeswoman for U.S. Northern Command, the military headquarters responsible for U.S. territory, said the Air Force scrambled fighters over several major American cities after the crash as a precaution. For security reasons the military did not disclose the number of jets deployed or which cities they flew to.

"While every indication is this is an accident, we see this as a prudent measure," said Navy Chief Petty Officer Susan Hammond, adding that the plane was never a "flight of interest" to officials tracking potential terrorist threats.

Lidle, a pitcher who played for several major league teams before joining the Yankees in late July, pitched his last game Saturday, when the Detroit Tigers eliminated New York from the American League playoffs.

One of his Yankees teammates, Jason Giambi, also played with Lidle at South Hills High School in West Covina. "Right now, I am really in a state of shock," Giambi said in a statement. "My thoughts are with Cory's relatives and the loved ones" of the other victim. "I have known Cory and his wife, Melanie, for over 18 years and watched his son grow up. We … have remained close throughout our careers. We were excited to be reunited in New York this year, and I am just devastated to hear this news."

Lidle had agreed to serve as a replacement player when major league players were on strike in spring 1995. The strike was settled before the replacements played any games, but he and other replacement players who went on to play in the big leagues were resented by some of their colleagues.

Lidle was also one of the few active ballplayers to criticize superstar Barry Bonds for his alleged use of steroids. "I don't want to see him break records," Lidle said in the spring.

A month ago, the New York Times ran an article about Lidle's love of flying. The team has worried about flying ever since the death of its catcher Thurman Munson, when the plane he was learning to fly crashed in 1979. But Lidle told the reporter he was safe in the air.

"The whole plane has a parachute on it," Lidle said. "If you're up in the air and something goes wrong, you pull that parachute, and the whole plane goes down slowly."

The article quoted Tyler Stanger, a flight instructor from Pomona who taught him in California. Stanger described Lidle as one of his best students.

Stanger would orchestrate tense maneuvers to see how Lidle responded, Stanger said. Lidle was a star in those situations, Stanger told the newspaper.

Small Plane Hits High-Rise In N.Y. (WP)

By Michael Powell And Sara Kehaulani Goo

The Washington Post, October 12, 2006

NEW YORK, Oct. 11 -- A small plane carrying New York Yankees pitcher Cory Lidle and a flight instructor spun out of control on a blustery Wednesday afternoon and slammed into the side of a 50-story condominium tower on the Upper East Side, killing both people on board.

The airplane exploded into a fireball as it hit the building around the 30th floor, sparks and pieces of the wing and the plane's door raining down on the sidewalk below. The fire that raged afterward incinerated two apartments, although, remarkably, city officials reported no fatalities inside the luxury Belaire Condos on East 72nd Street, where apartments feature views of the East River and command $2 million and up.

DOJ_NMG_0079639

The crash and fire and clouds of black smoke billowing from a high-rise tower evoked memories of Sept. 11, 2001, for New Yorkers. Many stood on the streets listening to radios, watching television sets in corner grocery stores and anxiously asking strangers for information. The East Side of Manhattan all but came to a standstill, as police cordoned off York and First avenues, two vast thoroughfares, and fire engines screamed across town.

North American Aerospace Defense Command fighter aircraft were scrambled minutes after the crash, and fighters and support aircraft remained airborne for hours over U.S. and Canadian cities. But city and federal officials concluded the crash had no connection to terrorism.

"There is nothing to suggest anything remotely like terrorism was involved," Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg (R) said at a news conference late in the afternoon. "We are just very lucky that it was not more than two people, although our prayers go out to them."

Sana Monayair, a mother of four, described standing on her 37th-floor balcony across 72nd Street about 2:40 p.m. She watched as the four-seat, single-engine Cirrus SR20 plane strayed inland from the East River, climbing briefly upward before lurching down into the building's cliff wall.

"I saw the plane fly directly into the building," Monayair said. "There was a big explosion. It was very scary, the bricks falling and people screaming."

Not far from her terrace, dozens of hard-hat workers stood along the metal skeleton of a high-rise under construction, screaming as the plane swooped over their heads. Inside the Belaire, where tall windows offer sweeping panoramas of the Queens waterfront, Patti Charles, a housekeeper on the 32nd floor, said the "place just lit up -- it shook the building, and I ran."

"We sort of felt that it was 9/11 happening all over again," said Sara Cohen, 32, a nurse who was walking down York Avenue when she heard the concussion and saw the fireball. "I was terrified."

Lidle, 34, was an experienced pitcher who had played for both New York teams. He arrived in the major leagues in 1997 with the Mets and pitched the latter part of this season with the Yankees. He had acquired his pilot's license within the past year; it is not known whether Lidle or the unidentified instructor was at the controls of the airplane at the time of the accident.

Yankees management, including owner George Steinbrenner, confirmed that Lidle died in the crash. Lidle's passport was found on the street below, along with two bodies, authorities report.

Lidle had a wife, Melanie, and a 6-year-old son, Christopher; they live in California.

The crash also summoned memories of the death of Thurman Munson, a star Yankees catcher who died in August 1979 when a jet he was piloting struck a tree during takeoff at an airport in Ohio.

Rick Peterson, the Mets' pitching coach, worked with Lidle when they were with the Oakland Athletics in 2000 and 2001. He remembered a husky kid who relished pitching under pressure.

"He was a very hard worker, very competitive," Peterson told reporters out at Shea Stadium. "I have no words; I just have very strong emotions --."

Cirrus targets a wealthy male audience of nonprofessional pilots, a market largely abandoned by other manufacturers.

"People are using them like a car," Cirrus spokeswoman Kate Dougherty said. "They have become very efficient business tools and also have the ability to give people an entirely different lifestyle, especially now that families are so spread out."

Cirrus aircraft are the only planes currently manufactured with parachutes as standard equipment. According to Cirrus, the parachutes have been deployed nine times and have saved 21 lives.

The plane carrying Lidle took off at 2:29 p.m. from Teterboro Airport in New Jersey, where many small planes and corporate jets are housed. The plane flew south into New York Harbor and around the Statue of Liberty, then up the East River.

Federal Aviation Administration officials said the crash occurred at 2:45 p.m. near a corridor above the East River where helicopters and small planes can fly under 1,100 feet and are not required to remain in touch with air traffic controllers. The corridor runs up the river, over the Brooklyn, Manhattan, Williamsburg and 59th Street bridges that necklace the river. It is commonly used by sightseeing helicopters under "visual flight rules," which means pilots under 1,000 feet must steer clear of other airplanes and helicopters as well as buildings.

Air traffic controllers are examining radar tapes to see if the plane can be spotted, and a six-member team of national safety investigators was en route to the scene. The plane emitted a distress signal just before striking the building, city officials said.

"We can't exactly tell what the route was after it came up the East River and why it turned onto 72nd Street," Bloomberg said.

Yankee Killed When Plane Hit N.Y. Building (WT)

DOJ_NMG_0079640

By Betsy Pisik

The Washington Times, October 12, 2006

NEW YORK - New York Yankees pitcher Cory Lidle and his flight instructor were killed yesterday after he crashed his Cirrus SR20 into a Manhattan high-rise yesterday, igniting a four-alarm fire in the 40-story building and sparking fears of a terrorist attack.

A National Transportation Safety Board (NTSB) spokeswoman said that the plane was owned by Mr. Lidle, 34, and that Mr. Lidle's passport was found on the street outside the building at 524 E. 72nd St. on the city's Upper East Side, about a half-block from the East River. Mr. Lidle's death was confirmed last night by the Yankees, and the second death was confirmed by New York Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg.

"This is a terrible and shocking tragedy that has stunned the entire Yankees organization," team owner George Steinbrenner said, offering condolences to Mr. Lidle's wife, Melanie, and 6-year-old son, Christopher.

"It's very tragic," said Mr. Bloomberg at a press conference at nearby Sotheby's Auction House.

The plane was traveling from Teterboro Airport in New Jersey over the East River at about 2:45 p.m. when it veered off course just 15 minutes after takeoff and crashed into the Belaire Condominiums at about the 30th floor. First-responders told CNN that they found the bodies of Mr. Lidle and his instructor outside the apartment building.

The building was evacuated. More than 20 people were hospitalized, most were among the nearly 200 firefighters who doused the blaze in about an hour.

An official from the Federal Aviation Administration (FAA) said the plane put out a distress call, but it was too early to determine what might have caused the crash.

But for a time yesteday afternoon, when details were sketchy, the crash reawakened fears of terrorism among New Yorkers and dredged up memories of September 11, 2001, when first reports said a small plane crashed into the World Trade Center, just five miles from yesterday's crash site.

A blond woman who did not give her name leaned on a parked car and sobbed into the rain: "Oh my God, it was just like September 11. It was so scary."

The skies over the Midtown neighborhood were filled with police, medevac and news helicopters, while the streets below were clogged with emergency responders, which have been reassessing their procedures since September 11.

"It was really loud; it sounded like a truck going over a steel plate bump, really loud," said a Fox News cameraman who was about three blocks away working on another story when the plane hit the building.

While flames leaped from two stories of the red-brick building that houses more than 180 luxury residences, witnesses turned to their cell phones. Most were describing memories of September 11 where they were on the day, how this revived that feeling of panic and how relieved they were that this was an accident.

One man yelled into his cellular phone: "They said this was an accident, but that's what they said about the World Trade Center, too."

The scene was just about a mile from the United Nations, where delegates were debating their response to North Korea's claim to have conducted a nuclear test. Within minutes of the accident, U.N. security told the assembled diplomats that there had been an incident and that it was being monitored.

FAA spokeswoman Diane Spitaliere said the aircraft was traveling along an 8-mile corridor over the East River, where helicopters and fixed-wing aircraft are allowed to fly below 1,100 feet under visual flight rules meaning they are not required to file a flight plan or talk to air-traffic control.

"They should not be flying near buildings," Miss Spitaliere said. "And they should not be flying below a thousand feet."

"It's the pilots' responsibility to pilot the plane and to watch where he's going, to be cognizant of other aircraft in the area," Miss Spitaliere said.

The Belaire Condominiums is the tallest building in its immediate neighborhood.

Laura Brown, a second FAA spokeswoman, said that the skies were overcast but that conditions were generally good, with visibility at nine miles and wind coming from the east at 13 knots.

A California native and a pilot for only seven months, Mr. Lidle recently bought the 2002 four-seat airplane with less than 400 air hours on it for $187,000. In his 10-year Major League career, Mr. Lidle also played for the New York Mets, Tampa Bay Devil Rays, Oakland Athletics, Philadelphia Phillies, Cincinnati Reds and Toronto Blue Jays.

Mary Varela, Mr. Lidle's mother-in-law, told reporters that her daughter wasn't home and they weren't certain if she knew about the crash.

"This is a tragedy for everybody involved," she said through tears.

Kevin Lidle, Mr. Lidle's twin brother, said on CNN last night that he had spoken to their parents, who were "obviously having a tough time."

DOJ_NMG_0079641

Federal officials worked furiously during the afternoon to determine whether the crash was terrorist-related, and the U.S. military scrambled fighter jets over major U.S. cities as a "prudent measure," Sgt. 1st Class Gail Braymen said.

"There is no nexus to terror," said William Knocke, Homeland Security spokesman. "All indications are that it was a terrible accident."

President Bush was notified of the crash and monitored reports from New York, but he was not moved to another location, a White House spokesman said.

Still, former NTSB director Jim Hall told the Associated Press in a telephone interview that he does not understand how a plane could get so close to a New York City high-rise building after September 11.

"We're under a high alert, and you would assume that if something like this happened, people would have known about it before it occurred, not after," he said.

Crash Exposes Limits Of Post-9/11 Security Steps (WSJ)

By Laura Meckler

The Wall Street Journal, October 12, 2006

Small Plane Hits Building In New York, Highlighting Concerns About U.S. Skies

The crash of a small plane into a high rise on Manhattan's Upper East Side, apparently an accident, offered a reminder that new security measures adopted after the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks can't prevent risks posed by aircraft in the busy airspace over the nation's cities.

The single-engine plane was flying along New York's East River in midafternoon when it veered and crashed into a condominium tower of about 50 stories located less than a block from the river. The crash sent black smoke soaring into the sky and jangled nerves still sensitive five years after two jetliners crashed into the World Trade Center.

Like a string of similar small-aircraft accidents, casualties were limited. The pilot and the one passenger aboard were killed, but those on the ground suffered only minor injuries, local officials said. Among the dead was the plane's owner, New York Yankees pitcher Cory Lidle, who had taken up flying in the past few years. It is unclear who was at the controls.

Officials said it was too early to determine the cause of the crash. The National Transportation Safety Board sent a team to New York to investigate.

Early on, officials were fairly confident that the incident wasn't terrorism related, but federal authorities scrambled to implement a host of precautionary measures. Fighter jets patrolled the skies above New York and major U.S. cities, a standard emergency response in the post-9/11 era. The Federal Bureau of Investigation Joint Terrorism Task Force was on the scene, assisting with the on-ground investigation.

Still, the incident highlighted the vulnerabilities that are inherent in the nation's cities. Trucks and public transportation have been targeted or used in terrorist attacks in the U.S. and elsewhere. Air traffic presents its own challenges, given the number of aircraft regularly flying in close proximity to urban areas.

The plane in yesterday's crash was flying along the East River under rules that allow small aircraft to skirt Manhattan as long as they stay under 1,100 feet. A similar corridor along the Hudson River also allows for flights using "visual flight rules," where pilots use their eyes and ears, rather than instruments, to navigate their way.

Similarly, Federal Aviation Administration rules allow small aircraft to fly through major cities across the country, allowing the operation of planes that take off from small downtown airports and helicopters that land at convention centers, hospitals and heliports.

Flight restrictions have been in place in various places around the country for years, chiefly for security reasons, but were greatly expanded after 9/11. The largest restricted zone extends in a 15-mile radius around Washington, D.C. Flights in an even wider area beyond that are tightly controlled and monitored. Hundreds of small planes have violated the restricted airspace since it was expanded in February 2003. Notably, in May 2005, a Pennsylvania pilot and a student flew their Cessna 150 within three miles of the White House. The FAA later determined the pair was lost.

Airspace above the presidential retreat Camp David in western Maryland is also restricted, and temporary restrictions are put in place wherever the president travels.

There have been several incidents involving small planes crashing into buildings after 9/11, though they typically do relatively little damage. Overall, in 2005, there were 1,669 general aviation accidents including 321 fatal crashes, according to the NTSB. There are some 210,000 small-aircraft owners in the U.S., a number that has been falling due to aging pilots and rising maintenance costs, according to the Aircraft Owners and Pilots Association.

The plane involved in yesterday's crash wasn't required to file a flight plan and took off from Teterboro Airport in New Jersey to a hazy, cloudy sky at about 2:30 p.m. New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg said at a news conference that the plane flew to Manhattan, circled the Statue of Liberty and then headed north up the East River. About 2:45 p.m. it hit The Belaire, a red-brick tower about five miles north of the World Trade Center.

DOJ_NMG_0079642

"In the beginning, there was screaming. People were very upset. They were like 'Oh, my God. It's 9/11 again,' " said Erasto Arenales, a cook at La Crosta Restaurant & Gourmet Pizzeria, on 72nd Street, less than half a block west of the crash site. People started to run, he said, but then they stopped "when they saw there was not so much danger." (Read more4.)

At the time of the crash, real-estate broker Donna Olshan was showing a three-bedroom apartment selling for $4.8 million on the building's 47th floor to a pair of brothers. "The floors were rocking. The walls were rocking. You knew that it was some kind of explosion but I wasn't sure what," she said. Ms. Olshan raced down 47 stories, through smoke that grew thicker as she descended through the building.

Manhattan Plane Crash Kills Yankee Pitcher (NYT)

By James Barron

The New York Times, October 12, 2006

A single-engine plane carrying the Yankees pitcher Cory Lidle smashed into a 42-story building on the Upper East Side yesterday, killing Mr. Lidle and his flight instructor, the authorities said.

The afternoon crash beneath overcast skies sent debris clattering hundreds of feet to the sidewalk and started a fire that destroyed several apartments and left a charred smudge on the face of the building.

Fourteen firefighters and four people in the building were injured, officials said, including a woman who had been in an apartment hit squarely by the plane and escaped the inferno, suffering burns.

The plane, owned by Mr. Lidle, was a Cirrus SR20, a four-seat propeller plane that is popular for its performance and sleek looks. It has a fixed landing gear reminiscent of a stunt plane. With two sets of controls, officials said, either Mr. Lidle or his instructor could have been flying it.

It slammed into the center of a 501-foot building on East 72nd Street several hundred yards from the East River. New Yorkers with memories of the Sept. 11 attack on the World Trade Center watched smoke drifting toward the sky as firefighters clambered into another high-rise, and the North American Aerospace Defense Command scrambled military jets. Some worried that they had witnessed another terrorist attack, but officials quickly dismissed that notion.

Mr. Lidle, 34, a pilot for less than a year who was traded to the Yankees in the summer, had talked enthusiastically about flying to his home in California this week.

As he cleaned out his locker at Yankee Stadium on Sunday, the day after the Yankees' playoff hopes fizzled in a series loss in Detroit against the Tigers, he said that he planned to work on instrument training exercises yesterday before he left for California, and that his regular instructor, whom he identified as Tyler Stanger, was coming in to work with him. Officials said they believed that Mr. Stanger was the second victim.

The plane took off from Teterboro Airport in New Jersey about 2:30 p.m., according to a spokesman for the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey.

Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg said it circled the Statue of Liberty before heading north by the East River. Radar contact was lost around the Queensboro Bridge. He said it was not clear why the plane veered toward Manhattan, apparently after traveling farther north, and hit the building on the north side about 12 minutes after takeoff. The plane never got higher than 800 feet, according to Passur, a flight-tracking service.

Pilots describe that area of the East River as a particularly treacherous corridor that tends to be crowded with helicopters. Several witnesses said the plane appeared to be in trouble moments before it crashed. One investigator said initial reports indicated that the aircraft had radioed La Guardia Airport to say that it was running low on fuel.

The plane disintegrated as it hit the building, shaking bricks loose from the façade, and ended up as a smoking wreckage on the street. "The engine with the propeller was two feet inside the window," another investigator said, adding that much of the rest of the plane had fallen to the street outside the building, at 524 East 72nd Street.

The plane bore into an apartment on the 30th floor, which under the building's numbering system is Apt. 40ABG. Dr. Parviz Benhuri, who owns the apartment with his wife, Ilana, said she was at home when the plane blasted through the window and the apartment went up in flames.

"She told me she saw the window come out and the fire comes," he said. "She told me she saw the window coming out and she ran. She's in shock. She's lucky she made it. It's a miracle."

She ran down the stairs and went to the emergency room at NewYork-Presbyterian Hospital/Weill Cornell Medical Center a couple of blocks away.

Three other people walked down from lower floors and were treated for exhaustion, one city official said.

DOJ_NMG_0079643

Other witnesses said that the sequence of events leading to the crash unfolded so quickly that they realized only later that noises they had heard must have come from Mr. Lidle's plane.

"It sounded like a truck gearing down," said Kim Quarterman, a doorman at a nearby building. "Then I saw a cloud of smoke."

Jeremy Chassen, a real estate developer who was in an apartment across the street, recognized the droning of an airplane engine — he has taken flight lessons himself.

Joanne Hartlaub, an actress and filmmaker who was working out in a gym across the street, heard explosions and a "loud whooshing noise, like something falling, very loud."

She said she saw "this large object falling from the sky; it was aluminum and it was smoking."

Inside the building that was struck, five construction workers going over renovation plans for an apartment on the 42nd floor looked out the window and the plane bearing down on them. One of the workers, Luis Gonzalez, 23, said it was so close that he could see the pilot's face.

"It was coming right at us," he said. "The whole building shook. Then we ran for the elevator."

Fuel burned on the sidewalk as black smoke rose from the apartments above.

In the penthouse, a housekeeper, Ann Robert, was ironing clothes. "I heard a boom and saw smoke and ashes outside the kitchen window," she said, "and then the painter came running in frantically from working in the baby's room," Ms. Robert said.

Her 21-year-old daughter was also in the apartment, watching television and talking on the telephone. Within seconds, Ms. Robert had grabbed her purse and was hurrying her to get out. "Let's go. Let's go. Let's go," she shouted.

"Death was going through my mind," Ms. Robert said. "When I saw the smoke, I did not know if we would make it out alive." She added, "As I was coming down the stairs I thought that the whole building might come down and that me and my daughter might go at the same time. But once we got past the 30th floor, I said in my mind that maybe we were safe."

The building is a condominium with residents like Marvin R. Shanken, the publisher of Cigar Aficionado and other specialty magazines; Marvin S. Traub, the former head of Bloomingdale's; and Carol Higgins Clark, a mystery writer who is the daughter of Mary Higgins Clark. A dozen lower floors are used by the Hospital for Special Surgery for offices and guest rooms for patients' families.

The building remained closed to residents last night. While structurally sound, a spokeswoman for the Department of Buildings said that there had been extensive damage and, with only one elevator working, it was not suitable for people to return.

For the Yankees, Mr. Lidle's death stirred memories of another player who perished at the controls of his own plane, the catcher Thurman Munson, in 1979. But where Mr. Munson was the team captain, Mr. Lidle was still something of a newcomer.

A 5-foot-11 right-hander who rarely threw his fastball above 90 miles an hour, he was not drafted out of high school and played for three organizations in the minor leagues, including an independent team, before joining the Mets in 1997. He had also played for the Tampa Bay Devil Rays, the Oakland Athletics, the Toronto Blue Jays, the Cincinnati Reds and the Philadelphia Phillies before joining the Yankees.

"He was a good guy, a real competitor," said Brian Cashman, the Yankees' general manager. "He wasn't here long, but I saw him compete for years with different teams, and he had a lot of success. That's one of the reasons why we wanted him."

Mr. Lidle made one memorable start, a victory on Aug. 21 that concluded the Yankees' five-game sweep of the Red Sox in Boston's Fenway Park. He had a 4-3 record with a 5.16 earned run average for the Yankees and made a brief relief appearance in the team's final playoff game on Saturday.

For his career, Lidle was 82-72 with a 4.57 earned run average, pitching in 277 games. He was a free agent and was not expected to return to the Yankees, though he said on Sunday that he hoped to sign a two-year contract this winter.

Mr. Lidle, who was married with a 6-year-old son, lived in Glendora, Calif. He had earned his pilot's license during the last off-season. He said last month that the four-year-old plane had cost $187,000 and had "cool safety features."

"The whole plane has a parachute on it," he said. "Ninety-nine percent of pilots that go up never have engine failure, and the 1 percent that do usually land it. But if you're up in the air and something goes wrong, you pull that parachute, and the whole plane goes down slowly."

Shortly after his trade to New York from Philadelphia, he flew his plane from a small airport in southern New Jersey to Teterboro. Describing his itinerary in a September interview, he said: "I didn't fly around New York, but I flew straight up north. I don't like to go in the big boys' airspace."

But yesterday, he did. The plane left Teterboro, in Bergen County, at 2:29 p.m., officials said.

Police and fire officials applauded what they said was a fast and efficient response, noting that there were no fatalities beyond the two men in the plane. They said that they too had worried at first that the crash was a terrorist attack.

"We are concerned about the possibility of things being something more than an accident," Police Commissioner Raymond W. Kelly said. "But it seemed clear fairly early it was a small plane."

DOJ_NMG_0079644

Gov. George E. Pataki issued a statement saying that the Federal Aviation Administration had issued a temporary flight restriction requiring all planes flying below 1,500 feet to be in communication with air traffic controllers. He said he was asking F.A.A. officials to leave the restrictions in effect while they and officials of the Department of Homeland Security review the rules that apply to private airplanes flying in the New York City area. "New York's airspace should enjoy the same kind of protections as our nation's capital," Mr. Pataki said.

NYC Tragedy Echoes 9/11, Raises Small-plane Questions (USAT)

USA Today, October 12, 2006

For a few jittery moments Wednesday, the nation suffered a collective flashback to 9/11.

Cable and network TV news flashed a breaking story: A small plane had crashed into a New York high rise. Viewers could see fire and smoke spewing from a tall facade in Manhattan's skyline.

This time, thankfully, the plane was not a jetliner. It was a single-engine Cirrus SR20 that seats four.

This time, it was not terrorists in the cockpit. It was New York Yankees pitcher Cory Lidle and a passenger.

This time, it was not a history-changing attack. It was apparently an accident — a personal tragedy in which Lidle and the passenger died.

And this time, the military and emergency workers weren't caught off-guard. North American Aerospace Defense Command scrambled fighter jets quickly and, according to New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg, first responders reacted speedily and precisely.

For all the differences, however, the incident raises security concerns about the 220,000 small planes in the USA and the 5,500 airports that serve them. While 9/11 prompted a crackdown on commercial flying, many of the vulnerabilities of small planes have never been addressed.

In most areas, flight plans are not required from pilots flying small aircraft in clear weather, so air traffic controllers have a limited ability to monitor them or determine in a timely way whether they're headed somewhere potentially dangerous.

And though Congress mandated that pilots' licenses have photo identification, regulations haven't caught up with the law. Terrorists could easily use a stolen license.

More to the point of Wednesday's crash, small planes fly dangerously close to skyscrapers housing millions of residents and workers in Manhattan and, under some circumstances, within seconds of Washington's most treasured landmarks.

Crashes into high-rises are quite rare, but they do happen, both accidentally and, in one memorable case, by design. In January 2002, a 15-year-old pilot in an unrecognized plane violated restricted airspace around the U.S. Central Command and intentionally slammed into a Tampa office building.

The public saw Wednesday that a small aircraft crashing into a high-rise causes far less damage than a jetliner. But should a terrorist get hold of a plane and fill it with explosives or a biological weapon, the public also saw how little there is to stop him from flying into such New York icons as the United Nations headquarters and the Statute of Liberty, both of which Lidle flew past.

The FBI warned last year that as security improves for commercial aircraft, terrorists may find small planes a tempting weapon.

If any good can come from the tragic and untimely death of the 34-year-old Lidle, perhaps it's heightened scrutiny of unaddressed threats from the air.

Small Planes Aren't Big Risk (USAT)

By Phil Boyer

USA Today, October 12, 2006

Crashes like this one are rare, and they're a poor excuse to limit flying.

Wednesday's accident was tragic and highly regrettable. And it certainly stung the nerves of post-9/11 New Yorkers. But the fact is: It was an accident. For USA TODAY to pose a series of unsubstantiated "what-if" questions and concerns regarding small aircraft, their safety and security is uninformed and ill-conceived. It's also highly irresponsible because it needlessly stokes already-heightened public concerns.

USA TODAY has not waited for the facts behind this tragedy; determining the cause (and any possible remedies) of an accident like this is a process that can take months. Instead, USA TODAY is exploiting this extraordinarily rare occurrence, using it as the barest thread of justification to bolster its long-standing and indefensible bias against small aircraft.

The facts show that thousands of the small planes that make up general aviation fly safely over and near U.S. cities every day, just as cars and trucks drive on our highways and streets. That's especially true around New York City. So we ask: Does a single auto accident generate questions about whether cars should be on our roadways? Of course not.

DOJ_NMG_0079645

For USA TODAY to question the need for increased ground security ignores the fact that general aviation pilots know their passengers and cargo. And it ignores the fact that the federal agencies responsible for our security — the Transportation Security Administration and the Federal Aviation Administration — have looked hard at general aviation and said it does not pose a threat. Mayor Michael Bloomberg himself indicated that this event says "nothing" about security to New York City.

This accident is a sad event compounded by the loss of life, and our profound sympathies go out to the affected families. Like many things, flying involves a small measure of risk, but general aviation pilots work continuously to minimize those risks.

Pilots are passionate about the many joys of flying. Our freedom of travel is one of the great liberties we all enjoy in the USA. Challenging that through USA TODAY's unfounded questions — not honest and informed inquiry — has neither merit nor benefit.

Phil Boyer is the president of the 408,000-member Aircraft Owners and Pilots Association, the world's largest aviation group.

Report: Few Cities Prepared For Evacuation Procedures (USAT)

By Mimi Hall

USA Today, October 12, 2006

WASHINGTON — Most of the nation's largest cities got flunking grades on a report card released today that measures how well each city can evacuate its population before or after a major disaster.

Ten urban areas received grades of "B" or "C," six got a "D," and 20 got an "F" in the report by the American Highway Users Alliance. Only Kansas City, Mo., got an "A."

Among those that failed the test: New York City, Los Angeles, Chicago, San Diego, Miami, Philadelphia, Denver, Atlanta and Boston.

"The potential for terrorist attacks and last year's New Orleans flood destruction underscore the necessity for providing sufficient evacuation capacity from the nation's urban areas," according to the alliance, a non-profit organization that promotes highway safety and construction to reduce congestion.

The report follows the release in June of a review by the Homeland Security Department that examines the ability of all 56 states and territories and 75 urban areas to respond to catastrophes. "Significant weaknesses in evacuation planning are an area of profound concern," that review concluded.

The alliance's report blames several factors for cities' poor grades, including the number of major highways out of a city and whether the city is partially hemmed in by water or mountains. Other factors included how well internal roads are laid out; how densely populated the city is; and the percentage of residents who have cars.

Kansas City scored high because it's not densely populated, there are no geographical barriers on any side of the city and it has a good intra-city road system, said Greg Cohen, president of the highway users alliance. New York City ranked low because it's so densely populated, congested and surrounded by water, and it has a higher percentage than most cities of residents who rely on public transportation.

In Atlanta, planning an evacuation is complicated by the fact that two major highways converge in the middle of the city, says Alfred Moore, director of the Atlanta-Fulton County Emergency Management Agency. He says the city has a plan on paper, but "have we exercised the plan yet? Nope. Have we trained on the plan? Nope."

Among the recommendations made by the alliance:

·Building new highways leading out of cities, where possible.

·Putting timed lights and gates on highway entrance ramps to limit congestion during evacuations and keep traffic flowing.

·Developing more ways to get information to drivers about alternate routes and traffic conditions.

·Creating government programs to increase car ownership among low-income people.

Justin DeMello, director of Denver's Office of Emergency Management, said evacuation planning is the most difficult part of any emergency-preparedness effort.

"There are just so many factors that come into play," he said. "And there are no easy solutions."

Strategizing On Disaster Relief (USAT)

By Mindy Fetterman

USA Today, October 12, 2006

WASHINGTON — Executives at Home Depot were watching the aftermath of the 9/11 terrorist attack in New York from the company's emergency command center in Atlanta — a room with banks of TVs and phone lines. They saw that rescue workers' boots were being sliced by the smoldering steel remains of the World Trade Center towers.

"We sent 40,000 pairs of work boots to New York right away," CEO Bob Nardelli says.

DOJ_NMG_0079646

He's not looking for praise. In fact, he thinks the way Home Depot — and other U.S. corporations — got information about what they could do to help in that disaster, and during Hurricane Katrina four years later, was ridiculous.

"We saw it on CNN!" he says, exasperated.

Now, nearly 30 CEOs have teamed in an unprecedented effort to set up an "emergency protocol" with the U.S. government and charities so that Corporate America can better respond to the next natural or manmade disaster.

"We're starting to put our actions where our words are," says Bill McDermott, CEO of SAP Americas, part of the world's largest business software company.

That protocol includes everything from a 24/7 direct phone link to the Department of Homeland Security and a website that will have "real time" news about what the government needs from business, to "swat teams" of employees from competing firms. Those teams will fly into a disaster site within 24 hours, assess needs and report back to the government and business community.

The group says it "won't wait for the government" when the next disaster hits.

"We're not saying it in an arrogant or condescending way," says Nardelli, who is chairman of the Business Roundtable's disaster-response task force. "But some of our frustration even before Katrina was having to wait for a coordinated effort from government. We want to set up that cooperative effort now."

CEO members of the task force, the largest ever put together by the Business Roundtable, met for the first time last month in Washington. Frances Townsend, President Bush's point woman on Homeland Security, was at the meeting.

Nardelli called it "an old-fashioned workout," where all parties get into a room, air complaints and come up with solutions. (Nardelli, who used to be a top executive at General Electric, learned the "workout" discipline from then-chief Jack Welch.)

"We're past the venting," Townsend laughs. "Now it's a question of how we can do better. I told them: 'Tell me what I can do better.' "

The CEOs told her. They want in on the early planning. They want in on information during a disaster. And they want in on the emergency operations on the ground.

Townsend agreed. She's holding a meeting in November at the White House with the CEOs, officials from DHS and the Federal Emergency Management Agency, and emergency operations chiefs from some state and local governments.

"The idea is that this works better if the private sector is involved in planning on the front end," Townsend says. "There's a lot we can learn from business."

The tsunami that hit Indonesia in December 2004, was "a watershed event" for Corporate America, says Johanna Schneider, spokeswoman for the Roundtable. "Companies were stepping up as never before."

When Hurricane Katrina hit, that volunteer spirit kicked in again, but with only limited success. "There was a huge outpouring of support," Schneider says. "But we were unable to get people connected down there (in the Gulf Coast) in a way that could really make a difference."

The CEOs want to harness that spirit and set up better logistics for getting people and supplies to disaster sites quickly.

"We want to make sure they get food and water, and not television sets," says McDermott of SAP. "How do you logistically get things to people who need them at the time they need them? Business can help do that."

DHS is identifying equipment and supplies it would need in various emergency scenarios — a hurricane, a tornado, a terrorist attack.

"In certain disasters, we'll know what we'll need, like water, tarps, housing. And we're communicating that to business" so that contracts can be bid on and awarded before the next disaster, Townsend says. FEMA has contracted with six companies for $1.5 billion in temporary housing to avoid delays such as those seen during Katrina, she says.

Government audits found hundreds of millions of dollars was wasted on no-bid contracts and fraud, from $300 million spent on 10,000 mobile homes that sat unused to $3 million for unused beds.

"There was legitimate concern after Katrina that the government's contracting was wasteful," Townsend says. "We think that if you precontract, you'll do it in a rational way."

In the next year, the CEO task force will assess what supplies and equipment are on hand at U.S. corporations, including companies that aren't members of the Roundtable. Who has the bottled water? Who has the satellite telephone equipment? The lumber and tarps? That way, the government can request and get supplies quickly.

During Hurricane Katrina, charities competed for donations. But companies that were giving millions of dollars felt it was unclear what a charity would handle: Emergency response? Rebuilding? Food and water? Housing?

CEOs saw "mission creep" as many charities were trying to do the same things. "There was a lot of carpetbagging going on" after Katrina, says Kevin Martinez, community affairs director for Home Depot, pointing to 400 new charities that were formed. "We're saying to charities: Don't work in a vacuum. Work with each other. What exactly are you fundraising for?"

Like governments, charities also were overwhelmed by Katrina.

DOJ_NMG_0079647

The American Red Cross was sharply criticized in a Government Accountability Office report for being unprepared and slow to react. Since then, the Red Cross has spent about $80 million to triple its warehouse space for emergency supplies, triple its satellite phone availability, and add more volunteers and computer capacity.

"Our mission has been the same for a long time: mass care early," says Jack McGuire, interim CEO of the Red Cross. "But there's a huge problem relative to what people think our mission is. People were upset because they didn't see our helicopters with the Coast Guard out there rescuing people off rooftops. We don't do rescues. We don't build houses. We don't give loans. We don't run hospitals."

The Red Cross and other charities are beginning to work together to coordinate volunteer response, although efforts are in the early stages, McGuire says.

Katrina taught everyone, he says, that "these things are going to work better if it's a system of the many rather than the few."

TSA Secrecy Rules Eased (WP)

The Washington Post, October 12, 2006

Congress has ordered the Department of Homeland Security to ease secrecy rules at the Transportation Security Administration, helping families of victims of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks who have sued to unearth security practices before then.

A $34.8 billion homeland security spending bill signed by President Bush last week requires the department to release "security sensitive information" that is more than three years old and is not part of existing plans or certain categories, barring "a rational reason" cited by Secretary Michael Chertoff that it should remain secret.

Congress ordered that SSI-designated evidence be released in civil cases with some restrictions if required by a judge, unless such access "presents a risk of harm to the nation."

In a statement, Michael Low of Batesville, Ark., thanked Congress on behalf of 9/11 Families United to Bankrupt Terrorism "for telling TSA not to misuse the term 'national security' as an excuse to hide documents that are of no use to would-be terrorists but instead contain information embarrassing to our government and the airlines." Low is the father of Sara Low, a flight attendant on American Airlines Flight 11.

About 50 survivors' suits targeting airlines and security firms are before the U.S. Southern District of New York, as is a broader case against terrorist financing.

The White House opposed the change, which it said would impose "an ongoing, burdensome review process."

Steven Aftergood, director of the Federation of American Scientists' project on government secrecy, called the legislation "surprising" and a "welcome gesture by Congress to push back against expanding secrecy."

SSI includes airport security plans, vulnerability assessments and technical specifications of screening equipment, but TSA's definition is open-ended. The program has been invoked to withhold information about bomb scares at airports and to drop cases against screeners charged with stealing from passengers, for example.

It has raised concerns that local law enforcement may not be able to issue reports about incidents at airports, or that passengers stopped by security officers may not learn why they were stopped.

Insurers Get An Earful From Senator (NYT)

By Joseph B. Treaster

The New York Times, October 12, 2006

Sometimes, political connections come in handy. Ask Senator Trent Lott of Mississippi.

Mr. Lott, a Republican and former majority leader, is one of thousands of homeowners on the Gulf Coast who have been fighting with their insurers over payments for damage in Hurricane Katrina. In an interview yesterday, he said he was angry about the insurers' "insensitivity and outright meanness" in rejecting many homeowners' claims.

He said he inserted a provision into legislation, signed by President Bush last week, directing the Department of Homeland Security to investigate potential fraud by the insurance industry. Mr. Lott said he was also drafting legislation to challenge the industry's exemptions from antitrust laws and had asked his staff to investigate the industry's tax rates.

"I am outraged," he said. "I'm concerned there are lots of abuses in the aftermath of the hurricane."

Mr. Lott's claim for the loss of his $400,000 house in Pascagoula was rejected by State Farm.

Industry executives and lawyers denied that the insurers had engaged in fraud and some questioned whether Mr. Lott was improperly using his position in Congress.

"Given that the senator has a personal dog in the fight, his actions have the appearance of an abuse of power," said Randy J. Maniloff, a lawyer in Philadelphia who represents insurance companies.

DOJ_NMG_0079648

Mr. Lott said he was not acting solely out of personal motivation. "I've had my own experience, but a lot of people have had similar experiences," Mr. Lott said. "They have abused my people, my friends, the people I love."

Robert P. Hartwig, the chief economist for the Insurance Information Institute, a trade group in New York, said: "It's unfortunate that the scarce resources of the Department of Homeland Security are being diverted toward an unjustified investigation."

The industry executives also asserted that Mr. Lott, as a senator, had a duty to be impartial. They said he should follow the example of several judges in Mississippi whose homes were damaged in Katrina and who have recused themselves from cases involving the storm.

"I don't profess to be impartial," Mr. Lott said.

Mr. Lott said he was also planning to introduce legislation requiring the insurers to include in their policies a prominent listing in plain English of what they refuse to cover. He said home insurance policies contained "a bunch of subterfuges" difficult for laymen or lawyers to comprehend. "Don't tell me they don't do it on purpose," Mr. Lott said.

Insurance is mainly regulated by the states. But the federal government has authority on antitrust and tax issues. The insurers have been exempted from some antitrust laws since the 1940's. These exemptions permit them to share industrywide information on claims costs and project future costs.

The insurers say working with a larger pool of data than any single company could develop enables them to offer lower prices. J. Robert Hunter, an insurance expert at the Consumer Federation of America, said that without the antitrust exemption, insurance prices would probably be lower.

Mr. Lott told The National Underwriter, an insurance industry publication, that he spoke directly to Edward B. Rust Jr., the chief executive of State Farm. "He said he would look into my situation," Mr. Lott was quoted in January as saying. "I told him I didn't want any special consideration. I wanted them to do what was right for everybody."

State Farm and other insurers promise to pay for wind damage in hurricanes but they say their policies do not pay for flood damage. Federal flood insurance pays up to $250,000 in damage to a home and up to $100,000 for furnishings and clothing.

Mr. Lott and several thousand other Mississippi homeowners are suing State Farm and other insurers, arguing that the winds of Katrina pushed floodwaters across the beaches and that the policies they bought that promise coverage against wind damage should be honored.

State Farm declined yesterday to discuss Mr. Lott's lawsuit. Insurers have paid $41 billion for damage to homes and businesses from Hurricane Katrina, $13.6 billion in Mississippi alone, resolving, they say, 95 percent of the state's 355,000 homeowner claims.

Mr. Lott said he bought flood insurance and received the maximum of $350,000 from the government. Industry executives say Mr. Lott clearly understood that flood insurance and private homeowners insurance provide separate coverage.

Mr. Lott's lawyer is Richard F. Scruggs, who made a fortune in litigation against tobacco companies. Mr. Scruggs, who is representing many Katrina victims, is Mr. Lott's brother-in-law and a neighbor in Pascagoula. Mr. Scruggs's home was heavily damaged. John Griffin Jones, a lawyer working with Mr. Scruggs on claims, said an insurer also denied Mr. Scruggs's claim.

In August, Judge L. T. Senter Jr. of Federal District Court in Gulfport ruled in the first trial over wind versus water damage that the insurers did not have to pay for flood damage. But he said language permitting them to refuse payment when damage results from a combination of wind and water was ambiguous.

Mr. Lott said he had sought the Homeland Security investigation because he believed that the insurers shifted the cost of many claims to the federal flood insurance program that they should have paid themselves.

Mr. Lott said he wanted Homeland Security to determine if the shifting of costs to the federal program "was just an occasional mistake or systematic."

"I think it was systematic," he said.

WAR NEWS:

Bush Open To Change In Tactics (LAT)

By Paul Richter And Doyle McManus

The Los Angeles Times, October 12, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush opened the door to possible changes in his approach to the Iraq war, declaring Wednesday that "we'll change tactics when we need to change tactics," amid pressure from Republicans about the unrelenting violence and the shortcomings of the government in Baghdad.

DOJ_NMG_0079649

Bush said at a White House news conference that the description of his policy as a stay-the-course stance was only "about a quarter right."

"My attitude is, don't do what you're doing if it's not working — change," he said.

Bush did not specify what changes he would be willing to consider, and he said he remained committed to involvement in Iraq until the country was stable and democratic. And he continued to characterize opposing views as "cut-and-run."

Yet the comments were seen as a signal of a partial openness to a new direction in Iraq, at a time when allies and adversaries have been demanding one.

A congressionally chartered study group co-chaired by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III, a longtime Bush family ally, signaled this week that it was prepared to recommend changes. Last week, Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman John W. Warner (R-Va.), a reliable White House ally, said that a shift will be needed in coming months if violence continues and the 4-month-old Iraqi government does not assert control.

Even the administration's ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad, has said that the new government has only a few months to prove that its approach to the country's problems is workable.

Some political analysts said Bush's comments were tailored for the upcoming midterm elections. The president wants to avoid appearing too tied to an inflexible course, they said, and also wants to give cover to vulnerable Republican candidates who are trying to distance themselves from the policy.

Yet they said the language might also hint that changes will come after the elections, as some in Washington have been predicting.

"He's trying to avoid being stuck with 'stay the course,' but at the same time opening the door a little bit for the inevitable pressure that's going to come, including from Republicans, for a reevaluation of the strategy," said Marshall Wittmann, a former aide to Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), now with the moderate Progressive Policy Institute. "He was clearly walking a rhetorical tightrope between his view that he has to stay the course and the political reality, which is demanding some reassessment."

Bush said he looked forward to the upcoming recommendations from Baker and his co-chairman, former U.S. Rep. Lee Hamilton, (D-Ind.), who once chaired the House's Foreign Affairs Committee.

Bush also said he "completely" agreed with Warner's comment that "if the plan is not now working, America needs to adjust."

"For those folks saying, you know, 'Make sure there's flexibility,' I couldn't agree more with you," Bush said.

Bush said he is open to suggestions for change from Army Gen. George W. Casey Jr., commander of U.S. forces in Iraq.

At the same time, Bush asserted that the government of Prime Minister Nouri Maliki was making progress in improving security, brokering political compromises among the country's ethnic and religious groups and strengthening the central government.

Speaking about internal strategy on condition of anonymity, one White House official said: "Are there things the administration is not trying? If an independent group like the Baker panel can come up with some good ideas, we're all for it."

There are signs that within some parts of the administration, officials are already reviewing options.

Marine Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, has asked several strategists to take a new look at the issue. These include Army Col. H.R. McMaster and Army Col. Pete Mansoor, who is director of the Army-Marine counterinsurgency school at Fort Leavenworth, Kan., according to a person close to the group who was not authorized to speak for it.

Senior State Department officials deny that there are plans in the works for a sudden change in direction in Iraq. But some officials have privately acknowledged their concern over the course of events, and have said officials are always weighing how they might improve their approach.

At a news conference with Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, Casey said the strategy in Iraq had been evolving. Casey cited his decision over the summer to scrap his plan to reduce the troop presence in Iraq and instead expand the number of American forces in Baghdad.

"We constantly review our strategy and review what's going on, and we adapt as we need to," he said.

"The broad strategy, where we are working to bring the levels of insurgency down as we bring Iraqi security forces up, I believe, is still a valid framework for what we're doing there in Iraq," Casey added.

"And we will continue to look tactically at what's happening on the ground, and my subordinate commanders will work to deal with that," he said.

At the same time, there were signs Wednesday that the military was at least preparing for the possibility of maintaining current troop levels for several years.

Army Chief of Staff Peter J. Schoomaker said the Army had drafted plans to keep its share of more than 140,000 troops in Iraq through 2010.

DOJ_NMG_0079650

Schoomaker said those plans were part of prudent preparations and not a sign that things were better or worse.

"I have to have enough ammo in the magazine that I can continue to shoot as long as they want us to shoot," Schoomaker said.

Baker, in comments on his committee's work, has indicated that the group will urge a departure from what he described as the White House's "stay the course" approach.

Baker said on ABC that the White House should enter direct talks with countries such as Iran and Syria — a view that is counter to one of the administration's most strongly held principles.

Warner last week said that Iraq as a policy issue was "drifting sideways." Another Republican senator, Olympia J. Snowe of Maine, endorsed that view Tuesday, citing worsening conditions in Iraq.

"There must be no question among the administration, the Congress and the Iraqi unity government that staying the course is neither an option nor a plan," Snowe said.

Bush Stands Firm On Policies (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 12, 2006

President Defends Strategies for Iraq, North Korea

Despite setbacks on North Korea and Iraq, President Bush vowed yesterday to stick with his policies on both crises, praising Chinese condemnation of North Korea's apparent nuclear test and citing progress in helping the fledgling Iraqi government stand on its own.

Even as he rejected calls to hold bilateral talks with Pyongyang, Bush said during a Rose Garden news conference that diplomacy is beginning to unite the world against North Korea's nuclear efforts. He called it hopeful that China is helping North Korea "understand it's not just the United States speaking to them," and he reassured South Korea and Japan that the United States "reserves all options" to protect its allies in the region against threats from the communist state.

At the same time, Bush addressed the recent doubts expressed by senior Republicans, including Sen. John W. Warner (Va.) and former secretary of state James A. Baker III, about the current U.S. course in Iraq -- which he described as more flexible than critics suggest.

"We're constantly changing tactics to achieve a strategic goal," the president said, adding that "stay the course" is only a partial description of his strategy in Iraq. "My attitude is, 'Don't do what you're doing if it's not working; change,' " said Bush, who met yesterday with the senior U.S. commander in Iraq to review the progress of the war. " 'Stay the course' also means don't leave before the job is done."

The hour-long news conference gave Bush an opportunity to try to regain some control over a dangerous political environment for Republicans just four weeks before midterm elections, in which the GOP majorities in both the House and the Senate face a stiff challenge from Democrats. Until recently, Bush seemed to be having some success in shoring up GOP lawmakers with an effort to make terrorism and the improving economy the centerpieces of the fall campaigns.

But that strategy has been thrown seriously awry by new revelations about the administration's troubled conduct of the Iraq war, and by a burgeoning scandal surrounding the House leadership's handling of allegations of sexual misconduct against Florida Republican Mark Foley, who has resigned. Meanwhile, this week's apparent underground nuclear test by North Korea exposed the White House to new questions about the success of its efforts to keep weapons of mass destruction from the world's most dangerous governments.

Bush received only one question about the Foley episode, which he used to restate his support for House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) and Hastert's handling of the matter. He expressed confidence that Republicans will keep control of both chambers despite the Foley scandal, saying that the public supports the GOP on what he termed the two big issues of the campaign -- security and the economy. And he took pointed shots at Democratic leaders for not supporting his tax cuts -- criticism that they said misrepresented their interest in cutting taxes for the middle class.

The White House also announced yesterday that the federal budget deficit dropped to $248 billion, a four-year low, which it attributed to tax cuts and other "pro-growth" economic policies. Democrats derided that explanation and said Bush's boast ignored the considerable debt that the federal government has acquired since he was inaugurated in 2001.

Most of the news conference, however, was devoted to North Korea and Iraq, and Bush enthusiastically defended his basic strategy in both crises, offering lengthy answers to most questions with a mixture of feistiness and contemplation.

Answering a question about the North Korean nuclear test, Bush explained his reluctance to engage in direct talks with Pyongyang by saying that the Clinton administration tried such an approach and it did not work. He said that North Korea violated a 1994 agreement in which Pyongyang promised to shut down its nuclear reactor and keep spent nuclear fuel under international supervision, and that the U.S. government promised certain benefits such as providing oil for energy production. Bush's account left out the U.S. government's own role in scuttling that agreement.

DOJ_NMG_0079651

"I learned a lesson from that, and decided that the best way to convince Kim Jong Il to change his mind on a nuclear weapons program is to have others send the same message," Bush said at the news conference. He said Pyongyang's defiance of international demands that it give up its nuclear program is a reflection on the North Korean leader, not on any failure by his administration.

"The inability to convince people to move forward speaks volumes about them," Bush said. "It ought to say to all the world that we're dealing with people that, maybe, don't want peace, which in my judgment . . . requires an international response."

The refusal to engage with Pyongyang directly has been condemned by lawmakers in both parties and by diplomats, including U.N. Secretary General Kofi Annan, who urged the United States yesterday to sit down with North Korea.

"From North Korea to Iraq, the American people have seen clearly what it means to 'stay the course' with the president's failed national security policies," House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) said yesterday. "The president's policies are not making the American people safer. Staying the course won't change that. It's time for a new direction."

On Iraq, Bush was asked about the recent comments of Warner, chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, who returned from a trip to Iraq last week warning that Iraq is drifting "sideways." Warner said major changes should be considered within a few months if the situation there does not improve.

Bush said he agrees with Warner "completely" that "if the plan isn't working, adjust." But he said the overall strategy in Iraq is sound, even as day-to-day tactics might change. Bush said the upsurge in attacks and casualties is happening because U.S. forces are more aggressively confronting the enemy in Baghdad and elsewhere. "We're on the move," he said. "We're taking action."

Bush said he does not find credible a new report in the Lancet, a British medical journal, which estimates that 655,000 more Iraqis have died since coalition forces arrived than would have died without the invasion. In a comment in the journal, the editors said the study was reviewed by four outside experts, all of whom recommended publication, with one noting the "powerful strength" of the research method. The findings, however, have a large margin of error. The low-end estimate of excess deaths (both civilian and military) is 393,000, while the high-end estimate is 943,000.

Bush disputed the study's numbers but did not supply his own. "I do know," he said, "that a lot of innocent people have died, and that troubles me, and it grieves me."

Staff writer David Brown contributed to this report.

For Bush, Many Questions On Iraq And North Korea (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, October 12, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 11 — President Bush said Wednesday that he would not use force against North Korea because “diplomacy hasn’t run its course,” but acknowledged that many Americans wonder why he invaded Iraq but has not taken military action to head off North Korea’s race for a bomb.

“I’m asked questions around the country, ‘Just go ahead and use the military,’ ” Mr. Bush said at a morning news conference in the Rose Garden, his first extended question-and-answer session with reporters in the days since North Korea announced it had detonated a nuclear device. “And my answer is that I believe the commander in chief must try all diplomatic measures before we commit our military.”

Then, without prompting, the president asked an obvious next question.

“I’ll ask myself a follow-up,” Mr. Bush said. “ ‘If that’s the case, why did you use military action in Iraq?’ And the reason why is because we tried the diplomacy.”

Mr. Bush’s unusual exchange with himself came during an hourlong news conference dominated by questions about North Korea and Iraq. Democrats have criticized him for rushing into a war with Iraq, which turned out not to have unconventional weapons, while not setting limits on North Korea, which declared this week that it had conducted its first nuclear test.

That the president himself raised and rejected this critique appears to reflect concern among Mr. Bush’s advisers that North Korea could be a political liability for Republicans, one that the president needed to confront directly with voters.

Mr. Bush’s stance was to reassert that the United States would not tolerate a nuclear-armed North Korea, but that the way to shut down its nuclear programs was through multilateral diplomacy, not one-on-one talks or military action.

Intelligence officials have not yet determined the exact size of the device that North Korea tested, or explained why it appeared to have been fairly small, less than a kiloton. Democrats and Republicans have been arguing over who was responsible for the buildup in the North. Madeleine K. Albright, a secretary of state for former President Bill Clinton, issued a statement on Wednesday defending his administration and striking back at Mr. Bush.

DOJ_NMG_0079652

"During the two terms of the Clinton administration, there were no nuclear weapons tests by North Korea, no new plutonium production, and no new nuclear weapons developed in Pyongyang," Ms. Albright's statement said. "Through our policy of constructive engagement, the world was safer. President Bush chose a different path, and the results are evident for all to see."

Despite the North's test, Mr. Bush insisted Wednesday that his diplomatic approach was the best course and that he would continue to seek support for sanctions from other nations. He resisted calls for direct negotiations with North Korea of the sort the Clinton administration had engaged in, saying "the strategy did not work."

"North Korea has been trying to acquire bombs and weapons for a long period of time," Mr. Bush said, "long before I came into office."

On Iraq, Mr. Bush seemed to push back against recent remarks by James A. Baker III, the former secretary of state who is the Republican chairman of a bipartisan panel reassessing Iraq strategy. On Sunday, Mr. Baker suggested that his panel's report would depart from Mr. Bush's repeated calls to "stay the course."

But Mr. Bush signaled that he would not be pressed into a premature withdrawal.

"Stay the course means keep doing what you're doing,' " he said. "My attitude is, don't do what you're doing if it's not working — change. Stay the course also means, don't leave before the job is done. We're going to get the job done in Iraq."

On North Korea, Mr. Bush was asked if he regretted his decision not to take action — military or otherwise — to destroy fuel supplies in 2003, when the North threw out international weapons inspectors, withdrew from the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty and said it would turn its spent nuclear fuel into weapons. At that time, the fuel was all briefly in one known location.

"I used that moment to continue my desire to convince others to become equity partners in the Korean issue," Mr. Bush said, referring to the so-called six-party talks aimed at persuading the North to give up its nuclear capacity. He added, "I obviously look at all options all the time, and I felt like the best way to solve this problem would be through a diplomacy effort."

Experts believe the nuclear buildup in the North dates back to the early 1990's, when the first President Bush was in office. Under an agreement Mr. Clinton struck in 1994, North Korea agreed to freeze its production of plutonium in return for energy aid. North Korea abided by the freeze, but starting around 1997, it took steps on a second, secret nuclear program.

In 2002, after South Korean and American intelligence agencies found conclusive evidence of that program, the Bush administration confronted the North with the evidence that it had cheated while Mr. Clinton was still in office. That led to the six-nation talks, involving the United States, North Korea, South Korea, Japan, China and Russia.

"The Clinton administration was prepared to accept an imperfect agreement in the interest of achieving limits," said Gary S. Samore, a North Korea expert who helped negotiate the original 1994 agreement. "The Bush administration is not prepared to accept an imperfect agreement, and the result is that we have no limits."

But Mr. Bush on Wednesday reiterated his stance that it was "unacceptable" for North Korea to have nuclear weapons. Asked if he was "ready to live with a nuclear North Korea," Mr. Bush gave a one-word answer: "No."

Bush Rejects Direct Talks With North Korea (USAT)

By David Jackson

USA Today, October 12, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush ruled out one-on-one talks with North Korea on Wednesday, saying the United States will work with regional allies to try and stop the communist dictatorship from developing nuclear weapons.

"The best way to convince Kim Jong Il to change his mind on a nuclear weapons program is to have others send the same message," Bush said in a Rose Garden news conference.

Speaking less than a month before elections — and with control of Congress at stake — Bush also defended his Iraq policy, endorsed House Speaker Dennis Hastert and said lower taxes would help preserve the GOP majorities in Congress.

Bush spoke as North Korea threatened more nuclear tests. The president said even though the United States is still working to verify the test North Korea disclosed Sunday, "this claim itself constitutes a threat to international peace and stability."

Bush blamed North Korean dictator Kim Jong Il's "intransigence." He said North Korea cheated on a 1994 agreement with the Clinton administration to forgo nuclear weapons development in exchange for economic help.

Bush repeatedly said he prefers concerted action with regional partners: China, Japan, Russia and South Korea. The United States and its allies, along with the United Nations Security Council, are discussing possible sanctions against North Korea.

Kim's government lashed back on Wednesday, saying North Korea would interpret sanctions as an act of war.

For his part, Bush stressed that it's too early to consider possible military action. "Diplomacy hasn't run its course," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0079653

Democrats such as Sen. Dick Durbin of Illinois blamed North Korea's reported nuclear test in part on Bush's decision to not negotiate directly with the country, as the Clinton administration did. Durbin also said the Bush administration was distracted from North Korea by the “pre-emptive” war in Iraq. “It is clear that the Bush approach has failed,” he said.

On other issues, Bush said:

·He is adjusting tactics to meet new challenges in Iraq, calling victory there essential to stability in the Middle East. “We can't tolerate a new terrorist state in the heart of the Middle East, with large oil reserves that could be used to fund its radical ambitions, or used to inflict economic damage on the West,” Bush said.

·He supports a pledge by Hastert, R-Ill., to get to the bottom of who knew what — and when — about former Republican representative Mark Foley's alleged inappropriate Internet communications with teenage congressional pages. Bush said Hastert has “done a fine job as speaker.” Hastert has said he will fire any staffer who did not tell the truth about what they knew about Foley. The House ethics committee is investigating whether members of the House or its staff did not respond appropriately when warned about Foley's actions.

·He doubts the Foley scandal will affect the Nov. 7 elections. Bush predicted the economy and national security “will be the issues that drive the election.” He also touted lower budget deficits and higher economic growth, which he said show his tax cuts work.

·He is committed to building 700 miles of fencing along the U.S.-Mexican border, as approved by Congress, focusing on urban areas. Bush also repeated his call for a “comprehensive” immigration bill that expands “guest worker” programs.

Bush Hits Democrats On N. Korea Talks (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, October 12, 2006

President Bush yesterday took aim at Democrats who demand he open direct talks with North Korea's reclusive leader Kim Jong-il, saying they are the same critics who charged he acted unilaterally when he invaded Iraq to oust Saddam Hussein.

"I can remember the time when it was said that the Bush administration goes it alone too often in the world, which I always thought was a bogus claim to begin with," the president said in a press conference at the White House Rose Garden.

But Mr. Bush said one-on-one talks with North Korea "didn't work in the past," and reiterated support for continued pressure from regional leaders to restart the stalled six-party talks, in which the United States, China, South Korea, Japan and Russia deal jointly with North Korea.

"I learned a lesson from that and decided that the best way to convince Kim Jong-il to change his mind on a nuclear weapons program is to have others send the same message," the president said.

He called on the U.N. Security Council to quickly hand down "serious repercussions" for North Korea's purported nuclear test on Monday.

While Mr. Bush said the United States has "no intention of attacking" the communist country and remains committed to diplomacy, he added that "all options to defend our friends in the region" remain on the table.

He again backed new ballistic missile defenses in the region to protect U.S. allies.

In an hour-long session with reporters, Mr. Bush also defended his strategy to secure Iraq, saying "we're constantly changing tactics."

In the face of criticism from leading Republican lawmakers -- including the chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, Sen. John W. Warner of Virginia, who said the situation in Iraq is moving "sideways" -- the president sought to put the best face on the war.

"I want you to notice what he did say is, if the plan is now not working -- the plan that's in place isn't working, America needs to adjust. I completely agree," he said.

"I believe that the situation in Iraq is, no question, tough on the American psyche. ... Look, the American people want to know, can we win -- that's what they want to know -- and do we have a plan to win? There are some who say, get out, it's not worth it. And those are some of the voices, by the way, in the Democrat Party."

The president's remarks came as the Army Chief of Staff Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker said he plans to keep the current level of soldiers in Iraq through 2010, a later date than Bush administration or Pentagon officials have mentioned thus far.

Without naming former President Bill Clinton, Mr. Bush harshly criticized the 1994 bilateral agreement that traded money and oil for a promise from North Korea to put its plutonium under lock and key.

"We all agree that there must be a strong Security Council resolution that will require North Korea to abide by its international commitments to dismantle its nuclear programs," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0079654

"This resolution should also specify a series of measures to prevent North Korea from exporting nuclear or missile technologies, and prevent financial transactions or asset transfers that would help North Korea develop its nuclear and missile capabilities."

Democrats repeated calls for a new direction on Iraq and North Korea, with Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean saying "the stakes are too high to have a permanent commitment to a failed strategy in Iraq."

"North Korea has increased its nuclear capabilities by 400 percent and tested a nuclear weapon because the Bush administration took its eye off the ball," he said.

"Iran has also become an even greater threat. And still, the president refuses to listen to the advice of his own party's leaders like Senator John Warner and [former] Secretary [James A.] Baker, who have spoken out on the need for a new direction in Iraq and acknowledged that we sometimes must talk with our adversaries."

Army Plans Same Troop Levels In Iraq Until 2010 (USAT)

By Tom Vanden Brook

USA Today, October 12, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Army plans to maintain its current level of 120,000 soldiers in Iraq through 2010, the Army's chief of staff said Wednesday.

Gen. Peter Schoomaker said the Army's plans could change if conditions warrant. The Army has maintained that level in part this year by extending deployments for some units.

“This is not a prediction that things are going poorly or better,” Schoomaker told reporters. “It's just that I have to have enough ammo in the magazine that I can continue to shoot as long as they want us to shoot.”

The Army will have to rely on the National Guard and Reserves to maintain the current level of deployments, Schoomaker said. When asked about concerns that Reserve units are struggling to get the training and equipment they need before going back to Iraq, Schoomaker said that no soldiers would be sent into war without needed resources.

Military analysts Wednesday said they doubted the Army could maintain its Iraq levels for that long.

Domestic politics and the strain on soldiers from repeated deployments will force a reduction in the number of troops in Iraq, said Loren Thompson, a military analyst at the Lexington Institute.

“It's very unlikely the Army will have the same number even a year from now,” Thompson said.

Andrew Bacevich, a military analyst at Boston University and a retired Army colonel, said the all-volunteer Army has held up well so far under the strain of multiple deployments. But he said he doubted that current levels could be maintained for another four years.

Bacevich speculated that Schoomaker's comments could be interpreted as a political statement. “This can easily be seen as evidence of growing dissatisfaction with the management of the war,” he said.

Last year Pentagon officials had hoped to be down to about 100,000 troops by the end of this year, but escalating violence and sectarian tensions have prompted military leaders to increase forces. Today, there are 141,000 servicemembers there — overwhelmingly Army.

In an interview, Lt. Gen. Thomas Metz, deputy commander and chief of staff of the U.S. Army Training and Doctrine Command, said training enough soldiers to meet the current level through 2010 would be challenging.

Gen. Richard Cody, the Army vice chief of staff, said in separate remarks to reporters that soldiers need more than 12 months between deployments to Iraq so they can do a full range of combat training and complete educational programs that enable the Army to grow a fully mature officer corps.

“We need to reset the sergeants and send them to schools, the lieutenants and captains and send them off, so that we don't erode and become an Army that only can fight a counterinsurgency,” Cody said. He said North Korea's reported nuclear test “reminds us all that we may not just be in a counterinsurgency fight, and we have to have full-spectrum capability.”

Pentagon To Maintain Troop Levels In Iraq (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopulo

Financial Times, October 12, 2006

The US army chief of staff on Wednesday said the Pentagon was planning for the possibility that it might have to keep current troop levels in Iraq until 2010.

General Peter Schoomaker said he was not predicting that the situation in Iraq would require maintaining current levels of about 140,000 troops for the entire period. But he said the army needed to plan for that possibility.

DOJ_NMG_0079655

"This is not a prediction that things are going poorly or better," Gen Schoomaker was cited as saying by [a news organization]. "It's just that I have to have enough ammo in the magazine that I can continue to shoot as long as they want us to shoot."

His comments come less than a month before the crucial midterm Congressional elections. The Republicans are in jeopardy of losing control of one, or both, houses of Congress, partly because of falling support for the war.

The US military and Iraqi force continue to struggle to stop the violence in Iraq and as its military death toll in the increasingly unpopular war continues to climb. Since the 2003 invasion, 2,749 troops have been killed in Iraq, and another 337 have died in Afghanistan, where violence has also escalated in recent months. The US has also suffered more than 20,000 non-fatal casualities, with more than 9,000 so serious that the soldier could not return to duty.

President George W. Bush on Wednesday acknowledged that attacks on US soldiers have increased recently, but argued that despite the violence Iraq will still making progress. His comments come less than a month before the November congressional elections, in which the Republicans are in danger of losing control of one, or both, houses of Congress.

Mr Bush did suggested that there would be some flexibility in US policy on Iraq, partly in response to recent comments by James Baker, the former secretary of state who is leading a bipartisan workgroup on Iraq, that there were other options between remaining for the long haul and cutting and running.

The Bush administration had hoped to reduce US troop numbers to about 100,000 by the end of 2006, partly in an attempt to convince the US public that the military was making progress in Iraq. But those plans have had to be shelved because of the growing level of sectarian violence in Iraq and particularly Baghdad. The Pentagon recently extended the tour of some soldiers in Iraq to deal with the increasing violence.

General John Abizaid, head of US Central Command, recently said he expected current US troop levels would be maintained until at least spring of next year. Gen Abizaid in July told Congress that Iraq could descend into full-scale civil war, and warned that curbing the violence in Baghdad was the key to avoiding such an outcome.

Speaking at the Pentagon on Wednesday, General George Casey, the top US commander in Iraq, said the situation in Iraq remained "difficult and complex" but said he did not agree with analysts who say Iraq is already mired in civil war. He added that Shia extremists, death squads and militias comprised the "greatest current threats" in Iraq.

Army: Troops To Stay In Iraq Until 2010 (AP-Y)

By Robert Burns

AP-Yahoo, October 12, 2006

For planning purposes, the Army is gearing up to keep current troop levels in Iraq for another four years, a new indication that conditions there are too unstable to foresee an end to the war.

Gen. Peter Schoomaker, the Army chief of staff, cautioned against reading too much into the planning, which is done far in advance to prepare the right mix of combat units for expected deployments. He noted that it is easier to scale back later if conditions allow, than to ramp up if they don't.

"This is not a prediction that things are going poorly or better," Schoomaker told reporters. "It's just that I have to have enough ammo in the magazine that I can continue to shoot as long as they want us to shoot."

Even so, his comments were the latest acknowledgment by Pentagon officials that a significant withdrawal of troops from Iraq is not likely in the immediate future. There are now 141,000 U.S. troops there.

At a Pentagon news conference, the top U.S. commander in Iraq, Gen. George Casey, said that as recently as July he had expected to be able to recommend a substantial reduction in U.S. forces by now. But that plan was dropped as sectarian violence in Baghdad escalated.

While arguing that progress is still being made toward unifying Iraq's fractured political rivalries and stabilizing the country, Casey also said the violence amounts to "a difficult situation that's likely to remain that way for some time."

He made no predictions of future U.S. troop reductions.

Appearing with Casey, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said he and other senior Pentagon officials are still studying how the military might keep up the current pace of Iraq deployments without overtaxing the Army and Marine Corps, which have borne the brunt of the conflict. Rumsfeld said one option is to make more use of the Air Force and Navy for work that normally is done by soldiers and Marines.

Sen. Jack Reed, D-R.I., a member of the Senate Armed Services Committee, said Wednesday that the advance planning Schoomaker described was an appropriate cautionary approach. However, he added, the Pentagon should increase the overall size of the military to reduce stress on troops repeatedly sent into combat.

DOJ_NMG_0079656

"I applaud the new realism but I think they also have to recognize that this (war) is going to put a huge stress on our forces," said Reed, a former Army Ranger. Reed and other Democrats have called on President Bush to start bringing home troops within a year to force the Iraqi government to take more responsibility for security.

At his news conference, Rumsfeld was asked whether he bears responsibility for what has gone wrong in Iraq or if the military commanders there are to blame.

"Of course I bear responsibility," he replied in apparent exasperation. "My Lord, I'm secretary of defense. Write it down."

In recent months the Army has shown signs of strain, as Pentagon officials have had to extend the Iraq deployments of two brigades to bolster security in Baghdad and allow units heading into the country to have at least one year at home before redeploying.

The Army is finding that the amount of time soldiers enjoy between Iraq tours has been shrinking this year. In the case of a brigade of the 3rd Infantry Division, its deployment to Iraq was delayed by about six weeks because it otherwise would have had only 11 months to prepare instead of the minimum 12 months. As a result, the unit it was going to replace has been forced to stay beyond its normal 12-month deployment.

In separate remarks to reporters, Gen. Richard Cody, the Army vice chief of staff, said soldiers need more than 12 months between deployments to Iraq so they can do a full range of combat training and complete the kinds of educational programs that enable the Army to grow a fully mature officer corps.

That kind of noncombat experience is necessary "so that we don't erode and become an Army that only can fight a counterinsurgency," Cody said. He added that North Korea's announced nuclear test "reminds us all that we may not just be in a counterinsurgency fight and we have to have full-spectrum capability."

Army Plans To Maintain Current Troop Levels In Iraq (MCT)

By Drew Brown

McClatchy Newspapers, October 12, 2006

WASHINGTON - The Army is making plans to keep its current troop levels in Iraq through 2010 if they're needed, the Army's chief of staff said Wednesday.

But Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker cautioned against putting too much emphasis on the Army's plans, saying that conditions in Iraq would dictate force levels. He said it would be easier to pull troops "off the table" or shorten their tours in Iraq rather than to add more forces later on.

"This is the way you'd expect us to operate," Schoomaker said, speaking to reporters. "This is not a prediction that things are going poorly or better; it's just that I have to have enough ammo in the magazine (so) that I can continue to shoot as long as they want us to shoot."

The general's remarks came as sectarian violence in Iraq between Sunni insurgents and Shiite militias showed no signs of relenting. U.S. casualties have risen sharply while domestic political support for the war continues to slide.

There are currently about 142,000 U.S. troops in Iraq, with the overwhelming majority from the Army. Schoomaker said Army troop rotation plans for 2008-2010 call for keeping the current level of 15 combat brigades in the country.

But the general said that in order to sustain current levels, the Army would have to continue to rely on the National Guard and the Army Reserve.

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld slammed the notion that Schoomaker's remarks meant U.S. troops would be in Iraq in 2010.

"Schoomaker did not, of course, say anything like that, and it's unfortunate that stories go out mischaracterizing what people say," he said at a Pentagon press conference.

The defense secretary said he didn't want to speculate how many troops might be required to sustain the current pace of deployments.

The Iraqi Ministry of Health said Wednesday that more than 2,660 Iraqi civilians were killed in Baghdad during September, about 400 more than in August. At least 41 U.S. troops in Iraq have lost their lives in October, one of the worst two-week stretches of American combat deaths in nearly two years.

The Iraqi government figures were released the same day a new study claimed that nearly 655,000 Iraqi civilians have died as a result of the U.S. invasion. The study, conducted by a team of Iraqi doctors in conjunction with public health experts from the Johns Hopkins School of Public Health in Baltimore, was published Wednesday in The Lancet, a British medical journal.

Deaths from violent causes, mostly from gunfire, totaled more than 601,000 from March 2003 to July 2006, the study found.

President Bush, speaking to reporters at the White House Rose Garden, dismissed the report as "not credible."

DOJ_NMG_0079657

Gen. George Casey, the top U.S. general in Iraq, told reporters at the Pentagon that an estimated 655,000 deaths in Iraq seemed "way, way beyond" any numbers that he had seen. The Iraqi government also rejected the findings.

"I have not seen a number higher than 50,000," Casey said during a press briefing with Rumsfeld. "And so I don't give that much credibility at all."

Asked if he needed more U.S. forces in Iraq, Casey said that he did not plan to ask for more troops and wasn't sure if more American troops would lessen the violence in Iraq over the long term.

"It's a tough nut - whether or not bringing in more troops, more U.S. troops will have a significant long-term impact on the violence," Casey said. "There's no question locally more troops will have some effect on the levels of violence, but whether more U.S. troops for a sustained period will get us where we're going faster is an open question."

Rumsfeld said determining sufficient force levels for Iraq wasn't an "easy calculation."

"There's no guidebook where you get up in the morning and look in the guidebook on Chapter 7, page 6 that tells you how to do this," Rumsfeld said, adding that many military officials were working on the problem. "It is getting enormous attention, and there is no road map."

Sen. John Warner, R-Va., chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, after returning from Iraq last week, said the situation there was "simply drifting sideways." Warner has generally been a strong supporter of Bush's policy in Iraq.

Here are some earlier quotes from high U.S. officials on the strength and duration of the U.S. troop commitment in Iraq.

President Bush, November 2005 - "As Iraqi forces gain experience and the political process advances, we will be able to decrease our troop level in Iraq without losing our capability to defeat the terrorists. ... Setting an artificial deadline to withdraw would vindicate the terrorist tactics of beheadings and suicide bombings and mass murder and invite new attacks on America."

Donald Rumsfeld, Secretary of Defense, August 2006 - "We can persevere in Iraq or we can withdraw prematurely, until they force us to make a stand nearer home. ... Decisions about conditions for a drawdown of our forces in Iraq are best based on the recommendations of the commanders in the field."

Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., June 2005 - "The worst thing we could do would be set a time or date of withdrawal of U.S. troops until the Iraqi military is able to take over those responsibilities of ensuring the security and safety of the Iraqi people as they transition to democracy."

Sen. Joseph Biden, D-Del., ranking Democrat on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, advocate of a phased redeployment of U.S. troops this year, withdrawing most of them by the end of the year 2007. "We would need to maintain, in my view, a small follow-on force to keep the neighbors honest, strike at concentrations of terrorists and train Iraqi security forces."

Gen. Erik Shinseki, former Army Chief of Staff, February 2003 - "Something on the order of several hundred thousand soldiers are probably, you know, a figure that would be required" to win in Iraq, rebuild it and keep the peace.

Kerry Defends Troop Withdrawal Proposal In Las Vegas (BOS)

The Boston Globe, October 12, 2006

LAS VEGAS --U.S. Sen. John Kerry on Wednesday called the Bush administration's Iraq policy a "stand-still-and-lose strategy," and defended his proposal to set a deadline for troop withdrawal.

"Every time President Bush tells the Iraqis we will 'stay as long as it takes,' he is giving squabbling politicians there an excuse to take as long as they want," the Massachusetts senator said in a statement released while campaigning for Nevada candidates. "At each step along the way, the Iraqi leaders have responded only to deadlines."

Kerry was responding to comments Bush made earlier in the day in which the president described the senator's deadline proposal as a "cut and run" approach.

Bush said at a White House news conference, "when you pull out before the job is done, that's cut and run, as far as I'm concerned. And that's cut and run as far as most Americans are concerned."

Kerry and Sen. Russ Feingold, D-Wis., have proposed a July 2007 date for withdrawal of troops from Baghdad.

"We must refocus our military efforts from the failed occupation of Iraq to what we should have been doing all along: tracking down and killing members of al Qaida," Kerry said in a statement.

Sacrifice Of The Few (NYT)

By Bob Herbert

The New York Times, October 12, 2006

Clarksville, Tenn.

Sgt. Mike Krause remembers the time, not too long ago, when he came home on a brief leave from Iraq. He was walking through an airport, in uniform, and other passengers, spotting him, began to applaud.

DOJ_NMG_0079658

"It was awesome," he said. "They were cheering and clapping. It was great. But you know what? I said to myself, 'That guy's flying to Toledo on a business trip. This lady over here is flying off on vacation. Their lives are normal. But soon I'll be getting on a plane to go back to the most abnormal place on earth.' "

Just how abnormal is made explicit when the sergeant, just 24 years old, describes the worst task he had to perform in Iraq. He spoke hesitantly. "You'll excuse me," he said. "This is not easy to talk about. Part of our job, our duty, was that we loaded, you know, bodies. We were in charge of the airfield, and we would load these heroes into the aircraft.

"My platoon sergeant had a policy. He didn't want lower-ranking soldiers involved. He told us, 'I don't want privates doing this. You guys are going to carry this with you, whether you realize it or not, for the rest of your lives. If I can protect the privates, I will.'

"I don't know if I could ever explain what that was really like. I loaded those guys — and I know all their names — onto a plane. And you don't know how heavy a guy in a body bag can be. It's not just his weight. He may be 180 pounds, but it's a lot more than just a 180-pound guy. You're loading his entire life."

Sergeant Krause, who served with the Army's 101st Airborne Division, lives in a quiet middle-class subdivision not far from Fort Campbell, which is on the Tennessee-Kentucky border. Sprawled in his living room in jeans and a polo shirt, he seems happy. He's safely home after serving three nerve-racking combat tours — one in Afghanistan and two yearlong tours in Iraq. He's engaged to be married and will receive a degree soon from nearby Austin Peay State University. His commitment to the military, which he made while still in high school in Huntsville, Ala., will end in a few months.

But there is a definite edge in his voice, an undercurrent of bitterness, when he talks about the tiny percentage of the American population that is shouldering the burden of the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. "We're nowhere close to sharing the sacrifice," he said. "And it should be shared, because it's only in that sharing that society will truly care about what's going on over there.

"Right now it's such a small minority of families who have a stake in all of this. I hear people say things like, 'We lost a lot of good people over there.' I sort of snap around and say, 'We? You didn't lose anybody.' You know what I mean?"

While most Americans are free to go about their daily business, unaffected by the wars in any way, scores of thousands of troops have been sent off on repeat tours into the combat zones. According to the support group Iraq and Afghanistan Veterans of America, two-thirds of the 92,000 Army troops deployed since the beginning of this year are on at least their second deployment.

Many soldiers, like Sergeant Krause, have served three or four tours. There is no way for a nation as big and as rich and as healthy as the U.S. to justify the imposition of such a tragic and heavy load on the backs of so few.

Sergeant Krause showed me a photo of a soldier who he thought would become his brother-in-law, a 23-year-old West Point graduate named Dennis Zilinski. He was killed last November, along with four other American soldiers in a roadside bomb attack near Bayji, Iraq.

Sergeant Krause said that witnessing the profound grief of Lt. Zilinski's mother and fiancée "drove home" the real meaning of wartime sacrifice.

Sergeant Krause is proud of his service and still loves the military. "But we're a nation at war," he said, "and we should all be in this together."

He said that if he could wave a magic wand, he would make some form of public service compulsory. "You wouldn't have to join the military," he said. "But there are many other ways to serve. You could work for AmeriCorps, or the Red Cross, or Homeland Security. You could do something. It's about social responsibility. Especially in a time of war."

Top U.S. Officer In Iraq Sees Spike In Violence (NYT)

By David S. Cloud

The New York Times, October 12, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 11 — The senior American commander in Iraq said Wednesday that violence in Baghdad had reached its highest levels in recent weeks, despite the assignment of thousands more American and Iraqi troops to the capital in August.

The comments, by Gen. George W. Casey Jr. at a Pentagon briefing with reporters, came as President Bush, at a Rose Garden news conference, said he was open to modifying strategy in Iraq if military commanders determined that a new approach was required.

Mr. Bush met with General Casey earlier in the day.

General Casey suggested at the briefing that broad changes were not necessary, though he added, "We constantly review our strategy."

DOJ_NMG_0079659

Mr. Bush was responding to questions about comments from, among others, Senator John W. Warner, Republican of Virginia and chairman of the Armed Services Committee, and James A. Baker III, a former secretary of state and co-chairman of a bipartisan panel reviewing Iraq policy, both of whom have said some new approach may be needed.

"Stay the course means keep doing what you're doing," Mr. Bush said. "My attitude is, don't do what you're doing if it's not working — change. Stay the course also means, don't leave before the job is done. We're going to get the job done in Iraq."

General Casey said that the redeployment of troops to Baghdad in August had initially reduced the number of killings and bombings but that attacks had gone back up recently.

"The levels of violence over the last few weeks are as high as they have been," he said.

"It's going to go back down," he added, but "it's not going to be something that we're going to get done quickly."

Even so, he added, the broad American strategy of trying to contain violence while training Iraqi troops to step in "is still a valid framework."

He called it an "open question" whether more troops were needed, but said that for now, he was not requesting that.

The surge in violence in Baghdad led General Casey to abandon plans over the summer to reduce forces substantially by the end of the year — an example, he said, of his willingness to shift strategy if required.

There are about 141,000 American soldiers in Iraq, more than at any time since January.

The Army is planning for the possibility that it may have to keep that number of troops in Iraq for four more years, Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker, the Army chief of staff, said Wednesday at a roundtable session with reporters.

"This is not a prediction that things are going poorly or better," he said. "It's just that I have to have enough ammo in the magazine that I can continue to shoot as long as they want us to continue to shoot."

General Schoomaker noted that while current Pentagon strategy called for the Army to be able to deploy 19 combat brigades at any one time, it was currently providing the equivalent of 23 brigades around the world, including 15 in Iraq. To keep at the current pace of deployment in coming years, he said, the Army would need "assured access" to the National Guard, large segments of which have been mobilized.

Some military experts said it might be necessary for President Bush to mobilize units that have already gone to Iraq and Afghanistan, or to loosen restrictions that prevent Guard units from being mobilized more than 24 months in a row.

But Mr. Bush is unlikely to take such steps before Congressional elections next month.

Appearing with General Casey on Wednesday, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld acknowledged that he was examining ways of maintaining the current pace of deployments in Iraq.

"The options we have are numerous," he said, "and what we have to do is decide, if we are asked to do something."

President Bush and General Casey both took issue with a study released Wednesday by American and Iraqi public health researchers who estimated that 600,000 civilians had died in violence since the American-led invasion in 2003. The estimate was extrapolated from a survey of Iraqi households.

"I don't consider it a credible report, neither does General Casey and neither do Iraqi officials," Mr. Bush said.

General Casey said the estimate "seems way, way beyond any number that I have seen."

"I've not seen a number higher than 50,000," the general said, "and so I don't give it that much credibility at all."

'Tough' Time In Iraq To Continue, Casey Says (WP)

By Josh White And Thomas E. Ricks, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, October 12, 2006

Violence in the Baghdad region has peaked with a flare-up of sectarian attacks in the past few weeks, leaving U.S. commanders and the Iraqi government "not comfortable" with the current situation there, Gen. George W. Casey, the top U.S. general in Iraq, said yesterday.

Casey, in Washington for regular meetings with top U.S. officials, said at a Pentagon news conference that Iraq is a "tough situation" and that he expects it to continue to be difficult through Ramadan and in coming months, as Sunni and Shiite extremists vie for control of that nation's capital.

"I think it's no surprise to anyone that the situation in Iraq remains difficult and complex," Casey said.

The general tempered his assessment of the Baghdad area by saying that progress exists in Iraq alongside the attention-grabbing violence. Much of the country is relatively peaceful, Casey said, and U.S. goals for the development of Iraqi security forces are on track.

He said the current approach of bringing the level of the insurgency down as Iraqi forces stand up is still "a valid framework for what we're doing in Iraq," and he was dismissive of a wholesale strategic change, as some members of Congress have recently suggested.

DOJ_NMG_0079660

Casey said there are no plans to boost the number of U.S. troops in Iraq in the near term, but he said that if he needs more, he'll ask.

"It's a tough nut: Whether or not bringing in more troops . . . will have a significant long-term impact on the violence," Casey said. "There's no question [that] locally, more troops will have some affect on the levels of violence, but whether more U.S. troops for a sustained period will get us where we're going faster is an open question."

Earlier, Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker, the Army's chief of staff, told reporters at the Pentagon that he plans to be able to provide enough troops to maintain the current level in Iraq through 2010. There are about 140,000 U.S. soldiers there.

"I don't think you should read too much into this," he said, cautioning that "this is not a prediction," but rather an attempt to be prepared for any contingency. The Army provides troops to field commanders, who determine their troop requirements in consultation with the defense secretary and the White House.

Casey and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld met with President Bush yesterday. Casey said he believes the ongoing wave of violence in Baghdad is intensified by the holiday period and the inability of the newly created Iraqi government to handle such a volatile situation. Casey said that although he believes there has been progress on the security front, "this is going to be a long-term process."

Rumsfeld declined to speculate on plans for troop levels or how the U.S. military services might supply troops for a lengthy stay in Iraq, saying that he is evaluating a series of briefings on the matter.

"We're looking around corners, up ahead, and asking ourselves how we would do things," Rumsfeld said.

In his meeting with reporters, Schoomaker, the Army chief, also elaborated on comments made Tuesday at an Army convention that public support for the military is "tepid."

The U.S. public respects the military, he said, but lacks an understanding of how dangerous the world has become and so isn't funding the military adequately, he said. "This is about what's good for America in the strategic environment we're in. . . . I think this is America's choice."

He also insisted that while he strongly desires a sharp increase in spending on the Army, he hasn't threatened to quit over the issue, as has been rumored. "I've never discussed early departure with anybody," he said. "It's not useful to walk around here threatening anybody."

Schoomaker is expected to retire in the next 12 months. Pentagon insiders expect Casey to succeed him.

‘All-time High' In Baghdad Violence (USAT)

By Rick Jervis

USA Today, October 12, 2006

BAGHDAD — The number of sectarian killings each month in Baghdad has more than tripled since February, and the violence has not slowed despite a major offensive in the capital.

Death squads killed 1,450 people in September, up from 450 in February, according to U.S. military statistics. In the first 10 days of October, death squads have killed about 770 Iraqis.

The increase in death squad killings reflects the level of religious warfare that is now the largest threat to security in Iraq.

Lt. Col. Christopher Garver, a military spokesman, acknowledged violence in Baghdad is at an “all-time high” and said U.S. commanders, in coordination with their Iraqi counterparts, are continuing to adjust the security plan to try to reduce the violence. “We've been working to keep it peaceful, and we've been frustrated that the extremists keep perpetuating the number of attacks,” Garver said.

U.S. forces are also caught in the violence. At least 37 American troops have been killed in combat this month, about half of them in or around Baghdad, where Iraqi and U.S. forces are attempting to loosen the grip of armed militias. The weekly average of U.S. deaths since President Bush declared the end of major combat operations in May 2003 has been about 14.

Sectarian violence grew after the February bombing of a sacred Shiite mosque in Samarra. Gen. George Casey, the top-ranking U.S. officer in Iraq, said the conflict was changing from an insurgency against U.S. forces to a struggle among Iraqis.

The civil unrest has placed U.S. troops in a difficult position. In a seven-day period last week, troops from the Army's 1st Battalion, 23rd Infantry Regiment in northwest Baghdad investigated 40 sectarian killings and collected 57 bodies, many of them mutilated or bearing signs of torture, said Sgt. Jeff Nelson, an intelligence analyst with the unit. “We're finding bodies everywhere out here,” he said. The troops haven't caught any suspects in the deaths, Nelson said.

The U.S. military this summer established an extrajudicial killings task force to share evidence and leads with Iraqi investigators.

The violence, which has pitted Sunni and Shiite Muslims against each other and spawned neighborhood gangs, has escalated despite the presence of more than 60,000 U.S. and Iraqi forces in the capital.

DOJ_NMG_0079661

In the worst months this year, sectarian killings averaged about 47 a day, according to the military statistics. So far this month, sectarian assassinations have claimed an average of 77 lives a day. The monthly numbers were rounded before being released and include assassinations and revenge killings but not victims of car bombs or suicide bomb attacks.

In Washington, Bush said, "The violence is being caused by a combination of terrorists, elements of former regime criminals and sectarian militias."

Bush also dismissed a study released this week that indicated that more than 600,000 Iraqi civilians have died in all types of violence since 2003. "I don't consider it a credible report," he said.

2,660 Iraq Civilians Killed In September (AP)

By Qassim Abdul-Zahra And Lee Keath, Associated Press Writers

AP, October 12, 2006

More than 2,660 Iraqi civilians were killed in Baghdad in September, according to new Health Ministry figures — 400 more than the month before despite an intensified U.S.-Iraqi sweep aimed at reining in violence.

The numbers indicate how tough the vital battle to secure Baghdad has proven amid a wave of bloodshed this year, not only from Sunni Arab insurgents but also from Shiite and Sunni death squads who kidnap and kill members of the opposing sect.

So far, October has brought no relief. A U.S. soldier died Wednesday from a roadside bomb while patrolling in Baghdad. That brought to 40 the number of Americans killed across Iraq the past 11 days — a pace not seen since the U.S. attack on the insurgent stronghold of Fallujah in November 2004.

Three car bombs in different parts of Baghdad and attacks elsewhere in the country killed at least 14 Iraqis on Wednesday. Bodies of 11 suspected victims of sectarian slayings were found around the southern city of Kut, while police in the northern city of Mosul discovered the beheaded corpse of a priest.

No cumulative figures for Iraqi deaths in October have been released. But several times this month, police have reported finding 50 to 60 bodies dumped around Baghdad over a 24-hour period, suggesting the bloodshed has not waned.

The Health Ministry figures emerged as a controversial new study claimed the Iraqi death toll in the war since the U.S.-led invasion in March 2003 is vastly higher than believed. The study, to be published Thursday by the British medical journal The Lancet, said more than 600,000 had been killed, more than 10 times most estimates.

President Bush dismissed the number as "not credible," and the Iraqi government called it "inflated" and "far from reality."

The wave of killings in Iraq this year has prompted U.S. officials to warn of a change in American policy unless Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's government shows within a few months that it can rein in militias blamed for sectarian violence.

Since Aug. 7, thousands of U.S. and Iraqi soldiers have been pursuing Operation Together Forward in Baghdad, moving from district to district and searching building by building to clear out weapons and hunt down militiamen and insurgents. They have seized more than 1,700 weapons and arrested more than 120 people. They have also staged raids on prominent militia figures.

But the numbers from the Iraqi Health Ministry suggested that by the end of September, the sweep had yet to slow the bloodshed.

A total of 2,667 civilians in Baghdad died violent deaths during September, two senior Health Ministry officials told The Associated Press this week, based on an official monthly report from the ministry to the Cabinet.

By comparison, 2,222 people died violently in August in Baghdad, according to a U.N. report published in September, which was also based on official statistics from the Health Ministry.

The two ministry officials said the U.N. number was accurate. They spoke on condition of anonymity because the government has issued orders that the death figures not be released.

The monthly figures include two categories: the number of bodies taken in at the city morgue to determine the cause of death and the number of violent deaths reported by hospitals.

Hospitals reported 1,196 fatalities from explosions, shootings and other attacks in September, and the morgue listed 1,471 people who died from violence.

Shiite and Sunni death squads are known to kidnap their victims, then dump their bodies — often bound and tortured. So many of the morgue's bodies were likely from sectarian killings, though they also would include victims of criminal kidnappings and murders.

Sectarian violence was sparked by the February bombing of a Shiite shrine in Samarra, north of Baghdad. Shiites, a chief target in three years of Sunni insurgent attacks, responded with attacks on Sunnis, starting a cycle of reprisal killings.

The deadliest month was July, when 3,590 people were killed across the country, according to the U.N. The number killed countrywide fell in August to 3,009, which the U.N. said could be attributable to Operation Together Forward.

DOJ_NMG_0079662

U.S. troops have taken a heavy blow in the growing violence. In September, 71 Americans were killed — 28 in Baghdad — the second deadliest month this year after April, when 76 died. The number of U.S. wounded in September was 776, the highest since the Fallujah siege.

On Tuesday, militiamen struck back at U.S. troops, firing four mortar rounds at a base in southern Baghdad, hitting an ammunition dump. The resulting fire set off tank and artillery shells that exploded throughout the night, though there were no injuries.

The Islamic Army in Iraq, a Sunni insurgent group, claimed responsibility for the attack in a statement posted on the Internet.

"With the help of God, the mortar and rocket squads of the Islamic Army have shelled a U.S. Army base with two rockets and three mortar shells," said the statement posted on a Web site known to be used by insurgents.

The same Web site aired a 4-minute video later Wednesday showing huge balls of flames stretching into the sky, and a cloud of gray smoke billowing from the site. The sound of explosions is faintly audible on the video, and the tape appeared to be shot from a distance of at least several hundred meters. The footage was stamped with the emblem of the Islamic Army in Iraq. The authenticity of the statement and video could not be verified.

Iraq's Shiite-led parliament on Wednesday pushed through a law allowing the formation of federal regions despite Sunni Arab objections that will splinter the country and fuel sectarian violence.

Many in Iraq's Shiite majority want to form an autonomous region in their heartland of southern Iraq, mirroring the Kurdish self-rule area already in place in the north. Shiites defend a decentralized federal system as the only way to ensure Iraq's communities can live together in peace.

The constitution, passed in a referendum last year over overwhelming opposition from the Sunni Arab minority, enshrines federalism.

Sunnis, however, fear the new law will create sectarian mini-states, giving Shiites and Kurds control of the oil wealth of the south and north and leaving Sunnis in an impoverished central zone.

Critics also warn that moves toward federalism could push Sunnis to more violence in trying to stop it.

The new law says autonomous regions cannot be formed for another 18 months, a concession to Sunnis. But the Sunni Arab coalition and two Shiite parties that also oppose the measure tried to prevent a vote by boycotting the session in an unsuccessful effort to keep the 275-seat body from reaching the necessary 50 percent quorum.

"This is the beginning of the plan to divide Iraq," said Adnan al-Dulaimi, leader of the Sunni National Accordance Front. "We had hoped that the problems of sectarian violence be resolved. We hope there won't be an increase in violence."

Insurgents Cause Ammo Explosions (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi

The Los Angeles Times, October 12, 2006

BAGHDAD — Insurgents fired a mortar round at a U.S. military base that struck an ammunition supply depot, sparking a series of explosions that shook much of the capital Tuesday night and a massive fire that continued to smolder into the morning, the U.S. military said today.

Meanwhile shootings, bombings and rockets left at least 20 Iraqis dead and 46 injured today around the country. According to a controversial public health study published in the medical journal Lancet this week, more than 600,000 Iraqis have died violently since the 2003 U.S.-led invasion, more than 10 times the number obtained by canvassing Iraqi hospitals, morgues and government offices for death statistics.

Deposed Iraqi President Saddam Hussein and other defendants today returned to a special Baghdad courtroom to hear witness testimony, in which the former Iraqi regime is accused of orchestrating the mass murder of tens of thousands of Iraqi Kurds during the late 1980s campaign dubbed Anfal.

Tuesday night's earth-shaking explosions, which caused no casualties, sent shock waves across southern and central Baghdad shortly after 11 p.m. Fireballs and plumes of smoke could be seen rising hundreds of feet into the night sky from the area in southwestern Baghdad where Camp Falcon is located.

Arab-language television reported that the Islamic Army in Iraq, a Sunni Arab insurgent group, claimed responsibility for the attack, which ignited a tank, artillery and small-arms ammunition at the base.

"Intelligence indicates that civilians aligned with a militia organization were responsible for last night's mortar attack," Lt. Col Jonathan Withington, a U.S. military spokesman, said in a news release.

U.S., British and Iraqi military bases frequently draw of mortar and rocket fire that rarely inflict casualties, but frays nerves and diverts resources from peacekeeping and combat operations.

DOJ_NMG_0079663

Multiple rockets and mortars struck near a British military base and a police station in the southern city of Basra on Tuesday. The same day, insurgents launched mortar and rocket attacks on three Iraqi army bases in the northern city of Kirkuk and another base in the southern city of Kut.

Tuesday night's attack south of Baghdad put the base on full alert, with helicopters and unmanned aerial drones launched to locate the mortar position. Firefighters and waste disposal experts continued to douse the fire today.

The ongoing trial of Hussein, disrupted Tuesday when the judge ejected Hussein and the six other defendants from the courtroom, resumed quietly today.

Judge Mohammed Orabi Khalefa opened the trial cordially, asking defendants to behave respectfully toward the alleged victims testifying in the trial.

Hussein politely protested the judge's decisions to cut off the broadcast of the trial sound at certain junctures and force him to stand up when he addresses the court.

"When the defendants speak you switch off the broadcast," he told the judge. "Is that fair?"

Uribe held firm.

"The microphone is for any legal argument but getting into political issues, this is not allowed," he said.

One of the complainants, who told the courtroom of how his village was destroyed and three of his siblings disappeared during the Anfal campaign, produced a document he said that showed 18 women, including 14 of his cousins, were sold to Egyptian nightclubs by Hussein's intelligence services.

But defendants strenuously objected. He apparently got the information from a Kurdish newspaper. The complainant, 50-year-old Abdul Khader Aziz, refused to answer when asked about his service in the Kurdish peshmerga militia and membership in the Communist Party.

Iraq Death Toll Study Has Mixed Reaction (AP)

By Malcolm Ritter

AP, October 12, 2006

President Bush says he doesn't believe it. Some experts have a problem with it. But several others say it seems sound. Such was the varied reception for a controversial new study that estimated the Iraq war has led to the deaths of nearly 655,000 Iraqis as of July.

Researchers from Johns Hopkins University in Baltimore and the Al Mustansiriya University in Baghdad derived that estimate from a door-to-door survey, conducted by doctors, of 1,849 households in Iraq. Taking the number of deaths reported by household residents, they extrapolated to a nationwide figure.

The researchers, reflecting the inherent uncertainties in such extrapolations, said they were 95 percent certain that the real number lay somewhere between 392,979 and 942,636 deaths.

Even the smaller figure is almost eight times the estimate some others have derived.

The new study — which attributes roughly 600,000 of the deaths directly to violence and 55,000 more to other war-related causes — was released Wednesday on the Web site of The Lancet, a respected medical journal. But just how good is its conclusions?

"I don't consider it a credible report," President Bush said Wednesday.

Neither does Gen. George W. Casey, the top American military commander in Iraq.

"That 650,000 number seems way, way beyond any number that I have seen," Casey said. "I've not seen a number higher than 50,000. And so I don't give it that much credibility at all."

And neither does Michael E. O'Hanlon of the Brookings Institution, which also tracks Iraqi deaths.

"I do not believe the new numbers. I think they're way off," he said.

Other research methods on the ground, like body counts, forensic analysis and taking eyewitness reports, have produced numbers only about one-tenth as high, he said. "I have a hard time seeing how all the direct evidence could be that far off ... therefore I think the survey data is probably what's wrong."

However, several biostatisticians and survey experts were supportive of the work.

"Given the conditions (in Iraq), it's actually quite a remarkable effort," said Steve Heeringa, director of the statistical design group at the Institute for Social Research at the University of Michigan.

"I can't imagine them doing much more in a much more rigorous fashion."

He said the study made "minor departures" from the standards generally used in national surveys for choosing what households to interview. Whether those departures, brought on by wartime conditions in Iraq, introduced a bias in the results is impossible to measure from the data alone, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0079664

Frank Harrell Jr., chair of the biostatistics department at Vanderbilt University, called the study design solid and said it included "rigorous, well-justified analysis of the data."

And Richard Brennan, head of health programs at the New York-Based International Rescue Committee, said the study's survey approach was typical.

"This is the most practical and appropriate methodology for sampling that we have in humanitarian conflict zones," said Brennan, whose group has conducted similar projects in Kosovo, Uganda and Congo.

"While the results of this survey may startle people, it's hard to argue with the methodology at this point."

Donald Berry, chairman of the statistics department at the University of Texas' M.D. Anderson Cancer Center in Houston, said he believes the study was done "in a reasonable way." But he said the range of uncertainty given for the estimates was much too narrow, because of potential statistical biases in the survey.

While it's impossible to calculate a better range that accounts for that, he said, it wouldn't be surprising if the low end dropped about four-fold to 100,000 deaths. A wider range of uncertainty would make the 655,000 figure less meaningful, he said.

Meanwhile, one of the study's authors said he's confident in the work's conclusions.

If the estimate seems high, it's because the door-to-door survey turned up deaths that are typically overlooked when sought by other means in wartime situations, said Les Roberts, who was with Johns Hopkins when he co-authored the study but has just taken a post at Columbia University.

As for extrapolating a nationwide figure from the sample of the few hundred deaths actually reported, "almost every statistic you've ever heard about health in America comes from a sample," Roberts said. "It may not be extremely precise, but at least it gets us in the right ballpark."

Iraq Disputes Claim Of 600,000 War Dead (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi

The Los Angeles Times, October 12, 2006

BAGHDAD — The Iraqi government on Wednesday condemned as "exaggerated" a controversial public health study concluding that more than 600,000 Iraqis have died violently since the toppling of Saddam Hussein's regime in 2003.

The statement came as shootings, bombings and rockets left at least 25 Iraqis dead and 46 injured around the country. The bodies of 40 people slain execution-style also were found in the capital, part of the surge in sectarian and insurgent strife that is killing an average of 100 a day, according to the United Nations.

A U.S. soldier also died early Wednesday from wounds suffered when his vehicle was hit in a roadside bombing.

The violence has undermined trust in the Shiite Muslim-led government, which was elected in December with a mandate to restore security. Though deaths of civilians have mounted, government spokesman Ali Dabbagh condemned as inaccurate the findings of U.S. and Iraqi public health researchers that were published this week in the medical journal Lancet.

"We affirm that these numbers are far from the truth and the Iraqi government is making efforts to protect the Iraqi citizen from forces of terror," Dabbagh said in a release.

The study found that, with 95% certainty, 426,369 to 793,663 Iraqis had died violently since the U.S.-led invasion in March 2003, with 601,027 statistically the most probable death toll. Those figures are many times higher than other reported estimates, including the figure of 50,000 reached by The Times in June after a weeks-long canvassing of Iraqi hospitals, morgues and government offices for death statistics.

On Wednesday, the Iraqi Health Ministry reported that more than 2,660 civilians had been killed in Baghdad in September, Associated Press reported. The toll was about 400 higher than in August, despite an intensified U.S.-Iraqi sweep aimed at reining in the violence.

The U.S. military on Wednesday reported that a mortar attack by insurgents caused a fire at a U.S. ammunition supply depot and sparked a series of explosions that shook much of the capital Tuesday night.

Arab-language television reported that the Islamic Army in Iraq, a Sunni Arab insurgent group, had claimed responsibility for the attack. The mortar shell ignited a fire that set off ammunition at Forward Operating Base Falcon in southern Baghdad.

"Intelligence indicates that civilians aligned with a militia organization were responsible for last night's mortar attack," military spokesman Army Lt. Col. Jonathan Withington said in a news release.

U.S., British and Iraqi military bases frequently draw mortar and rocket fire, which, though rarely inflicting casualties, frays nerves and diverts resources from peacekeeping and combat operations.

Amid the continuing violence, the dominant Shiites and Kurds overruled Sunnis and nationalist Shiites in parliament and narrowly passed a law Wednesday that allows for creation of self-ruled federal regions in Iraq, beginning in 18 months.

Many Shiites want to form an area in the south similar to the Kurdish region in the north, but Sunnis fear the move will lead to autonomous states in the north and south that control Iraq's oil wealth, excluding the central Sunni area.

DOJ_NMG_0079665

Deposed Iraqi President Saddam Hussein and six codefendants returned to a Baghdad courtroom Wednesday to hear witness testimony. They are accused of orchestrating the killings of tens of thousands of Iraqi Kurds during a late-1980s campaign dubbed Anfal, or "spoils of war."

After ejecting the defendants from the courtroom Tuesday, chief Judge Mohammed Orabi Khalefa opened Wednesday's session cordially, asking them to behave respectfully toward the alleged victims testifying.

Hussein politely protested the judge's decisions to cut off the broadcast of the trial at certain junctures and force him to stand when he addressed the court.

"When the defendants speak, you switch off the broadcast," he told the judge. "Is that fair?"

The judge held firm.

"The microphone is for any legal argument, but getting into political issues, this is not allowed," he said.

One witness told the courtroom that his village was destroyed and three of his siblings disappeared during the Anfal campaign. Abdul Khader Aziz, 50, also produced a document he said showed that 18 women, including 14 of his cousins, were sold to Egyptian nightclubs by Hussein's intelligence services.

But defendants strenuously objected that he had gotten the information from a Kurdish newspaper. Aziz refused to answer when asked about service in the Kurdish peshmerga militia that battled Hussein's regime and about membership in the Communist Party.

The trial is to resume Tuesday.

In Victory For Shiite Leader, Iraqi Parliament Approves Creating Autonomous Regions (NYT)

By Kirk Semple

The New York Times, October 12, 2006

BAGHDAD, Oct. 11 — Iraq's Shiite-dominated Parliament approved a law on Wednesday enabling provinces to unite to form autonomous regions, in spite of vehement opposition by Sunni Arab leaders who said it could splinter the republic and disadvantage the minority Sunni population.

The vote was a resounding victory for Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, leader of the dominant Shiite bloc, who wants to form an autonomous state from nine predominantly Shiite provinces of southern Iraq, a region that includes much of the nation's oil and other natural resources.

Mr. Hakim cast the result as a victory for democracy. "The road is open for all the Iraqi people to form any region they want, and it is up to the Iraqi people basically to decide this issue," he said.

The American military revealed on Wednesday that a spectacular series of explosions in a munitions depot on an American base here late Tuesday was caused by an 82-millimeter mortar fired by insurgents. The attack destroyed much of the stockpile, shut down most operations on the base and grounded a few battalions, compelling the military to move troops from elsewhere in Baghdad to cover the units' patrol areas.

The right to form semi-independent regions was guaranteed in the Iraqi Constitution, which voters approved a year ago. The law passed Wednesday merely defined the mechanisms of the process.

The law allows provinces to hold referendums on whether to merge into larger states, but it imposes an 18-month moratorium on the process. Consent by a third of a province's governing council or a tenth of its electorate can prompt a referendum, which would then require approval by a majority of voters to pass.

The Sunni Arab blocs and some Shiite and secular legislators, who had united last month to block the legislation, boycotted the session on Wednesday in an unsuccessful effort to prevent a quorum. But 140 of the 275 members attended and voted unanimously for the bill, The Associate Press reported.

Sunni Arab leaders fear that any plan to divide Iraq into regions would eventually shift control of its oil wealth to the Kurds in the north and the Shiites in the south, leaving them with the relatively barren central and western regions. The Kurds already have an autonomous region, but hope to expand it.

"We had our objections, and when they were disregarded, we found that the best way to deal with that was to boycott the session," said Salman al-Jumaili, a legislator from the Iraqi Consensus Front, the largest Sunni bloc. "We believe that implementing this law in its present form will be a prescription for dividing Iraq."

In the governing Shiite coalition, which remains divided on the issue, legislators loyal to the Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr, an ardent nationalist, have demanded that any discussion of federalism proceed only after American forces have left Iraq.

Members of the Fadhila Party, a Shiite group wary of Mr. Hakim's power, had opposed the law because it did not include clauses to prevent the formation of one huge federation across southern Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0079666

The mortar attack on Forward Operating Base Falcon, on the southern fringes of Baghdad was conducted by "civilians aligned with a militia organization," an American military statement said. The insurgents fired four 82-millimeter rounds at the base and one struck the ordnance supply, igniting tank, artillery and small-arms ammunition, officials said.

Powerful explosions continued for several hours, spraying huge chunks of jagged shrapnel across the base, destroying trailers, breaking windows, knocking doors off their hinges and shaking buildings across the capital, where alarmed residents were reminded of overnight aerial bombardments that signaled the start of the American-led invasion in 2003.

Three people were lightly wounded, all servicemen on the base who quickly returned to duty, military officials said.

Troops were forced to remain indoors until bomb squads could begin clearing the base of live and exploded ordnance, officials said. In the meantime, armored Stryker units were scrambled to the area to cover the base's area of control, which includes the troubled Dora neighborhood.

The Islamic Army in Iraq, a nationalist insurgent group, took responsibility for the attack. "With the help of God, the mortar and rocket squads of the Islamic Army have shelled a U.S. Army base with two rockets and three mortar shells," the group said in a posting on a Web site used by insurgent groups, The Associated Press reported.

In other violence in Baghdad, at least 13 people were killed and dozens more were wounded in several attacks Wednesday, officials said. In the most deadly event, unidentified gunmen stormed a house in Dora, killing five members of a family and wounding two others, said an official at Yarmouk Hospital, where the bodies of the victims had been taken.

The American military announced Wednesday that three marines were killed Monday in an insurgent attack in Anbar Province, and an American soldier was killed Wednesday when an bomb exploded near his patrol in central Baghdad.

At least 41 American soldiers have been killed this month, according to Iraq Coalition Casualty Count, an independent Web site that tracks military deaths based on military news releases and media reports.

Parliament Approves Measure Allowing Autonomous Regions (WP)

By Amit R. Paley, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 12, 2006

BAGHDAD, Oct. 11 -- Parliament on Wednesday approved a controversial law that will allow Iraq to be carved into a federation of autonomous regions, after Sunni Arabs and some Shiite Muslims stormed out of the session in protest.

The bill passed the 275-member parliament by a vote of 141 to 0, despite a nearly successful attempt by opponents to prevent a quorum by walking out, said Mohanned Abdul Jabbar, an aide to parliament speaker Mahmoud al-Mashhadani.

The measure, introduced by a powerful Shiite group last month, creates a mechanism that many believe will lead to a predominantly Shiite zone in southern Iraq that would parallel the semiautonomous Kurdish region in the north. Sunnis vehemently oppose such a division, which would leave them with an area in central Iraq that lacks the vast oil wealth of the north and south.

Under a compromise worked out two weeks ago, the bill includes a provision that prevents the formation of federal regions for 18 months. In exchange for that delay and the creation of a panel to review the constitution, the Sunnis agreed to call off a boycott that had prevented the federalism bill from being introduced.

Although the principle of federalism is enshrined in the constitution, the law passed by parliament is the first to set up a system that will allow provinces in 2008 to merge into autonomous regions.

"This is a first step on a long road toward a new system of governance in Iraq," said Ridha Jawad Taqi, a legislator with the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, the Shiite political party that was the measure's strongest supporter. "It will be up to the residents of whatever province to submit a request and go through the system."

But opponents of the bill -- including not only Sunni Arabs but secular parties and the bloc of anti-American Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr -- expressed fears that the federalism plan could increase sectarian tensions and push the country further toward civil war.

"This is the beginning of the plan to divide Iraq," said Adnan al-Dulaimi, leader of the National Accordance Front, a major Sunni bloc, according to the Associated Press. "We hope there won't be an increase in violence."

Nasaar al-Rubaie, a lawmaker from the Sadr bloc, said: "The present conditions are not conducive to establishing regions, because we lack a strong central government that can overrule the regions." In fact, he added, "the central authority is actually weakening instead of being solidified and strengthened."

Also on Wednesday, former electricity minister Aiham al-Sammarae was convicted of corruption and sentenced to two years in prison. Afterward, U.S. troops took custody of Sammarae, who holds dual Iraqi-American citizenship, because he feared being killed if he was placed in jail, said government spokesman Ali al-Dabbagh.

Dabbagh said that the Iraqi government had demanded his return and that the Americans agreed. "The government of Iraq expects that the Americans will respect Iraqi juridical authority," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0079667

Lou Fintor, a spokesman for the U.S. Embassy, said he could not comment because "federal privacy law prohibits us from releasing information concerning U.S. citizens in the absence of a Privacy Act waiver."

The U.S. military on Wednesday also announced the deaths of four troops, bringing the death toll for American forces this month to at least 40. The military said a soldier was killed Wednesday after his patrol was struck by a bomb in central Baghdad, and three Marines assigned to the 1st Brigade of the 1st Armored Division were killed Monday in Anbar province.

Special correspondent K.I. Ibrahim contributed to this report.

U.S. Agency Cites Flaws In Another Iraqi Construction Project (NYT)

By James Glanz

The New York Times, October 12, 2006

The American-financed rebuilding of an Iraqi police headquarters that was meant to show a new approach to reconstruction has instead turned out to be rife with shoddy construction and is exposing security forces to unnecessary risk, a federal oversight agency said yesterday.

The criticism has come in the midst of an intensive American push to train and equip a police force capable of restoring order to Iraq's increasingly violent streets.

The headquarters project, in the ethnically divided and volatile northern city of Mosul, is the second police-related contract to face harsh criticism recently. Two weeks ago, the same oversight agency told Congress of grotesque plumbing failures and other problems at a $72 million police college in Baghdad.

In the earlier project, most of the criticism was directed at Parsons, the American contractor hired by the United States Army Corps of Engineers to carry out the work with the help of Iraqi subcontractors. But this time, in a step the Army Corps has said will eliminate some of the construction problems, the work was contracted directly to a local Iraqi company.

But the Mosul police headquarters project, a $988,000 contract that was much smaller and presumably simpler than the earlier one, suffered some of the same troubles, according to a report released yesterday by the agency, the Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction.

Brian M. Flynn, the assistant inspector general for inspections at the oversight agency, said there had been no plans to look into the headquarters, called One West, until an inspection team happened to be in Mosul and was approached by the Iraqi police.

The police "were so upset with the quality of construction that they asked us to inspect it while we were there," Mr. Flynn said.

Problems with the construction were not hard to find, the agency's report said. One part of the contract called for the construction of 10 showers, 12 toilets, 10 urinals, 10 sinks and a changing room at One West. Instead, just one shower and one toilet had been built, and there was no changing room. A tree in the spot where the construction took place was allowed to remain standing, and its trunk was cemented into the building's structure.

Numerous other plumbing and construction shortcomings turned up, an electrical generator was delivered but not installed and instead of installing fans in the guard houses, as called for in the contract, workers installed extra windows, leaving the guards exposed in a city where police stations have frequently been attacked.

The problems stemmed from a poor Iraqi contractor and a lack of inspection by Army engineers early in the project, said Stuart W. Bowen Jr., who runs the oversight agency.

"The issue is oversight," Mr. Bowen said. "Our experience is that where there is good oversight there are good projects."

Mr. Bowen cited a courthouse project in Baghdad on which the Army Corps of Engineers kept closer tabs; the inspectors declared it a success. The agency also released a report on that project yesterday.

Maj. Gen. William H. McCoy Jr., commander of the Army Corps' Gulf Region Division until his tenure ends early next week, called Mr. Bowen's findings on One West "on the mark." General McCoy said that for about six months after the project began, in September 2005, government overseers failed to monitor the Iraqi contractor or accurately report construction problems.

But General McCoy said the corps eventually discovered the problems and was taking steps to terminate the contract when the federal inspectors arrived on the scene. Half the contractor's payment was eventually withheld, he said, and much of the chain of command in charge of the corps' overseers was replaced.

"As a result," General McCoy said, "the performance of this office has greatly improved."

Afghanistan Five Years Later: Charting The Reconstruction (CSM)

The Christian Science Monitor, October 12, 2006

The United States and its coalition partners launched "Operation Enduring Freedom - Afghanistan" in October 2001 as a response to the attacks of Sept. 11. At the time of the invasion, Afghanistan was already a broken nation. Decades of war and austere fundamentalist rule had left the country with little in the way of industry, infrastructure, government institutions, or an educational system.

DOJ_NMG_0079668

In the five years since the invasion, the coalition has worked to fill a gaping political vacuum in the face of growing challenges. Since 2001, poppy cultivation in Afghanistan has increased from 8,000 hectares to 165,000 hectares. But Afghanistan has also made strong democratic advances, and the education system has markedly improved. Since 1999, the percentage of Afghans enrolled in primary school rose from 25 percent to 93 percent. The road to democracy

Afghanistan's first democratically elected parliament in more than three decades of conflict convened on Dec. 19, 2005, the culmination of an international effort.

2001

Oct. 7: US and British military strikes launched on Afghanistan as the Taliban refuse US demands to hand over Osama bin Laden, blamed for the 9/11 attacks.

Dec. 22: Hamid Karzai, leader of one of the largest tribes in southern Afghanistan, is sworn in as head of a six-month, post-Taliban government following agreements reached in Bonn, Germany, including an interim powersharing arrangement, the creation of a new constitution, and presidential and parliamentary elections in 2004. The International Assistance Force in Afghanistan (ISAF) is established.

2002

April 18: Deposed Afghan monarch Mohammed Zahir Shah, 87 at the time, returns from 29 years' exile in Italy, escorted by Karzai, to oversee the loya jirga, Afghanistan's traditional grand assembly.

June 10: After a power struggle, Zahir Shah renounces claim as head of state and endorses Karzai.

June 13: Karzai elected for a two-year term by the the loya jirga.

July 6: Vice President Abdul Qadir is assassinated.

Sept. 5: Karzai survives assassination attempt in Kandahar.

October: A constitutional commission of 35 members is appointed to draft a constitution.

2003

Aug. 11: NATO assumes command of the ISAF, under leadership of Germany and the Netherlands at the time, the first NATO peacekeeping mission outside of the Euro-Atlantic area since NATO's creation in 1949.

December: Constitutional Loya Jirga delegates - 500 Afghan civic leaders - meet in Kabul to debate draft constitution.

2004

Jan. 4: The traditional grand assembly, the loya jirga, ratifies a new constitution proposing a presidential system of government with Afghanistan as an Islamic state.

July 9: Electoral commission announces that presidential elections will be on Oct. 9, but delays parliamentary polls until 2005.

Oct. 9: First post-Taliban presidential elections pass without major incident; more than 8.1 million Afghans participate.

Nov. 3: Karzai proclaimed winner with 55 percent of vote.

2005

March 17: Karzai announces delay in parliamentary polls until September.

July 12: Election officials say more than 5,800 candidates are eligible for the elections, more than 10 percent of them women. Later, several candidates are disqualified, mainly for links to armed factions.

Sept. 15: Taliban militants shoot dead an election candidate, the seventh to die in violence before the poll.

Sept. 18: More than 6.2 million Afghans vote in the first parliamentary elections since 1969.

Nov. 12: After a series of delays, election results are released confirming several seats for former regional warlords and some ex-Taliban.

Dec. 10: Karzai announces his choices for the remaining 34 seats in the upper house.

Dec. 16: Three days before parliament is due to open, a bomb explodes near the parliament building, killing an apparent suicide attacker and wounding two others.

Dec. 19: National Assembly inaugurated in Kabul; parliament convenes for the first time since 1973.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Options Scandal Snares Tech Chiefs (FT)

By Kevin Allison In San Francisco

Financial Times, October 12, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0079669

The chief executives of McAfee, the antivirus software maker, and CNET, an online publisher, quit on Wednesday over Silicon Valley's options backdating scandal.

Their departures are likely to increase fears that the apparently widespread practice could lead to a broader shake-up of senior leadership in the world's leading technology hotspot.

The resignations come a week after Apple Computer cleared Steve Jobs, its co-founder and chief executive, of wrongdoing over options backdating, even though he was aware of the practice in "a few instances".

Shares in McAfee rose 2.4 per cent after the company said it had appointed Dale Fuller, the former chief executive of Borland Software, to replace George Samenuk as chief executive.

Mr Samenuk said: "I regret that some of the stock options problems . . . occurred on my watch." His departure followed news that the company would be required to restate its earnings by $100m to $150m to account for improper backdating.

McAfee said it had ousted Kevin Weiss, president, who joined the company in 2002 and became president in March, several years after improper backdating at the company began.

Mr Fuller declined to elaborate, noting that shareholders would be able to "read everything . . . in excruciating detail" in filings.

Shares in CNET, owner of the technology news website, dropped 6.5 per cent after the company announced the departure of Shelby Bonnie, its co-founder, chairman and chief executive. He resigned after an internal probe found the group backdated some options grants between 1996 to "at least" 2003.

Mr Bonnie said he was "deeply disappointed" that backdating occurred under his leadership.

2 More Executives Resign Over Options (NYT)

By Laurie J. Flynn

The New York Times, October 12, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO, Oct. 11 — McAfee Inc. and CNet Networks both announced on Wednesday that their chief executives had stepped down, as casualties from investigations of stock option grants continued to mount.

The departures came as internal reports at both companies — which are also under investigation by federal regulators — revealed that accounting discrepancies might have inflated the value of stock options granted to executives. More than 100 public companies are the focus of similar inquiries, including dozens in Silicon Valley.

McAfee, a major seller of antivirus software, said George Samenuk, chief executive since 2001, had retired and that Kevin Weiss, the company's president, had been fired.

Dale L. Fuller, who joined McAfee's board in January, was named interim chief executive and president. Charles J. Robel, who joined the McAfee board in June, was named chairman.

"I regret that some of the stock option problems identified by the special committee occurred on my watch," Mr. Samenuk said in a statement, adding that he was stepping down "in the company's best interest."

In a conference call with Wall Street analysts on Wednesday, Mr. Fuller declined to provide details on Mr. Weiss's firing.

Shares of McAfee rose 85 cents, or 3.3 percent, to close at $26.64 on Wednesday. The company is trading well above its 52-week low of $19.52 reached in August.

Rumors have circulated on Wall Street recently that McAfee might be an acquisition target. Eugene Munster, an analyst with Piper Jaffray, said the departure of Mr. Samenuk made that possibility even more likely. "I believe McAfee now is going to get bought," he said. "The fact that it is a rudderless ship makes it a more attractive prospect."

Mr. Fuller, whose eight months on the McAfee board give him relatively little direct experience with the company, told analysts he was well prepared to run the company and had already begun meeting with McAfee's executive team. Mr. Fuller was chief executive of Borland Software for six years and also served as general manager of Apple Computer's Powerbook division.

McAfee, based in Santa Clara, Calif., said that as a result of the accounting problem it could have to restate as many as 10 years of financial records and take a charge of $100 million to $150 million.

In May, McAfee fired its general counsel, Kent Roberts, just days before it announced that it was being investigated by the Securities and Exchange Commission over its stock options.

Many of the recent options investigations have involved backdating, in which a company typically selects a grant date when its stock price was lower, increasing the value of the options for employees who sell them later for a higher price.

CNet, the online media company, announced Wednesday that Shelby W. Bonnie, a CNet cofounder who had led the company since 2000, resigned as chairman and chief executive. Neil M. Ashe, who joined CNet four years ago as head of corporate strategy and development, was named chief executive, while Jarl Mohn, a former television executive, was named chairman. Mr. Bonnie will remain on the CNet board.

DOJ_NMG_0079670

A special committee established by CNet's board in May found that in some instances option grants were backdated in the period from the company's initial public offering in 1996 to 2003. Mr. Bonnie, as well as three other former executives, bear responsibility, though none of them "engaged in intentional wrongdoing," a company statement said.

"I apologize for the option-related problems that happened under my leadership," Mr. Bonnie said in a statement. "I believe that the company has come a long way since 2003 in addressing these deficiencies, but am deeply disappointed it happened nonetheless."

As a result of having to restate previous financial results, CNet, based in San Francisco, also revised its outlook for the third quarter. The company now estimates revenue of $92.8 million, compared with previous estimates of $93 million to $96 million. For the full year, CNET expects revenue of $376 million to $386 million, down from a previous forecast of $386 million to $403 million.

CNet shares tumbled on the news, falling 76 cents, or 7.7 percent, to $9.14.

The developments at McAfee and CNet come just days after Monster Worldwide announced that its chairman and chief executive, Andrew McKelvey, had resigned, saying he was unable to devote enough time to the company's options investigation.

And last week, Apple Computer announced that Fred D. Anderson had resigned his post on Apple's board as a result of the company's investigation into the timing of stock option grants during his tenure as finance chief. A committee investigating Apple's accounting practices said last week that Steven P. Jobs, Apple's chief executive, had not benefited from stock option backdating.

Two former executives of Brocade Communications Systems are facing criminal charges related to the backdating of stock options.

Given the number of investigations under way, analysts say the options scandal is far from over. "I think ultimately you're going to see more C.E.O.'s resign over this," Mr. Munster of Piper Jaffray said.

Adobe Options Review

WASHINGTON, Oct. 11 (Dow Jones) — Adobe Systems, the design and software graphics company, said Wednesday that a review of its stock option granting processes found no improper grants to company executives. But the company said that some grants to employees were changed after their grant date.

The company had not previously disclosed that it was reviewing its option grants. The company said it would correct accounting errors related to the changed options.

As Companies Probe Backdating, More Top Officials Take A Fall (WSJ)

By Charles Forelle And James Bandler

The Wall Street Journal, October 12, 2006

Five senior officers at two well-known Silicon Valley companies became the latest corporate casualties of the stock-options backdating scandal, adding to a toll that is likely to continue to rise as companies wrap up probes of their internal practices.

In the latest actions, Shelby Bonnie, founder and chief executive officer of Web publisher CNET Networks Inc., and George Samenuk, chairman and CEO of computer-security vendor McAfee Inc., stepped down following internal probes that found use of options backdating. So far, some two dozen executives or directors have been fired or suspended or have resigned amid options probes. Among them are top officials of Apple Computer Inc., Web-site operator Monster Worldwide Inc. and software maker Comverse Technology Inc., whose former CEO is facing extradition proceedings in Namibia.

Experts said more departures are likely. More than 100 companies are under investigation for options backdating, and scores of them are still conducting internal probes. Many would like to finish them in time to make disclosures during quarterly earnings reporting, which will be heavy in the next several weeks. The companies face pressure to finish because they may not be able to tally their earnings without knowing whether they will need to record charges for any improper options discovered by the probes.

WSJ's Charles Forelle discusses7 why so many executives are getting caught up in the options backdating scandal and whether more departures are likely.

Many companies have already said they won't meet securities-filing deadlines for the quarter, leaving them at risk of delisting, costly fights with bondholders entitled to timely financial statements, and potentially greater liability in any options-related civil actions by shareholders.

Charles Elson, director of the John L. Weinberg Center for Corporate Governance at the University of Delaware, said he believes more people will lose their jobs. "It is a fundamental breach of trust to your investors," he said.

Backdating amounts to pretending that an option was granted earlier than it actually was, at a beneficial time when the share was trading at a low price. Since options entitle their recipients to profit from a rise in price, claiming the grant occurred at a time of low prices could give the recipient a running start to extra profit.

DOJ_NMG_0079671

At a minimum, backdating generally involves accounting and disclosure violations. It can also constitute fraud. U.S. attorneys in more than a half-dozen jurisdictions are probing at least 50 companies. Five former executives of two companies are facing federal criminal charges for their alleged participation in backdating schemes.

Firing an executive doesn't necessarily get a company off the hook with regulators or litigious shareholders, but can be held up as a sign of good faith. The actions at CNET and McAfee underscore how seriously some corporate boards are taking options manipulation. Taken with other recent dismissals, they are establishing a precedent that separating executives from the company is a prudent response to options problems.

Getting rid of someone can be a double-edged sword, though. "The SEC [Securities and Exchange Commission] and the Department of Justice expect crisp remedial measures, so termination of a wrongdoing executive typically helps the company in the eyes of those regulators," says Michael Young, a lawyer at Willkie Farr & Gallagher. "Unfortunately, it can hurt in the defense of subsequent class-action litigation to the extent that plaintiff's lawyers infer that the departed executive did something wrong."

The McAfee departures suggest also that some boards, guided by outside lawyers conducting the probes, are taking a stern view of responsibility. Mr. Samenuk joined McAfee in January 2001, long after manipulations there apparently started. President Kevin Weiss, whose firing was announced yesterday, joined the company in October 2002.

In a statement, Mr. Samenuk expressed "regret" that some of the problems "occurred on my watch." Mr. Weiss couldn't be reached. Exactly what Messrs. Samenuk and Weiss did that precipitated their departures isn't known; a McAfee spokeswoman said the men were "implicated in the options backdating" but declined to elaborate.

Exactly who will go and who will stay at the scores of companies being investigated is difficult to discern. An executive's fate, of course, depends strongly on what evidence a review finds. But how that evidence is treated can vary from company to company.

Apple Computer threaded the needle last week when it discussed superstar CEO Steve Jobs's role in backdating at the company. Apple's disclosure said Mr. Jobs knew some grants were backdated; earlier, the company said he received a problematic grant. But Apple also said last week that Mr. Jobs wasn't aware of the accounting implications of backdating and didn't get any grants he knew were backdated, implying that any troublesome grant he received was manipulated for his benefit but was backdated without his knowledge. Apple's relatively terse disclosure didn't spell out exactly who did what.

Mr. Jobs apologized and remains with the company, which laid the blame on two unnamed former executives. Apple director Fred Anderson, a former finance chief, resigned from the board.

Bed Bath & Beyond Inc., the specialty retailer, said Tuesday that its review had found rampant backdating, concluding that "almost all annual grant dates" for several years were likely selected "with some hindsight." At a time when many corporate disclosures about backdating are opaquely written, the company's statement was frank and detailed, laying out how many grants the company believed were backdated and giving a sketch of how the process worked.

What's more, Bed Bath & Beyond said, the co-chairmen and chief executive had responsibility for picking the dates; the men themselves benefited from the low prices. But the board committee probing the options offenses concluded that no one had "engaged in willful misconduct." No top executives have departed Bed Bath & Beyond because of options misdeeds.

Mr. Young, the Willkie Farr attorney, says that in investigations of matters like options backdating, board committees try to probe deeply an executive's state of mind. "When somebody is deliberately doing something wrong, and misrepresenting the consequences, then you've got dishonesty in the ranks," says Mr. Young. That, he says, is dealt with harshly. What to do can be a tough call, he says, with "those whose involvement was gray."

San Francisco-based CNET said its review, conducted by law firm Davis Polk & Wardwell and led by a special committee of directors, found "instances of backdating" from the company's initial public offering in 1996 through "at least 2003." Even though CNET said its review didn't conclude that any of these people "engaged in intentional wrongdoing," Mr. Bonnie, General Counsel Sharon Le Duy and human-resources head Heather McGaughey all "bear varying degrees of responsibility." They all resigned and agreed to have any improper options repriced so that they wouldn't continue to benefit from the backdating.

CNET also said directors will reprice improper options; a company spokeswoman says the repricing affects "all members of the board of directors, to varying degrees depending on their length of service."

It isn't clear exactly which grants were backdated, though some raise suspicion. In 2000, CNET granted options to Mr. Bonnie and two other top executives with purported dates that coincided with the stock's lowest closing price in April. Other executives got options dated at October's low price. One received both favorable dates.

Melinda Haag, a lawyer for Ms. Le Duy, said her client neither knew about nor participated in any intentional misdating of options. "Sharon has always acted with integrity with regard to CNET's stock-option grant process and in all other regards," Ms. Haag said. "Given that she was a senior officer for part of the time at issue, however, Sharon recognized that her resignation would best help the company move forward."

An attorney for Mr. Bonnie couldn't be reached for comment.

DOJ_NMG_0079672

Ms. McGaughey, a former Time Inc. manager, joined CNET in 1998 as vice president of human resources. She became senior vice president in 2000. "Ms. McGaughey is deeply saddened by the events that have happened at CNET," said her lawyer, Leigh A. Kirmsse. "She believes that in the end her name will be completely cleared of any wrongdoing whatsoever."

Kirk Hanson, executive director of the Markkula Center for Applied Ethics at Santa Clara University, said companies are operating in a climate that places great weight on the integrity of senior-most executives.

Mr. Hanson said he believes a senior executive who initiated or authorized backdating should leave his position.

"If a CEO who is tainted remains in place, a very unfortunate signal is given to the organization that irregular practices will be tolerated or even applauded," Mr. Hanson said. "This is not a question of whether the CEO is indictable; it is a question of whether the CEO is a credible leader of integrity."

Two Tech Companies Shake Up Leadership (USAT)

By Jon Swartz

USA Today, October 12, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO — Computer-security firm McAfee on Wednesday said chairman and CEO George Samenuk retired and president Kevin Weiss was fired because of accounting discrepancies in stock options.

Shortly after McAfee's announcement, CNet Networks said its co-founder, Shelby Bonnie, resigned as chairman and CEO after an internal investigation at the online media company concluded he shared the blame for backdating CNet stock options.

The Silicon Valley companies both will restate financial results. They are the latest caught in a deepening investigation that has touched more than 120 companies, and led to executive departures at Apple, software maker Mercury Interactive and others.

The new corporate scandals center on how companies handle stock options. Most involve backdating options to days when the company's stock price was lower, inflating executive payouts.

The problems hardly constitute a “crisis in confidence” in tech companies, where stock options first became a staple of compensation packages during the 1990s. But it badly diminishes the reputation of executives, says Charles Elson, director of the University of Delaware's center for corporate governance. As more companies dig into their records, he predicts more executive ousters and financial restatements. “The determination that needs to be made is whether it was intentional, sloppy bookkeeping or a mere coincidence,” Elson says. “If it's the former, severe actions like fines may result.”

In a statement, McAfee said Samenuk, 51, was retiring, and Weiss was terminated. It fired its general counsel in May after determining he had been involved in option improprieties. McAfee said in June that securities regulators had opened a formal investigation.

“I regret that some of the stock option problems … occurred on my watch,” Samenuk said in a statement.

Replacing Samenuk and Weiss on an interim basis is Dale Fuller, 48, a McAfee board member who was CEO and president of Borland Software. McAfee also named board member Charles Robel as chairman.

McAfee said it intends to soon file its restated financial results and annual report and look for a permanent CEO. The charges are likely to be $100 million to $150 million over a 10-year period, it said.

Despite the shake-up, McAfee shares rose 3.3% to $26.64 Wednesday, a reflection of investor sentiment that a management change was in order. Samenuk “has been perceived on Wall Street as unpredictable and inconsistent in financial performance,” says analyst Gene Munster of investment bank Piper Jaffray. “For every three good quarters, there was a clunker.”

The shake-up also renewed speculation that McAfee could be acquired by Hewlett-Packard or IBM, he says.

CNet, meanwhile, said some stock options were backdated from its initial public offering in 1996 to at least 2003. It appointed Neil Ashe as its new CEO and board member. He has led the company's acquisition of content. It also named Jarl Mohn, a former executive at E! Entertainment Television and MTV, as non-executive chairman. CNet shares fell 7.6% to $9.14.

Scandal Grows Over Backdating Of Options (WP)

By Frank Ahrens

The Washington Post, October 12, 2006

The heads of three well-known technology companies lost their jobs this week as the result of a scandal sweeping through the business world over the improper backdating of stock options, a practice often designed to inflate the value of stock grants to employees.

Internet news publisher Cnet Networks Inc., security software firm McAfee Inc. and online recruitment service Monster Worldwide Inc. announced the resignation or retirement of their chief executives, all apparently over concerns about how the companies granted stock options.

DOJ_NMG_0079673

The three are the latest of at least 135 companies to acknowledge or be investigated for backdating stock options, which typically involves picking dates for stock grants when the purchase price was low, so that when the stock is sold, the holder can make more money. The practice is not illegal as long as the options are properly accounted for on company earnings sheets and tax returns.

According to the Securities and Exchange Commission and the Justice Department, however, a number of companies have not followed the rules. Federal authorities have filed fraud charges against executives at two technology companies, and they continue to investigate many firms.

The investigations are sending shock waves through the tech community, where stock options have long been a key tool for luring talent to start-ups.

"The primary concern in [Silicon] Valley is how many CEOs will be fired, and how many will be indicted," said Kirk O. Hanson, executive director of the Markkula Center for Applied Ethics at Santa Clara University.

Though the scandal lacks Enron's hubris or Tyco's Saturnalian excess, the consequences are grave: Cnet founder Shelby W. Bonnie resigned yesterday as chief executive and apologized for his role in the backdating options. The company issued an internal report that said Cnet backdated options from 1996 through 2003 and partially blamed Bonnie.

Also yesterday, McAfee fired its president, Kevin Weiss, and announced that chief executive George Samenuk was retiring. Earlier in the week, Monster's chief executive, Andrew J. McKelvey, resigned. Last week, Apple Computer Inc. announced the resignation of board member Fred D. Anderson over stock option issues.

Though many of the higher-profile companies under scrutiny are tech firms in Silicon Valley, the SEC and Justice Department are casting their nets widely, investigating companies as varied as Home Depot Inc. and Cheesecake Factory Inc. The SEC said in testimony to Congress last month that it is investigating more than 100 companies for possible fraudulent reporting of option grants.

"As the use of options compensation has increased, however, so apparently has its abuse," SEC enforcement director Linda Thompson testified. "This practice benefits employees at the expense of shareholders."

Former Comverse Technology Inc. chief executive Kobi Alexander is awaiting extradition from Namibia on federal charges related to his company's options practices. Former Brocade Communications Systems Inc. chief executive Gregory L. Reyes also faces federal charges.

How does backdating work?

Companies have long issued stock options to their employees to motivate them. Options allow an employee to buy a certain number of company shares at a price set by management, usually the price the day the option is granted.

The employee makes the most profit by buying stock options at a low price and selling them when the stock market has pumped up the company's stock to a higher price. If a company backdates options, it typically allows the employee to buy options when the stock was at its lowest point, thereby increasing the profit when the stock is sold.

Options usually are granted to a company's highest executives as part of their compensation packages. Backdating has been criticized as a shady way for wealthy executives to get wealthier, even if the company performs poorly.

The process is not illegal if no company documents have been forged, if the other shareholders have been informed and if the backdated options are correctly accounted for in company earnings and tax returns.

It may be legal, but it's "slimy," said Nell Minow, co-founder of the Corporate Library, a corporate-governance watchdog. "It subverts the whole justification for options," she said.

Minow was in New York yesterday lecturing corporate directors on a number of topics, including backdated options.

"No one comes to you and says, 'Let's backdate our options,' " she said. A company's human resources department "will tell an employee, 'We have a great benefit with our options -- a 60-day look-back.' That doesn't sound quite so dirty."

Backdating has cost some companies more than their chief executives. Many have had to restate earnings and take charges on upcoming earnings to account for the improperly recorded options.

For example, in August, Clorox Co. said it took a $25 million pretax charge in its most recent quarter to account for "errors" in how the company accounted for options. Research in Motion Ltd., maker of the BlackBerry, said last month that a review of its options-accounting practices could reduce past earnings by as much as $45 million. Also last month, chipmaker Broadcom Corp. said it would restate earnings to take $1.5 billion worth of options expenses off its books.

McAfee, Cnet Chiefs Leave As Options Scandal Deepens (Update2) (BLOOM)

By Rebecca Barr And Rick Green

Bloomberg, October 12, 2006

Oct. 11 (Bloomberg) -- The federal crackdown on stock- options backdating claimed the chief executive officers of McAfee Inc. and Cnet Networks Inc., deepening a scandal that has cost investors more than $2.5 billion of earnings.

McAfee, the No. 2 maker of anti-virus software, said Chairman and CEO George Samenuk resigned, fired President Kevin Weiss and announced plans to slash 10 years of previously reported profits by as much as $150 million. Cnet, the online publisher of technology news and reviews, said CEO Shelby Bonnie and two other executives stepped down after an internal probe found the company backdated some stock-option grants.

The toll from backdating continues to mount. More than 30 officials, including eight CEOs, have left companies under scrutiny for manipulating stock options to reward employees, and executives at two, Brocade Communications Systems Inc. and Comverse Technology Inc., face criminal charges. More than 60 companies -- from Apple Computer Inc. to Cablevision Systems Corp. -- have restated or plan to revise earnings.

``It's getting worse before it gets better," said Howard Silverblatt, an analyst at Standard & Poor's in New York. ``The issue will become more widespread as more companies are coming forward voluntarily instead of waiting for official inquiries."

At least 140 companies have disclosed federal investigations or internal probes of potential stock-option manipulation. The Justice Department, the Securities and Exchange Commission, the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the Internal Revenue Service are among the agencies running civil or criminal probes.

Scratching the Surface

Meantime, investors have filed more than 230 lawsuits seeking compensation for the profits that executives and other employees made from improper grants and the earnings misstatements that may have resulted.

``I think we have scratched the surface," said Derek Meisner, a partner in the Boston office of Kirkpatrick & Lockhart Nicholson Graham LLP who's advising companies he declined to name on whether to terminate executives over stock-option manipulation. ``You are going to see more of it as companies conclude internal investigations and the SEC completes its investigations. This is kind of the tip of the iceberg."

Backdating, the most serious abuse, involves retroactively pegging options to an earlier day when a company's stock was trading at a lower price. When the stock rises, holders of backdated grants can buy shares at artificially low levels and pocket the difference.

If not disclosed to shareholders, backdating can be considered fraudulent. The practice hides compensation costs, reduces income-tax payments and overstates earnings.

Widespread Fallout

Companies from Broadcom Corp. to CA Inc. have said restatements for stock-option errors will cut past earnings by more than $2.5 billion. Not since the probe into improper mutual- fund trading three years ago has a scandal swept up as many companies and led to fallout so widespread. That investigation resulted in $4.3 billion in penalties.

Most of the companies that found backdating or other errors in stock-option grants have said the practices weren't deliberate and didn't take action against any executives or board members.

San Francisco-based Cnet is among the exceptions. The company said in a statement today that a special committee of its board, assisted by law firm Davis Polk & Wardwell, found evidence of backdating from 1996 to at least 2003.

Cnet said several executives, including Bonnie, ``bear varying degrees of responsibility for these deficiencies." Neil Ashe, the company's head of strategy, replaced Bonnie as CEO. Jarl Mohn, former CEO of Liberty Digital Inc. and E! Entertainment Television, will be non-executive chairman of Cnet's board.

`I Apologize'

``I apologize for the option-related problems that happened under my leadership," Bonnie, who helped start Cnet in 1993, said in the statement. ``I believe that the company has come a long way since 2003 in addressing these deficiencies, but am deeply disappointed it happened nonetheless."

General Counsel Sharon Le Duy and the head of personnel, Heather McGaughey, also left because of the options investigation, Cnet said. The company previously disclosed probes by the U.S. Attorney for the Northern District of California and the SEC.

McAfee said director Dale Fuller will take over as president and interim CEO until a replacement is found. Director Charles Robel will become non-executive chairman. Chief Financial Officer Eric Brown declined to elaborate on the ouster of Weiss, 50, during a conference call.

`My Watch'

``If the CEO is somehow culpable then dumping the CEO allows the company to tell regulators that the options problems were a legacy issue and we have established a new tone at the top," Meisner said.

Santa Clara, California-based McAfee began an internal review of stock options in May. It fired General Counsel Kent Roberts less than two week after finding problems with at least one grant. In June, the SEC subpoenaed McAfee as part of a formal investigation. The company was subpoenaed by federal grand jury in August.

DOJ_NMG_0079675

McAfee's internal investigation is now largely over and the company plans to file restated results ``as soon as practicable," Brown, the CFO, said on the call today.

``I regret that some of the stock-option problems identified by the special committee occurred on my watch," Samenuk, 51, said in a statement today.

Penalty Box

Under Samenuk, whom it hired in 2001, McAfee cleaned up its accounting and settled lawsuits that claimed former CEO William Larson misstated the company's financial condition. McAfee said its restatement for improper options grants will cover a decade's worth of financial statements and probably will cut pretax earnings by $100 million to $150 million. The company previously said it expected to restate three years of results.

Shares of McAfee rose 85 cents, or 3.3 percent, to $26.64 at 4:03 p.m. in New York Stock Exchange composite trading, the highest level since May. The stock has fallen 1.8 percent this year.

Separately, Cnet lowered its third-quarter and full-year revenue forecasts, sending its shares down 7.7 percent. The company's third-quarter results will be delayed because its options probe is continuing. Cnet shares fell 76 cents to $9.14 on the Nasdaq Stock Market.

Management changes are ``the first step for the company out of the penalty box," said Daniel Ives, a New York-based analyst with Friedman Billings Ramsey who follows McAfee and has an ``outperform" rating on the stock. ``Investors can start focusing on the fundamentals again."

CEOs Swept Out By Stock Options Scandal (FINDLAW/AP)

By Michael Liedtke, Ap Business Writer

AP, October 12, 2006

(AP) - SAN FRANCISCO-Companies sullied by stock option chicanery seem intent on cleaning out their executive suites and boardrooms before regulators and prosecutors do it for them.

On Wednesday, the scandal's fallout widened when the chief executives of both McAfee Inc. and CNet Networks Inc. stepped aside to atone for stock option shenanigans that will erase some of the companies' past profits. Santa Clara-based McAfee, a leading maker of computer anti-virus software, also fired its president, Kevin Weiss.

The abrupt departures of McAfee CEO George Samenuk and CNet CEO Shelby Bonnie follow last week's resignation of Apple Computer Inc. board member Fred Anderson - the company's former chief financial officer - after the iPod maker acknowledged its mishandling of past stock options inflated its past profits.

Apple CEO Steve Jobs held onto his job because the Cupertino-based company's internal inquiry cleared him of any misconduct, but other business leaders battling stock option problems won't be so fortunate, predicted Anthony Michael Sabino, a business law professor at St. John's University.

"The day of reckoning is here and there are still a lot of dominoes to fall, both big and small," Sabino said.

McAfee shares gained 85 cents to close at $26.64 on the New York Stock Exchange while shares of CNet, which runs a stable of technology news and entertainment Web sites, fell 76 cents, or more than 7.6 percent, to close at $9.14 on the Nasdaq Stock Market.

The stock option practices of at least 135 companies are under government investigation or internal review.

Most of the inquiries are focused on a technique known as "backdating," which occurs when insiders look back in time for a low point in their company's stock price so the exercise, or "strike," price of the options could be set at that ebb.

If they aren't properly disclosed, backdated options can inflate corporate profits and result in an underpayment of taxes.

Silicon Valley has been caught in the eye of the stock option storm because of an entrepreneurial culture that embraced the rewards during the 1990s as the best way to get rich fast. That mind-set encouraged high-tech companies to pass out stock options like candy on Halloween.

A federal government task force looking for evidence of stock option malfeasance is now based in San Francisco.

Companies that cooperate with the government and take steps to clean up their books have the best chance of avoiding legal trouble, said Eumi Choi, a federal prosecutor who is chairing the task force.

"That's something we will seriously consider when taking action, Choi said. "What's really called for here is a transparent process."

Perhaps the most famous executive caught up in the options scandal is Jacob "Kobi" Alexander, the fugitive former CEO of software company Comverse Technology Inc. He's in the southern African nation of Namibia, awaiting extradition to the United States to face charges of manipulating options.

Another former Silicon Valley CEO, Gregory Reyes of Brocade Communications Systems Inc., is fighting criminal charges tied to his alleged mishandling of stock options at that San Jose-based company.

DOJ_NMG_0079676

Neither McAfee nor San Francisco-based CNet elaborated on the reasons why they parted ways with their CEOs, but the financial problems caused by the improper accounting of stock options appear to be a pivotal factor.

McAfee said it expects to absorb charges of $100 million to $150 million to correct the errors. CNet hasn't specified how large its restatements will be other than to say they will be "material."

Wednesday's developments signal the jobs of other CEOs may be on the line if stock option improprieties force their companies to make substantial revisions to their financial statements, said Michael Koenig, a former federal prosecutor now working at a Washington, D.C. law firm.

"The bigger the restatement, the more likely you will see people falling on their swords, rightly or wrongly," he said. "This issue isn't going away soon, by any stretch of the imagination."

The Securities and Exchange Commission is focusing its stock option investigation on companies forced to make big changes to their past profits, said Marc Fagel, head of enforcement in the agency's San Francisco office.

The SEC expects to impose civil fines on some companies and make criminal referrals on others. "There's always fraud versus recklessness and calls will have to be made," Fagel said.

CNet said there wasn't any sign that Bonnie, a company co-founder, engaged in intentional wrongdoing and allowed him to stay on the board. McAfee didn't elaborate on Samenuk's role in its stock option trouble, but he expressed regret for letting it happen on his watch.

Still, the stock option-induced departures of Bonnie and Samenuk "are like red meat for prosecutors and regulators," Koenig said.

The actions of McAfee and CNet may sway other corporate boards to come down hard on their CEOs to signal they have zero tolerance for reckless accounting even if there is no evidence of intentional misconduct, said James Post, a Boston University professor who focuses on corporate governance.

"This kind of lifts the bars for all the other companies" with backdating problems, Post said. "The burden of proof is starting to shift. The executives involved in this may have to prove they are very clean if they want to keep their jobs."

AP Legal Affairs writer David Kravets contributed to this story.

Stock-option Probes Lead To Exit Of Top Execs At McAfee, CNet (MERCN)

By Ryan Blitstein

The San Jose Mercury News, October 12, 2006

McAfee's chairman and chief executive, as well as its president, will step down after revelations of stock-option backdating at the Santa Clara security software company, the company announced today.

Chairman and CEO George Samenuk will retire, and company President Kevin Weiss was terminated by its board of directors.

``The board has had to make some very difficult decisions, in the last 24 hours but we believe they were in the best interests of the McAfee shareholders," said McAfee board member Dale Fuller in a conference call this morning with financial analysts. Fuller, former CEO and president of Borland Software, will take over as the company's interim CEO and president.

A similar review at online media company CNet Networks in San Francisco led today to the resignation of co-founder and Chief Executive Shelby Bonnie.

The three executives are the latest casualties in a scandal that has ensnared more than 120 U.S. companies, about one-fourth of them in Silicon Valley. The businesses either face investigations by the Securities and Exchange Commission or Justice Department or are conducting internal reviews.

Backdating involves changing the dates on the paperwork on options to a day when stock prices were lower, giving recipients a better chance for quick paper profits. Many companies under investigation have warned they will need to restate past financial reports because option abuses led them to overstate their profits.

McAfee said it would have to restate earnings from the last 10 years by $100 million to $150 million.

Fuller spent much of last night and the early-morning hours breaking the news to McAfee senior managers around the world.

``I don't believe that we'll have any disruption of business," he told analysts. ``My job is really to stay partially out of their way and to help clear away any of the deck that might be causing any friction or struggles for them."

In mid-May, McAfee admitted it was in informal discussions with the SEC about possible backdating, and launched the internal investigation. Later that month, the company fired general counsel Kent Roberts in connection with the review.

In June, the company said it had received a subpoena for documents from the SEC for a formal investigation. Several McAfee shareholders have also initiated lawsuits against the company.

At CNet, Executive Vice President Neil Ashe has been appointed CEO, and Charles Robel has been named board chairman. Jarl Mohn, a former MTV and VH1 executive and founder of E Entertainment Television, has been named CNet's non-executive chairman.

The company said it will release its quarterly earnings reports as scheduled on Oct. 23, but will be delaying its 10-K earnings filing with the SEC.

CNET General Counsel Steps Down Over Stock Options Probe (LAW)

By Justin Scheck And Jessie Seyfer, The Recorder

California Recorder, October 12, 2006

It's not clear whether the latest lawyer to go down because of stock option backdating was involved in the actual decision to award suspect options.

But a Recorder review of SEC filings shows CNET General Counsel Sharon Le Duy did receive grants when the stock was trading at quarterly lows.

CNET announced Wednesday that an internal probe found "deficiencies with the process by which options were granted at CNET, including in some instances the backdating of stock options grants" from 1996 through at least 2003. Le Duy and CEO Shelby Bonnie stepped down, along with the company's human resources chief.

The announcement also said "a number of executives of the company ... bear varying degrees of responsibility" for backdated grants, though it didn't specify who those executives are.

Le Duy's lawyer, Melinda Haag of Orrick, Herrington & Sutcliffe, says her client is in the clear.

"Sharon did not participate in or know about any intentional misstating of stock options at CNET," said Haag.

But according to SEC filings, between 1999 and 2003 Le Duy received six options awards, and four of them came at quarterly lows in share price.

The odds that four of six grants would come at quarterly lows is less than one in 880,000, according to an equation provided by Erik Lie, the University of Iowa professor whose research on options grants raised awareness of the backdating phenomenon earlier this year.

The questionable grants given to Le Duy came in 2000, 2001 and 2003. And while they at one time had considerable paper value, Le Duy -- like so many others during the tech boom -- soon ended up having many of her options buried by a plummeting stock market.

Share price was certainly on an overall decline in April of 2000, when Le Duy received the option to purchase 30,000 shares dated April 17. CNET stock was trading at $24.625, which was its lowest price in well over a year.

The stock immediately jumped, hitting $31.50 within two days, and it surpassed $41 less than a month later.

Later in 2000, Le Duy got a much larger grant -- the option to purchase 60,000 shares -- dated Oct. 18, and priced at $18.875. Leading up to that date, the company's share price saw a steady decline. After bottoming out at $18.875, it immediately began rising, exceeding $30 on Oct. 26 before plummeting.

Le Duy never got a chance to profit from these two option grants, as the company eventually exchanged them for a lower-priced award in 2003.

The company did not exchange all of Le Duy's options, though.

Suffering like the rest of the tech industry, CNET saw its share price fall from more than $10 in August 2001 to $3.20 on Oct. 2. On Oct. 8 -- when Le Duy received 60,000 options -- it was priced at $3.42.

It then began a steady increase, hitting $9 by the end of November. It is unclear whether Le Duy ever exercised all of these options.

A fourth grant, in 2003, also came at a quarterly low. After surpassing $5 in early June of that year, CNET's share price hit $4.65 on June 24. On that day, Le Duy received the option to purchase 125,000 shares.

While the grant doesn't appear to have been backdated -- it was reported to the SEC within two days of being awarded -- it came before the company announced favorable financial results on July 22. The stock began a steady rise, hitting $7.34 by the end of July.

"Sharon has always acted with integrity with regard to CNET's stock options grant process and in all other regards," she added. "Given that she was a senior officer for part of the time at issue, however, Sharon recognized that her resignation would best help the company move forward."

A Boalt Hall graduate, Le Duy joined CNET in November 1999 after serving as senior counsel for AirTouch Communications. Before that, she worked as an associate for Latham & Watkins, according to the CNET Web site.

DOJ_NMG_0079678

CNET's attorney, Latham & Watkins' Patrick Gibbs, referred questions about the reasons behind Le Duy's resignation to CNET spokeswoman Sarah Cain. Cain declined to comment, saying that any information the company was ready to release was in Wednesday's press release.

Le Duy's departure Wednesday came along with news that the chief executive of computer security firm McAfee Inc., George Samenuk, the target of a federal stock-options accounting probe, also stepped down.

McAfee General Counsel Kent Roberts stepped down in May after an internal investigation revealed he had received an improper stock option grant. In August, Northern California federal prosecutors sent the company a grand jury subpoena.

Roberts' attorney, Cooley Godward Kronish's Stephen Neal, did not return a call seeking comment on the latest McAfee resignation.

Court Denies United Request To Stop State's Options Probe (MINNST)

By David Phelps, Star Tribune

Minneapolis Star Tribune, October 12, 2006

Attorney General Mike Hatch can proceed with his investigation into the question of stock-option dating at UnitedHealth Group Inc., Ramsey County District Judge David Higgs has ruled.

Attorney General Mike Hatch can proceed with his investigation into the question of stock-option dating at UnitedHealth Group Inc., Ramsey County District Judge David Higgs has ruled.

Higgs denied UnitedHealth's request for a protective order to stop Hatch from getting company documents related to the disputed options, which also are the target of investigations by federal regulators, the Internal Revenue Service, the Justice Department and a special independent internal review committee.

UnitedHealth argued that Hatch's civil investigative demands for corporate documents had no jurisdiction under state law and would be an undue burden to the Minnetonka-based company.

Higgs disagreed, saying the material sought by Hatch "is clearly relevant and essential" to the attorney general's investigation to determine whether top executives got favorable treatment in the dating of their stock options.

"UnitedHealth presented no evidence suggesting that it will suffer undue burden if the requested discovery is permitted," Higgs said in a memorandum Wednesday accompanying his ruling.

Hatch and other investigators are attempting to determine whether UnitedHealth's option program allowed top executives to accumulate large numbers of options at low prices and reap large profits when they later exercised the options at a significantly higher share price.

The company said it plans to appeal the ruling.

"While we respect the court's decision, we continue to believe that the attorney general is overstepping the limits of his investigative authority in this matter," the company said in a prepared statement. "UnitedHealth has been and is cooperating fully with the ongoing reviews by federal regulators who have jurisdiction and expertise concerning the issues in question, and by the independent committee of the board of directors supported by outside counsel."

David Phelps · 612-673-7269 · dphelps@startribune.com

Backdating To The Future (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 12, 2006

The options "backdating" backlash continues to cut a swath through corporate management, with executives at CNET Networks and McAfee Inc. getting the ax yesterday after internal probes. While there's no excuse for false reporting to shareholders, the worst reaction to this mini-scandal would be for Congress to overreact.

For one thing, the practice is undeniably in the past, a legacy of the 1990s' stock-market bubble and pre-Sarbanes-Oxley accounting rules. For another, the practice has now been suspected or detected at so many companies -- 115 at last count -- that its alleged perfidy is being diluted by its ubiquity. Are all of the CEOs, CFOs and general counsels at all of these companies greedy and corrupt? Seems unlikely. Maybe these managements were trying to fulfill an important business purpose -- attract and retain key talent in a competitive labor marketplace -- and merely ran afoul of ambiguous option accounting standards.

The Justice Department and SEC are investigating, which is fair enough. But watch out for Senate Finance Chairman Charles Grassley, who has begun to rumble about eliminating the tax deduction for performance-based pay, such as stock options. He's liable to make things worse.

At a recent Senate hearing, neither SEC Chairman Christopher Cox nor Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty expressed any enthusiasm for such a legislative "fix." And Chairman Cox noted the irony of Congress's own role in promoting options compensation: Stock-option issuance to top execs ballooned in the 1990s after Congress capped the tax deductibility of salaries at $1 million in 1993.

DOJ_NMG_0079679

"As a Member of Congress at the time, I well remember that the stated purpose was to control the rate of growth in CEO pay," Mr. Cox said. "With complete hindsight, we can now all agree that this purpose was not achieved. Indeed, this tax-law change deserves pride of place in the Museum of Unintended Consequences." The de facto salary cap's main effect was to divert compensation into other, tax-advantaged, modes -- such as stock options.

Mr. Cox was too polite to fill in the blank for the tub-thumping populist who lives inside Mr. Grassley, but the implication is obvious. If the Senator is concerned about "excessive" stock-option grants, he might turn his attention to lifting that arbitrary cap on the deductibility of executive salaries. Senator Robert Bennett of Utah has proposed exactly this. But Mr. Grassley would rather "fix" one government-caused distortion in the incentives for executive pay by layering on another. The tale of the woman who swallowed the spider to catch the fly comes to mind.

Then there is the related, but separate, question of "spring-loading" options by granting them just ahead of news that could reasonably be expected to give the stock price a favorable result. SEC Commissioner Paul Atkins courted criticism in July when he gave a speech defending spring-loading options grants. He noted at the time that, because there was no counterparty to the transaction, there could be no question of insider trading when an options package was approved ahead of good news.

The legality of this practice remains uncertain. In some recent (and extreme) cases, investigations have resulted in settlements with the SEC over well-timed grants. While critics have raised fairness questions, few are pretending that spring-loading and backdating are in any way equivalent.

Keep in mind that executive stock options generally vest over a period of years, far too long for a momentary blip in the stock price to equate to a guaranteed profit. But, other things being equal, granting options at a lower price allows the company to issue fewer options. By way of analogy, take restricted stock, which is effectively a stock option with a strike price of zero. Is restricted stock "unfair" because it has no strike price? The question answers itself. Restricted stock merely allows a company to offer similar compensation with a somewhat different risk-reward balance.

As to whether the executives thus favored with spring-loaded options somehow "unfairly" benefit, the case of Brocade, one of the most infamous of the alleged backdaters, is instructive. For all the huffing and puffing over Brocade's alleged systematic backdating, most of the options in dispute are still under water owing to a collapse in the company's stock price between their issuance and their vesting. Only one executive exercised any of the options in question at all after the company's 1999 IPO. Neither spring-loaded nor backdated options are anything like a surefire road to riches.

This is not to say that falsifying records or failing to disclose compensation practices to shareholders is OK. Shareholders deserve full disclosure from the executives and directors who work for them. But before the dudgeon gets too high, let's bear in mind that this problem is already in the past. And if Congress wants to "fix" it, the Members could do worse than to revisit their own role in creating the problem in the first place.

Enron's Skilling Asks To Remain Free On Bail During His Appeal (WP)

By Carrie Johnson, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 12, 2006

Former Enron Corp. chief executive Jeffrey K. Skilling is asking a judge to let him remain free while he appeals his conviction on 19 fraud, conspiracy and false-filings charges, according to court papers filed by his defense team.

Skilling, 52, faces more than two decades in prison when he is sentenced in a Houston federal court. Under the federal system, he must serve at least 85 percent of his sentence. U.S. District Judge Simeon T. Lake III could order Skilling into custody immediately after the court proceeding, set for Oct. 23.

But defense attorneys this week launched a preemptive strike, asking the judge to allow Skilling to remain free on bail pending his appeal. Alternatively, attorneys requested that Skilling be allowed to surrender to the Bureau of Prisons on Jan. 2, or no earlier than Nov. 27. He presents no flight risk and is not "a threat to society," attorney Daniel M. Petrocelli wrote.

Skilling has had other legal troubles since his May conviction. Earlier this month, he paid $385 to resolve a misdemeanor public-intoxication charge filed in Dallas.

To remain free during the appeals process, Skilling must prove he will raise substantial issues that are likely to result in a reversal of his conviction.

Lawyers cited three key issues they will bring up in the coming appeal: an instruction that allowed jurors to consider whether Skilling turned a blind eye to accounting fraud that took place on his watch, alleged jury bias in Enron's Houston home town, and a lack of access to former insiders at the energy-trading company.

The Justice Department's Enron Task Force has yet to respond to the defense motion.

Filings Illuminate IPO's Bumpy Ride (WP)

By Griff Witte

DOJ_NMG_0079680

The Washington Post, October 12, 2006

For 37 years, Science Applications International Corp. has been owned by its employees. In that time, the company has grown from nothing to an $8 billion giant that does some of the government's most sensitive work in intelligence, homeland security and defense.

But within days, those employees -- 43,100 of them, more than a third of whom live in the Washington area -- will have to learn to share their company with people who have never before had the chance to own SAIC stock: members of the public.

SAIC shares could begin trading on the New York Stock Exchange as soon as tomorrow in an initial public offering estimated to be worth $1 billion, which would be among the largest IPOs ever in the defense industry.

The shift to a public company is the culmination of a broader transformation for SAIC of San Diego, which has grown significantly in recent years and is gunning to move into the top tier of contractors. But SAIC has stumbled several times along the way. In recent public filings, it has had to acknowledge that more problems lie ahead as the government market flattens and as it continues to be dogged by questions about its performance.

"The thing that really stands out to me about this IPO is how difficult it's been for the company," said Philip Finnegan, director of corporate analysis at Teal Group Corp., a market research firm. The offering is "smaller than they were originally talking about. It's been delayed so long. And now they've had to admit some programmatic embarrassments."

As with all companies that plan to go public, SAIC was required to disclose the risks of buying its stock in a filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission. That filing shows that the company lost $123 million on a contract with the government of Greece to provide security at the 2004 Olympics in Athens, and it could lose substantially more. Greek authorities have long maintained that SAIC did not meet its obligations under the contract, and that they should get their money back.

SAIC has also been criticized for its work on other high-profile projects, including the FBI's case-management system, data-mining software for the National Security Agency and a television station for post-invasion Iraq.

A spokeswoman for SAIC declined to comment because the company is in its "quiet period" before the IPO. But the firm has defended its work in the past.

SAIC was supposed to go public earlier this year, but the company put off the IPO because it first wanted to resolve problems with the Olympics contract. The delay was ill-timed. The government contracting industry had been flying high as of early 2006, reaching the peak of the boom that followed the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. Since then, revenue and profit have begun to level off, as have company stock prices. SAIC had originally indicated it planned to raise as much as $1.7 billion with its IPO, but a softer market meant that it had to set its sights lower.

Still, the IPO promises to be lucrative for SAIC employees, who would initially hold 81 percent of the company's shares. Not only will employees be able to sell their stock on the public market, but they will also receive a substantial dividend. SAIC has said it would return all the proceeds of its IPO and then some -- $1.6 billion to $2.4 billion in all -- to its current shareholders.

Company directors and top executives would benefit most from that arrangement, as they are the biggest stockholders. Chief executive Kenneth C. Dahlberg, for example, owns 335,927 shares, according to company filings.

But average employees would also gain if the stock performs well, and that could have ripple effects on the regional economy. SAIC is the region's fourth-largest private-sector employer with around 16,000 workers locally, many of them well-paid engineers, consultants and scientists who possess high-level government clearances and work side by side with government employees on top-secret programs.

"If experience is any guide, there will be a real impact here in terms of spending and wealth creation," said Anirban Basu, chief executive of the economic consulting firm Sage Policy Group Inc. "Often, people who find themselves in a lot of money in a short amount of time are in the habit of making a big-ticket purchase -- and perhaps several of them. This is the type of thing that gives berth to Ferraris and Bentleys."

SAIC could make some big-ticket acquisitions of its own. Dahlberg joined the company in late 2003 with the goal of rapid growth, after decades of steady expansion under founder J. Robert Beyster. Since 2004, revenue is up by more than $2 billion, and profit has more than doubled as SAIC cashed in on rising demand for high-end technology and personnel after the 2001 attacks.

"They've got whole buildings out there in Tysons Corner that are funded by agencies that we're not going to even talk about," said John E. Pike, director of GlobalSecurity.org, a Web site that tracks the defense and intelligence sectors. "They must be doing something right."

Dahlberg, a veteran of General Dynamics Corp. in Falls Church, has made no secret that he wants to put SAIC in the same league as contracting behemoths such as Lockheed Martin Corp., Northrop Grumman Corp. and General Dynamics. He has streamlined the company's structure, which had been famously decentralized, with company units sometimes competing against each other for the same work.

The IPO is intended to help the company grow even more because it would free capital that had been used to buy back employee stock. Trading is to begin at $13 to $15 a share. Fourteen dollars a share would give SAIC a market value of $5.6 billion.

But some worry that SAIC could lose something after it joins the ranks of public companies. Retired Adm. Bobby Ray Inman, former head of the NSA and an SAIC board member for two decades, said employee ownership was what drew him to the company.

"For me, the principal value of the employee-owned culture was the focus on integrity and accountability," said Inman, who left the board several years ago. "Will that be maintained now? I don't know."

Money Rules Behind Soaring Executive Pay, Decades Of Failed Restraints (WSJ)

By Joann S. Lublin And Scott Thurm

The Wall Street Journal, October 12, 2006

In 1993, activist investor Ralph Whitworth shuttered United Shareholders Association, a group that was trying to tackle the contentious issue of executive pay. It looked as if his work was done.

Federal securities regulators had just forced companies to reveal details about pay and perks for top officials, in some cases for the first time. The changes would "make boards think twice" before approving compensation plans that couldn't be justified, Mr. Whitworth recalls thinking. Around the same time, Congress attacked executive pay for the second time in a decade by removing tax breaks on compensation above one million dollars.

Since then, the average pay for chief executives of large companies has quadrupled, according to Kevin Murphy, a professor at the University of Southern California's Marshall School of Business. The average last year was $10.5 million, a figure that includes salary, bonus and the value of stock and stock-option grants.

There are many reasons why Mr. Whitworth was mistaken in his prediction, including the bull market of the 1990s, cozy corporate boards and CEOs striving to keep pace with highly paid athletes and entertainers. What's often overlooked is the role of all the efforts -- by Mr. Whitworth and many others -- to limit CEO compensation. For more than two decades, critics tried to slow skyrocketing pay through regulations, legislation and shareholder pressure. Few of their tactics worked. Many backfired.

As it turns out, disclosure requirements can push pay higher by revealing to CEOs what their peers receive. Limiting one type of compensation often encourages new types of pay, such as stock options, which were pushed as a solution only to become tainted by scandal. Now that shareholders are quicker to push out poorly performing chiefs, CEOs are seeking more financial guarantees. And if companies turn to outsiders, they often have to pay extra.

Curbing executive compensation is "like moving Jell-O," says Kayla Gillan, the former general counsel of the California Public Employees Retirement System, or Calpers, the nation's largest public pension fund. When it's limited in one area, "it squirts out in another."

Mr. Whitworth disputes the idea that advocacy like his helped make things worse. "To say there's a causal relationship between reform efforts and high executive pay is not logical," the veteran shareholder activist says. Instead, he says he and his peers erred in not focusing on company compensation committees and their lack of accountability to investors. As a result, he says, "CEOs still get whatever they can."

In recent years, CEOs have raced ahead of other Americans, including their own lieutenants. Mr. Murphy calculates that average CEO pay was 369 times as much as the average earned by a worker last year, compared with 131 times in 1993 and 36 times in 1976. Meanwhile, the average U.S. paycheck has barely kept ahead of inflation in recent years.

Carola Frydman, a finance professor at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology's Sloan School of Management, says the pay gap between CEOs and other executives at the same company has doubled since the 1960s.

Charles Munger, vice chairman of Warren Buffett's Berkshire Hathaway Inc., and a longtime business partner of the famed investor, describes executive compensation as "wretched excess." In an interview, Mr. Munger says he hears complaints even from "Republicans who grumble on the country-club porch" about the resulting political turmoil over the pay question. They're "mad at corporate America," he says.

The Securities and Exchange Commission recently set forth another set of rules governing the expanded disclosure of top executive pay and benefits. For the first time, it required that companies reveal top executives' "total compensation." Investors, too, are intensifying efforts to limit pay. They're embarrassing some highly paid CEOs, trying to change corporate bylaws and seeking to replace directors who bless exorbitant packages.

There are already doubts as to whether these moves will be any more effective than prior efforts. According to a survey by the University of Southern California and executive-search firm Heidrick & Struggles International Inc., 64% of directors say they expect CEO cash compensation to continue to rise; 58% say they expect stock compensation to continue to rise.

DOJ_NMG_0079682

Many CEOs say they're paid what they're worth. The Business Roundtable, a group of big-company CEOs, says compensation has roughly kept pace with stock-market returns for the past decade. Using different methodology than that employed by Mr. Murphy, the group says the typical CEO makes 179 times as much as a typical U.S. worker.

"I made a lot of money. I became wealthy," says Harvey Golub, CEO of American Express Co. from 1993 to 2000. "My shareholders became even wealthier."

During Mr. Golub's tenure, American Express's shares rose more than sixfold and its market capitalization climbed to $65 billion from $10 billion. "How much of that $55 billion should I get?" he asks.

Mr. Golub was paid roughly $57 million in salary, bonus and restricted stock over eight years. He also exercised options to buy shares valued at $92 million. When he stepped down as CEO, he held options valued at $114.5 million and received an additional 990,000 options. Because he soon after retired as chairman, investors don't know how much Mr. Golub made from exercising those options. He declines to divulge the figure. Mr. Golub is a director of Dow Jones & Co., publisher of The Wall Street Journal.

In his 1936 State of the Union address, President Franklin D. Roosevelt railed against "entrenched greed" at American corporations. At the time, the average compensation for the top executive of a big company was about $95,000, according to MIT's Ms. Frydman, equivalent to $1.4 million in today's dollars.

Reflecting the more egalitarian societal values, as well as punitively high marginal tax rates, executive pay barely budged in the prosperous post-World War II decades. In 1970, Ms. Frydman says, average CEO pay was no more, adjusted for inflation, than it was in 1940.

Then, in the late 1970s, the culture of pay started to change. After a decadelong bear market soured executives on stock and stock options, they began to seek out other forms of compensation, aided by a budding industry of pay consultants. Among the most inventive CEOs was the late Steven J. Ross, chief of Warner Communications Inc. and later Time Warner Inc.

The son of an oil-burner salesman, Mr. Ross built a media empire from a chain of funeral parlors and parking lots. He weathered a federal investigation, fought with partners and investors and fended off takeover attempts from Rupert Murdoch, among others.

In 1981, Mr. Ross took home more than $22 million, including gains on stock options, making him the first executive to crack $10 million in annual compensation, according to Mr. Murphy.

In addition to a salary and a bonus pegged to Warner's profits, Mr. Ross received a dizzying array of other types of compensation, including stock, stock options and multiple forms of deferred compensation. Between 1973 and 1989, he took home $275 million, according to Graef Crystal, a former compensation consultant who is now a columnist and critic of executive pay.

The 1980s witnessed a flourishing of different types of compensation, following President Reagan's deep cuts in the top rates of income tax. Some of the techniques were seemingly unrelated to performance, such as "signing bonuses" for new CEOs and "guaranteed bonuses." In 1981, Occidental Petroleum Corp. CEO Armand Hammer was promised a bonus of at least $240,000.

Golden Parachutes

Another new technique was the "golden parachute," a sizable sum promised to executives if their company was taken over. Without such assurances, boards worried that executives might oppose a deal that was good for shareholders out of concern for their own futures.

In 1983, Bendix Corp. CEO William J. Agee received $3.9 million over five years after his aerospace, auto-parts and machine-tools concern was acquired by Allied Corp., an industrial conglomerate. It was one of the decade's first bruising takeover battles, sparked by Mr. Agee when he tried to buy aerospace and defense firm Martin Marietta Corp. The size of his parachute, as well as the circumstances in which it was paid, created a furor.

The following year, Congress slapped a special tax on golden parachutes. "The Bill Agee Bill," as some at the time dubbed it, taxed awards valued at more than three times an executive's average compensation over the previous five years.

Rather than curbing pay, the law had the opposite effect. Despite a few well-publicized examples, golden parachutes were rare before Congress intervened. In a survey of companies named in either the Fortune 1000 list or the S&P 500 index, a mere 8% gave at least one executive a golden parachute before the law was passed. By taxing parachutes at a certain level, Congress in effect blessed their existence. It also gave the technique a publicity boost.

Baxter International Inc. adopted golden parachutes for its CEO and 22 other officers for the first time in 1985, promising executives twice their annual salary and bonus. A Baxter spokeswoman says the parachutes came at a "tumultuous" time of mergers in the industry.

By 1991, more than half of the top companies in the survey provided parachutes to certain executives, according to Executive Compensation Reports, a newsletter.

DOJ_NMG_0079683

The parachute law also spawned a new form of compensation: payments to cover the new taxes. By 2004, 77% of 1,000 public concerns tracked by consulting firm Towers Perrin offered such tax compensation, known as a "gross up," compared with 10% in 1987.

James F. Reda, a New York pay consultant who began working in the field in the late 1980s, recalls: "It was an easy argument to sell to boards, that it's just money going to the government, so why penalize these people?"

Critics of executive pay say boards, stocked as they often are with CEOs and retired CEOs, rarely need to be sold on pay packages. Mr. Buffett, well known for his dislike of ostentatious compensation, joined the compensation committee of Salomon Inc. after taking a stake in the investment bank in the late 1980s. In 1990, when Salomon's profit declined, Mr. Buffett voted against bonuses for top executives, a rare event inside U.S. boardrooms. Mr. Buffett was outvoted and hasn't been asked to serve on a compensation committee since.

Compensation panels are "tail-wagging puppy dogs meekly following recommendations by consultants," Mr. Buffett wrote in his 2002 letter to Berkshire shareholders. For an outside director to oppose these recommendations "would be like belching at the dinner table."

In spring 1990, Richard Koppes, then general counsel of Calpers, convened a meeting of corporate lawyers and activist investors at Morton's Steakhouse in Washington, D.C. Ira Millstein, a New York attorney and longtime adviser to the boards of General Motors Corp. and Walt Disney Co., urged investors to focus on executive pay. "You shareholders can do something about it," he said.

To better align CEO pay with shareholder returns, activists started urging a wider use of stock options. Options give the holder the right, but not the obligation, to buy shares at a specified price. They become valuable only when a company's share price increases.

Calpers began publishing a "target list" of overpaid, underperforming CEOs. Its initial top target was Rand Araskog, chief executive of conglomerate ITT Corp. Mr. Araskog, the son of Swedish immigrants, graduated from West Point. After fending off corporate raiders, he spent a decade dismantling ITT, a sprawling conglomerate whose businesses stretched from telephones to timber. In 1990, Mr. Araskog's compensation rose 82%, to $7.3 million, the same year ITT shares fell 18%.

In September 1991, Mr. Araskog met Mr. Whitworth, the investor activist, at the offices of his group, United Shareholders. "I'm tired of being the poster boy for executive compensation," Mr. Whitworth recalls Mr. Araskog saying. "What would you do?"

On a yellow legal pad, Mr. Whitworth sketched a plan that paid a modest cash compensation and plenty of options. Mr. Araskog "tore it off and took it with him," Mr. Whitworth says. Two days later, the chairman of ITT's compensation committee chairman called Mr. Whitworth and declared, "Rand is going to take you up on your offer." Mr. Araskog says he doesn't dispute Mr. Whitworth's recollection.

As a result, ITT gave Mr. Araskog options for the first time -- 170,000 with an initial value of $3.5 million. The board also revamped its long-term performance plan and moderated Mr. Araskog's salary increases. The CEO received a 6% raise in 1992, down from a 17% raise the year before. Mr. Araskog says ITT embraced options partly because making money under the old performance plan was "next to impossible."

With subsequent grants, Mr. Araskog held options valued at $17.8 million by the end of 1995 when ITT broke itself up and sold off the pieces. He retired in 1998 and received $15 million in severance.

Other top CEOs took up the concept. In 1990, H.J. Heinz Co. CEO Anthony J.F. O'Reilly received options to acquire four million shares. The following year, Leon Hirsch, chief of medical-products company U.S. Surgical Corp. received options for 2.75 million shares valued at $170 million, more than 100 times his annual salary and bonus.

At the time, "we never saw an [option] plan we didn't like," Mr. Whitworth recalls. "People would say, 'How much is too much?' We said, 'The sky's the limit as long as it's tied to stock options,' which we equated to performance."

Shareholders expected option grants would displace other types of compensation. More often, they were doled out as an extra. As chairman and CEO of Chase Manhattan Corp., Walter V. Shipley received a $750,000 salary and options for 90,000 shares in 1993. Four years later, he was granted options for 240,000 shares, with an estimated value of $3.8 million. Mr. Shipley's salary rose, too, to $950,000.

The huge option grants began to trigger enormous paydays. In 1992, Disney CEO Michael Eisner exercised options valued at nearly $127 million. The former studio head reshaped and revived Disney in the 1980s and Disney's share price had risen tenfold.

Amid the economic downturn and corporate restructurings of the early 1990s, complaints about such awards found receptive audiences. In 1992, Democratic presidential candidate Bill Clinton made executive pay a campaign issue. Washington responded.

DOJ_NMG_0079684

The SEC said it would require more disclosure about compensation, particularly stock options and executive perks. The following year, after Mr. Clinton was elected, Congress decided companies could no longer take tax deductions on executive compensation of more than $1 million, unless it was related to performance.

Neither approach slowed the upward march of executive compensation. In fact, the disclosure rules allowed CEOs to see what others were getting, encouraging a competitive spiral. The tax law, meanwhile, drove up the compensation of CEOs who were making less than $1 million. Executives considered the cap a "minimum wage for CEOs," says Mr. Koppes, the former Calpers official.

SEC Chairman Christopher Cox recently said the 1993 law belongs in "the Museum of Unintended Consequences," because it encouraged the growth of "less transparent forms" of pay, such as pensions and deferred compensation.

Ignoring the Caps

Some companies felt free to ignore the caps altogether, especially as they wooed outsiders, a tactic increasingly used by boards to fix succession problems. In the 1970s, says the University of Southern California's Mr. Murphy, companies picked outside CEOs about 15% of the time. By the 1990s, that had risen to 27%. Last year, executive-search firm Spencer Stuart says outsiders won 40% of the CEO vacancies at S&P 500 firms.

Eastman Kodak Co. in 1993 wooed George Fisher, the successful chairman and CEO of Motorola Inc. Kodak offered a $2 million salary, more than double what he was earning at Motorola. Kodak didn't seem bothered by having to sacrifice tax deductions on half the $2 million. Mr. Fisher says, "I don't remember that was ever part of the discussion."

Mr. Fisher says the $2 million figure originated with his attorney, Joseph Bachelder, who had negotiated a similar deal for Louis V. Gerstner at International Business Machines Corp. Kodak also gave Mr. Fisher a $5 million signing bonus, a $1 million guaranteed bonus in both 1994 and 1995, 20,000 restricted shares and more than one million stock options.

"Going outside can be frightful," says Alfred DeCrane Jr., former CEO of Texaco Corp., who has served as a director on four compensation committees. "You can negotiate, but if you want to close the deal, you have to close it."

Defenders of CEO pay say these contracts demonstrate the market value of a successful executive. "There is an incredible shortage of qualified people to manage and lead big companies today," says Kenneth Langone, a veteran Wall Street figure. Mr. Langone is a defender of two executives caught up in pay controversies: Former New York Stock Exchange Chairman Richard Grasso and Home Depot Inc. CEO Robert Nardelli. Mr. Langone chaired the NYSE's compensation committee and is a director and a co-founder of Home Depot.

Mr. Bachelder, who has been negotiating CEO contracts for 26 years, points to another factor: big paydays for athletes, entertainers and money managers. "It's the Michael Jordan principle," Mr. Bachelder says. "If he can get $30 million, I have to get it."

Throughout this time, options remained a favorite pay tool for an important reason -- they were effectively free. Options granted at or above the market price of a stock did not have to be recorded as a company expense in financial results.

Accounting regulators proposed changing this rule in 1993 but backed off following opposition from Congress and Silicon Valley. Then-SEC Chairman Arthur Levitt later wrote in his memoir that failing to support the accounting change was his "biggest mistake" as chairman.

A few directors tried to buck the option fad to little effect. In the early 1990s, shareholder activist Robert Monks persuaded fellow directors of Tyco International Ltd. to pay CEO L. Dennis Kozlowski with restricted stock -- which requires a holder to wait several years before it can be sold -- rather than options. At Mr. Monks's urging, they also decided to deny Mr. Kozlowski a bonus if Tyco's cash flow and earnings didn't grow by at least 15%.

During a 1993 board meeting at a Tyco factory in Michigan, Mr. Monks says, he called for independent board members to meet privately and discuss even tougher ties between pay and performance. Mr. Kozlowski and his predecessor, John Fort, another board member, refused to leave the room, Mr. Monks says. The following year, Mr. Monks was not renominated for the board.

In 1997, Mr. Kozlowski received 3.3 million options after Tyco acquired security firm ADT Ltd. He later swapped some restricted stock for more options. Between 1998 and 2001, Mr. Kozlowski reaped more than $400 million in salary, stock grants and gains from options, according to securities filings. Mr. Kozlowski and his former finance chief were convicted last year of looting more than $150 million from Tyco. Both are serving prison sentences of as much as 25 years, and have appealed their convictions.

Asked for comment, a Tyco spokeswoman would say only that "prior management is no longer in place."

In the bull market of the late 1990s, these awards led to staggering paydays. In general, criticism of such deals was relatively muted as smaller investors also benefited from rising stock prices.

DOJ_NMG_0079685

That changed in 2001 when Enron Corp. collapsed in an accounting scandal. Others corporate debacles followed: WorldCom Inc., Adelphia Corp., Tyco. In each case, top executives massaged the books to prop up the share prices that accounted for most of their worth.

In response, the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, passed in 2002, required more timely disclosure of executive-pay deals and required CEOs to return compensation based on financial results that were later restated. The disclosure requirement squelched another pervasive, but little-known, practice of the 1990s, a side effect of the options craze: the "backdating" of stock options. The long-hidden practice burst into public view this year, and now more than 100 companies are under scrutiny for manipulating the timing of option grants to generate even bigger gains for executives.

By 2003, the average option grant fell nearly by half to $3.3 million, according to the University of Southern California's Mr. Murphy. As a result, average CEO compensation actually declined, to $8.7 million in 2003, from $12.8 million in 2000.

The following year, accounting rulemakers finally required stock-option grants to be treated as an expense. Corporate boards responded by distributing fewer options.

In lieu of options, boards distributed more restricted stock. Some questioned whether this was progress; unlike options, restricted stock retains its value even if share prices decline. Other boards pledged to tie pay more closely to performance.

Big awards are now popping up when executives leave their companies, regardless of performance. As of the end of last year, then-Pfizer Inc. CEO Henry McKinnell accumulated $83 million in pension benefits, according to company filings. He was ousted as CEO in July. During his five-year tenure, Pfizer stock declined nearly 37%. Mr. McKinnell is set to remain Pfizer chairman until his retirement in February.

His pension benefits "were awarded on the basis of many years of service to the company, including years in which the company significantly outperformed the market and its peers," says Dana Mead, head of the Pfizer board's compensation committee, in a written statement.

Golden parachutes are back, too. James Kilts, CEO of Gillette Co., received about $164.5 million in severance and other benefits after the razor maker was acquired by consumer-products giant Procter & Gamble Co. last year. North Fork Bancorp CEO John Kanas received $185 million for selling his Melville, N.Y.-based bank to a rival.

"By the time the payments are disclosed, the CEO is gone," notes Sarah Teslik, a longtime corporate-governance watchdog. "The worst that happens is a day's trashing in the press."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Blagojevich Friend Faces Fraud Charges (SLPD)

By Kevin McDermott, POST-DISPATCH SPRINGFIELD BUREAU

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, October 12, 2006

A federal corruption investigation edged closer to Illinois Gov. Rod Blagojevich on Wednesday, with the indictment of a Blagojevich friend and fundraiser who allegedly conspired with another defendant to extort money from state contractors - some of it earmarked for the campaign fund of "a certain public official."

Blagojevich - a Democrat just 27 days from the end of a re-election campaign in a race that has focused on corruption issues - isn't named in the indictment unsealed in Chicago. U.S. Attorney Patrick Fitzgerald, laying out his case at a news conference, refused to answer repeated questions about whether Blagojevich is the unnamed official for whom the two men were allegedly shaking down contractors.

But the indictment includes allegations that Blagojevich confidant Antoin "Tony" Rezko used "his relationships and influence" in state government to get the other defendant reappointed to a state pension board, so they could continue demanding kickbacks from contractors hired by the board. That board's members are appointed by the governor.

The 24-count federal indictment names Rezko, a close Blagojevich adviser and major fundraiser, and Stuart Levine, a former Blagojevich appointee to the Illinois Teachers Retirement System. It charges attempted extortion, money laundering and mail and wire fraud.

Fitzgerald said Levine is cooperating with investigators. That's likely to put the spotlight on Rezko, 51, a Syrian immigrant and millionaire businessman who has raised hundreds of thousands of dollars for Blagojevich while serving as an unofficial but close adviser to him.

"In the spring of 2004, there was a frenzied effort (by Rezko and Levine) to try to obtain millions of dollars illegally in kickbacks and shakedowns" for themselves and for the unidentified political fund, Fitzgerald said.

DOJ_NMG_0079686

In one alleged scheme laid out in the indictment, Rezko and Levine are accused of attempting to prevent one firm from getting a $220 million investment contract unless the firm gave $1.5 million in political contributions to what the indictment identified only as "a certain public official."

The indictment doesn't reveal whether that official is Blagojevich. There's no indication in the indictment that the public official knew about the alleged scheme.

That scheme fell through, Fitzgerald said, after the investment firm threatened to go to the authorities, causing Rezko and Levine to back off.

The indictment also alleges that Rezko successfully got Levine reappointed to the Teachers Retirement System board so that their schemes could continue. The governor makes all appointments to the board, and it was Blagojevich who reappointed Levine.

Fitzgerald is mum

Fitzgerald turned aside reporters' questions about Blagojevich's possible role. "I'm not going to talk about anyone who's not charged," he said.

He added that the inquiry is ongoing and that it won't be affected by the Nov. 7 gubernatorial election.

"We're going to bring the cases as soon as they're ready to go. . . . We're not going to take a siesta for election season," Fitzgerald said.

Blagojevich has been leading Republican challenger Judy Baar Topinka in polls but has been dogged all year by questions about the continuing federal investigation into people around him.

"The allegations in today's indictments, if proven true, are a violation of my trust but far more importantly a betrayal of the public's trust - the indictment details a pattern of self-enrichment by two individuals, acting on their own, that is reprehensible," Blagojevich said in a written statement. "If these allegations are true, the individuals cited in these indictments should be held accountable to the fullest extent of the law. Wrongdoing must be punished."

The Topinka campaign seized on the indictment as further proof of what she calls "pay-to-play" politics under the Blagojevich administration.

"The governor needs to answer questions about how he allowed this to happen," Topinka said Wednesday. "(Rezko) is his right-hand man. . . . He's been involved in every aspect (of the administration).

"The public ought to brace itself, because it sounds like there's more to come," Topinka added.

Second indictment

In a second indictment, Rezko also was charged with defrauding General Electric Capital Corp. out of $10.5 million in loans in connection with a pizza restaurant business.

Arraignment for both indictments was scheduled for Friday. Rezko was out of the country on Wednesday but was being contacted, according to his legal counsel, Stetler & Duffy Ltd. of Chicago.

"Mr. Rezko is innocent of the charges brought against him and is confident he will be vindicated at trial," the law firm said in a written statement. It called the charges "the creation of Stuart Levine."

Levine attorney Jeffrey B. Steinback said Wednesday that Levine "is cooperating, as he has since early this year, and it is his full intention to continue to cooperate," The Associated Press reported.

The allegations are reminiscent of charges originally leveled at people around former Gov. George Ryan, before Ryan himself was accused of wrongdoing. Ryan ultimately was indicted on corruption charges and convicted earlier this year. He is appealing his conviction.

Top Aide To Illinois Governor Is Indicted In Kickback Inquiry (NYT)

By Libby Sander

The New York Times, October 12, 2006

CHICAGO, Oct. 11 — Accusations of political corruption drew closer to Gov. Rod R. Blagojevich of Illinois on Wednesday, as a federal grand jury indicted one of his top advisers and fund-raisers in an alleged kickback scheme involving state pension funds.

The fraud accusations against the adviser, Antoin Rezko, whose ties to Mr. Blagojevich date to the early 1990's, come in the final weeks of a campaign in which Mr. Blagojevich's opponent has made ethics a top issue. That opponent, Judy Baar Topinka, the Illinois treasurer, has kept up a steady refrain reminding voters that four years ago Mr. Blagojevich ran for governor on the promise of cleaning up corruption.

Mr. Blagojevich, a Democrat, was quick to criticize the accusations against Mr. Rezko, whom prosecutors said devised an elaborate plan to extort millions of dollars from investment firms seeking to do business with state pension funds.

The governor said in a statement that the accusations against Mr. Rezko and another businessman, Stuart Levine, who is expected to plead guilty later this month, were "reprehensible."

Ms. Topinka has tried to distance herself from the scandals that plagued her party under Gov. George Ryan, who was sentenced last month to six and a half years in prison for government corruption, while spotlighting state and federal investigations into the Blagojevich administration's actions in hiring, fund-raising and awarding state contracts.

John McGovern, a spokesman for the Topinka campaign, said, "The Rezko indictment makes clear that the ongoing investigation into corruption in the Blagojevich administration is broad, is deep and is gathering momentum."

Patrick J. Fitzgerald, the United States attorney who announced the indictment, said Mr. Rezko and Mr. Levine developed plans in 2003 and 2004 to obtain $5 million in kickbacks from six investment firms seeking money from two state pension funds.

In one scheme, the indictment alleged, Mr. Rezko and Mr. Levine agreed to tell one investment firm that it would receive money from the pension fund only if it paid them $2 million or made a $1.5 million political contribution to "a certain public official."

Mr. Fitzgerald, speaking at a news conference, declined to name the "certain public official" cited.

"We're not going to comment on anyone not charged," he said, deflecting repeated questions from reporters about Mr. Blagojevich's role in the investigation. He also said the timing of the indictment had nothing to do with the coming election.

Mr. Rezko, who has raised large sums for Democrats and Republicans alike, told The Chicago Tribune last year that he first came to know Mr. Blagojevich in the early 1990's. When Mr. Blagojevich ran for governor in 2002, Mr. Rezko helped raise money and, after Mr. Blagojevich won, became a close political adviser. But he said his ties to the governor were misunderstood.

"I don't do any business with state government," Mr. Rezko told The Tribune, "and have stayed away from it" since Mr. Blagojevich became governor.

Top Blagojevich Adviser Indicted (CHIT)

By Rick Pearson, Ray Long And David Mendell

Chicago Tribune, October 12, 2006

Federal prosecutors alleged Wednesday that Antoin "Tony" Rezko used his influence as one of Gov. Rod Blagojevich's closest advisers and fundraisers to seek millions of dollars in kickbacks and campaign donations from firms seeking state business.

Rezko's indictment comes less than a month before voters must decide whether to re-elect Blagojevich, a Democrat who won four years ago on a platform of ethics reform in the aftermath of the scandal-tarred tenure of George Ryan.

The governor is not accused of any wrongdoing and the indictment does not mention him by name. But the long-rumored charges have been hanging over Blagojevich's campaign for months.

The indictment alleges that Rezko schemed to extort businesses that came before two state boards with the help of co-conspirator Stuart Levine, a campaign contributor re-appointed to the boards by the governor.

Blagojevich, in a Wednesday evening news conference at his campaign headquarters, described Rezko as a friend and supporter. But the governor played down Rezko's extensive influence in the administration, which ranged from recommending appointees to the governor's Cabinet to low-level jobs at the Illinois Tollway. The governor said he had no personal knowledge of any alleged wrongdoing.

"If in fact these allegations relating to Tony are true, he betrayed my trust," Blagojevich said. "He lied to me. He deceived me. But a lot more important than that, he violated the public trust.

"And I feel a tremendous sense of personal betrayal," the governor said. "But no one is above the law and everybody is accountable to the law and God forbid he did these things. And I pray that he didn't, but if he did, he is going to have to be held accountable and answer to that."

Blagojevich's Republican challenger, state Treasurer Judy Baar Topinka, seized on news of the indictment, alleging the governor had violated the public trust by giving Rezko a prominent advisory role.

"My goodness, this man is just so intricately involved with Rod Blagojevich," Topinka said of Rezko while campaigning in Springfield. "You can spin it all you want, but this was his right-hand man."

In announcing the indictment against Rezko, 51, of Wilmette, U.S. Atty. Patrick Fitzgerald said his office was unconcerned about whether its actions would impact the upcoming election. Fitzgerald refused to discuss Blagojevich.

"We're not going to stop momentum or take a siesta for political reasons," Fitzgerald said. "We're not concerned with elections. We're concerned with bringing the cases as soon as they're ready to go."

Rezko, an international businessman and native of Syria, has been out of the country for weeks and his whereabouts had become a concern for federal investigators. Sources said investigators were waiting to see whether Rezko would return from overseas this past weekend. When Rezko did not return, authorities made the unusual decision to unseal the Oct. 5 indictment even though they aren't certain he will return to the United States.

An arrest warrant has been issued for Rezko and Fitzgerald said if he does not appear for his scheduled arraignment Friday, he will be considered a fugitive.

Joseph J. Duffy, Rezko's attorney, issued a statement denying his client committed any wrongdoing and expressing confidence he would be vindicated at trial. Rezko is currently traveling abroad, Duffy said, adding that he was attempting to notify him of the charges and arrange for his return to the United States.

Fitzgerald alleged the actions of Rezko and Levine, who is cooperating with prosecutors, represented "pay-to-play politics on steroids" and said the two engaged in a "frenzied" effort to score kickbacks.

Robert Grant, special agent-in-charge of the Chicago office of the FBI, said the federal investigation, dubbed "Operation Board Game," continues to build and he all but promised more indictments.

"This is a gathering storm of an investigation with a goal of rooting out the parasites that have plagued our public institutions," Grant said. "Our investigative efforts and those of our partners are ongoing, methodical, aggressive and relentless."

Specifically, the indictment alleged Rezko used his influence with top officials in Blagojevich's office in the spring of 2004 to ensure that allies were appointed to or retained seats on a state hospital planning board and the state's Teachers' Retirement System Board, the $36.5 billion pension fund for retired teachers outside of Chicago.

The indictment alleged Rezko worked to secure Levine's reappointment to the pension panel, by using "his relationships and influence with high-ranking State of Illinois officials" so the two could pull off their extortion plans.

The indictment alleged Rezko would exert similar influence to gain the appointment of pension-board members who would be helpful to Rezko and Levine.

In May of 2004, the indictment said, "Rezko instructed a State of Illinois employee responsible for facilitating appointments to state boards to move forward on Levine's reappointment to the [teachers' pension board], and represented that the reappointment had been approved by a high-ranking state official. The high-ranking state official subsequently directed that Levine be reappointed to the [teachers' pension board]."

Blagojevich reappointed Levine to the teachers' pension board in 2004. A year earlier, the governor also reappointed Levine to the state's Health Facilities Planning Board, the agency in charge of approving hospital construction and expansion. Rezko previously served on the hospital panel.

The indictment contended that once Levine's post on the teachers' pension board was in place, Levine would use his power to try to leverage investment firms seeking state business into paying millions of dollars in "finder's fees" that he and Rezko would split or funnel to intermediaries and associates.

Those intermediaries, who were not named in the indictment or charged with wrongdoing, include significant insiders in state Democratic and Republican politics.

In one instance, the indictment alleges that Levine used his influence on the pension board in 2004 to withhold a planned allocation of $220 million in funds unless a kickback of $2 million was paid to a consultant of Rezko's and Levine's choosing or arrange for $1.5 million in campaign contributions to be made to an unnamed public official.

Though the extortion payment was never made, sources close to the investigation said the donations were solicited for Blagojevich's campaign fund.

Prosecutors alleged that Rezko and Levine used an unidentified intermediary to approach the investment firm.

Citing TRS records, Jon Bauman, the teacher fund's executive director, confirmed that the intermediary, identified in the indictment as Individual A, is longtime Springfield powerbroker William Cellini, a pre-eminent Republican fundraiser who has supported Blagojevich. A federal law enforcement source, speaking on the condition of anonymity, confirmed Cellini was Individual A.

Cellini, who has not been charged with any wrongdoing, did not respond to requests for comment.

While the indictment alleges Rezko and Levine displayed a pattern of attempting to extort several firms, federal prosecutors said Rezko netted $250,000 in a lone instance in which the two succeeded. They said Levine stopped efforts to coax money from other firms after FBI agents interviewed him in May 2004, alerting him to the ongoing investigation.

Levine, a millionaire businessman who was a prominent fundraiser and donor for Blagojevich's 2002 Republican opponent, former Atty. Gen. Jim Ryan, has agreed to plead guilty to corruption-related charges, federal prosecutors said.

Only 11 days before the Nov. 7 election, Levine is scheduled to enter a guilty plea for his role in the pension-fund charges. On Nov. 1, he is to enter another guilty plea regarding kickback charges involving his role at the Health Facilities Planning Board.

Prosecutors said Levine worked with Joseph Cari, a former finance director for the national Democratic Party and a major fundraiser, to try to secure kickbacks and campaign contributions from firms seeking state pension fund business.

In his September 2005 plea agreement, Cari said he was told that pension fund business was steered to firms that made campaign donations under the direction of a high-ranking public official. The unnamed person was described in the plea agreement only as "Public Official A." Blagojevich has denied being that public official.

Cari and Levine traveled with Blagojevich to New York on a fundraising trip following the Democrat's election as governor, which was recorded as a campaign donation to the governor worth more than $4,000.

Shortly after Cari's plea agreement last fall, Blagojevich defended his closest fundraising aides and advisers, including Rezko.

"I have confidence that they do things right," Blagojevich said then. "They don't break the law or make any promises or deals or quid pro quos. Those are obvious and I don't think it takes a brain surgeon to figure out you shouldn't do those things."

On Wednesday evening, as he found his ethical credentials in question, Blagojevich said he would donate to charity as much as $70,000 in direct donations from Rezko. But in his role as one of two key money men for Blagojevich, Rezko was responsible for leveraging much more. Blagojevich has amassed more than $50 million in his campaigns for state office.

Gov's Pal Indicted In Kickback Scheme (CHIST)

By STEVE WARMBIR, NATASHA KORECKI, CHRIS FUSCO AND DAVE MCKINNEY, Staff Reporters

Chicago Sun-Times, October 12, 2006

Wielding their clout like a club, Antoin Rezko, a top adviser and fund-raiser for Gov. Blagojevich, and GOP insider Stuart Levine were partners in crime as they arranged to shake down nearly $5 million in kickbacks from six investment firms looking for business with the state, a federal indictment alleged today.

The new charges against Rezko, 51, of Wilmette, represent the closest federal investigations have come to Blagojevich's inner circle and present fresh complications for the governor as he campaigns for re-election.

Blagojevich acknowledged at a Wednesday night news conference that Rezko "has been a friend and a supporter and ... I pray that these allegations are not true."

"If in fact these allegations relating to Tony are true, he betrayed my trust, he lied to me, he deceived me, but even more important than that he betrayed the public trust," said Blagojevich, who added the indictment did not suggest he had any knowledge of alleged wrongdoing.

Levine was charged in the scheme last year. He's cooperating extensively with federal investigators.

Rezko and Levine also allegedly schemed to shake down a seventh investment firm co-owned at the time by Hollywood producer Tom Rosenberg — a facet of the investigation first reported by the Sun-Times last month. Rosenberg's firm was slated to get a $220 million state deal when the shakedown began. Rosenberg's firm was warned to either cough up $2 million to a consultant of Rezko and Levine's choosing or arrange for $1.5 million to be contributed "to a certain public official." The Sun-Times has reported that official was Blagojevich.

The deal, though, went through, after Rosenberg threatened to notify law enforcement of the shakedown, according to the indictment and sources.

Rezko and Levine are also accused of shaking down a $1 million kickback to get state approval for a corporation to build a hospital in Crystal Lake.

Rezko derived his clout from his close to ties to the Blagojevich administration, while Levine sat on the boards for the Teachers' Retirement System — which the investment firms were seeking business from — and the Illinois Health Facilities Planning Board — which had say over hospital construction in the state.

U.S. Attorney Patrick Fitzgerald said today the criminal charges showed "a frenzy of corrupt scheming."

Rezko and Levine "and their associates put out the word loud and clear: You have to pay to play in Illinois," Fitzgerald said.

In a separate indictment, Rezko was charged with defrauding General Electric Capital Corp. and investors in regard to the financing and sale of Rezko's Papa John's pizza restaurants in Chicago and Milwaukee.

The indictment alleges Rezko fraudulently obtained more than $10 million in loans from General Electric.

Early this afternoon, Blagojevich's Republican challenger for the governor's job, Judy Baar Topinka, stressed she hadn't seen the indictment yet but that charges against Rezko would be "very, very damaging to the governor's campaign."

Calling Rezko the governor's "right-hand man," Topinka said that Rezko had "an influence on hiring . . . He had an influence on the campaign. He's had a tremendous influence."

Rezko, who has been traveling out of the country, has been a key fund-raiser for and adviser to the governor. His name has surfaced in state and federal probes into whether campaign contributions to Blagojevich were being traded for lucrative state contracts and appointments to government boards and commissions. It's unclear whether Rezko has returned to the United States.

The indictment of Rezko, a real estate developer, comes just weeks before Levine, a key figure in the federal probes of the Blagojevich administration, is set to plead guilty in two cases involving boards to which the governor appoints members.

DOJ_NMG_0079690

Levine, a wealthy businessman and political insider, was reappointed by Blagojevich to the health facilities board and the state teachers retirement board. Levine plans to plead guilty before the Nov. 7 gubernatorial election to criminal wrongdoing involving both of those boards.

Last year, another man indicted in the TRS case, lawyer Joseph Cari, pleaded guilty and alleged that Levine told him that Blagojevich and top Blagojevich fund-raisers Rezko and Christopher G. Kelly schemed to steer state pension deals to investment firms and consultants who agreed to donate to Blagojevich's campaign. The plea identified Blagojevich as "Public Official A" and Kelly and Rezko as "associates," sources have said.

The governor has called Cari's accusation "triple hearsay." Rezko and Kelly repeatedly have denied wrongdoing.

Kelly's lawyer said this morning he was unaware of any criminal charges being filed against his client, and there was no indication charges against Kelly were imminent.

A lawyer for Rezko could not be reached for comment.

Illinois Governor's Aide Indicted (LAT)

By P.j. Huffstutter, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 12, 2006

A key fundraiser for Rod Blagojevich is accused of trading state contracts for cash. The charges may boost the race's GOP challenger.

CHICAGO — Less than a month before the gubernatorial election, a federal grand jury has indicted a top advisor and fundraiser for Illinois Gov. Rod Blagojevich on suspicion of using his political clout to get millions of dollars in kickbacks from companies seeking state contracts.

The indictment, unsealed Wednesday, alleges that businessman Antoin "Tony" Rezko orchestrated a fraud scheme with Chicago attorney Stuart Levine, whom the governor reappointed to two state boards: one that handles hospital projects and another that manages teachers' pensions.

Rezko was one of Blagojevich's biggest fundraisers during the gubernatorial campaign four years ago, and himself contributed more than $49,000.

"Rezko used his relationship with certain state of Illinois officials to ensure that Rezko and Levine had the ability to influence the actions of [state boards] … for the benefit of themselves and their nominees and associates," according to the indictment. The two men then "solicited and demanded millions of dollars in undisclosed kickbacks and payments, and received and directed hundreds of thousands of dollars in undisclosed kickbacks and payments."

Rezko also allegedly obtained more than $10 million in fraudulent loans from General Electric Capital Corp. for pizza franchises, and defrauded investors in that business, according to a second indictment unsealed Wednesday.

Levine has already been charged with using his position on the state boards to extort payoffs from medical groups and investment firms, and is cooperating with federal investigators, according to U.S. Atty. Patrick J. Fitzgerald.

An arrest warrant has been issued for Rezko, who is thought to be traveling abroad.

Though neither indictment names the governor, the charges further roil a nasty gubernatorial race between Blagojevich, a Democrat seeking a second term, and GOP rival Judy Baar Topinka, the state's three-term treasurer.

The indictments are part of a federal probe into whether campaign contributions to Blagojevich were given in exchange for business contracts or appointments to state boards and commissions.

The FBI also has been looking into claims that Beverly Ascaridis, the wife of the governor's former campaign treasurer, got her job as a state parks administrator in exchange for a $1,500 check her husband wrote to Blagojevich's daughter.

Blagojevich has repeatedly denied any knowledge of, or connection to, the alleged corruption.

"The allegations in today's indictments, if proven true, are a violation of my trust but far more importantly a betrayal of the public's trust — the indictment details a pattern of self-enrichment by two individuals, acting on their own, that is reprehensible," Blagojevich said in a written statement Wednesday.

Illinois' gubernatorial race is being closely watched, with Democrats and Republicans fighting to attain a majority of the nation's governorships. And the Midwest is particularly contested, seen as key in the 2008 presidential campaign.

After 25 years, the GOP lost Illinois' governorship in 2002, when Blagojevich positioned himself as someone who would clean up state government.

Before that election, the GOP had held almost all top statewide offices.

Today, it has only Topinka's.

Michael Lawrence, director of the Paul Simon Public Policy Institute at Southern Illinois University in Carbondale, said this week's news could prove a break for Topinka.

DOJ_NMG_0079691

A poll last month for Copley News Service showed Blagojevich with a 10-point lead over Topinka, 47% to 37%. But voters weren't particularly happy with Blagojevich: A third of voters rated his job performance as "excellent" or "good," two-thirds as "fair" or "poor."

Rezko "is not some little-known person," Lawrence said. "This is someone who clearly knows the governor and is close to him. The question is going to be whether the public will pay attention."

*

p.j.huffstutter@latimes.com

As The Foley Case Unfolds, Hastert Gets A More Enthusiastic Nod From Bush (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg And Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, October 12, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 11— Early last week, President Bush said he respected J. Dennis Hastert as a father, a teacher and a coach — but did not say what he thought of him as House speaker.

Two days later, amid continuing calls for Mr. Hastert to resign as speaker over the Mark Foley e-mail scandal, Mr. Bush expressed more direct support for Mr. Hastert, but only through aides.

This week, Mr. Bush is giving Mr. Hastert a more unmistakable embrace, telling reporters on Wednesday: “Denny is very credible, as far as I’m concerned. And he’s done a fine job as speaker.”

The president is expected go one step further on Thursday, when he is scheduled to appear side-by-side with Mr. Hastert at a Republican rally in Chicago.

Aides to both men said Mr. Bush’s ever-friendlier declarations of support were one part political calculus, one part personal loyalty. The White House has made clear it agrees with Republican leaders in Congress that Mr. Hastert’s resignation would only prompt Democrats to demand more scalps in the imbroglio over what Congressional Republicans knew when about Mr. Foley’s risqué e-mails to male pages.

But, aides said, it also reflects Mr. Bush’s belief that Mr. Hastert has by and large been a loyal supporter who has come through for him at crucial moments — though their working relationship has had its rifts. This year, Mr. Hastert has criticized the administration for approving a deal giving control of operations at several major ports to a Dubai-owned company and for pushing an immigration plan that caused open rebellion among his members.

The strains seemed evident last week as Mr. Bush initially appeared to hold back on giving Mr. Hastert full-throated support as speaker, though aides said the president could only come so far when so many facts were unknown.

But then last Thursday, Mr. Hastert declared that he took ultimate responsibility for his office’s missing signals that Mr. Foley was crossing the line with pages — though he said he had not personally known of them. This seemed to clear the way for more forceful presidential support.

Within hours, Mr. Bush called Mr. Hastert at home to say he stood by him as speaker. Aides to both men told reporters about the call minutes later.

People in Mr. Hastert’s inner circle describe the phone call as the equivalent of a papal blessing that helped cool demands for his resignation from within the party, even as new reports emerged accusing Mr. Hastert’s office of knowing about potential trouble with Mr. Foley earlier than it had acknowledged.

Addressing some friction this year, Ron Bonjean, Mr. Hastert’s spokesman, said, “Sure, there have been ups and downs, but at the same time we both have our eye on the ball and we both are trying to defy history in this midterm election.”

Aides to Mr. Bush said the president was also grateful for Mr. Hastert’s help on signature issues like his tax cuts. Mr. Bush had urged the speaker to stay on in 2004, to help advance his second-term agenda. Otherwise, Mr. Hastert’s associates say, he would now be savoring an ambassadorship or concentrating on building a vacation home in Wisconsin.

In the end, Mr. Hastert could not help the president deliver his proposed Social Security overhaul or his immigration plan. But Tony Snow, the White House press secretary, said the president had appreciated Mr. Hastert’s candor.

“Sometimes Hastert will say ‘I agree with you, but given where the votes are, you’re not going to get it,’ ” Mr. Snow said.

Only weeks ago, Illinois Republicans worried about having Mr. Bush attend a fund-raiser for local Congressional candidates on Thursday, given his approval ratings. Mr. Hastert’s name was highlighted on the invitations, printed larger than Mr. Bush’s.

Now, it is Mr. Hastert who is seen as the bigger liability. And now it is Mr. Bush who is trying to boost Mr. Hastert.

“When he stands up and says, I want to know the truth — I believe yesterday he said that if somebody on his staff didn’t tell him the truth, they’re gone — I respect that and appreciate that, and believe him,” Mr. Bush said Wednesday.

The president predicted that the scandal would not harm the party on Election Day.

DOJ_NMG_0079692

"This Foley issue bothers a lot of people, including me," he said. "But I think when they get in that booth, they're going to be thinking about how best to secure the country from attack, and how best to keep the economy growing."

Hastert Aides Interest Ethics Panel (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, October 12, 2006

With House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert denying personal knowledge of former representative Mark Foley's activities, investigators for the House ethics committee are bearing down on three senior members of Hastert's staff to determine when they learned of Foley's actions and whether they passed on their knowledge to the speaker.

The three -- chief of staff Scott Palmer, deputy chief of staff Mike Stokke and counsel Ted Van Der Meid -- have formed a palace guard around Hastert (R-Ill.) for years, attaining great degrees of power and unusual autonomy to deal with matters of politics, policy and House operations. They are also remarkably close. Palmer and Stokke have been with Hastert for decades. They live together in a Capitol Hill townhouse and commute back to Illinois on weekends.

It is that relationship that has made investigators so interested in their knowledge of Foley's contacts with teenage male congressional pages, especially allegations that his chief of staff personally appealed to Palmer in 2003 to confront the Florida Republican. Foley resigned Sept. 29 when news reports indicated he had sent electronic messages to a former page.

"It would be very hard to believe if Palmer knew that kind of detail, he wouldn't have acted upon it, and it's hard to imagine Scott Palmer would have spared the speaker that knowledge," said one former Republican leadership aide, who spoke on the condition of anonymity for fear of jeopardizing his lobbying contacts.

Within Hastert's operation, some staff members appear to point accusingly at Van Der Meid, who is in charge of ethics matters and is widely believed to have steered Hastert wrong before.

Van Der Meid, a former chief Republican counsel for the House Committee on Standards of Official Conduct, helped engineer the failed effort to change GOP ethics rules to allow an indicted lawmaker to remain in the leadership. The power play was designed to keep then-House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Tex.) at his post, but it backfired spectacularly, embarrassing many Republicans and leaving a blemish on Hastert's record.

One House leadership aide said Van Der Meid lacks the personal connections with the speaker that Palmer and Stokke have, making him the most vulnerable of the three.

The staff issue will be front and center today, as the ethics committee takes the testimony of Kirk Fordham, Foley's former chief of staff, who is to testify that in 2003 he alerted Palmer to Foley's behavior. A source with knowledge of the events said Fordham will detail repeated efforts by then-House Clerk Jeff Trandahl to raise alarms about Foley's interest in young pages, and Fordham's own confrontations with Foley.

As early as 2000, Trandahl periodically called Fordham to say Foley was spending too much time with pages, the source said, and Fordham would have to "pull him back a little." In brief, awkward conversations, the source said, Fordham would tell Foley: "I just got a call from Jeff Trandahl. And Mark, you just need to be conscious of appearances. Everyone knows you're gay. You're being held to higher standards than everyone else. They see the stereotype -- a gay man going after kids."

In 2003, Trandahl placed another call to Fordham, according to the source. But this time, it was because Foley was seen drunk outside the pages' dormitory after the 10 p.m. curfew, trying to get in. Exasperated, Fordham reputedly told Trandahl, "I don't know if my saying something [to Foley] would make any difference."

Both Fordham and Trandahl decided that Fordham should call Palmer, according to the source. In a phone call with Palmer, Fordham expressed his concern about Foley's "over-friendliness" to pages, although Fordham did not specifically mention that Foley was seen outside the pages' dorm. Palmer said he would talk to Foley about it; two days later, Fordham checked in with Palmer. Palmer said that he spoke with Foley and that he told the speaker about it, the source said.

Palmer has said: "What Kirk Fordham said did not happen."

Now, a rapidly escalating ethics investigation is trying to determine who is right. Peggy Sampson, a former Capitol Police officer who has supervised Republican pages since 1986, went before the committee yesterday. According to several former pages, Sampson was the adult who warned them to stay away from Foley, and she may be able to confirm his alleged visit to the pages' dormitory.

A current staff member who has corroborated Palmer's meeting with Foley has also offered to cooperate with investigators. House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio), who said he told Hastert about the Foley matter this spring, yesterday afternoon received an invitation to testify and "looks forward to cooperating fully," said spokesman Kevin Smith.

Rep. Rodney Alexander (R-La.) and his chief of staff are to testify next week, presumably about e-mails Alexander's staff received from a former page. The 2005 e-mails from Foley, which asked the youth for a picture and what he wanted for his birthday, came to the attention of Stokke and Van Der Meid that fall, the speaker's office said.

DOJ_NMG_0079693

For an institution replete with glory seekers, Hastert's inner circle has been virtually invisible to the outside world. Palmer has known Hastert for 28 years and worked on his first political campaign; he is the speaker's gatekeeper, a policy expert who swoops into negotiations to untie knots and seal deals.

Stokke, an old Illinois political hand, is tasked with getting GOP lawmakers what they need for their faltering campaigns, such as an appearance by Hastert, a fundraiser or vital legislation.

Van Der Meid is the relative newcomer -- he came to the speaker's office after guiding the ethics committee's probe of then-House Speaker Newt Gingrich (R-Ga.). Known by some as the mayor of the House, Van Der Meid has the institutional knowledge of the chamber's customs. He handles legal matters but has been known to intervene angrily on a shade of carpet or which paintings to hang on the Capitol's walls.

The speaker's own timeline points to Van Der Meid and Stokke as central players in the Foley matter. After Alexander's staff alerted a low-level Hastert aide in the fall of 2005, Stokke directed the information to Van Der Meid. Later that day, Stokke met with Alexander's chief of staff, then summoned Trandahl to the speaker's office. Later, Trandahl informed Van Der Meid that action had been taken to stop Foley's communications with the Louisiana youth.

A senior GOP aide, speaking on the condition of anonymity for fear of retribution, said it made little sense to have a political hand such as Stokke handle the Foley matter, a delicate issue involving personnel questions and possible legal violations.

"Did they make an affirmative decision to have the political guy work on this?" the GOP staffer asked. "It clearly was a bad damn idea."

Nowhere in the speaker's timeline is Palmer mentioned. But former leadership aides question how a powerful chief of staff could have been left out of such complicated deliberations and how they would have been kept from Hastert.

The latter point is especially true if Foley's behavior came to Palmer's attention in 2003, one former aide said. In recent months, as the House has become consumed in scandal and political trouble, Hastert has been less engaged in the day-to-day activities of the House, he said. That was not true in 2003, however, the former aide added.

Ethics Panel Questions Page Supervisors (AP-Y)

By Larry Margasak

AP-Yahoo, October 12, 2006

House officials who directly supervise teenage congressional pages were questioned Wednesday by ethics committee investigators probing the handling of former Rep. Mark Foley's inappropriate messages to pages.

The internal investigators spoke privately with Peggy Sampson, who supervises House pages sponsored by Republican lawmakers, and her Democratic counterpart, Wren Ivester.

The high schoolers attend classes at Congress' page school and perform errands for lawmakers.

By starting with those closest to the pages, investigators can learn what the youngsters might have told the supervisors about Foley, R-Fla., and whether they reported any inappropriate conduct to higher House officials.

Until now, there has been no evidence that any Democratic lawmaker or employee knew about Foley's conduct.

Investigators planned to question Foley's former chief of staff, Kirk Fordham, on Thursday. He says he took action in 2002 or 2003 when he learned of Foley's inappropriate approaches to pages.

Fordham has emerged as a key figure because he said he brought the allegations to Speaker Dennis Hastert's chief of staff, Scott Palmer. Fordham has said he subsequently learned that Palmer spoke with Foley.

Palmer has denied speaking with Fordham at that time, and Hastert's office said the speaker's staff first learned about Foley's conduct in the fall of 2005.

An internal review by Hastert's office said the information passed on last fall concerned Foley's overly friendly — but not sexually explicit — computer messages to a former page from Louisiana.

The page was sponsored by Rep. Rodney Alexander, R-La. His office said the lawmaker and his top aide will appear before the ethics panel next week.

Hastert, R-Ill., said he did not learn of Foley's conduct until the end of September. If that is correct, his staff will have to explain to investigators why they did not tell the speaker what they knew last fall.

Hastert said he believes his staff acted appropriately when the information was passed on to the House clerk and Rep. John Shimkus, R-Ill., the chairman of the board that oversees the page program. Shimkus and the clerk met with Foley and made it clear he should stop communicating with the former page to avoid even the appearance of impropriety.

The speaker said this week that if he finds that anyone on his staff covered up the problem, they would be fired.

President Bush has expressed confidence in Hastert's handling of the Foley matter several times, the latest on Wednesday.

He said Hastert's "strong statements have made it clear to not only the party members, but to the country, that he wants to find out the facts," Bush told a White House news conference.

"I mean, this is disgusting behavior when a member of Congress betrays the trust of the Congress and a family that sent a young page up to serve in the Congress."

The president called the speaker "very credible as far as I'm concerned," and said Hastert has "done a fine job as speaker."

Bush planned to speak at a fundraiser in Chicago on Thursday that Hastert was hosting to help two Illinois Republicans in tough races.

Boehner Asked By Ethics To Testify On Foley (RC)

By Susan Davis

Roll Call, October 12, 2006

The House ethics committee is stepping up its investigation into former Rep. Mark Foley's (R-Fla.) relationships with House pages, as Members are being lined up to offer testimony before the panel.

According to sources, House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) received an invitation Wednesday to appear before the Committee on Standards of Official Conduct, but a specific date was not disclosed.

A spokesman for Boehner reiterated that he will cooperate fully with the investigation.

"Mr. Boehner welcomes the opportunity and looks forward to meeting with them and providing any information that might be helpful to their inquiry," said spokesman Kevin Madden.

Additionally, Rep. Rodney Alexander (R-La.) will appear before the ethics committee next week. Adam Terry, a spokesman for Alexander, said he will "voluntarily" offer testimony Wednesday.

The Louisiana Republican will discuss his role in 2005 in informing House Republican leaders that a former page — sponsored by his office — had been made uncomfortable by an e-mail exchange with Foley that was characterized as "over-friendly."

The public revelation of that e-mail exchange two weeks ago quickly led to the disclosure of a series of other, more sexually explicit online discussions Foley had with former House pages that prompted him to resign from the House on Sept. 29.

The ethics committee launched a formal investigation of the Foley matter Oct. 5. On Wednesday, lawyers for the committee met separately with Peggy Sampson and Wren Ivester, the majority and minority House page supervisors, respectively. Those discussions were characterized as informal because committee rules dictate that two House Members must be present "to take testimony and receive evidence" as part of a formal investigative subcommittee.

At least two panel members, Chairman Doc Hastings (R-Wash.) and ranking member Howard Berman (D-Calif.), were scheduled to return to Capitol Hill today to hear testimony from Kirk Fordham, a central figure in the investigation. Reps. Judy Biggert (R-Ill.) and Stephanie Tubbs Jones (D-Ohio) also are on the investigative subcommittee.

Fordham was chief of staff to National Republican Congressional Committee Chairman Tom Reynolds (N.Y.) before resigning last week as the scandal unfolded. Fordham previously spent more than a decade working for Foley, and he has offered an account that conflicts with the timeline of events provided by senior aides to Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.).

Fordham has said publicly that he warned Hastert's chief of staff, Scott Palmer, as early as 2003 on Foley's interactions with House pages, but Palmer denied he ever spoke to Fordham on that topic.

Palmer, Deputy Chief of Staff Mike Stokke and staff counsel Ted Van Der Meid are expected to be called before the panel. Ron Bonjean, communications director for Hastert, said Wednesday that he did not know whether anyone in the office had been contacted by the committee yet.

Other Members who may be called to offer testimony include retiring Rep. Jim Kolbe (R-Ariz.), but his spokeswoman said Wednesday the office had not been contacted.

Rep. John Shimkus (R-Ill.), a co-chairman of the House Page Board, also is expected to appear, but a spokesman did not return calls. Former House Clerk Jeff Trandahl also has said he will cooperate with the ethics committee. His attorney did not return calls seeking comment.

A spokesman for Reynolds did not comment directly on whether his boss would appear before the panel, stating only "Congressman Reynolds supports a complete and full investigation and has said so since the beginning."

Hastings and Berman told reporters last week that the panel had approved nearly four-dozen subpoenas for documents and testimony in the Foley case. They have promised a thorough and timely investigation.

While the ethics panel investigates the Foley case, the House also is considering ways to reform the chamber's page program.

DOJ_NMG_0079695

A spokeswoman for the House Administration Committee said any decisions regarding new orientation procedures for students and administrative changes to the operation of the House page program will be discussed following the completion of the current investigations.

"Everything is operating normally right now. No kids have left the program," said spokeswoman Salley Collins, whose panel oversees the Office of the Clerk, which manages the page program along with the three-member Page Board.

Along with setting up a toll-free hotline number for current and former pages to report any inappropriate contact they may have experienced, "the Office of the Clerk has reached out to the parents of the current class to one, reiterate the fact that safety and security has been and will continue to be the top priority and two, to inform them of the hotline that has been established," Collins said. "Supervisors have spoken to the teenagers directly regarding this issue and counselors are available for the students both at the school as well as at the dorms residence."

Page: Foley Touched Page On House Floor (MDAy)

By Walter Nowinski

Michigan Daily, October 12, 2006

A former House page said he witnessed inappropriate contact between former Republican Congressman Mark Foley and another page in the back of the House floor in early 2001.

The page, Richard Nguyen, a first-year student at the University's Gerald Ford School of Public Policy, said he saw Foley pat a male page's behind.

Foley's attorney did not return calls for comment.

Nguyen said he was not sure during which month the incident took place. He was a page between January and June of 2001.

Nguyen did not report the incident to authorities. At the time, the then-16-year-old thought it was "questionable activity," but he was unsure how to interpret it.

"I wasn't sure if it was a social norm I wasn't accustomed to," Nguyen said. "I mean, you see athletes patting each other's asses all the time on the field."

Nguyen, a first-generation Vietnamese American from California, said he was amazed by what he learned about other points of view and other lifestyles while serving.

"It was one of the most rewarding experiences of my life," he said.

However, the positive experience Nguyen had as a congressional page has recently been dimmed by doubts about the program's future.

In the aftermath of an unfolding sex scandal involving sexually explicit instant messages and inappropriate e-mails between Foley and several underage male pages, there have been calls for the program to be suspended or abolished.

Rep. Ray LaHood (R-Ill.) has called for the current page class to be sent home and the whole program to be reviewed.

Nguyen said he and other pages found LaHood's call alarming.

"We are united in that we want to make sure the page program is preserved," he said.

Nguyen described the page program as having been one of the most significant parts of his life.

"For someone like me who doesn't have a million dollars and is a first-generation American, it was a wonderful way to feel like I was a part of the American fabric," he said.

Yet the future of the page program is in jeopardy as the Foley sex scandal continues to unfold.

Two weeks ago, reports by ABC News revealed that Foley exchanged sexually explicit instant messages and inappropriate e-mails with several underage male House pages.

Foley resigned from Congress on Sept. 29 after a reporter from ABC News confronted him with a graphic instant message transcript in which Foley discussed masturbation techniques with an underage male page.

Earlier this week, there were reports that at least one former male page who served in the House in the fall of 2000 had sexual relations with Foley after the page had left the program. He was 21 years old.

Nguyen said many of the pages in his class were suspicious of Foley.

"We always saw that Mr. Foley was very friendly to male pages," he said. "There were signs, for an observer like myself, but I never knew what I know now."

Nguyen said he never felt threatened. The dormitory where he and the other pages lived was guarded by police, and the page program enforced curfews and a buddy system.

"I always felt safe when I was there," Nguyen said. "But then again, I was a Democratic page."

In the fallout from the Foley sex scandal, questions have been raised about how much the Republican House leadership knew about Foley's actions and when they knew it. Several prominent conservative voices, including the editorial page of the

DOJ_NMG_0079696

Washington Times, have called for House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) to resign for failing to act after he learned of inappropriate e-mail exchanges between Foley and pages.

Hastert has refused to resign and maintains that he acted properly.

The FBI is investigating Foley's conduct, and the House Ethics Committee is reviewing the Republican leadership's handling of the situation.

"If there were people who knew that the pages were being sexually harassed, you have to ask yourself," Nguyen said. "Are these the right people to be in charge of young people and to be in charge of our country?"

Nguyen hopes the page program will survive the current political uproar.

"By eliminating the page program we would be punishing the victims who came forward," Nguyen said. "That is unfair."

Page basics: A Congressional page is a high school junior who works in the House of Representatives and assists members of Congress with their duties on the House floor.

They are housed in a Capitol Hill dormitory and attend classes at the Library of Congress.

Scandal Sidelines Hastert, Reynolds (WP)

By Juliet Eilperin

The Washington Post, October 12, 2006

Weeks before the Nov. 7 elections, the Mark Foley scandal and its aftermath have already had a visible effect on Republican prospects: Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) and Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds (R-N.Y.), the two men leading the GOP efforts to keep power in the House, have both been largely sidelined from the public campaign.

Under normal circumstances, the House speaker and the chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee, currently Reynolds, would be in a full sprint in the closing weeks of an election campaign -- raising money and rallying partisans to help House members in the most competitive races. Both leaders, however, have drastically curtailed their appearances this month after coming under fire for what critics have called an inadequate response to early warnings about Foley's behavior with House pages.

Reynolds is now battling to hold on to his own district in Upstate New York, while Hastert has been tied down in Washington, holding news conferences and attempting to control the legal and political fallout from the uproar -- including demands from Democrats, commentators and at least some Republicans that he resign the speakership. Although speculation has centered on whether Hastert can hang on, and how much the episode is hurting Republicans at the polls, there is already a tangible impact on GOP fortunes.

In the past week alone, Republicans have canceled nearly a dozen campaign events with Hastert and Reynolds. Rep. Don Sherwood (Pa.) -- who is one of the GOP's most endangered incumbents after revelations that his former mistress had sued him in Maryland, alleging assault -- told both men not to come to his district, forgoing crucial campaign dollars to minimize additional negative news coverage. In addition, at least seven House GOP candidates have donated to charity nearly $20,000 in contributions that they had received from Foley before the scandal broke.

"Sometimes political reality takes over travel schedules," said Joe Gaylord, who was a top political adviser to then-Speaker Newt Gingrich (R-Ga.). "This is one of those things where candidates have to decide for themselves what is best for their individual campaigns, and national leaders will follow that."

Increasingly, Republican candidates are telling their leaders to stay home. Houston City Council member Shelley Sekula Gibbs (R), who is running for former House majority leader Tom DeLay's open seat as a write-in candidate, had hoped that Hastert would come to Texas to tout its prospects for economic development. Last week, she told the speaker he need not visit.

"It would be a distraction. I have to focus on winning this race," Sekula Gibbs said in an interview. "They want me to focus on winning," she added, referring to the speaker's office.

Other Republicans have also canceled Hastert fundraisers, such as Rep. Ron Lewis (Ky.), who was once regarded as safe for reelection but now looks imperiled.

In other instances, the speaker and Reynolds are the ones pulling the plug. Hastert told both Rep. Michael E. Sodrel (R-Ind.) and Ohio state Sen. Joy Padgett that he could not stump on their behalf this month, while Reynolds canceled events with fellow New York Rep. John E. Sweeney and Florida businessman Vern Buchanan.

"My understanding is he had to go back to his district," said Buchanan spokeswoman Sally Tibbetts. She added that the campaign went ahead with the Oct. 2 event aimed at "rallying some of our grass-roots supporters and leaders in the community."

Though Hastert and Reynolds have crisscrossed the country for months raising money and generating publicity for congressional candidates, it is not just money that matters at this point. Motivation counts just as much, because a visit by a House leader under better circumstances can help build the enthusiasm that is critical for turnout efforts.

DOJ_NMG_0079697

Former House majority leader Richard K. Armey (Tex.) said he has warned fellow Republicans "for a long time the biggest danger the Republican majority faced is insufficient turnout of their own base, and this Foley thing hasn't helped anything." Rallying the troops through last-minute campaign stops "can be very important," Armey said, recalling the efforts of Gingrich to "get people excited."

House leaders have not abandoned the campaign trail altogether. Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) attended a fundraiser yesterday on behalf of Rep. John Kline (R-Minn.) and will campaign for other candidates in Minnesota and Iowa this week. Hastert will campaign today for Illinois Republicans Peter Roskam and David McSweeney, along with President Bush.

But freshman Rep. Melissa L. Bean (D-Ill.), McSweeney's opponent, said the speaker's appearance "doesn't surprise me" because McSweeney is "a rubber stamp" for the GOP. "People appreciate independence," Bean said.

Bush acknowledged at a news conference yesterday that the page controversy has resonated with the public.

"This Foley issue bothers a lot of people, including me," Bush said. But he added that Americans care more about national security and the economy when voting. "When they get in that booth, they're going to be thinking about, you know, how best to secure the country from attack and, you know, how best to keep the economy growing."

Neither Reynolds nor Hastert has said that the fallout from the Foley scandal has hampered their ability to run their party's reelection effort.

"It has not affected [Reynolds's] ability to be NRCC chairman, not at all," said NRCC spokesman Carl Forti. "I think you've seen over the past three years he's been able to run the committee, be home on weekends and when Congress is in recess, and still make decisions here. Nothing has changed that."

But several Democratic campaign experts, including former Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee chairman Martin Frost (Tex.), said Reynolds's intensified reelection fight will distract him and take a toll on his ability to make last-minute decisions about where to focus the GOP's dollars and effort.

"You have to make some substantial judgments about who has a chance and who doesn't," Frost said. "The campaign chairman needs to bring all his faculties to bear on those questions. . . . This is enormous additional trouble, and I don't think they can survive this."

Polls: GOP Put Politics Ahead Of Pages (AP-Y)

By The Associated Press

AP-Yahoo, October 12, 2006

Most Americans say the House Republican leadership worried more about politics than the safety of congressional pages in the case of disgraced former Rep. Mark Foley, according to polls. Most also say Democrats would not have handled the situation better.

Republicans have come under criticism for their response to Foley, who sent sexually explicit messages to teenage male pages. GOP House leaders have faced questions whether they acted promptly to deal with the Florida congressman.

People were split on whether House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., should step down, with just under half saying he should, according to several polls.

Among the other findings:

More than half in several polls said Hastert tried to cover up what he knew about Foley.

Almost half in an Associated Press-Ipsos poll said recent reports of scandal and corruption would be very important in their vote.

Two-thirds said the GOP leadership did not take the e-mails seriously enough when they first learned of them, according to a CBS-New York Times poll.

Six in 10 in an ABC News-Washington Post poll said the Democrats are pursuing the case for political advantage, not to raise concerns about the page program.

The results come from AP-Ipsos, ABC-Washington Post, CBS-Times and Newsweek polling done in the last week. The polls questioned from 1,000 to 1,500 adults and had margins of error of plus or minus 2.5 percentage points to 3 percentage points.

National GOP Fights To Keep Foley Seat (NSDY/AP)

By Brian Skoloff

Long Island Newsday, October 12, 2006

WEST PALM BEACH, Fla. -- National Republicans haven't given up on former Rep. Mark Foley's district, recently spending $244,300 for television ads attacking Democratic hopeful Tim Mahoney.

DOJ_NMG_0079698

The Democratic newcomer has become a strong contender, partly because Foley's name will remain on the ballot even though his replacement will receive those votes. The replacement, state Rep. Joe Negron, has just under five weeks to campaign.

The National Republican Congressional Committee spent the money between Foley's resignation Sept. 29 and Oct. 10, when the filing was made to the Federal Elections Commission. Foley was considered likely to be re-elected easily until his sexually explicit Internet messages to teenage male House pages were publicized.

Mahoney's campaign notes that the group has committed to spend another $690,000 by reserving air time through Nov. 7. The committee doesn't have to use the time -- or pay for it -- if they later determine it is not necessary.

"It looks like the bosses in Washington have sent $934,000 in tainted funds to prop up (House Speaker Dennis) Hastert's hand-picked attack dog," Mahoney campaign consultant Charles Halloran said of Negron. "We look forward to campaigning on issues that matter to Florida."

Negron said the national support shows that "Republicans are in a fighting mood, and we're not going to roll over and send a John Kerry Democrat to Congress."

The ad attacks Mahoney for his stance on Social Security. The NRCC claims Mahoney's plan would raise taxes. Halloran said Mahoney has no plans to push for higher taxes but he opposes privatization, an option favored by President Bush.

NRCC spokesman Ed Patru wouldn't say if more ads were planned, but acknowledged that more needed to be done to ensure voters know that Negron is the candidate.

In the district, registered Republicans outnumber Democrats by 202,500 to 170,369, according to the latest state figures.

Foley Case Snags Incumbent In Ohio Race For House Seat (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney

The New York Times, October 12, 2006

COLUMBUS, Ohio, Oct. 11 — Representative Deborah Pryce is a former municipal court judge, a Republican and a member of the House leadership who has represented her central Ohio district for 14 years. She is also friends with Mark Foley, the congressman who resigned in the page scandal, as she told Columbus Monthly for a feature it published just last month.

Ms. Pryce always thought she would have a difficult re-election campaign this year in a state raked by Republican scandals. But since Mr. Foley quit, she said in an interview on a tense day of campaigning here, her own internal polls have measured a steady drop in support under the weight of attacks by Mary Jo Kilroy, her Democratic opponent.

Ms. Kilroy has emphasized Ms. Pryce's connections to Mr. Foley, who was on a list of five people Ms. Pryce said she considered Washington friends in the Columbus Monthly interview.

"I'm totally convinced," Ms. Pryce said, her voice faint, as she described why her support had declined. "All our polling showed we were going in the right direction until this happened. It fell precipitously."

"It's very sad that sometimes we're slipped up by things that we have no control over and have absolutely nothing to do with," she said. "But that is part and parcel of politics."

The contest, in which Ms. Pryce and Ms. Kilroy are now described as tied in internal party polls, has emerged as a case study of how the fallout from the Foley scandal is causing problems for Republicans across the country. But it is also unusual in a way that reflects the intriguing diversity of this central Ohio district, the 15th, and all the swirling complications of an explosive scandal that landed just four weeks before Election Day.

Ms. Kilroy is using the Foley scandal to try to systematically undercut Ms. Pryce with a big component of the Republican base here, Christian conservatives, when Republicans already worried that those voters would stay home on Election Day. "Deborah Pryce's friend Mark Foley is caught using his position to take advantage of 16-year-old pages," an announcer says in advertisements the Kilroy campaign has placed on Christian radio stations.

Ms. Pryce responded by accusing Ms. Kilroy of gay-baiting. She said in an interview she was hopeful she could win over gay voters in a city long known for a large gay population, particularly because the Human Rights Campaign, a gay advocacy organization, has endorsed both candidates in the race.

"She feels that the gay and lesbian population is a very big component of her support," Ms. Pryce said. "And she really is kind of baiting with this in terms of Mark Foley."

Few other issues are getting the same kind of attention here; no one has been asking them this week about, say, the North Korea nuclear test, both candidates said.

The Foley case is becoming an issue in an increasing number of races, aides in both parties said. But nowhere else has it become quite as pitched as here, where Ms. Kilroy — who had already been trying to link Ms. Pryce to corruption scandals in Ohio involving Republicans — has moved in with withering attacks since Mr. Foley resigned.

DOJ_NMG_0079699

In an interview on Wednesday, Ms. Kilroy questioned whether Ms. Pryce had had any warning about Mr. Foley's conduct, and why Ms. Pryce, the No. 4 Republican in the House, had not called for the resignation of Representative J. Dennis Hastert of Illinois as speaker.

"When you have a member of Congress abusing his authority and his position with pages, and you have leaders of Congress looking the other way — protecting their majority instead of protecting the pages — people here saw that and said, that's the final straw," Ms. Kilroy said. "She's in leadership. And I don't understand why she is not calling on those leaders who didn't act to step down."

"What did she know?" Ms. Kilroy said, sitting in her campaign headquarters Wednesday during a break in preparation for a debate here Thursday night. "What did she do about it?"

Ms. Pryce said she did not have earlier knowledge of Mr. Foley's actions, and in the interview she said she stood by Mr. Hastert, while saying he had been "ill-served by his aides." She said she thought Ms. Kilroy would hurt herself by politicizing the Foley case.

"She's taking a big risk doing it," Ms. Pryce said. "She has overstepped a bit — I mean she's running those ads on Christian radio! That because I happened to mention him as a friend that I knew all along; because he was gay, that he must be a pedophile. I mean, I just don't think that's going to really sell like she's hoping it will."

Even before Mr. Foley resigned, Ms. Pryce was running into a stiff wind. The scandals that have swept this state involving Republican officeholders have caused problems for Republicans up and down the ballot; polls show that Ohio Republicans are at risk of losing a Senate seat, the governor's office and as many as five Congressional seats.

Ms. Pryce's elevation after the 2002 election to the House leadership ranks, if helpful to her in Washington, made her vulnerable to the very kind of anti-incumbent campaign being run by Ms. Kilroy, even before Mr. Foley quit and questions were raised about the Republican leadership.

"Over the years she's run, Congresswoman Pryce has emphasized her centrality to the party, her ties to the leadership and what they can produce for Ohio," said Paul A. Beck, a professor of political science at Ohio State University. "This is a difficult time to talk about that, and Kilroy has hit her pretty hard."

John C. Green, director of the Ray C. Bliss Institute of Applied Politics at the University of Akron, said the Foley disclosures could serve to push more undecided voters into Ms. Kilroy's camp while discouraging conservative Republicans from bothering to vote.

"That district seems to be at the center of the storm in Ohio," Professor Green said.

Although Ms. Pryce is conservative on spending and other issues, she has opposed a ban on same-sex marriage and supported other gay rights initiatives. Her positions on those issues led the Human Rights Campaign to take the highly unusual step of endorsing both candidates in this district.

But Joe Solmonese, the president of the organization, disputed Ms. Pryce's characterization of Ms. Kilroy's attacks on the Foley resignation. Mr. Solmonese said he had reviewed the Kilroy radio advertisements and thought she had gone to great pains to make clear she was criticizing Mr. Foley for improper behavior with a teenage page, and not for being gay.

"I don't think it's gay-baiting at all," he said. "She clearly is trying to make a case here that has a lot more to do with Deborah Pryce's leadership, supporting Denny Hastert, but not about Mark Foley being gay."

Asked about Ms. Pryce's claims, Ms. Kilroy said: "This is about a member of Congress abusing his position with pages, and it's about how the Republican leadership engaged in a cover-up, and it's about Deborah Pryce not speaking out against that. It's not about anyone's sexual orientation."

Phil Burress, president of Citizens for Community Values of Ohio, a conservative group, said that while he initially thought the Foley scandal would keep what he called values voters at home, he thought Democrats had been too brazen in discussing the issue and had lost whatever advantage they might have had.

"It's become so politicized that everyone is sick of it," Mr. Burress said. "They are not concerned about the kids. They are concerned about politics. I think it's beginning to boomerang on the Democrats because they overplayed their hands."

Chris Redfern, the state Democratic chairman, said he thought the Foley scandal would affect races across the state, starting with this one, and that the Democrats had so far been careful in their discussion of it.

"We all have to be careful," Mr. Redfern said. "Democrats shouldn't overplay it. But Republicans shouldn't underplay it."

Bob Bennett, the chairman of the state Republican Party, said he was confident Ms. Pryce would survive because "any wrongdoing by anyone was done by others." But Mr. Bennett said that while he was not worried about Ms. Pryce, he was worried that these latest ethics accusations could complicate Republican hopes of holding onto the Ohio district left vacant by the retirement of Representative Bob Ney, who was caught up in an ethics scandal.

Ms. Pryce said that, if distressed, she was also confident there was time to recover.

"We just have to gain it back," she said. "We have to work hard to turn this back into lemonade."

Foley Scandal Exposes The GOP's Gay Identity Crisis (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely

USA Today, October 12, 2006

WASHINGTON — At a State Department ceremony this week, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice warmly acknowledged the family members of Mark Dybul, whom she was swearing in as the nation's new global AIDS coordinator.

As first lady Laura Bush looked on, Rice singled out his partner, Jason Claire, and Claire's mother. Rice referred to her as Dybul's "mother-in-law."

The celebratory moment for a gay couple was emblematic of the political identity crisis facing the Republican Party, two years after an election the GOP won in part by making gay marriage an issue and less than two weeks after revelations about a Republican House member's advances toward teenage boys.

For Republicans, the most difficult problem posed by the e-mail exchanges that former congressman Mark Foley had with pages is not necessarily the flagrant misbehavior of one member. Rather it's the fact that the investigation is exposing a politically awkward fact of life: some GOP leaders practice a more tolerant brand of politics in their offices than some in the party have preached on the campaign trail.

"They play somebody different on TV than they are in person," says John Aravosis, a gay blogger who used to work for Sen. Ted Stevens, R-Alaska.

Jeff Trandahl, the former House clerk at the center of the inquiry into the Foley e-mails and a top-ranking appointee of House Speaker Dennis Hastert, is openly gay. So is Kirk Fordham, the former Foley chief of staff who says he alerted Hastert's office last year to his boss' over-chumminess with high school pages.

The revelations have disturbed some conservative activists, who believe that Republicans owe their victories in the 2004 elections to the thousands of "values voters" who trooped to the polls to vote for anti-gay-marriage measures on the ballots of 11 swing states.

"It was the deciding factor in the presidential election," says Phil Burress. He spearheaded the successful effort to pass a gay-marriage ban in Ohio, the state that decided the election for Bush.

"Has the social agenda of the GOP been stalled by homosexual members or staffers?" Tony Perkins of the Family Research Council wrote in an e-mail message to the organization's activists this week. In an interview, Perkins says that while he has not drawn any conclusions, "these are questions that need to be resolved."

Such sentiments have raised concerns that gay staffers will be pressed to leave Republican offices. "It could be another Salem," says former senator Alan Simpson, referring to colonial-era witch hunts. Simpson, a Wyoming Republican, co-founded the Republican Unity Coalition to encourage gay participation in the party.

Gay Republicans insist they shouldn't be blamed for Foley or the fallout. Patrick Sammon, political director of the Log Cabin Republicans, denounced the congressman's behavior toward pages as "despicable."

Justin Nelson, a former GOP House staffer who founded the National Gay and Lesbian Chamber of Commerce, says "it was gay Republican staffers and an openly gay member of Congress" who delivered early warnings about Foley's behavior.

Both Fordham and Rep. Jim Kolbe of Arizona, Congress' only openly gay Republican member, have said they passed on complaints about Foley to the House speaker and clerk offices.

While many conservatives insist their opposition to gay marriage doesn't equate to opposition to homosexuality, some remain suspicious of gays' trustworthiness. Burress says he believes that homosexual men are more prone to pedophilia than heterosexuals. "There's no question about that," he says.

The Rev. Debra Haffner, head of the Religious Institute on Sexual Morality, Justice and Healing, denies that assertion. "The vast majority of child abusers are heterosexual; the vast majority of abused children are girls," she says.

Former senator John Danforth, a Missouri Republican who has just published a book called Faith and Politics, says his party's successful use of gay marriage as a campaign issue may come back to haunt it. "There are some things that aren't worth doing whether they work or not," he says.

Not all conservatives have had their faith shaken in the GOP, however.

Helen Cindrich, an abortion opponent and conservative activist who is working for Republican Sen. Rick Santorum's re-election in Pennsylvania, says her views about gays and lesbians have evolved as she has met some of them.

"What would you do if you took all those people who are homosexual out of all those offices?" she asks. "There's probably a lot of good people who would be shunned, and that's not the way it's supposed to be."

Cindrich acknowledges that not all her fellow conservatives agree with her, but she adds, "I guess I'm learning to take people where they are."

DOJ_NMG_0079701

FBI Seeks Help In Wales Case (SEAPI)

By Paul Shukovsky, P-I REPORTER

Seattle Post-Intelligencer, October 12, 2006

Author of letter, unidentified man are key elements

The FBI is appealing for help in its five-year manhunt for the murderer of federal prosecutor Tom Wales.

In the weeks before Wales was gunned down as he sat at a computer in the basement of his Queen Anne home, someone noticed a man wandering around the neighborhood and contacted police.

Dan DeLong / P-I

At a news conference at the U.S. District Courthouse, Robert Geeslin of the FBI shows the type of gun used to kill federal prosecutor Tom Wales five years ago in his home.

That information didn't make it to the federal task force handling the case until 2004, and agents are now seeking public help because more discreet inquiries failed to identify the man.

At a news conference Wednesday marking the fifth anniversary of the slaying, agents said they want to talk with the man and released a sketch in hopes that someone would recognize him.

The potential witness is described as white, in his late 30s to early 40s, slim, 140 to 165 pounds, with a chipped front tooth and black hair possibly pulled back in a ponytail.

"We are interested in identifying this person and finding out what they were doing in the neighborhood," said FBI inspector Robert Jordan, who is in charge of the investigation.

Jordan also asked to hear from anyone who might know the author of an anonymous letter sent to the FBI in Seattle last January from Las Vegas by someone claiming to be a hit man hired to killed Wales. FBI behavioral science experts believe the author of the letter may have some connection to the murder.

The letter's return address contains the name "Gidget." Supervisory Special Agent James Fitzgerald of the FBI's behavioral analysis unit said the letter was likely written by an adult, native English speaker in his 30s or older. Because the letter was well-written, the author is probably well-educated or well-read and may use writing in his or her job.

Fitzgerald said the author has probably used the name Gidget in some playful context in the past.

"If there is someone from a year ago or 20 years ago ... that used the term 'Gidget' -- that would be important for us to know," he said.

The FBI's prime suspect in the case -- a commercial airline pilot who lives in Snohomish -- happened to be in Las Vegas on a layover when the letter was mailed in January, according to the suspect's Seattle lawyer, Larry Setchell.

The pilot, who has been the subject of a relentless investigation, including three searches of his homes and electronic surveillance, has not been charged with a crime. In a Seattle P-I story Wednesday, Setchell said his client is innocent and likened the FBI probe to an inquisition.

Jordan, asked to respond to the criticism, said the FBI would not identify any particular suspect.

Potential witness

"When the investigation reaches the point where we have probable cause to arrest someone, we speak with an indictment." Jordan and supervisory agent Robert Geeslin also pointed out that a major part of the investigation is aimed at finding a Makarov 9 x 18mm pistol replacement barrel they believe was used in the murder.

The global hunt for that barrel is "target-neutral" in that it is not tied to any particular suspect, they said. "We will follow the evidence wherever it takes us," Geeslin said.

So far, agents have located and run ballistics tests on about half the 3,500 barrels. They are continuing with the painstaking task of finding the rest and want the public's help.

Anyone with information on the whereabouts of such a barrel, the man seen wandering around Wales' neighborhood or Gidget is asked to call the FBI at 866- 322-7009.

A reward of up to $1 million is offered for information leading to an arrest and conviction.

Several of the FBI agents assigned to the dragnet for the killer were present Wednesday morning at a ceremony at the U.S. District Courthouse celebrating Wales' life as a prosecutor, parent and public servant. Among those speaking was Wales' son, also named Tom.

"It's a dreadful anniversary for me and my family," he said. "Time has not healed any wounds."

Wales noted how even people his father prosecuted lauded his fairness and sense of justice.

"After Pop's murder, we received several letters praising the understanding and guidance he had offered them during the worst period of their lives," he said. "He did not believe anyone was beyond redemption."

P-I reporter Paul Shukovsky can be reached at 206-448-8072 or paulshukovsky@seattlepi.com.

Five Years Later, FBI Still After Wales' Killer (SEATIMES)

By Steve Miletich And Mike Carter, Seattle Times staff reporters

Seattle Times, October 12, 2006

Five years after the killing of Seattle federal prosecutor Thomas Wales, the FBI released a sketch Wednesday of a dark-haired man who may have information about the killing and announced a new Web site to take tips in the investigation.

The steps came as the FBI asked for help in what it acknowledged has been a difficult investigation. About 4,000 people have been questioned and more than 10,000 leads have been pursued in all 50 states and a half-dozen foreign countries.

No one has been arrested in the slaying of Wales, who was shot in his Queen Anne home on Oct. 11, 2001. But the FBI has focused on an airline pilot who had been prosecuted by Wales in a fraud case.

At a news conference Wednesday, FBI officials declined to discuss any suspect but said they are determined to obtain an indictment.

"We will not give up," said Bob Jordan, special agent in charge of the Portland FBI office. Jordan was given oversight of the investigation in June when the head of the Seattle office tried to reduce the number of agents on the case.

Jordan said if Wales was killed because of his work, he would be the first federal prosecutor in U.S. history slain in the line of duty.

In that case, Jordan added, "we are all victims in a sense."

FBI seeking help

Tips about a newly released sketch of a man agents would like to question can be provided at 866-322-7009.

A new Web site has been set up to provide information on the case and to receive tips: http://wales.fbi.gov.

A $1 million reward has been offered for information that helps solve the case.

The sketch, the officials said, is of a man seen pulling a black nylon suitcase in Wales' neighborhood weeks before the killing. Investigators have not identified the man, who had tobacco-stained teeth and a chipped left front tooth.

It is not known if the man has any connection to the killing, but even eliminating him as a subject would be helpful, said Robert Geeslin, an FBI supervisory agent overseeing a task force of five agents, two Seattle police detectives and five investigative analysts.

The man's presence in the neighborhood was first reported as suspicious before Wales was killed. But it was not brought to the attention of the Wales task force until 2004, Geeslin said. After trying unsuccessfully to identify the man, the FBI decided to make the sketch public.

Geeslin said the FBI is continuing its search for a unique silver gun barrel used in the killing. The gun used to kill Wales — an Eastern European pistol called a Makarov — had been fitted with one of the barrels, ballistics experts found.

About 3,600 of the barrels were sold in the U.S. before Wales was killed. The FBI has tracked half of them without finding the one used to shoot Wales, Geeslin said.

The news conference followed a memorial service at the U.S. Courthouse in Seattle, where Wales' 29-year-old son, Tom, sounded a bitter note about how he and his sister, Amy, and their mother, Elizabeth, had suffered the loss. "It is a dreadful anniversary for our family," he said to more than 150 attorneys, judges, and court employees. "Time does not heal all wounds."

His father, Tom Wales said, was unconcerned over the possible danger of his job as a white-collar prosecutor. His life was "lived for the betterment of others."

"After Pops was murdered," he said, "we got letters from people he had prosecuted." All expressed condolences. "He did not believe anyone was beyond redemption."

Tom Wales, who now lives in England, said his father was a "mentor and inspiration and probably the best friend Amy and I will ever have."

"When my conscience speaks, it does so in my father's voice," he said.

Seattle Police Chief Gil Kerlikowske recalled Wales' role as executive director of Washington CeaseFire, a gun-control advocacy group.

"It is a terrible tragedy that he would lose his life at the end of a gun," the chief said.

Also speaking was Assistant U.S. Attorney Bob Westinghouse, who worked with Wales on the fraud investigation that targeted the man who's now the prime suspect in Wales' killing. Westinghouse was placed under 24-hour protection for months after Wales' death.

"I have not known a prosecutor who was more committed to seeking justice," Westinghouse said. "His legacy is our directive to do justice ... to live our lives as ethically as possible, to have fun, and be good stewards to our community and our country."

DOJ_NMG_0079703

FBI Seeks Help Identifying Man (OREG)

By Gene Johnson

The Oregonian, October 12, 2006

SEATTLE -- Shortly before federal prosecutor Thomas Crane Wales was killed five years ago, a man with a chipped front tooth was seen dragging a small, nylon suitcase through Wales' upscale neighborhood on Seattle's Queen Anne Hill.

At least one person who saw the man contacted law enforcement. But that information wasn't passed on to the task force investigating Wales' murder until 2004, and only now is the FBI asking the public for help identifying him.

The FBI released a composite sketch of the man Wednesday, the fifth anniversary of the shooting, saying that its attempts to identify him had come up empty. Wales, an 18-year veteran of the U.S. attorney's office and president of the gun control group Washington CeaseFire, was shot as he worked alone at a computer in his basement.

The FBI is offering up to $1 million for information that helps solve the killing. The sketch bears no resemblance to the only publicly identified suspect, an airline pilot whom Wales once prosecuted in a fraud case. That suspect's lawyer, Larry Setchell, has maintained his client's innocence, and no charges have been brought.

Although the sketch was made in April 2004, years after the initial report, FBI Inspector Robert Jordan said he is confident in its accuracy because agents received "some corroboration" about the way the man looked. He declined to elaborate.

Jordan would not say what agency received the initial tip about the man, how soon it was before the killing, or how close to Wales' home the man was seen. Agents don't know if the man had any connection to the killing. At the time, the man, who was white, was in his late 30s or early 40s, 5-foot-7 to 5-foot-10, slim, 140 to 165 pounds, with black hair and tobacco-stained teeth.

Jordan, who is in charge of the FBI's Portland office, took over the case in June, after Seattle special agent-in-charge Laura Laughlin was criticized

FBI: Strange Man Was Reported In Wales' Neighborhood Before Death (AP)

By Gene Johnson, AP Legal Affairs Writer

AP, October 12, 2006

SEATTLE (AP) -- Shortly before federal prosecutor Thomas Crane Wales was killed five years ago, a strange man with a chipped front tooth was seen dragging a small, nylon suitcase through his upscale neighborhood on Seattle's Queen Anne Hill.

At least one person who saw the man contacted law enforcement. But that information wasn't passed on to the task force investigating Wales' murder until 2004, and only now is the FBI asking the public for help identifying him.

The FBI released a composite sketch of the man Wednesday, the fifth anniversary of the shooting, saying that its attempts to identify him had come up empty. Wales, an 18-year veteran of the U.S. attorney's office and president of the gun control group Washington CeaseFire, was shot as he worked alone at a computer in his basement.

The FBI is offering up to $1 million for information that helps solve the killing. The sketch bears no resemblance to the only publicly identified suspect, an airline pilot whom Wales once prosecuted in a fraud case. That suspect's lawyer, Larry Setchell, has maintained his client's innocence, and no charges have been brought.

Although the sketch was made in April 2004, years after the initial report, FBI Inspector Robert Jordan said he is confident in its accuracy because agents received "some corroboration" about the way the man looked. He declined to elaborate.

Jordan would not say what agency received the initial tip about the man, how soon it was before the killing, or how close to Wales' home the man was seen. Agents don't know if the man had any connection to the killing. At the time, the man, who was white, was in his late 30s or early 40s, 5-foot-7 to 5-foot-10, slim, 140 to 165 pounds, with black hair and tobacco-stained teeth.

Jordan, who is in charge of the FBI's Portland, Ore., office, took over the case in June, after Seattle special agent-in-charge Laura Laughlin was criticized for cutting resources for the investigation. Since then, Jordan said, the FBI has roughly doubled the number of people assigned to the case.

There are now five special agents, a supervisor, and two Seattle Police detectives working it full time, along with five analysts, three federal prosecutors and a King County deputy prosecutor.

The investigation has included close to 4,000 interviews and a nationwide hunt for Makarov pistols outfitted with replacement barrels, which the shooter used. The FBI has located about half of the 3,500 Makarov replacement barrels sold in the U.S., but none matched the ballistics pattern on the bullets that killed Wales.

One Bellevue gun collector who has provided grand jury testimony in the Wales investigation, Albert Kwan, purchased at least one Makarov replacement barrel in March 1996, which he turned over to the FBI. In court papers filed Wednesday, Kwan's lawyers said he repeatedly told the grand jury he doesn't remember buying more than one barrel, but that investigators insist he bought a second barrel, which has not turned up.

Jordan said that if Wales was killed because of his work as a prosecutor, he would be the first federal prosecutor ever slain in the line of duty.

"If that's the reason he was murdered, we are all victims in a sense," he said.

Jordan's comments followed a memorial service that drew dozens of Wales' former colleagues, as well as his son, daughter and former wife.

Wales' son, Tom, said the pain his family felt after the killing remains undiminished. It's a pain they're reminded of when people ask them about the investigation or what their father might have done to provoke the murderer.

"Even if we do not invite peril, it can find us, even in the safety of our own homes," he said.

Wales' colleagues remembered him for his sense of humor, his public service and volunteer work, and his commitment to justice.

Wales "pursued justice relentlessly in his life, and with his life," said U.S. Attorney John McKay.

Seattle Police Chief Gil Kerlikowske said Wales would have been saddened at the recent spate of school shootings across the country, to see how little progress has been made.

"He saw the human face of gun violence," Kerlikowske said. "Such a terrible tragedy, then, to lose your life at the end of a gun."

.

How To Make US Schools Safer (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock, Staff Writer Of The Christian Science Monitor

The Christian Science Monitor, October 12, 2006

A presidential conference focused on people solutions: staff-police cooperation, crisis drills, and identifying problem students.

WASHINGTON

Just hours after a 13-year-old Missouri boy fired an assault rifle at his school - and in the wake of four recent fatal school shootings in rural America - President Bush and national experts vetted plans to make schools "gentle places of learning."

But, unlike comparable panels after the Columbine High School shootings in 1999, proposed strategies did not include curbing access to guns.

Instead, Tuesday's presidential conference on school safety in Chevy Chase, Md., focused on the human face of the solution: getting "stakeholders" - students, school officials, parents, and police - working together, practicing school crisis plans as regularly as fire drills, and, most critically, identifying students who need help before they pick up a gun.

That means taking bullying seriously, encouraging students to tell an adult when they hear classmates threaten to harm themselves or others, and identifying "students of interest" (taking care not to label a child a troublemaker) and getting them help.

Since more than 3 in 4 shooters talk in advance about their plans, the goal is to get better intelligence, experts say. That means getting police into classrooms, even at elementary schools. "Our first line of prevention is really having good intelligence," said Delbert Elliott, director of the Center for the Study and Prevention of Violence in Boulder, Colo., who urged monitoring children for agitation and aggression.

Other panelists came fresh from their own bouts with school violence. Sheriff Fred Wegener of Bailey, Colo., talked about how recent emergency drills helped his officers "go to the threat," pin down the man with the gun, then evacuate students, after a call came on Sept. 27 that an outsider had taken hostages at the Platte Canyon High School. In the end, the gunman killed himself and a hostage, but was not able to fire into large groups of students.

Although gun control was not on the agenda, it did come up when panelists opened the session to questions. "Obviously, kids should not have access to weapons," said Theo Milonopoulos, a sophomore at Stanford University who with his twin brother, Nico, is a cofounder of Vox Populi and Kidz-LA. The two groups encourage youth to combat violence by engaging in the legislative process.

Sheriff Wegener of Bailey responded that he had a rifle in the bed of his pickup truck when he went to school, but "never thought about shooting anybody with it." He added: "We have to change society."

In an interview after the conference, Mr. Milonopoulos voiced his dissatisfaction: "I'm grateful to the Bush administration for bringing these issues to light through a national conference, and inviting a wide variety of groups, but there needs to be a new approach beyond the dialogue that we heard [on Tuesday]. The first thing I would do is renew the federal assault weapons ban." After the Columbine shootings in Littleton, Colo., school-safety experts called for metal detectors to keep weapons out of schools, surveillance cameras, improved school design to reduce potential hiding places - and new laws to curb access to guns.

While the event was open to the press, it was closed to the general public. Gun-control advocates say they were shut out of the conference, but not the larger fight over how to make society safer.

DOJ_NMG_0079705

"The fact that the president doesn't want to address this issue and the Republican Congress is moving in the wrong direction doesn't mean that the issue has been taken off the table," says Ladd Everitt, a spokesman for the Coalition to Stop Gun Violence, citing the 109th Congress's failure to renew the assault weapons ban and a recent House bill that makes it more difficult to curb corrupt gun dealers. Recently, more than 100 mayors have organized to press for curbs on interstate gun trafficking, he notes.

Still, school-safety experts say that experience with threat assessment is beginning to pay off. Art Kelly, police chief of New Bedford, Mass., told the conference that he used information provided by the Secret Service to prevent a school shooting from being committed.

"Generally, generally, America's schools are safe places to be," said Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, one of the speakers. "Your kids are much more likely to be safer in school than they are at the mall. And that's the good news. We are, however, seeing some indications in the last two years that those trends are changing."

But finding the money to pay for all the upgrades needed to keep schools safer is a challenge. In a statement this week, the Democratic National Committee noted that the Bush administration has cut funding for the Community Oriented Policing Services program from $160 million in the last two years of the Clinton administration to $5 million in 2005. In 2006, the program was zeroed out.

Code Blue At Schools Rattles Nerves (WP)

By Lori Aratani And Katherine Shaver, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, October 12, 2006

Montgomery Officials Tighten Security After Threats of Violence Are Received

A 12-year-old boy's false claim yesterday that an armed man approached him at a bus stop and threatened violence at a school prompted officials to lock the doors and heighten security at 13 campuses in northwestern Montgomery County.

The boy, a seventh-grader at Kingsview Middle School in Germantown, told his story to a driver as he boarded his bus in the morning, then recanted it during an after-school interview with detectives.

Before he did, the tale was enough to throw Maryland's largest school system into confusion and parents into a state of uncertainty. Acting with "an abundance of caution," police and school system officials put the schools under a day-long Code Blue alert, which meant doors were monitored and students continued classes under tighter security than usual.

Police spokeswoman Lucille Baur said detectives are conferring with prosecutors to determine whether to file charges against the boy. She said it was unclear what his motive may have been.

The school system's actions, coming after a series of school shootings and violent threats across the United States, demonstrate the current concern about student safety. Baur said police had initially recommended that three campuses be put under Code Blue alert, but school officials decided to add 10 schools.

Montgomery's response echoes that of officials in Virginia's Culpeper County, which shut down all public and private schools last week after receiving a bomb threat by phone. A 25-year-old man was arrested yesterday in connection with the case.

In Arlington County, security was tightened yesterday at Wakefield High School and neighboring Claremont Immersion Elementary School after a teenager apparently fired a paintball gun while walking to school, an official said. And in Wilmington, Del., three high school students were charged with terroristic threatening and conspiracy for making bomb threats at their school.

On Tuesday, President Bush hosted a six-hour Conference on School Safety in Chevy Chase, at which officials talked about strategies for making campuses more secure.

Yesterday's Code Blue alert in Montgomery was one of several incidents that rattled the nerves of the 139,000-student school system.

Just before 8 a.m., more than 2,200 students at Sherwood High School were evacuated after administrators received a bomb threat. Bomb-sniffing dogs were brought in to sweep the Sandy Spring campus. The threat turned out to be false, and a 15-year-old student from Sherwood was arrested in connection with the incident.

Then, in the early afternoon, two elementary schools in Gaithersburg -- Brown Station and Diamond -- briefly tightened security after Gaithersburg police notified them that a burglary suspect whose description matched that of the man who allegedly made the bus stop threat was believed to be in the area. The Code Blue at those schools, a separate action, was lifted about 90 minutes later.

Montgomery police said that elementary school students were kept inside buildings for recess and that outdoor activities at other campuses were canceled. School system officials also canceled after-school activities at Kingsview Middle.

Under the school district's rules, Code Blue is the less restrictive of two types of alerts issued when there is a potential threat to school security. Under a Code Red alert, students and teachers must remain in their classrooms or in a secured area.

DOJ_NMG_0079706

For students, the most frustrating part of the day was being stuck inside.

Akshan Singh, 8, a third-grader at Germantown Elementary, said students were calm throughout the day, but many found the alert frustrating because they couldn't go outside for recess and were allowed to leave the classroom only with special permission.

Some parents, however, found the alert frustrating for other reasons.

Lonnie Williams, 45, an electronic engineer, said he didn't know about the Code Blue until a reporter asked him about it as he waited to pick up his daughter at Seneca Valley High School in Germantown. Williams said he did not receive an e-mail notification on his hand-held computer device, as he would for weather-related changes in the school schedule.

"That's annoying," Williams said. "Since the sniper incident, there's been that edge, wanting to know what's going on when something like this is happening."

But Suzanne Maxey, principal at Seneca Valley, showed The Washington Post a copy of an e-mail she sent at 10:32 a.m. to members of the school's "Eagles Bulletin" e-mail list.

"The overall security of the building has been increased," Maxey wrote, in part. "The students are safe and regular instruction has continued." She said she knew of only one parent who took a child out of school early.

At Seneca Valley, Code Blue meant no casual bathroom breaks and no lunch trips to McDonald's or Wendy's. The front doors were locked, and teachers and security assistants guarded the other doors between classes. The first-period physical education students were called in from the tennis courts. Many teachers spent their free periods, meant as time to plan their lessons, walking the halls.

"A lot of people were calm," said Ashley Ramos, 14, a ninth-grader. "Some people were like, "Oh my God,' but everything was pretty normal besides being in the classroom with the doors closed."

She said she was never scared. "When they [school officials] said there was security everywhere and not to panic, we felt a lot more safe," she said.

With none of the school's 1,454 students allowed to leave campus for lunch, lines grew in the cafeteria. Many ate lunch in classrooms or the auditorium lobby. School officials unlocked the gym to ease crowds in the cafeteria and let students burn off energy playing basketball.

About 80 seniors carried on with a trip to the Germantown Soccerplex for a college expo.

"Usually we just say, 'Get on the bus,' " Maxey said. "Today, 15 adults were out there to make sure they were okay."

Although officials say they have made strides in making schools safer, they acknowledge -- as in the case of the Montgomery incident -- that it's sometimes difficult to differentiate the real threats from the false ones. But they hope stiffer penalties for such actions will be a deterrent.

Montgomery officials said that despite the vague nature of the threat, they did not want to take any chances. Parents, too, said it is difficult to know how concerned they should be.

Parent Carol Ferrara, 46, said yesterday's Code Blue did not worry her as much as it might have a couple of years ago. Seneca Valley had a bomb hoax last school year, she said, and she hears news reports about threats that turn out to be nothing.

"It's one of those things where you think it's not going to turn into anything, thank God," Ferrara said as she waited in her minivan to pick up her son, a junior at Seneca Valley. "It's so common. But with the school shootings, I sort of hold my breath and wonder when is it going to happen here?"

Staff writers Ernesto LondoÃ±o and Tara Bahrampour contributed to this report.

Fake Threat Puts Schools On Alert (WT)

By Gary Emerling, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 12, 2006

Montgomery County officials yesterday heightened security at 13 schools in Germantown and two in Gaithersburg after a student falsely reported that he had been approached by someone brandishing a weapon.

County police said that the student initially claimed to be waiting for a bus to Kingsview Middle School in Germantown at about 7:30 a.m. when a person with a weapon approached and made a threat about schools.

The student told the bus driver about the incident and the driver radioed school officials, who notified police, Montgomery County police spokeswoman Lucille Baur said.

Miss Baur said that the student later admitted that he made up the story while he was being re-interviewed after classes ended yesterday.

"He recanted the story or the description of the incident," Miss Baur said. "So there was not a man with a weapon who posed a threat to schools and students."

DOJ_NMG_0079707

Meanwhile, authorities in Culpeper County, Va., yesterday arrested a 25-year-old man in connection with a bomb threat that closed schools and day-care centers in the county for one day last week.

Mark J. Robinson, 25, of Culpeper, Va., has been charged with four felony counts of making bomb threats, two felony counts of threatening to kill or injure by phone, and one misdemeanor count of using obscene or vulgar language over the telephone.

"It's definitely a relief to know we have someone under arrest and can take a breather for a few moments and get back to it," said Lt. Patrick Coffey, a spokesman for the Culpeper Police Department.

Police arrested Mr. Robinson after serving two search warrants for an investigation into threats made against the Culpeper Police Department and a Best Western Motel in Culpeper, as well as the schools bomb threat.

Officers searched and seized computer equipment from Mr. Robinson's home and from the apartment of Justin Brown, 19. Police said that Mr. Brown was interviewed about the threats and was not arrested, but that he is still a suspect in the case.

In Montgomery County, Miss Baur said that police do not know why the student fabricated the story and have not determined whether charges will be filed against him.

School officials said that they had not yet determined if the student will be disciplined.

The story prompted police to recommend that 13 schools in Germantown be placed on a Code Blue security alert -- meaning all students and staff at the schools had to be accounted for and entrances to the school were monitored and secured.

School officials also opted to lock the buildings' exterior doors.

Orange cones and marked police cruisers were placed at the schools' entrances, and streets normally crowded around lunchtime near some schools were comparatively quiet.

"We're absolutely relieved that there was no real threat. At the same time, we did maintain a safe environment all day with our students," schools spokesman Brian Edwards said. "Any time there is a question of this nature you have to take it seriously and treat it as real."

Officials temporarily placed two schools in Gaithersburg on Code Blue after city police said they had seen a person in the area matching the description of the person with the weapon.

However, Gaithersburg police spokesman Cpl. Rudy Wagner said that the person was a man suspected of fourth-degree burglary who had escaped from officers but was not the same person wanted for the threat.

County police yesterday also arrested a 15-year-old boy from Olney who phoned in a false bomb threat to Sherwood High School in Sandy Spring.

The school was evacuated and searched, but students returned to classes at about 10 a.m.

·Matthew Cella contributed to this report.

Seven Search Warrants Issued In School Shooting Investigation (AP)

AP, October 12, 2006

LAKEWOOD (AP)— Investigators said Wednesday that seven search warrants have been issued and the gunman's suicide letter sent to the FBI for analysis as they try to determine why Duane Morrison invaded a mountain high school and killed a student two weeks ago.

Authorities also announced the evidence shows that the single bullet that killed Platte Canyon High School student Emily Keyes was fired from Morrison's gun.

Investigators wouldn't discuss the search warrants, which are sealed, or the hundreds of tips they have received, pieces of evidence collected or interviews conducted.

Park County District Attorney Molly Chilson

told reporters during a news conference at the Colorado Bureau of Investigation headquarters that she knows they want answers to why the 53-year-old Morrison entered the school in Bailey, took six girls hostage in a classroom and then shot Keyes and himself when officers entered.

"You want to know what happened in Duane Morrison's life in the months, weeks, days and hours prior to the morning of Wednesday, Sept. 27," Chilson said. "You also want to know detail by detail what happened in the school that day."

Chilson said the investigation by her office and the CBI is trying to answer those questions and releasing any information before the facts are verified would undermine their efforts.

Man Accused Of Call That Closed Schools (WP)

By Michael Alison Chandler, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 12, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0079708

A 25-year-old man was arrested yesterday on suspicion of calling in a vague bomb threat that shut down every school and day-care center in Culpeper County a week ago, and police linked him to previous telephone threats against authorities and a local motel.

Mark J. Robinson of Culpeper was charged with four counts of making bomb threats, two counts of threatening to kill or injure by telephone and one count of using obscene or vulgar language on the phone.

Police searched Robinson's house and a friend's apartment Tuesday night in connection with the Oct. 4 bomb threat and earlier threats against the Culpeper Police Department and a Best Western motel that employed the suspect as a housekeeper, said Lt. Patrick Coffey, the department's lead investigator on the case. Police said they have not established a motive for the threats, which began Sept. 17.

Investigators interviewed the friend, Justin Brown, 19, but did not arrest him, Coffey said.

In searching the Culpeper residences, police did not find any explosive-making materials, but they seized computers and other electronic equipment. Police said computers were used to help disguise the caller's voice and location.

The high-tech strategy made it difficult to identify a suspect, Coffey said. "It wasn't just a phone call with a caller ID," he said. "With this type of technology these days, it makes it more and more difficult to trace these kind of calls."

He said detectives worked round the clock and were aided by the county sheriff's office, state police, the FBI, the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, and the Federal Communications Commission.

"We are extremely relieved," Marla McKenna, spokeswoman for the 7,000-student Culpeper school system, said in response to the arrest.

She said students and teachers have been on edge since the countywide school shutdown last Thursday. Schools have received two additional bomb threats in the past three days.

On Monday, a 14-year-old middle school student phoned in a threat from a bus on her way to school, McKenna said, and yesterday a 15-year-old high school student left a threatening note in a girls' bathroom. The students, both female, were suspended and could be expelled, she said.

"We are taking all these threats really seriously," McKenna said. "We really need to get the messages out that a student might think it's a joke, but the consequences are really serious."

Since school shootings last week in Lancaster County, Pa., and last month in Bailey, Colo., school districts have been on heightened alert.

In Culpeper, about 70 miles southwest of Washington, the past week's events have intensified discussions about school safety. "We are going to continue to evaluate and reevaluate what we need to do to protect our students," McKenna said.

Arrest Made In Culpeper Bomb Threat (CULCIT)

Culpeper Citizen, October 12, 2006

25-year old Mark Robinson was arrested in connection with the bomb threats that closed all area schools on Oct. 5

Culpeper police arrested one man and questioned another in connection with the Oct. 4 bomb threat that closed all schools in Culpeper County.

One man was arrested and another questioned in connection to a telephoned bomb threat that closed all schools in Culpeper County Thursday, Oct. 5, the Culpeper Police Department announced Wednesday.

Mark J. Robinson, 25, of Willis Lane in Culpeper was charged in connection with bomb threats to the school and the Police Department. He is charged with four counts of making bomb threats (class 5 felon), two counts of threatening to kill or injure by phone(class 6 felony), and one count of obscene or vulgar language over the telephone (class 1 misdemeanor). The Culpeper Police Department estimates that Robinson placed about 30 calls to the E-911 center over the last several weeks. Police seized computers and computer equipment during a search of his home.

Justin Brown, 19, of Mountain View Drive in Culpeper, was questioned about threats made to the Police Department and the Best Western Motel in Culpeper, but at this time has not been arrested. Computers and computer equipment were seized during a search of his home.

Although no other individuals are thought to be involved, the investigation is continuing and additional subpoenas will be served "for telephone records and to obtain electronic tracking information from various communications vendors."

Police received the school bomb threat at 11:31 p.m. Wednesday Oct. 4. Because the threat did not specify a particular school, all schools were closed the following day while six local, state and FBI agencies searched each school.

Former Middletown Twp. Mayor Gets 43 Months For Bribery (NSL)

By John P. Martin, Star-ledger Staff

Newark Star-Ledger (NJ), October 12, 2006

Raymond O'Grady, the former Middletown Township mayor who bragged to undercover FBI agents that he could "smell a cop a mile away" was sentenced yesterday to 43 months in prison for taking bribes.

The punishment, handed down by U.S. District Judge William Martini in Newark, was far less than the term sought by prosecutors but was still longer than nearly any sentence for a New Jersey public official convicted of graft in recent years.

If it bothered O'Grady, 57, he didn't show it. He never testified at his trial in June and declined yesterday to address the judge.

His attorney, Kevin Roe, at one point told Martini that O'Grady was remorseful, but he said after the hearing his client was an innocent man who was entrapped by government agents. Roe said he planned to appeal the verdict and sentence.

A well-known figure in Middletown, O'Grady spent more than a decade on the township committee, including four terms as mayor. The judge said that despite receiving letters of praise from O'Grady's supporters, he felt all he knew about the man was the portrait that emerged during hours of secret FBI surveillance taping.

On those tapes, O'Grady, who was also director of the Monmouth County Central Motor Pool, met with undercover FBI agents who posed as demolition firm employees willing to pay for government contracts.

The same sting, dubbed Operation Bid Rig, has led to nearly 20 arrests and convictions of municipal officials, employees and contractors in and around Monmouth County.

O'Grady boasted to the agents about his ability to be discreet. He said he didn't do "stupid things" like discuss illegal activities on the telephone and warned them about a possible snitch. He also accepted envelopes stuffed with $6,000 cash from them.

During the trial and again yesterday, Roe suggested O'Grady was framed by overeager agents and one of their cooperating witnesses, former county bridges superintendent Anthony Palughi.

The judge, however, said such an argument was an insult to his intelligence. He called the tapes "damning" and the evidence overwhelming.

"Everything in the evidence in this case suggests he was very comfortable in this environment," Martini said.

The prosecutor, Assistant U.S. Attorney James Nobile, had sought a term as high as 78 months, contending O'Grady obstructed the probe by destroying evidence and scheming to kill former Undersheriff Thomas Broderick, who O'Grady believed was cooperating with investigators.

Nobile also said the evidence included conversations in which O'Grady and Palughi discussed taking payoffs from other contractors.

"Mr. O'Grady was not a deer in the headlights," Nobile said, challenging a defense contention. "Mr. O'Grady came to the agents already corrupted."

The judge said he believed the talk of silencing a witness was "puffery" by O'Grady. Broderick was never harmed. But Martini said he was troubled by O'Grady's willingness to take money from strangers and his attorney's suggestion that any harm was minimal because no public contracts were affected.

"The harm goes to the actual confidence people have in their public officials. As people become disillusioned with this type of conduct, they don't participate, they don't vote," the judge said.

Besides fining O'Grady $5,000 and ordering him to perform 200 hours of unpaid community service, Martini banned him from public office or employment for three years after his release from prison.

"This was an appropriately long prison sentence," U.S. Attorney Christopher Christie said in a statement. "He sold himself and abandoned his obligation to be an honest elected official."

Former Mayor Of A Monmouth County Town Is Sentenced In A Corruption Case (NYT)

By Ronald Smothers

The New York Times, October 12, 2006

NEWARK, Oct. 11 — A former mayor of Middletown, N.J., was sentenced to 43 months in federal prison on Wednesday on bribery and extortion charges arising from a sting operation aimed at what prosecutors said was pervasive corruption in Monmouth County.

The former mayor, Raymond J. O'Grady, 57, is the only one of nearly two dozen public officials and contractors caught up in the F.B.I. sting who has been tried. Most have pleaded guilty to corruption charges.

But a jury took just three hours in June to find him guilty of all five counts of soliciting and accepting $8,000 in bribes from undercover agents posing as contractors seeking government work. At the time, he was on the town council and was in charge of the county's motor pool.

The investigation, called Operation Bid Rig, laid bare what the United States attorney, Christopher J. Christie, said was "a shocking eagerness and ease" by officials "to trade contracts for cash or even to be involved in money laundering."

Prosecutors argued that Mr. O'Grady accepted the bribes with the understanding that he would use his office and influence to steer no-bid contracts to the agents posing as contractors. Mr. O'Grady, a Republican, served four terms as mayor and was on the town council for a decade.

Kevin Roe, Mr. O'Grady's lawyer, said his client continued to maintain his innocence and would appeal both the guilty verdict and the sentence.

Prosecutors said that under federal sentencing guidelines, Mr. O'Grady faced 51 to 78 months in prison. But Judge William J. Martini of Federal District Court said such a sentence would be "disparate" from those handed out to others convicted of similar offenses.

Mr. O'Grady's decision to go to trial, the judge said, brought to light hours of damning audio and video tapes that were played for jurors.

In one conversation, Mr. O'Grady brazenly said he "could smell a cop a mile away" — a remark that led Mr. Christie to suggest that "Mr. O'Grady should have his olfactory senses tested immediately."

At the sentencing on Wednesday, Judge Martini said Mr. O'Grady had "made the decision to go to trial, and when you do that I have the benefit of hearing all of this."

"His statements in this evidence are not consistent with an innocent mind," Judge Martini continued, "and I don't think to this day he has any recognition that he did anything wrong."

Judge Martini's comments recalled his apparent indignation last June when, after the jury verdict came in, he said he was repelled by Mr. O'Grady's cavalier attitude that came through in the recordings. At that time, Judge Martini angrily said that he was considering sending the defendant to jail immediately.

Mr. Roe, the defense lawyer, cautiously made his arguments on Wednesday for a lower sentence for his client. He portrayed Mr. O'Grady as innocently pursuing a legitimate business relationship and maintained that prosecutors had taken the recorded conversations out of context.

"Don't insult my intelligence," Judge Martini fairly thundered from the bench. "I heard that stuff, and those words weren't put into your client's mouth."

After the sentencing, Mr. Roe conceded that he had been uncertain about how his arguments for leniency would be received by the judge in light of his comments in June.

The outcome in court on Wednesday confirmed his concerns, he said, adding that it had "chilled" his defense efforts and deterred him in aggressively making other legal moves on his client's behalf.

But Mr. Christie called the sentence "appropriately long" and said Mr. O'Grady had "sold himself and abandoned his obligation to be an honest elected official in Middletown and government official in Monmouth County."

Menendez Denies Kean's Subpoena Claim (AP)

By Donna De La Cruz

AP, October 12, 2006

TRENTON, N.J. Oct 11, 2006 (AP)— Democratic Sen. Robert Menendez told The Associated Press Wednesday that he has not been subpoenaed in any federal investigation, a claim Republican opponent Tom Kean Jr. continued to maintain.

"There is a subpoena that has his name on it that was issued by an impaneled grand jury and delivered by the FBI," Kean said during an interview with the AP. "That's a fact."

In a separate interview with the AP later Wednesday, Menendez denied Kean's claim. No federal agency has publicly said Menendez has been subpoenaed, and a Menendez campaign spokesman said Kean has no proof to make such a serious accusation.

"There are no such subpoenas to my knowledge whatsoever," Menendez said.

He added that he was not surprised by Kean's continual "one-trick pony act" of portraying the longtime Hudson County politician as corrupt. Menendez has never been charged with any wrongdoing.

The U.S. attorney's office has issued a subpoena seeking records from the North Hudson Community Action Corp. related to a lease agreement it had with Menendez, who rented a house he owned in Union City to the group, and also helped the nonprofit organization obtain federal funds. Menendez has said he obtained verbal clearance from the House Ethics Committee before entering into the lease agreement.

Kean and Menendez discussed their views on the nastiness of the race, the war in Iraq, immigration and other issues in hourlong interviews, but Kean focused mostly on corruption. Menendez has appeared to be the Senate's most vulnerable Democrat in an election season that has seen Republicans on the defensive, but recent polls show him with a slight lead over Kean.

DOJ_NMG_0079711

"If we don't know why people are making the decision, whether it be for partisan purposes or personal gain purposes, how do we know the decisions they are talking about are the right decisions for the people of the state of New Jersey?" Kean said.

Menendez said he was tired of being "guilty by geography," referring to Kean's repeated portrayal of Hudson County as rife with political corruption.

Question Of Victim Buttons Comes Before Supreme Court (LAT)

By David G. Savage

The Los Angeles Times, October 12, 2006

WASHINGTON — If the family of a murdered man wears a small, button-sized photo of the victim in the courtroom, does that display violate the defendant's right to a fair trial and require that the conviction be thrown out?

That question came before the Supreme Court for the first time today. And while several justices said they thought trial judges should ban spectators from displaying photos, badges or messages in the courtroom, most of them also said they were reluctant to reverse a murder conviction for that reason alone.

At one level, the case poses a clash between victims' rights and defendants' rights. On another, it tests the power of federal judges to reverse convictions from state courts.

During today's oral argument, Justice David H. Souter questioned whether courtroom spectators could wear badges calling on the jury to "hang" the accused. Others noted that family members sometimes can be heard sobbing in the courtroom and those expressions of emotion have not been seen as depriving the defendant of a fair trial.

The case heard by the court today began 12 years ago.

Mathew Musladin was convicted of shooting and killing the fiancé of his estranged wife in the driveway of her San Jose home in May 1994. The victim, Tom Studer, ran toward Musladin after the woman shouted for help.

At his trial, Musladin claimed he acted in self-defense. The jury disagreed and a judge sentenced him to 32 years in prison.

Studer's parents and his brother Jim attended the trial and they sat in the spectators section wearing lapel buttons that contained a photo of Tom in his Navy uniform.

Last year, the U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals overturned Musladin's conviction in a 2-1 decision. Judge Stephen Reinhardt, speaking for the appeals court, said the photos, because they "conveyed the message" that Musladin was guilty, deprived him of "the right to a fair trial by an impartial jury free from outside influences."

A California state lawyer urged the high court to overturn that ruling. "The three simple buttons bearing only a photo did not convey any message of blame [or] guilt, anything other than grief of this family," said Gregory A. Ott, a deputy attorney general from San Francisco.

He ran into sharp questioning from Souter and Justice Stephen G. Breyer.

It is "quite a bad idea to have buttons being worn in a courtroom, which is not a place for demonstrations," Breyer said.

"What if three buttons had said 'Hang Musladin'?" asked Souter. "Wouldn't that call for overturning the conviction?"

Maybe so, Ott replied, because that would send an explicit message to the jury. By contrast, he said, the small, button-sized photo of Tom Studer did not convey a specific message. The judge who presided over the trial said he saw "no possible prejudice" to the defendant.

A lawyer representing Musladin said the justices should prohibit the display of photos by spectators because it created an "an impermissible risk" of influencing the jury. "I think you had to do away with this kind of courtroom behavior. It is simply not acceptable," said David W. Fermino, a lawyer from San Francisco.

He ran into sharp questions from Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justice Antonin Scalia.

"A typical jury will understand that the victim is going to have a family and they're going to be sorry he's dead and they might be there at the trial," Roberts said. "The buttons don't seem to add much to what the jury will derive from seeing the family seated behind the prosecution bench."

Even Breyer questioned whether the buttons in this case rose to a constitutional violation. "Why isn't this a normal sign of grief?" he asked.

By the end of the hour, most of the justices sounded as though they were inclined to reverse the 9th Circuit's decision. A ruling in the case, Carey vs. Musladin, is expected in several months.

Court Weighs Effect Of Victim's Image On Trial (USAT)

By Joan Biskupic

USA Today, October 12, 2006

WASHINGTON — Supreme Court justices appeared divided Wednesday over whether a convicted murderer's right to a fair trial was violated when spectators court wore buttons showing a picture of the victim.

DOJ_NMG_0079712

"I think they're probably a problem," Justice Stephen Breyer said of such buttons, suggesting at one point that judges should simply say, "No buttons (in court). No banners. No petitions. No posters." Justice David Souter also raised concerns that such buttons could improperly prejudiced jurors.

However, Chief Justice John Roberts suggested that buttons — such as those worn by the victim's relatives in the California case that was before the justices — could be no more influential than relatives who sit in a prominent place behind prosecutors.

Justice Antonin Scalia, also seeming unconcerned, likened such buttons to "tank shirts," "beanie hats" and other items that could break a court's decorum but not necessarily sway a jury.

This is the first time the justices have taken up the question of whether such buttons could unfairly influence a jury, but the issue often arises in trial courts. Judges have taken varying approaches in dealing with displays that could send messages to jurors. In the mid-1990s, U.S. District Court Judge Richard Matsch, hearing the cases of Oklahoma City bombing defendants Timothy McVeigh and Terry Nichols, banned buttons and other items with symbols of the bombing.

The case before the justices dates to 1994, when Matthew Musladin fatally shot Tom Studer, the fiancé of Musladin's estranged wife. Musladin said he shot Studer in self-defense. Relatives of Studer showed up at Musladin's trial wearing buttons depicting Studer's face. The judge said he did not think that would prejudice jurors, noting they had "been instructed not to let passion or prejudice influence their verdict." The jury found Musladin guilty; he was sentenced to 32 years to life in prison.

A California appeals court backed that verdict, but the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 9th Circuit reversed it. It said the message conveyed by the buttons was "that Studer was the innocent party and that the defendant was necessarily guilty."

Much of the justices' hour-long session Wednesday concerned whether buttons should be allowed in court, but there is a legal threshold that could prevent the justices from deciding the case on the merits of that question.

California officials say the 9th Circuit should have rejected Musladin's claim because lower court rulings in his case did not conflict with "clearly established federal law."

Deputy California Attorney General Gregory Ott told the justices that the 9th Circuit violated federal rules for prisoner appeals by not deferring to a state appeals court ruling.

David Fermino, Musladin's attorney, said past cases require that judges not allow behavior that is a risk to a fair trial. He said the buttons worn by Studer's relatives went beyond a normal showing of grief.

Buttons' Influence On Jury At Issue For Justices (WP)

By Charles Lane

The Washington Post, October 12, 2006

Tom Studer's family made a silent but powerful statement 11 years ago at the trial of the man accused of murdering him. They appeared in a California courtroom wearing lapel buttons emblazoned with photographs of him, wearing his Navy uniform and smiling.

Though the defense objected, the judge allowed the buttons. Matthew Musladin was convicted and sentenced to at least 32 years in prison; he says the buttons may have swayed the jury's emotions, depriving him of his constitutional right to a fair trial.

Last year, the San Francisco-based U.S. Court of Appeals for the 9th Circuit agreed with Musladin and overturned his conviction. Prosecutors appealed to the Supreme Court. Yesterday, the justices heard oral arguments in a case about legal due process and the proper relationship between state and federal courts.

Gregory A. Ott, representing the state of California, told the court that, even if the buttons may have influenced the jury, the state court's ruling was entitled to be upheld by the federal courts.

A 1996 federal law says that federal judges should defer to state courts' interpretations of the federal Constitution in criminal cases unless they clash with "clearly established" Supreme Court precedent. But the Supreme Court has never ruled before on buttons worn by courtroom spectators, so there was no such precedent, Ott said.

"It was certainly reasonable for the state court here to conclude that three simple buttons bearing only a photo did not convey any message of blame, guilt, anything other than the grief of this family," he said.

Justice David H. Souter seemed to disagree, citing a 1986 ruling written by Justice Thurgood Marshall that suggested that courtroom practices "inherently prejudicial" to the defendant would violate the Constitution.

"What if the button had said . . . 'Hang Musladin'?" Souter asked Ott. "Is there any question in your mind that allowing the family members to display this message to a jury throughout the trial . . . is raising a risk, an unacceptable risk, that the jury will consider improper influences in reaching its verdict?"

It may, Ott conceded, "but it might still be reasonable for a state court to conclude otherwise."

DOJ_NMG_0079713

Several members of the court also seemed troubled by the potential harm that such displays could cause in court. But, given the lack of a clearly applicable Supreme Court precedent, few seemed to think that Musladin's conviction should have been overturned.

David W. Fermino, Musladin's attorney, argued that the 9th Circuit ruling fit a framework outlined by the Marshall opinion and others, including a 1976 case in which the court said the government may not ordinarily require a defendant to appear in prison garb during trial.

"This wearing of the button in a sense branded the defendant in the eyes of the jurors," Fermino said.

But Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg noted that the cases Fermino cited involved government rules, rather than the conduct of private citizen spectators. Fermino's argument, she observed, "certainly goes beyond where our precedent left off."

Justice Antonin Scalia said that "there is a First Amendment problem when you're dealing with people other than the prosecution."

The case is Carey v. Musladin , No. 05-785. A decision is expected by July.

Justices Ponder Relationship Of Federal And State Courts (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, October 12, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 11 — Whether a murder defendant's right to a fair trial was violated when the judge permitted the victim's relatives to sit behind the prosecutor, wearing buttons with the victim's picture on them, was a question in a case argued before the Supreme Court on Wednesday. But it is not the question the justices will answer.

Rather, the case turns on whether the federal appeals court in San Francisco had the authority to order a new trial for the defendant, who was convicted after the state court trial judge refused to tell the family of the victim, Tom Studer, to remove the buttons.

The case is therefore a potentially important test of the relationship between the federal and state courts, as redefined by a 10-year-old federal law that greatly restricted the federal courts' ability to set aside state convictions through writs of habeas corpus. The real question is how one of the most important limitations in that law actually works.

In the 1996 law, the Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act, Congress specified that federal judges could grant habeas corpus petitions only if the state court decision was "contrary to, or involved an unreasonable application of, clearly established federal law, as determined by the Supreme Court of the United States."

That limitation seems straightforward enough, but as the argument on Wednesday made clear, it is more complicated than it looks.

The Supreme Court has had various things to say over the years about the unduly prejudicial impact of such practices as placing a defendant in shackles or in prison garb in the presence of the jury. But it has never said a word about a murder victim's relatives wearing buttons.

So, did the federal appeals court in this case, the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit, have the authority to extrapolate from the old Supreme Court precedents to the new situation? Did it have the authority to apply one of its own cases, a 1990 ruling that overturned a rape conviction because female spectators at the trial had worn buttons declaring "Women Against Rape"?

Gregory A. Ott, a California deputy attorney general, argued that the 1996 law required answering "no" to both those questions. Mr. Ott told the justices that the California Supreme Court's decision upholding Mathew Musladin's murder conviction neither violated "clearly established" law, of which there was none, nor amounted to an "unreasonable application" of the law that did exist.

There seemed relatively little doubt that most of the justices were inclined to agree. So they spent most of the argument trying to tease out the potential implications of a ruling that overturned the Ninth Circuit's decision in his case, Carey v. Musladin. No. 05-785.

Suppose, Justice Anthony M. Kennedy asked Mr. Ott, that there was no Supreme Court ruling on a particular issue, but that the courts of five federal appellate circuits had looked at the issue and had all reached the same conclusion. "And they all say, 'We think the general rule of the Supreme Court is as follows,' " Justice Kennedy said, asking: "Isn't that entitled to some weight? You're not supposed to cite that when you go to the Sixth Circuit court or you go to the state court?"

Such a decision, even if widely shared among the appeals courts, could not be considered "clearly established" law, Mr. Ott replied. "To redefine or shape this court's holdings beyond the face of those holdings, our position is that cannot be done with state or circuit law," he said.

He added that such lower-court extrapolations might be considered "reasonable applications" of Supreme Court law under some circumstances, and those could be of some relevance in a habeas corpus case.

Justice David H. Souter asked Mr. Ott to imagine that rather than a picture of the man Mr. Musladin was charged with killing, the buttons had carried the words “Hang Musladin.” Was there “not sufficiently clear law from this court to find that practice unconstitutional?” the justice asked.

There was no “clearly established” law governing that situation, Mr. Ott replied. But he said it would be “unreasonable” for a judge to permit such a display, and that it “would require habeas relief.”

How was that really different, Justice Souter wanted to know. “The prosecutor is going to get up and urge the jury to convict him,” he said. “What is wrong with it on a button? What risk does the button raise that the prosecutor’s argument does not?”

“It is an outside influence, Your Honor,” Mr. Ott replied.

Mr. Musladin’s lawyer, David W. Fermino, received a similar line of questioning when he argued that the buttons created an “unacceptable risk that impermissible factors have caused a jury’s verdict to be based not solely on evidence introduced at trial.” There was a “clearly established rule,” Mr. Fermino said, that equated such courtroom behavior with “inherent prejudice.”

Suppose “the trial is being held and the families appear and they’re all in black because they’re still in mourning,” Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. asked Mr. Fermino. “Does that violate this clearly established rule?”

It would, Mr. Fermino replied. He said the Ninth Circuit was properly concerned with “the risk, not the reality.”

That was an answer unlikely to persuade many justices. So Justice Souter, who emerged during the argument as the justice most sympathetic to the defendant, tried a rescue. Dressing in black might be normal behavior for people in mourning, he said, but the wearing of buttons is “something that is abnormal and something that is intended to presumably get the jury’s attention.”

“I don’t know why otherwise they would be doing it,” Justice Souter added.

In a second argument on Wednesday, the justices considered the constitutionality of California’s criminal sentencing system in light of the Supreme Court’s recent rulings on the respective roles of the judge and jury in making determinations that are central in calculating a sentence.

Last year, in United States v. Booker, the court found the federal sentencing guidelines unconstitutional because the system permitted judges rather than juries to make the relevant factual findings. As part of the same ruling, the court then saved the guidelines by making them advisory rather than mandatory.

The California system also places judges in a central role. But there was considerable confusion during the argument in Cunningham v. California, No. 05-6551, about exactly what the judges’ role is. The case is being watched closely for hints about the court’s next move on federal sentencing.

Plea Deal Ends Federal Trial For Hells Angels Accused In Deadly Brawl At Vegas Casino (AP)

By Ken Ritter, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 12, 2006

LAS VEGAS (AP) The federal racketeering trial of 11 Hells Angels motorcycle club members came to a sudden end Wednesday after six defendants accepted plea deals to reduce charges stemming from a deadly casino brawl.

The men also entered plea agreements in a parallel state criminal case, sparing them the possibility of life in prison if they had been convicted. Under the deals with federal and state prosecutors, they likely will face no more than 2{ years in prison.

All federal charges were to be dropped against the remaining five federal defendants. The judge said he also would dismiss the federal cases against the 31 other Hells Angles members charged in the brawl.

The collapse of the federal case came after two weeks of trial during which defense lawyers accused government agents and prosecutors of flagrant misconduct and withholding crucial evidence.

U.S. Attorney Daniel Bogden said he agreed to the plea deals because it involved ``the six most active and culpable participants" in the fighting.

The Hells Angels members brawled with rival Mongols biker gang members at a 2002 motorcycle rally in Laughlin, a Colorado River resort town some 100 miles south of Las Vegas.

Two Hells Angels and one Mongols member died and at least a dozen people were injured. Videotape images showed the rival motorcycle gang members battling with guns, knives, wrenches and chairs on the casino floor at Harrah's Laughlin hotel-casino.

Calvin Schaefer, Raymond Foakes, Rodney Cox and James Hannigan pleaded guilty to federal charges of committing a violent crime, battery, in aid of racketeering. Maurice ``Pete" Eunice and Dale Leedom pleaded no contest, conceding the government could prove they committed a violent felony.

Troy Regas, 43, a Hells Angels member whose brother, Sohn Regas, will go free, called it ``better for six to do a small amount of time than for one guy possibly to face a life sentence."

DOJ_NMG_0079715

Defense lawyers noted the settlement of the federal and state cases would clear the Hells Angels of federal claims that it constitutes a criminal enterprise like the Mafia.

``There is no implication whatsoever from this plea that the Hells Angels is a criminal enterprise," said Schaefer's lawyer, David Chesnoff.

No Mongols members were charged in the federal case, though six face state charges.

Republicans Call For Inquiry In Documents Case (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, October 12, 2006

Ten House Republicans called for a Congressional investigation into the improper handling of classified documents by President Bill Clinton's national security adviser, Samuel R. Berger. Mr. Berger admitted last year that he deliberately took classified documents out of the National Archives in 2003 and destroyed some of them. After his guilty plea, he was fined $50,000. The Republican lawmakers asked the House Government Reform Committee to determine whether any documents were missing from Clinton administration terrorism records, to review security measures for classified documents and to seek testimony from Mr. Berger. The group is led by Representatives Duncan Hunter, chairman of the Armed Services Committee, and F. James Sensenbrenner Jr., head of the Judiciary Committee.

Lawmakers Seek Probe Of Berger's Theft (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, October 12, 2006

Several top House Republicans yesterday asked for an investigation and committee hearings to determine which documents were "destroyed, removed or are missing" as a result of former National Security Adviser Samuel R. Berger's admitted theft of papers from the National Archives.

In a letter to the House Government Reform Committee, the lawmakers asked Chairman Thomas M. Davis III, Virginia Republican, to investigate whether there was criminal misconduct in the removal of the classified documents by the Clinton administration official.

"Because Mr. Berger was designated by President Clinton as the representative of the Clinton administration to the national 9/11 commission investigation into the terrorist attacks, it is vitally important for our congressional investigative committee to determine what records were destroyed, removed or are missing," the letter said.

Dave Marin, a spokesman for Mr. Davis, said yesterday that the chairman has requested a copy of the inspector general's report at the National Archives on the Berger matter. He said Mr. Davis plans to review the report before deciding whether to investigate.

Mr. Berger was fined $50,000 by a federal judge in September 2005 for illegally taking classified documents out of the National Archives by stuffing them in his pants. He told the court that he let "considerations of personal convenience override clear rules of handling classified material" and described the removal of the documents as a lapse of judgment as he was preparing to testify before the September 11 commission, which was investigating intelligence and security failures.

But the government said Mr. Berger "knowingly removed classified documents from the National Archives and Records Administration" and stored them at various locations, including his Washington office.

The document theft raised questions about whether Mr. Berger was attempting to cover up the Clinton administration's anti-terrorism policies and actions. The records he took were related to internal assessments of Mr. Clinton's handling of a terrorist threat in December 1999 to bomb airports in the United States.

Mr. Berger pleaded guilty to a misdemeanor charge of unauthorized removal and retention of classified material, including documents outlining the government's knowledge of terror threats in the United States during the 2000 New Year's celebration.

In his televised testimony to the September 11 commission, Mr. Berger said the Clinton administration's "sustained attention" to terrorist threats and "rigorous actions" foiled the New Year's plot.

Attorney General John Ashcroft, however, told the commission in 2004 that he saw some of the documents that had turned up missing from the Archives and that the plot was stopped with "luck playing a major role."

Members of Congress requesting the investigation and hearings were Republican Reps. Duncan Hunter and Dan Lungren of California, John L. Mica of Florida, Lynn Westmoreland of Georgia, Mark Souder and Dan Burton of Indiana, Patrick T. McHenry of North Carolina, Curt Weldon of Pennsylvania, John J. "Jimmy" Duncan Jr. of Tennessee and F. James Sensenbrenner Jr. of Wisconsin.

Prosecutor: Rove Didn't Sway Spam Probe (AP-Y)

DOJ_NMG_0079716

By Larry Neumeister
AP-Yahoo, October 12, 2006

Presidential adviser Karl Rove had nothing to do with the prosecution of a man accused of manipulating stock prices, a prosecutor says, disputing the man's claims that Rove set off probes to retaliate for a flood of spam e-mails to President Bush.

In papers submitted to a judge Friday, Assistant U.S. Attorney David M. Siegal said the criminal case against Robert McAllister was started three days before the e-mails were sent in January 2005.

The investigation began when a staff accountant at the Securities and Exchange Commission was told McAllister had made telephone threats against a stock promoter related to McAllister's events promotion company, Millennium National Events Inc., Siegal said.

McAllister's lawyer, Gerald L. Shargel, said last month he hoped to call Rove as a witness to support a claim that Rove "used his power and influence at the White House to seek quick punishment of Millennium, and therefore also Robert McAllister, for daring to spam the president's personal Web site."

Shargel said McAllister's efforts to grow his company were "thwarted by the wrongful conduct of stock promoters," one of whom sent spam e-mails to the Bush Web site, http://georgewbush.com/, which automatically reconnects to the Republican National Committee, http://www.gop.com/.

The Daily News reported last month that e-mails, phone records and transcripts of phone conversations show Rove contacted McAllister and at least three stock promoters.

Siegal told the judge that Rove did not wield the prosecutor's office "as his personal sword." He cited the careful manner in which the case progressed and written declarations by three government investigators saying Rover never communicated with them.

"This is nonsense, and the myriad claims the defendant makes are all either false, irrelevant or both," he said.

The government says McAllister, of Jupiter, Fla., was already on their radar screen because the FBI in early 2002 investigated his involvement in a scheme to fraudulently manipulate trading in another company.

McAllister was not arrested then, but the FBI recorded him talking to a cooperating government witness about allegedly bribing stock brokers in the plot to manipulate the company's stock, the government said in court papers.

The 2002 recordings are among evidence described in a July indictment charging McAllister with conspiracy to commit securities fraud, wire fraud and mail fraud. There was no indication when the case would go to trial.

If convicted, McAllister could face up to 65 years in prison. Three others in the case have pleaded guilty in the last two weeks and are awaiting sentencing. McAllister is free on $500,000 bail.

Ex-fugitives Plead Guilty In $31 Million Investor Scam (VAPILOT)

By Tim Mcglone, The Virginian-pilot
Hampton Roads Virginian-Pilot, October 12, 2006

NORFOLK - Former crime victim advocate Lee Hope Thrasher and her British boyfriend, Howard Welsh, pleaded guilty Wednesday to defrauding investors in a $31 million scheme.

Despite years professing their innocence while on the run from the FBI, the couple stood before a U.S. District Court judge and admitted that the investment plan was a fraud.

Welsh, 62, a British citizen, pleaded guilty to four felonies including conspiracy to commit mail and wire fraud. He faces up to 20 years in prison.

Thrasher, 52, pleaded guilty to three similar felonies and faces up to 15 years in prison. She had been employed in the 1990s as the victim-witness coordinator in the Virginia Beach Commonwealth's Attorney's office.

They have agreed to assist the government in recovering $28.5 million that was wired to banks in 13 countries. Federal agents seized $2.5 million during the investigation.

From 1999 to 2004, Welsh and Thrasher offered "corporation sole" investments, typically reserved for churches. They sold the plan, for a fee, at seminars around the country, promising compounded, tax-free profits.

Some 900 investors handed over thousands of dollars and in one case, an elderly woman from Illinois invested $8 million that Welsh had told her was to be used to start a bank.

That bank, according to court records, was nothing more than a post office box in England.

The couple fled the area in 2002 and later left the country.

Federal charges were lodged against them in 2003, followed by a 63-count indictment filed the next year.

The couple was discovered hiding out in the hometown of Welsh's mother, under assumed names, in November 2004. The couple spent 20 months fighting extradition.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Robert J. Seidel Jr., the lead prosecutor, said authorities were seeking the missing money.

"The investigation is continuing to identify the location of these funds and whether any other individuals might have been in control of the money," he said.

One other person has been convicted in the case.

Roy F. Overton Jr., a retired banker from the Peninsula, was sentenced last year to

3 1/2 years in prison after pleading guilty to stealing $2.5 million from Welsh and Thrasher.

Why Farm Belt Sees Rising Crime Wave (CSM)

By Patrik Jonsson

The Christian Science Monitor, October 12, 2006

ATLANTA

At the end of a dirt road in rural South Carolina, a lonely truck careered up through the red-clay ruts and into the woods.

The man, wearing chaps and wielding a chain saw, who emerged from the cab worked for himself, state foresters say. But the trees weren't his. Nor were the small profits he made selling the hauled timber to sawyers in the valley. Despite the whine of his saw, for years no one heard these trees fall.

The man, arrested earlier this year, was ax-cut-deep in a growing problem for America's farm belt: rural commodity theft, or "plaid-collar crime." From lush Hawaii to the Carolina plains, artichoke absconders, nut nappers, tree thieves, and even cattle rustlers are plucking, picking, hauling, and siphoning commodities from diesel to mangosteens at impressive rates. Loss is a familiar concept to a farmer. But such audacious heists have prompted many to go on the offensive to police America's wide-open spaces.

"The vulnerability of farms is legendary," says Bill Yoshimoto, the supervising attorney for a rural crimes task force in Tulare County, Calif. "They're just wide- open places for crooks to come. And crooks are going to go where the pickings are easy and where the prices are favorable."

Several commodities are particularly in demand because their prices are increasing. Almond prices jumped 70 cents a pound this summer, and beef prices remain high. Prices for high-grade lumber continue to climb. And rural backwoods areas have been hit by the copper theft epidemic across the country after prices peaked at $2.80 a pound this summer.

"If somebody can get [a commodity] for nothing, then it's a real good deal," says Ken Cabe, a senior forester with the South Carolina Forestry Commission in Columbia.

The losses from farm thefts in California, Mississippi, and South Carolina run into the hundreds of millions of dollars, according to estimates from law enforcement officers. But since only one of 10 farm crimes is reported, some say total annual losses are about $1 billion nationwide.

These days it's relatively easy to steal commodities without getting caught, Mr. Yoshimoto says. For one, farms are bumping up against suburbs, shortening the time it takes potential crooks to get their hands on freestanding tanks of diesel, barrels of expensive fungicides, and rolls of copper wire. Oftentimes, thieves can operate in plain view since the heavy equipment and tractor-trailers they use to carry out their crimes are common in these parts. Internet trading has also cut down on paperwork, making scofflaws tougher to track down.

Farm-thief profiles run the gamut from a 24-year-old mother of two arrested last month for timber theft in Mt. Croghan, S.C., to the most common farm thief: a 40-year-old white male, investigators say. The motives are as varied as the crimes.

"Somebody who is stealing copper wire to make a quick buck for a quick fix is very different from somebody who is masterminding a plot to steal hundreds of thousands of pounds of nuts across county lines," says Danielle Rau, a rural-crime prevention specialist at the California Farm Bureau in Sacramento.

In Alabama, where pine forests cover an area nearly equivalent to all of New England timber losses can be staggering, Mr. Yoshimoto says. Last year, Texas investigators recovered more than 5,000 stolen cattle worth more than $3.5 million. Twelve tractor-trailers carrying almonds have been stolen in California this year, the latest heist taking place in San Joaquin County Monday.

"You've got crews coming in and knocking down 10 acres of timber or 40 acres of prime plums, and then you have some on the other end receiving this timber and fruit and injecting it into the commercial stream somewhere," says Yoshimoto. "This level of sophistication has only become prominent in the last 10 years, and we've noticed it tremendously in the last five years."

Historically, farmers and growers have shoved their hands in their pockets and privately fumed. "We don't feel like we have a lot of protection in the first place," says Scott Phippens, a San Joaquin Valley almond grower who had 88,000 pounds of almonds stolen from him this summer. "We're defeated the minute theft happens. The problem is society; there's just far more hideous crimes being committed, and so this is nothing."

That's changing, with influential politicians such as Jeff Denham, a Republican state senator from the Central Valley. He wrote "our food supply is under attack in a recent op-ed article in Ag Alert, a newsletter published by the California Farm Bureau.

DOJ_NMG_0079718

The 14-county Agricultural Crime Technology Information and Operations Network (ACTION) in Visalia, Calif., has a collection of motion detectors and low-light cameras that farmers can borrow at no expense to try to catch thieves.

Some farmers are working on ways to brand individual vegetables such as artichokes to thwart theft.

Others are finding that the ticket to stopping theft is through having a paper trail. In Hawaii, a law enacted this year requires that receipts be issued for all commodities that are purchased. And coffee buyers must pay by check instead of cash.

Thefts have quickly gone down as a result. "We took a proactive approach and so far it's worked," says Mitch Roth, a Hawaii County prosecutor.

DOJ Eyes Donor Reimbursement (RC)

By Matthew Murray

Roll Call, October 12, 2006

When Charles La Bella began heading the Department of Justice's campaign finance task force in 1997, federal prosecutors, in his view, were battling a forest fire with a garden hose.

As allegations mounted that illegal campaign contributions had tainted the 1996 presidential election, government lawyers were becoming more and more certain something was amiss. But with the statute of limitations nearing expiration, and with penalties for running afoul of campaign finance laws rivaling those for moving violations, the bad guys mostly got away.

La Bella was furious.

"I made it known why I thought ... changes needed to be made, if they wanted to take campaign finance crimes seriously," La Bella, now in private practice in California, said recently.

Although his criticisms made him "radioactive" at the Justice Department, lawmakers took notice, incorporating some of his recommendations in the Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act of 2002.

Now, nearly a decade after La Bella first called for overhauls, federal lawyers may be tugging on the line of their first big fish, PBS&J, a giant construction and engineering government contractor.

In September, William Scott Deloach, PBS&J's former chief financial officer, and two co-workers pleaded guilty in a Miami court to conspiracy charges in connection with a decade-long embezzlement scheme that netted the trio millions of dollars.

The three admitted in court papers to bilking the company out of millions, which paid for commercial and residential property, lavish lifestyles and international gambling sprees.

Along with the conspiracy charge, Deloach alone pleaded guilty to reimbursing $11,000 worth of campaign contributions in October 2004 through "straw men," conduit gifts in the names of others, to then-open-seat challenger Mel Martinez (R-Fla.).

The Justice Department and the Federal Election Commission declined to discuss potential or ongoing law enforcement cases, including the one against PBS&J.

However, enhancements inserted into BCRA and teamwork between the DOJ and the FEC have helped boost the priority of these types of cases.

Officials with both agencies confirmed that cooperation has increased in recent years, a kinship that perhaps could result in a jump of combined civil and criminal penalties for two agencies long seen as at-odds.

An FEC official also said public corruption cases, including illegal contribution conduit schemes, have become a "top 10" priority for the DOJ, reflecting the desire of lawmakers.

"When Congress enhances the penalties," the FEC official said, "the message is that [prosecutors should] take those violations seriously and ... enforce them aggressively."

According to court papers detailing Deloach's plea deal, in or around 2004 an unnamed company executive contacted Deloach and "advise[d] him that PBS&J supported the United States Senate campaign of Mel Martinez."

"Deloach then wrote his own personal check, which he contributed to the Martinez campaign," the plea deal reads.

Deloach asked other company employees to give to Martinez's campaign, with contributions made in October 2004 totaling $11,000.

Out of an illegal bank account bloated with embezzled company money, Deloach then reimbursed the four PBS&J employees and two spouses, according to the plea deal. Such a reimbursement is punishable by up to two years in jail and thousands of dollars in fines.

Despite the breadth of the crimes, however, some familiar with the case are suggesting that the three could receive reduced sentences for turning on the company and detailing the workings of an even bigger reimbursement case, which allegedly funneled vast sums of illegal corporate money to politicians nationwide.

Documents obtained by Roll Call, first reported by the Miami Herald, suggest that Deloach was not alone in reimbursing PBS&J employees from company coffers, though he seems to be the only one who used embezzled money.

DOJ_NMG_0079719

In a fax dated March 2002, Jim Breland appears to urge Skip Homan, a fellow PBS&J executive, to make a donation to the re-election campaign of then-Sen. Max Cleland (D-Ga.).

"Bob Matthews called with this request ... a 'personal favor'," the fax cover sheet reads, "Bob also said the contribution would not go unnoticed by [Georgia] Gov. [Roy] Barnes. He is strongly backing Sen. Cleland."

The second page of Breland's fax, also dated March 15, 2002, appears to be on company letterhead, titled "Contribution Request Form":

"PBSJ Employee Requesting Contribution: Jim Breland

"Name of Payee on Check: Friends of Max Cleland

"Amount of Contribution Requested: $2,000."

An attached Post-It reads: "To be reimbursed."

Benson Weintraub, an attorney for Maria Garcia, one of the three former PBS&J employees, suggested that the 2002 corporate reimbursement for the Georgia Senate race is just the tip of the iceberg.

"It's our impression that there has been a wide proliferation of political corruption by PBS&J," Weintraub said. "We believe that the illegal campaign contributions were widespread on a national basis.

"The more information [that is] uncovered will indicate the scale and scope of a pattern of illegal campaign contributions," he said.

Garcia's attorney also said a member of PBS&J's board recently told him the reimbursement of illegal campaign contributions "unfortunately still continues today."

Mark Schnapp, an attorney for PBS&J, acknowledged that the reimbursement Deloach admitted to was not an isolated incident. But he denied that the company is the subject of a DOJ investigation and that the company systematically abused campaign finance laws.

"In the 1990s, there was some reimbursement of political contributions," he said. But those gifts, he claimed, were more a case of a few bad apples, not a rotten corporate culture.

"Before the embezzlement was even discovered, the company had instituted significant changes in the oversight of its PAC and campaign contributions," Schnapp added. "The company recently has instituted additional controls and training about campaign contributions and its political action committee."

The initial push in the United States to regulate campaign contributions began just after the Civil War, according to information available on the FEC's Web site.

Beginning in 1867, federal officers no longer were allowed to seek donations from Naval yard workers. With the signing of the Tillman Act 40 years later, corporations and banks were barred from contributing to federal campaigns.

The law again was expanded in 1947 to bar "labor unions and corporations from making expenditures and contributions in federal elections," according to the FEC.

The Federal Election Campaign Act, enacted in 1972, "provided the basic legislative framework" for political action committees, which could use corporate and union money to establish bank accounts from which "voluntary donations could then be used to contribute to federal races."

But nearly three decades after FECA was enacted, the lack of enforcement of campaign finance laws had come to viewed as a "bad joke," according to La Bella's words in a leaked 1998 Justice Department report.

In addition to reining in soft-money contributions, BCRA sought to boost prosecutorial powers for enforcing campaign finance crimes — an original recommendation of La Bella's that gave him something approaching cult-hero status with reform-minded lawmakers:

"When I first looked into it a couple of years ago, I was frankly surprised by what I learned — and that is that prosecutors just don't have the tools they need to effectively investigate, prosecute and punish people who egregiously violate our campaign finance laws" said Sen. Joe Lieberman (D-Conn.) in a March 2001 floor speech.

A Justice Department official said a delaying of the statute of limitations — ameliorating one of La Bella's original complaints — has helped in the prosecution of campaign finance crimes.

"Until late 2002, FECA crimes were subject to an unusually short, three-year statute of limitation, which complicated the task," the official said. "The statute of limitations for FECA crimes was raised to the usual five years effective Nov. 6, 2002, which has been a helpful tool."

Mosque Suit Says Manager Embezzled $300,000 (WP)

By Jerry Markon And Michelle Boorstein

The Washington Post, October 12, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0079720

A prominent Washington mosque has sued its longtime business manager, accusing him of embezzling more than $300,000 and diverting the money to companies he owned or controlled.

The Islamic Center of Washington, D.C., says in the lawsuit that Farzad Darui altered the names of payees on checks intended for legitimate vendors, primarily insurance companies, and substituted his own companies. It says the scheme began around 2000 and continued it until he was suspended last month.

"The actions taken by Mr. Darui constitute fraud . . . unjust enrichment and breach of fiduciary duties," says the lawsuit, filed Sept. 15 in U.S. District Court in Alexandria.

Reached yesterday at Zaal Inc., a Falls Church real estate management company of which he is president, Darui declined to comment on the suit. His attorney, Victoria Toensing, said only that the allegations "are false and we will defend them vigorously."

Darui has not yet responded in court. He framed the issue as a management dispute in yesterday's Washington Times, which first reported the lawsuit. "This, from my point of view, is about me opposing a Saudi takeover of the center," he told the Times. "They've been trying to unilaterally appoint a new Saudi director without going through the board."

The Islamic Center, on Massachusetts Avenue NW, is Washington's first mosque, opening in 1957, according to court documents and its Web site. It's a regular place of worship for thousands of Muslims, according to court documents.

The center is supported financially by the Saudi government, and the Web site lists the current chairman of its board of governors as Saudi Prince Bandar bin Sultan, who recently stepped down as ambassador to the United States. The center's governing board is largely made up of ambassadors from various Islamic nations to the United States. Calls to the center and to Saudi Embassy were not returned yesterday.

It was unclear yesterday why the allegations were contained in a civil suit and whether a criminal investigation is underway. An attorney for the center, from the D.C. firm of Williams & Connolly LLC, declined to comment.

Darui, of Falls Church, has worked at the center since at least 1984, when he was head of security, according to the lawsuit. He became responsible for the center's bookkeeping after accusing the existing bookkeeper of being involved in a scheme to defraud the organization, the suit says.

As bookkeeper, Darui routinely presented checks to be signed by the center's director, Abdullah M. Khouj. After Khouj signed the checks, Darui was responsible for mailing them to vendors, the lawsuit says.

Khouj began unraveling the scheme when he repeatedly asked Darui to commission an independent audit of the center's finances, but Darui kept putting him off, the lawsuit says. According to the suit, Khouj then discovered that Darui had been changing the names of payees to BLT Services Corp. According to the lawsuit, that is really Blue Line Travel Inc., "a company owned and/or controlled by Mr. Darui."

"Mr. Darui breached his fiduciary duties intentionally, willfully, with malice, and with ill will toward the Islamic Center," says the lawsuit, which is seeking a jury trial but does not specify damages sought.

Florida Judge Wants To See 'Bully' In Court (WP)

By Mike Musgrove

The Washington Post, October 12, 2006

The Bully is taking a beat-down. Game publisher Take-Two Interactive Software Inc. was ordered to demonstrate an upcoming video game titled "Bully" for a judge to determine whether it violates Florida's public nuisance laws. Miami-Dade Circuit Court Judge Ronald Friedman issued the order yesterday.

The move is a major coup for conservative Miami attorney Jack Thompson, known for his crusades against pornography and obscene rap music, and now the video game industry. He claims that the makers of the game have designed a "Columbine simulator" in Bully, which follows the life of a prep school student as he navigates the social ladders of a fictional school called Bullworth Academy.

Thompson filed the lawsuit a month ago, claiming that the game would violate Florida's public-nuisance laws, which are more typically used to prosecute environmental polluters. Besides Take-Two, the suit also names retailers Wal-Mart Stores Inc. and GameStop Corp.

"My view is that the game potentially impinges on public safety," he said. "I'm pretty sure that the game is harmful to minors."

The game is scheduled to be released Tuesday for the PlayStation 2. It has been rated "T" for Teen by the game industry's ratings board.

Thompson said that he and the judge plan to watch the game played in its entirety, no matter how long that takes.

Attorneys for Take-Two did not respond to phone calls or e-mails last night. Rockstar Games, the Take-Two subsidiary that developed the game, as well as the bloody Grand Theft Auto franchise, also did not respond.

DOJ_NMG_0079721

As the game has neared its scheduled release date, Rockstar has given a few tech sites and video game magazines an early look at it. So far, the early write-ups seem to have reviewers surprised by the game's lack of violence.

Clive Thompson, who reviewed the game for Wired.com, concluded that the game is "snarkily clever social commentary." His review described the game as not violent.

"The game doesn't glorify bullying at all," he wrote. "Indeed, it's almost precisely the opposite."

Deal In Brooklyn Corruption Case (NYT)

By Michael Brick

The New York Times, October 12, 2006

Nearly four years into a broad inquiry seeking to expose the sale of judgeships in Brooklyn, prosecutors have agreed to dismiss all charges against the longtime executive director of the county's Democratic Party, Jeffrey C. Feldman, in exchange for his cooperation.

The deal, announced yesterday at a brief hearing in State Supreme Court in Brooklyn, cost prosecutors the second highest ranking target they have identified. But it gained them the most highly placed witness they have named.

So far, the investigation has produced guilty pleas by minor figures in a judicial bribery case and the conviction and resignation of Clarence Norman Jr., a 12-term assemblyman, deputy speaker and chairman of the biggest county Democratic organization east of Chicago.

There were accusations that judgeships were being sold by party leaders, who have considerable influence over the nomination and election of judges. Yet no one has been charged with selling judgeships. Separately, a federal judge has declared the system of selecting state judges unconstitutional.

Evidence from a case in which a judge who oversaw divorce cases was charged with bribery led the Brooklyn district attorney's office to begin a broader investigation in April 2003 into corruption in the process of nominating judges. Mr. Norman has been convicted in two corruption cases and acquitted in a third. In the last pending case, he has been charged with pressing judicial candidates to hire certain election consultants to win favor with the party. Until yesterday, Mr. Feldman was a co-defendant in that case.

"We have concluded that Jeff Feldman was nothing more than a messenger," said Michael F. Vecchione, chief of the district attorney's rackets division. He added that Mr. Feldman "has agreed to testify on behalf of the people in this and other ongoing investigations."

Mr. Feldman has signed a cooperation agreement, prosecutors say, though it is unusual to dismiss charges against such a witness before testimony is completed.

A lawyer for Mr. Feldman, Benjamin Brafman said, "The D.A.'s office looked at the case very differently after we made our submission." Mr. Feldman, 52, declined to comment.

British Court Ruling Gives Boost To Serious Journalism (WSJ)

By Aaron O. Patrick

The Wall Street Journal, October 12, 2006

LONDON -- Britain's top court handed down a landmark decision that could encourage serious investigative journalism in a nation where newspapers are known more for chronicling celebrity scandal.

The Law Lords, a body within the House of Lords that is the equivalent of the U.S. Supreme Court, yesterday provided media organizations with much stronger protection against libel suits if they can show their stories serve the public interest.

The Lords made the unanimous decision in upholding an appeal by The Wall Street Journal Europe. They overturned a lower court's decision that had found a 2002 Journal story libelous. In dismissing the case, the Lords ruled that the Journal's story was in the public interest and was reported in a serious and responsible way.

Until now, British libel laws were among the friendliest to plaintiffs anywhere, making the nation's courts a magnet for foreign celebrities taking action against U.S. publications. When faced with a libel action, publications essentially had to prove their articles were true or meet a detailed checklist about their reporting that considered such things as the seriousness of the allegations and the steps that were taken to verify the information. Truth remains a defense against libel. But now a "qualified privilege" defense under which the defendant does not have to prove the truth of the allegedly defamatory statement is a viable option.

The new ruling brings United Kingdom law closer to the protections U.S. media are afforded under the First Amendment of the U.S. Constitution. U.S. law sets strict and limited standards for when public figures can successfully win libel suits. As honed in a 1964 Supreme Court decision, known as New York Times v. Sullivan, U.S. public figures must show that a story was false and that the publication knew it was false or acted in reckless disregard for the truth.

DOJ_NMG_0079722

The British standard defined yesterday doesn't give all publications such blanket protection as in the U.S. Rather, it will only apply to what a judge deems responsible journalism that is of value to the public. "We need more such serious journalism in this country and our defamation law should encourage rather than discourage it," one of the lords, Baroness Brenda Hale, wrote in her opinion.

"In some ways it's the coming of age of press freedom in the U.K." said Dan Tench, a partner at Olswang Solicitors, a London law firm specializing in media law.

At issue was a February 2002 story in The Wall Street Journal Europe and The Wall Street Journal's U.S. edition that said Saudi authorities, at the request of U.S. law-enforcement agencies, were monitoring bank accounts of prominent Saudis and Saudi businesses to ensure they were not being used, wittingly or unwittingly, to finance terrorism.

Among the accounts being monitored, the article said, were those of the Abdul Latif Jameel Group. Mohammed Jameel, the company's president and a prominent Saudi businessman, sued the paper claiming the story defamed both him and his company and claimed damages.

Throughout the initial trial, The Wall Street Journal Europe didn't seek to defend itself by showing the article was true. It said its sources in Riyadh were afraid of reprisals from Saudi authorities if they testified. The paper also said it wouldn't identify a confidential source at the U.S. Treasury Department in Washington who had confirmed the Saudi information. Instead, the newspaper, which is published by Wall Street Journal Europe SPRL, a subsidiary of Dow Jones & Co., argued that the article was in the public interest because it showed that Saudi Arabia was cooperating in the international effort to combat terrorism and was fairly and responsibly reported.

A jury in the original case ruled against the newspaper and damages of $74,477 were awarded to Mr. Jameel and a Saudi company controlled by his family. The judge in that case said The Wall Street Journal Europe should have made more checks before publishing the article.

Britain's Court of Appeal backed that ruling, prompting the Journal to appeal to the House of Lords. The Law Lords said the trial judge had misdirected the jury that heard the initial case, that The Wall Street Journal Europe had done nothing wrong, and that its article was clearly in the public interest. The ruling strengthened and clarified an earlier judgment that had established the public interest defense but hadn't been widely adopted by judges.

The Law Lords also said it didn't matter that a judge, with "leisure and hindsight," might have made different editorial decisions than those made quickly in newsrooms. Rather, "the question in each case is whether the defendant behaved fairly and responsibly in gathering and publishing the information," the decision read.

The trial judge also had ruled that the story wasn't in the public interest because it breached an agreement between U.S. and Saudi governments to keep the monitoring secret. But the Lords overturned his decision, ruling the media are not bound by a government's desire to keep certain facts or programs secret.

The result could be more investigative journalism in England now that the threat of libel action has somewhat diminished. "Having this pretty unequivocal declaration is pretty important," said Alan Rusbridger, editor of the London-based Guardian newspaper. "We never felt entirely confident" with the previous law, he said.

The Wall Street Journal Europe's lawyer, Geoffrey Robertson, who argued the case, said the ruling would usher in a new role for the media, allowing journalists to "make a genuine contribution to public knowledge rather than parroting back what they are told, often in partisan fashion, by police or politicians."

Stuart Karle, general counsel for The Wall Street Journal, said the ruling gave the media an incentive to "produce serious journalism on compelling subjects of public concern without the risk of nitpicking and second-guessing by courts years later."

Mr. Jameel's lawyer, Andrew Stephenson of Carter-Ruck, said his client would be shocked by the judgment. He added that "the House of Lords has substituted its own view of the facts for that of the judge and jury who had all the evidence." Mr. Jameel released a statement to some media outlets after the ruling that read: "What the Wall Street Journal Europe wrote in February 2002 was that the bank accounts of the ALJ Group were being monitored at the request of the US authorities. That was not true. Mr. Justice Eady and the court of appeal ruled that I was libelled. The House of Lords ruled that I was not, because it was reasonable for the Wall Street Journal Europe to print something that was false. So be it. I was only ever interested in proving that the allegations were untrue."

The Lords' ruling leaves open many key areas for judges to interpret in future cases. For instance, judges will decide whether an article is in the public interest and whether a publication acted seriously and responsibly.

Neither quality has been a hallmark of Britain's tabloids. They often focus on the personal lives of celebrities, such as model Kate Moss and singer George Michael. Reporting "stings," where reporters take on false identities to elicit information, are acceptable in tabloid culture. Paying for information is not unknown. Such tactics have flourished despite the strict libel laws in large part because many sensational stories are often accurate even if they were reported through stratagems that would be unacceptable in the U.S.

DOJ_NMG_0079723

Britain is also a fiercely competitive newspaper market. There are 11 daily national newspapers, with a combined circulation of about 12 million copies a day, boosted in part by sensational headlines.

Both broadsheets and tabloids have been targets of successful libel actions in the past. Singer Elton John was awarded $139,645 in 1995, for example, when he sued the Sunday Mirror, a tabloid, for reporting that he was suffering from an eating disorder, which he said wasn't true.

At other times, British newspapers have settled libel cases rather than fight them. The Financial Times, owned by Pearson Group PLC, agreed in January to pay $558,579 and the legal costs of a brokerage firm, Collins Stewart Tullett PLC, which claimed it had been defamed by the newspaper.

Actress Kate Hudson successfully sued the U.S.-based National Enquirer in Britain in the past year, after it claimed she was dangerously thin, something she denied. There were 74 defamation cases in British courts in the 12 months ended May 2006, and 20 involved celebrities, according to Sweet & Maxwell, a legal publisher owned by Thomson Corp.

It is unlikely that tabloid celebrity coverage will meet the Law Lords' requirement that journalism be in the public interest to merit protection by the new ruling.

High Court In Britain Loosens Strict Libel Law (NYT)

By Sarah Lyall

The New York Times, October 12, 2006

LONDON, Oct. 11 — Britain's highest court ruled Wednesday for the first time that journalists have the right to publish allegations about public figures, as long as their reporting is responsible and in the public interest.

The ruling, a unanimous judgment by the Law Lords, is a huge shift in British law and significantly improves journalists' chances of winning libel cases in a court system that until now has been stacked against them.

English judges have traditionally been so sympathetic to libel plaintiffs that many people from abroad have sued in English courts — even if the publications in question have tiny circulations here — because they have had a much better chance of winning here than at home.

Newspaper editors said the decision, in the case of Jameel v. Wall Street Journal Europe, would free them to pursue stories vigorously without constant fear of lawsuits.

"This will lead to a greater robustness and willingness to tackle serious stories, which is what the judges said they wanted," said Alan Rusbridger, editor of The Guardian. Until now, he said in an interview, newspapers have had to police themselves to the point where "stories weren't getting in the paper or were being neutered by clever lawyers who knew how to play the game."

The case concerned an article published on Feb. 6, 2002, in The Wall Street Journal and in its European edition, The Wall Street Journal Europe, which has a daily circulation of 18,000 in Britain.

The article said that at the request of the United States, Saudi Arabia was monitoring bank accounts of prominent Saudi businesses and individuals to trace whether they were being used, possibly unwittingly, to siphon money to terrorist groups.

One of the businesses mentioned, Abdul Latif Jameel Company Ltd., sued the newspaper, as did Muhammed Abdul Latif Jameel, its general manager and president. Under British libel law, newspapers being sued are required to prove the truth of the allegations they print — the opposite of the situation in the United States, where the burden of proof falls heavily on plaintiffs.

But that was a practical impossibility in this case, a member of the panel that ruled on Wednesday, Lord Hoffmann, wrote in his decision.

"In the nature of things, the existence of surveillance by the highly secretive Saudi authorities would have been impossible to prove by evidence in open court," he said. The paper argued that the article was in the public interest — that is, important to the debate about terrorism and the authorities' efforts to combat it.

A court ruling in a case several years ago involving The Times of London first seemed to open the door to such an argument. But that decision set out what some lawyers say was a prohibitively high set of standards for newspapers and other news media to meet, forcing them to defend their reporting practices to satisfy the subjective opinions of individual English judges.

In the Jameel case, a lower court jury rejected The Journal's public-interest argument, finding that the article was defamatory. The Journal was ordered to pay £40,000 — or about $74,000 — in damages. An appeals court affirmed the ruling.

The Law Lords overturned the decision. In a ringing rebuke to the lower court judge's conclusion that the article was not in the public interest, in part because it flouted an agreement between the United States and Saudi Arabia to keep the monitoring program secret, Lord Hoffmann declared it to be "a serious contribution in measured tone to a subject of very considerable importance."

Another member of the panel, Lord Scott of Foscote, defended the right of news organizations to publish material deemed private by the government.

DOJ_NMG_0079724

"It is no part of the duty of the press to cooperate with any government, let alone foreign governments, whether friendly or not, in order to keep from the public information of public interest the disclosure of which cannot be said to be damaging to national interests," he wrote.

A third member, Baroness Hale of Richmond, wrote, "We need more such serious journalism in this country, and our defamation law should encourage rather than discourage it."

Keith Mathieson, a partner specializing in media law at the firm of Reynolds Porter Chamberlain, said the ruling would make it easier for newspapers to rely on confidential sources, as long as the articles were responsibly reported and in the public interest.

"It should make it easier for newspapers in the U.K. to publish serious stories where they cannot prove that allegations are true," he said in an interview.

Stuart Karle, The Wall Street Journal's general counsel, said that the newspaper had spent millions of dollars on the case and that the decision represented an important turning point. "The history of English libel law was that essentially no decision was final in a newsroom until a judge, several years later, agreed with you," he said in an interview.

"Going forward," he said, "this decision means that if you're a quality news organization you can fully and fairly cover the important issues of the day without this nagging problem of having a libel judge in London basically engage in an autopsy of every single thing you did and decide whether he agrees with your editorial judgment."

A Libel Landmark (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 12, 2006

With murders and court defeats, the free press has endured a rough couple of years. So we're happy to report a landmark libel case victory in Britain's highest court yesterday -- a verdict that will assist the cause of brave and honest reporting in much of the world.

The five Law Lords' unanimous ruling in Jameel v. The Wall Street Journal Europe sets a new standard for libel trials in Britain, until now arguably the most plaintiff-friendly jurisdiction in the free world. Henceforth the press will be able to defend against libel suits by arguing that articles are in the "public interest" and were the product of serious and responsible journalism.

The new Jameel-Journal standard moves the British system closer to the constitutional protection enjoyed by media in the U.S. In its legal impact, the case could be the British version of New York Times v. Sullivan, the 1964 case in which the U.S. Supreme Court held that the First Amendment protects the publication of all statements, even false ones, about the conduct of public figures except when the statements are made with actual malice.

The news story in question in Jameel was published on February 6, 2002, in The Journal Europe and The Wall Street Journal. The article reported on joint U.S.-Saudi efforts to cut off funds to terrorists. It reported that the Saudi government, acting at the behest of the U.S., was monitoring bank accounts of well-known Saudi individuals and businesses that may, wittingly or not, have been used to finance terrorism. Mohammed Jameel, a billionaire Saudi car dealer, sued The Journal Europe in London for defamation because his company had been named in the story.

The Law Lords overturned two lower-court rulings, which found against The Journal, and held that the information in the article was in the public interest and had been reported responsibly. "The fact that the judge, with the advantage of leisure and hindsight, might have made a different editorial decision should not destroy the defence," Lord Hoffmann wrote. "That would make the publication of articles which are, ex hypothesi, in the public interest, too risky and would discourage investigative reporting."

And here's the key point: Even if an article contained a defamatory statement against a prominent individual, the Law Lords ruled, it would nevertheless be protected if the journalists had behaved "fairly and responsibly in gathering and publishing the information" and if the information is of public importance. This standard had been put forward in a 2001 case called Reynolds v. Times Newspapers but, according to the Law Lords, has been widely ignored by the lower courts.

In his opinion, Lord Bingham described The Journal as an "unsensational" newspaper, a charge to which we plead guilty. While the Jameel ruling won't matter much to Britain's tabloid press, it is likely to influence how "quality" newspapers go about investigative reporting. As another Law Lord, Baroness Hale, put it: "We need more such serious journalism in this country and our defamation law should encourage rather than discourage it."

The ruling should echo throughout the British Commonwealth, including in Australia, Canada, Hong Kong and -- dare we hope? -- Singapore. While Commonwealth countries now mostly have their own courts of final appeal, they still look to the Law Lords for guidance in interpreting the common law. Thanks to their Lordships, the world just got a little freer.

Two U.S. Pilots Criticized In Brazil (WP)

By Monte Reel, Washington Post Foreign Service

DOJ_NMG_0079725

The Washington Post, October 12, 2006

Details of Probe Fuel Anger Over Deadly Midair Collision

BUENOS AIRES, Oct. 11 -- Two American pilots are embroiled in controversy in Brazil as authorities try to determine if they accidentally caused a midair airplane collision two weeks ago over the Amazon rain forest, killing 154 passengers aboard a commercial jetliner.

The Americans were piloting a small executive jet being flown from its manufacturer in Brazil to its new owner in New Jersey when their plane hit a Gol Airlines Boeing 737-800 flying in the opposite direction. The pilots of the small plane, which carried seven people, landed safely at a military base about 120 miles from the point of impact, but the commercial airliner crashed into the dense jungle below, leaving no survivors.

This week, investigators released details that have led many Brazilians to blame New York residents Joseph Lepore and Jan Paladino for the worst air disaster in Brazil's history.

A spokeswoman for the Mato Grosso state police department, which has been investigating the crash, on Tuesday told the Associated Press that the American pilots had been instructed to fly at 36,000 feet at the time of the crash, according to the executive jet's flight plan. The airspace where the collision occurred -- at 37,000 feet -- had been reserved for the commercial jetliner, she said.

Lepore and Paladino earlier told police that they were following flight instructions given to them by Brazilian authorities. Brazil's defense minister, Waldir Pires, labeled the pilots' statements "frivolous" and "irresponsible" during an interview with O Globo Television on Tuesday, adding that it is customary for northbound flights to fly at even-numbered altitude levels.

Adding to the controversy were the comments of a New York Times business columnist who was aboard the executive jet while in Brazil on a freelance magazine assignment. The columnist, Joe Sharkey, told CNN last week that he had heard that Brazil's air traffic control system was notoriously incomplete in the area of the Amazon where the plane crashed. Those comments sparked angry admonitions from Brazilian officials who defended the nation's air control systems, saying they thoroughly cover even the most remote jungle regions.

Meanwhile, ordinary Brazilians have vented their own anger at the American pilots.

"They have to be judged as criminals," Evarista Soares da Silva, 50, a doorman at an apartment complex in Rio de Janeiro, said Wednesday. "A lot of people died because of them. They were totally irresponsible."

As the investigation continues and the contents of the 737's "black box" are revealed, investigators hope to learn why the transponder aboard the executive jet failed to alert the larger plane of its presence and why the pilots of the small plane did not respond to calls from air traffic controllers before the crash. Some Brazilian authorities have publicly speculated that the pilots might have turned off their transponder, though the pilots' lawyer on Wednesday denied that they had done so.

Even the possibility of mechanical failure doesn't placate many Brazilians who believe that the American pilots could have prevented the crash.

"They said they had problems with the equipment, but why didn't they follow the route?" asked Joyce da Conceicao Fonseca, 67, of Rio de Janeiro. "I'm really sad for all the people who died. I prayed for them."

Special correspondent Fred Alves in Rio de Janeiro contributed to this report.

O.C. Man Gets 50 Years To Life For Molesting Relative On Videotape (LAT)

By Christine Hanley, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 12, 2006

His wife is also charged. They allegedly tricked parents of the 4-year-old.

An Orange County businessman was sentenced Wednesday to serve 50 years to life for molesting a 4-year-old relative in a case that unfolded after authorities discovered a trunk full of homemade child porn movies that investigators called a "little chest of horrors."

David S. Hwang, 35, agreed to plead guilty to all charges under a deal proposed by Superior Court Judge Gary S. Paer. The judge said the plea will spare the girl and her family from reliving "the nightmare" by having to testify or watch the "despicable" videotapes Hwang made while molesting the child, and it ensures that Hwang will never be free.

"In my mind, this is a death sentence," Paer said in summarizing the agreement.

Prosecutors said Hwang and his wife, who is also charged, deceived the girl's parents into letting them "baby-sit" her to practice their parenting skills. Based on the footage, prosecutors also said the couple gave the girl "medicine" that rendered her unconscious while being molested.

Hwang admitted to 60 counts of kidnapping for child molestation, lewd acts on a child under 14, oral copulation on a person under 14, anal or genital penetration with a foreign object of a child under 14, using a minor for sex acts and sodomy of a person under 14.

All the charges involve the girl who was then 4.

Hwang told the court he was pleading guilty against the advice of his attorney, primarily out of his concern for the victim and her family, who have "already been through enough."

He will not be eligible for parole until he is 77. Even then, it is unlikely that he would be considered for release, under state guidelines.

Hwang had faced a sentence of at least 93 years had he been convicted at trial.

To that end, Deputy Dist. Atty. Beth Carmichael said she was satisfied with the outcome. She had arrived at court Wednesday fully prepared to put him on trial.

"I wanted to make sure he will never get out of custody," she said outside court.

Hwang's attorney, Don Ronaldson, declined to comment.

Hwang still faces charges in Texas for allegedly molesting five young girls there, including an 8-month-old. His wife, Sheila Marie Sikat, 26, is charged with the same counts as her husband in the Orange County case and is scheduled to go to trial next month.

The couple were arrested in September 2003, fresh from their honeymoon in the Bahamas.

At the time, they both worked for Pacific Life Insurance Co. in Newport Beach, he in technical services and she in marketing.

Authorities were led to their Rancho Santa Margarita home after an anonymous tipster sent a package with a videotape that contained scenes from multiple tapes, and revealed where other tapes might be found, Carmichael said.

Inside a green wooden trunk, investigators found 212 videotapes, some shot in Orange County and others shot in the 1990s in Texas, where Hwang went to college and lived before moving to California.

Some tapes allegedly show Hwang molesting girls, sometimes with the participation of his wife or, in earlier years, a former girlfriend, who is also charged.

Investigators in Orange County and Texas have not been able to identify all the victims. The girl at the center of the Orange County charges is seen in four of the tapes.

christine.hanley@latimes.com

CIVIL LAW:

Medicare Saves $2 Bln By Fighting Fraud In U.S. Health Programs (BLOOM)

By Kerry Young

Bloomberg, October 12, 2006

Oct. 11 (Bloomberg) -- The Medicare program, the biggest U.S. buyer of health care, said it saved more than $2 billion by cracking down on fraud and abuse, especially cases involving drugs and medical equipment and tests.

The health plan for Americans who are 65 and older or disabled also said it gave two contracts to Electronic Data Systems Corp. for detecting and preventing fraud. Science Applications International Corp. and Health Integrity LLC each won a Medicare contract for aiding fraud prevention.

Medicare's efforts to prevent fraud have fallen short in the past, according to the investigative arm of Congress. The Government Accountability Office last year said Medicare overpaid for medical equipment and supplies by $900 million, or about 10 percent of its total spending, in the year ended in September 2004.

``Vigilance in protecting beneficiaries and taxpayers from waste, fraud and abuse is one of our top priorities in Medicare," said Mark McClellan, the administrator for the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, in a statement.

The statement from Baltimore-based Medicare didn't say in what period of time it had saved the $2 billion. Medicare spokesman Peter Ashkenaz didn't immediately return a phone call from Bloomberg News. The U.S. Justice Department has opened 63 criminal and 38 civil Medicare fraud cases since October 2005, Medicare said in the statement.

The Baltimore-based agency said it has expanded its efforts in Los Angeles and Miami in particular. Medicare said it revoked billing privilege, known as a provider number, from more than 500 suppliers of medical equipment.

The agency said it also denied about $163 million in charges from testing centers.

GSA Asks Court To Rethink Ruling On FedBizOpps.gov (GCN)

By Jason Miller

Government Computer News, October 12, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0079727

The Justice Department, on behalf of the General Services Administration, asked the Federal Claims Court to reconsider two parts of its recent decision that found GSA erred in its awarding of the contract for FedBizOpps.gov.

According to the redacted motion filed by the government, Justice is asking the court to revisit the order to bring in a new source selection authority, and the judge's conclusion that GSA incorrectly calculated the bid from the winning vendor, Symplicity Corp. of Arlington, Va. GSA awarded Symplicity a $17.4 million contract that includes three base years and five one-year options in December after re-evaluating bids following a first protest by Development Infostructure (Devis) Corp. of Arlington, Va., and Information Sciences Corp. of Silver Spring, Md.

ISC, which is the subcontractor to Science Applications International Corp., currently supports FedBizOpps.gov.

"First, the court's conclusions with respect to the 'independent judgement' of the source selection authority in considering Symplicity's proposal do not completely reflect the record of evidence," U.S. attorneys wrote. "Moreover, injunctive relief should be limited to returning the procurement to the existing [source selection authority], given the absence of any allegations—let along evidence—of bad faith, bias or any other basis to disqualify the SSA ..."

The court in September found in favor of Devis and ISC in their second protest and ordered GSA to appoint a new source selection authority and re-evaluate the bids. This contract has been going on since June 2005.

"GSA still is operating FedBizOpps and will continue to operate it," said a GSA spokeswoman. "We can't comment on litigation."

Joseph Petrillo, a procurement attorney with Petrillo and Powell in Washington and a GCN columnist, said GSA's decision to file a reconsideration motion is somewhat unusual, but not unprecedented. Though, he added, reconsideration is rarely granted.

In the motion, Justice also argues that GSA didn't err in evaluating Symplicity's price because it was not a flat fee, but over a certain time period. The redacted motion does not show the total price or the number of years.

"Instead, the evidence suggests that Symplicity's price, even if price had been used to eliminate offers, would have made Symplicity's offer more attractive and more likely to remain in the competitive range," U.S. attorneys said.

GSA does admit that they calculated Symplicity's total price incorrectly, but Devis and ISC should not benefit from the agency's mistake, U.S. attorneys added.

Additionally, Justice asked the judge to reconsider her ruling for GSA to appoint a new source selection authority even if the decision stands. Attorneys said that there is no evidence that the SSA acted in bad faith and therefore return the procurement the source selection authority. The SSA was Debra Sonderman, the Interior Department's director, Office of Acquisition and Property Management, sources said.

"The judge clearly thought through all these issues and I am surprised DOJ is arguing that the important facts were not well represented in the court's order — which I thought was very clear," said Peter Gallagher, president of Devis. "I guess we must now wait to see if another round of comments will be entertained by the court. We are obviously disappointed that additional legal proceedings are delaying the award."

There is no time frame for the judge to decide on Justice's motion, according to the court's clerk office.

RJR Douses Flavored Smokes Criticized As A Lure For Teens (WSJ)

By Christina Cheddar Berk

The Wall Street Journal, October 12, 2006

R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co. agreed to a ban on certain types of flavored cigarettes in the U.S., ending a practice some critics say was used to lure teens to start smoking.

Under a deal with attorneys general from 40 states, Reynolds, a unit of Winston-Salem, N.C.-based Reynolds American Inc. that makes Kool, Salem and Camel brands, will no longer market cigarettes such as Mandarin Mint Camel Exotic Blends, Midnight Berry Kool Smooth Fusions or any others that use a fruit, candy or alcoholic beverage in its name.

"We recognize that the past use of certain names on a limited number of our brand styles resulted in unintended perceptions and concerns," said Lynn Beasley, R.J. Reynolds president and chief operating officer.

The agreement followed an investigation that began last year after several states raised concerns that the products violated a 1998 settlement with the largest tobacco companies that prohibited marketing of tobacco products to youths.

Under the settlement with Reynolds, the attorneys general agreed to pursue similar agreements with other tobacco companies, according to a Reynolds spokesman.

"This agreement is an important step forward in restricting the marketing of tobacco products to children," said Matthew Myers, president of the Campaign for Tobacco-Free Kids. Mr. Myers said he would like to see legislation banning makers of smokeless-tobacco products from using candy and fruit flavors.

DOJ_NMG_0079728

Reynolds introduced the flavored cigarettes in 1999 as a super-premium product priced about $2 above its premium brands such as Camel.

The flavored cigarettes represented less than 0.1% of the company's annual cigarette volume. In May, the company stopped making the last offerings in its Camel Exotic Blends line.

Write to Christina Cheddar Berk at christina.cheddar@dowjones.com1

CIVIL RIGHTS:

States Are Growing More Lenient In Allowing Felons To Vote (NYT)

By Erik Eckholm

The New York Times, October 12, 2006

Legislatures in 16 states have loosened voting restrictions on felons over the last decade, according to a new report, a trend hailed by some rights advocates as a step toward democratic principles and fairness, especially for black Americans.

Because of their high incarceration rate, blacks are most affected by the voting bans that vary widely among the states, with many barring current inmates and parolees from voting until they have fulfilled their sentences, and some barring felons for life.

In recent years, Iowa, Nebraska and New Mexico have repealed their lifetime bans on voting by people who have been convicted of felonies, and several other states made it easier for freed prisoners or those on probation to vote, according to the report, issued yesterday by the Sentencing Project, a liberal advocacy group in Washington.

The recent changes have restored voting rights to more than 600,000 individuals, the report said. But because the country's prison population has continued to rise, a record number of Americans, 5.3 million, are still denied the vote because of criminal records, it concluded.

"It's good news that many people who'd been disqualified from voting are being re-engaged as citizens," said Jeremy Travis, president of the John Jay College of Criminal Justice in New York and a leader of the movement to smooth the re-entry of prisoners to society.

"I think people are realizing that the country had gone too far in marginalizing a large group of people who have been convicted of felonies," Mr. Travis said. "This has had profound consequences for our democracy and the participation of minorities."

But some conservatives remain philosophically opposed to any wholesale loosening of voting restrictions. "If you're not willing to follow the law, then you shouldn't claim the right to make the law for someone else," said Roger Clegg, president of the Center for Equal Opportunity, a conservative advocacy group in Washington.

Mr. Clegg, who was a senior Justice Department official in the Reagan and first Bush administrations, said that those convicted of felonies should be given the vote only case by case, when they have proved to be constructive members of society.

Some restrictions on voting date to the early years of the country or to the post-Civil-War period, while others were tightened during the "get tough on crime" era of the 1980's.

By federal law, voter rules are mainly set by the states. As a result, even in presidential elections, former prisoners can vote in some states but not others.

Only two states, Maine and Vermont, have no restrictions, even permitting inmates to vote. At the other extreme, three states, Florida, Kentucky and Virginia, still have lifetime bans on voting by felons. Nine others bar selected groups of offenders for life.

New York, Connecticut and New Jersey, like most states, do not allow current inmates or parolees to vote.

In a ballot initiative in Rhode Island this November, voters will decide whether to restore voting rights to prisoners on parole or probation, who far outnumber inmates. Early polls show public support for the measure.

Advocates of change emphasize broad arguments about democratic process, but the racial disparities give the issue a special resonance and raise questions about the representation of minorities in politics.

In 2004, one in eight black men were unable to vote because of a felony conviction, the report said, a rate many times higher than that for other groups.

Felony convictions have left one in four black men barred from voting in five states: Alabama, Florida, Mississippi, Virginia and Wyoming, said Ryan S. King, author of the report and a policy analyst at the Sentencing Project.

But Mr. Clegg argued that the voting restrictions were applied evenhandedly, and that just because they had a disproportionate impact on one group, that did not make them racially discriminatory.

DOJ_NMG_0079729

Though data on felon voting patterns are murky, a large majority of former prisoners are believed to lean Democratic. Even with a low turnout rate, their participation could make a difference in close races, experts say. Florida's rules, for example, might have been a factor in the 2000 presidential election.

In Texas in 1997, Gov. George W. Bush signed a law eliminating a two-year wait before prisoners ending their parole could vote.

Manassas Irate That Inquiry Is Escalated (WP)

By Nick Miroff, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 12, 2006

HUD Sent Case To Justice Dept.

Manassas officials have blasted a Department of Housing and Urban Development decision to turn over an inquiry of discrimination in the city to the Justice Department -- calling the move "incomprehensible" and challenging claims by the housing agency that it had made a good-faith attempt to settle complaints by Hispanic residents and civil rights organizations.

HUD officials notified Manassas last week that the investigation had been forwarded to Justice, which will take over the inquiry into whether the city violated the Fair Housing Act with zoning enforcement efforts such as an anonymous "anti-crowding hotline" and a short-lived ordinance that sought to limit the number of extended relatives who could share a dwelling.

Attempts to reconcile the 11 outstanding discrimination complaints against the city "failed," HUD determined.

The Justice Department will now review HUD's findings and decide whether to bring charges against the city -- an announcement that caught Manassas officials "flatfooted," said City Manager Lawrence D. Hughes.

"We were completely surprised," said Hughes. "HUD never attempted to mediate the complaints, despite the city's repeated requests that it do so."

The gulf between HUD and the city has widened in recent weeks. First, city staff complained that a shifting cast of HUD officials, including seven investigators from four offices, went over similar territory and asked similar questions, burdening city staff. Then the came the announcement that HUD had referred its findings to the Justice Department, which further irked the city because it learned about the decision through The Washington Post.

But HUD said it informed Manassas of its decision through letters and phone calls that were unanswered, according to Bryan Greene, deputy assistant secretary in HUD's Office of Fair Housing and Equal Opportunity.

"We've notified all the parties in this case that we could not complete the investigation," Greene said. "We're done."

HUD's settlement process hit a roadblock, he said, because Manassas failed to satisfy the aggrieved parties who have filed complaints.

"The question is how the city of Manassas addresses the people who allege they have been injured by their ordinances," Greene said. "We tried to obtain relief for individuals, and we reached an impasse."

Under the Fair Housing Act, the agency was required by law to notify parties in the case after the first 100 days of the investigation.

"We will investigate as long as we can, but if we don't think we can resolve it, we want to get the information to the Department of Justice in a reasonable amount of time so they can take the actions they think are necessary," Greene said.

HUD's investigation does not produce a ruling or determination, and details of its findings were not disclosed. But Greene's statement suggests the agency thinks the case is headed for U.S. District Court, where federal attorneys could file suit against the city.

"If the judge or jury determines that the city of Manassas conspired to discriminate against Latino families, the punitive damages could be hefty," said Kent Willis, executive director of the American Civil Liberties Union of Virginia, one of the groups that threatened to sue the city last winter over its anti-crowding ordinance. Suits involving violations of the Fair Housing Act typically lead to punitive and compensatory damages, Willis said. Individuals can also file civil suits against the city over the same complaints, which can be costly for the city.

Hughes and other city staff called the HUD contention that the city did not address complaints false. "We have asked numerous times for the aggrieved parties to specify what their claim is, and we have not received a response," he said. "So this conclusion that we're at an impasse is unimaginable to us."

Hughes accused those who have alleged discrimination against the city of trying to squeeze Manassas for money. The Fair Housing Act "should not be used by those who are not discriminated against to raise money from a local government's limited treasury," he said in a recent news release.

"I find that comment sad," said Rabbi Bruce E. Kahn, executive director of the District-based Equal Rights Center, a civil rights organization that lodged a complaint to HUD and compiled information about city zoning enforcement practices. "The city has an obligation to face the wrong that it's done and remedy the wrong that it's done, including paying damages."

DOJ_NMG_0079730

Kahn accused the city of ongoing civil rights violations, despite changes in city policies and the swift repeal of the anti-crowding ordinance.

For additional legal counsel, Manassas has contacted Richmond lawyer William G. Broaddus, who is working with city attorney Robert W. Bendall. But Vice Mayor Harry J. "Hal" Parrish II said he was hopeful federal attorneys would not come knocking.

Parrish said maybe the Justice Department would decide there is no reason to go after anyone. But he cautioned, "I'm always an optimist."

3 Charged In Hate Crimes; Brooklyn Victim Is In A Coma (NYT)

By Al Baker

The New York Times, October 12, 2006

Three Brooklyn men were charged with hate crimes yesterday in connection with an attack on a man who was lured to a desolate meeting place Sunday night, robbed and forced onto the Belt Parkway, where he was struck by a car and critically injured, the police said.

The victim, Michael J. Sandy, 28, of Brooklyn, was still in a coma yesterday, relatives said. The attack is being treated as a hate crime because investigators believe the assailants singled out Mr. Sandy for being gay and arranged over the Internet to meet him at a place often visited by gay men. One other man was being questioned yesterday in connection with the attack, the police said. Officials said a group of as many as four men orchestrated the rendezvous in order to rob Mr. Sandy, telling him in Internet messages to bring enough money for a hotel room.

At 9:40 p.m. on Sunday at the meeting place — a narrow, garbage-strewn parking lot near Sheepshead Bay, sandwiched between Plumb Beach and the eastbound lanes of the parkway — Mr. Sandy, 28, was attacked by at least two of the men, the police said. He backed away from them and, at one point, darted into the path of a car, which struck him and kept going, the police said. The police were still seeking the driver of the car that struck Mr. Sandy.

Other cars on the highway were forced to stop as the attack spilled across three lanes of roaring traffic. One witness told detectives that after Mr. Sandy was struck by the car, she saw a man drag him to the shoulder of the Belt Parkway and rifle his pockets.

Detectives investigating Internet communications Mr. Sandy had had were led to the first suspect, John Fox, 19, of Knapp Street in Brooklyn, who is a sophomore at SUNY Maritime College. The other two suspects are Gary Timmins, 16, of Gerritsen Beach, and Ilye Shurova, 20, of Sheepshead Bay. The three men were charged yesterday with first-degree assault as a hate crime, and first- and second-degree robbery, also as hate crimes, according to the police. The men face a potentially longer prison term than if the hate crime statute was not applied, according to a spokesman for Charles J. Hynes, the Brooklyn district attorney.

The fourth suspect was being questioned at the 61st Precinct stationhouse in Brooklyn last night, the police said. It was unclear what role each of the four men played in the incident, according to the police.

“The perpetrators had an online interaction with the victim, and they lured him,” said one investigator, referring to what he said was an exchange of AOL instant messages over the course of about an hour.

When asked why the case was being classified as a hate crime, the investigator said: “Because of the totality of the evolution of the crime.”

But the case underlined the fine distinction prosecutors must consider when applying the state’s hate crime law. Under the law, established in 2000, a hate crime is typically defined as one in which a victim is chosen because of race, color, sexual orientation, religious practice or some other protected category, said Brian S. MacNamara, an assistant professor of law at John Jay College of Criminal Justice.

“The prosecutor will have to prove that in the underlying assault and robbery the victim was targeted in some way because of his sexual orientation,” said Professor MacNamara. “It’s a little bit tricky because, obviously, the main crime was the robbery, so you have to prove that the motivation for selecting that victim was substantially because he was gay.”

As Mr. Fox was led from the precinct station yesterday, his hands cuffed behind his back, his father, John Sr., yelled out, “John, I care about you.”

He later defended his son to reporters, speaking about his son’s goal of becoming a naval officer, and said he was perplexed by the hate-crime charge. “He never did anything like that before,” the elder Mr. Fox said. “Why would he be rabidly anti-gay? I don’t know.”

McCartha L. Lewis, Mr. Sandy’s aunt, said the family was rallying to support her nephew as he remained in critical condition yesterday at Brookdale University Hospital and Medical Center. She said that Mr. Sandy was in a coma with his breathing supported by a respirator, and that the family was struggling with whether to remove him from it.

DOJ_NMG_0079731

Ms. Lewis said the family wanted to wait at least until today, Mr. Sandy's 29th birthday, before making that decision.

"The doctors want us to pull the plug, but I told them no," said Ms. Lewis, 66, a singer who lives in Jamaica, Queens.

Mr. Sandy's father, Ezekiel E. Sandy Sr., is Ms. Lewis's brother, and she said that another of his sons, Tony, had come from Tobago to be with the family.

"He's a very good boy," Ms. Lewis said of Michael Sandy. "He is a hard worker and he is very nice."

Black Employees' Foundation Sues LOC (RC)

By Elizabeth Brotherton

Roll Call, October 12, 2006

Members of a nonprofit foundation designed to assist black employees at the Library of Congress filed a class-action lawsuit against the agency last week, claiming officials have failed to recognize the organization and discriminated against employees who joined it.

Officers of the Howard R.L. Cook and Tommy Shaw Foundation for Black Employees of the Library Inc. allege that by not recognizing the foundation as an employee organization, the Library has denied black employees the right to address racial discrimination in the work force through legal means.

"Now, that's illegal, because that's blatant retaliation," said Howard Cook, a plaintiff in the case and a foundation officer. "We have a right to combat racial discrimination and all other forms of retaliation that exists."

As a recognized employee organization, the Library would allow the foundation to use Library space and duty time for its activities.

In the lawsuit, the plaintiffs are asking that the court declare the Library's actions "illegal and discriminatory," as well as award the foundation $75 million for "the Defendant's illegal actions preventing the Foundation from having open access to financial assistance from its members."

Matt Raymond, a spokesman for the Library of Congress, declined to comment beyond stating that the LOC had not yet been formally served with court papers but was aware of the lawsuit.

"We don't comment on pending litigation," Raymond said.

But in a series of letters dating back to 2003, Library officials wrote to various members of the foundation to argue that they cannot recognize the group as an official employee organization because one of its primary purposes is to sue the Library in discrimination lawsuits by using money raised on Library property.

"One of the main goals of the Howard Cook/Tommy Shaw Foundation is to assist individuals in filing and maintaining claims, suits and litigation against the Library," Librarian of Congress James Billington wrote to Cook in August 2005. "I firmly believe that emplpoyee [sic] assistance is best provided by the Library through its Equal Employment Opportunity Complaints Office, Dispute Resolution Center, Employee Assistance Program, Office of Workforce Management, and through the collective bargaining agreements between the Library and its four unions."

The foundation was established following the landmark Cook v. Billington class-action court ruling by the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia, which found the Library had discriminated against minority employees.

Officially incorporated by the Washington, D.C., government in September 2001, the foundation provides financial support for those involved in combating racial discrimination at the Library, Cook said, as well as education and training to help minority employees advance their careers.

Lead plaintiff David Hubbard, another foundation officer, said repeated refusals by Library officials to recognize the foundation prompted the suit, which was filed on Oct. 6 in U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia.

"All we want to do is be recognized as an organization within the Library of Congress," Hubbard said. "Now that we have a foundation set up to help employees, they refuse to recognize us."

The Library has struggled with discrimination issues in the past. Following the Cook v. Billington ruling, the Library changed its hiring and promotion practices, which officials have said helped to lead to a drop in discrimination complaints and lawsuits.

But some legal experts familiar with the Library have argued these changes have not been effectively enforced by senior management, and problems have continued.

Cook, who worked for 32 years in the education division at the Library's Congressional Research Service, said he hopes the foundation can give minority employees a leg up at the Library.

"I loved it, but also hated the environment and treatment afforded minority employees," Cook said of his years at the Library.

The Baltimore-based law firm Snider & Associates is handling the case for the plaintiffs. The attorneys handling the lawsuit were unavailable because they were marking the Jewish holiday of Sukkot, a receptionist said.

DOJ_NMG_0079732

9th Circuit: UPS Can't Refuse To Consider Hearing-Impaired Drivers (LAW)

By Petra Pasternak, The Recorder

California Recorder, October 12, 2006

A 9th Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals panel ruled Tuesday that United Parcel Service violated the Americans with Disabilities Act by refusing to consider hearing-impaired workers for driving positions.

At issue was UPS' policy mandating that its drivers pass a government hearing test, even though the test isn't required to operate many of the company's vehicles. UPS argued its exclusion policies were designed with safety in mind. But the court said that a blanket determination of safety can't be made on the basis of disability.

"The concept of risk, in other words, is an individual, not an aggregate, one," Judge Marsha Berzon wrote for the unanimous court, "albeit one calculated by averaging out overall risk: how likely is it that the individual driver will get into an accident?"

Judge Betty Fletcher concurred, as did Judge John Gibson, a senior 8th Circuit judge sitting by designation.

Laurence Paradis and Caroline Jacobs of the Oakland, Calif.-based nonprofit firm Disability Rights Advocates represented the plaintiff class.

"There are a whole host of factors that go into every job description, and it's very rare that employees can challenge arbitrary job standards that close the door to people with disabilities," Paradis said. "The ruling was a tremendous victory for people with all kinds of disabilities."

Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher attorneys, who handled UPS' defense, could not be reached for comment. But company spokeswoman Heather Robinson said UPS "strongly disagrees with the court's ruling, and we are evaluating our options, including an appeal. We believe this case is about safety. It has nothing to do with disability or discrimination."

In upholding an injunction granted by U.S. District Judge Thelton Henderson in 2004, the 9th Circuit panel ruled the plaintiffs did not have to prove they could drive "safely" in order to have standing. Instead, they merely had to meet the other job qualifications UPS listed for the position, which they did.

That reasoning shifted the burden of proof to UPS, which had to prove the driving job mandated the strict government hearing test required by the company.

"UPS didn't show persuasively that hearing-impaired people were more likely to have accidents," Heller Ehrman partner Andrew Livingston said. "And the flip side, it didn't show that there was no way to determine whether or not hearing-impaired drivers present a heightened risk."

Livingston, who followed the case, added: "The opinion certainly changes the way people litigate these types of law suits, both at the summary judgment stage and the trial stage. It shifts the burden under the ADA to the defense to prove that the employee or class of employees are not qualified because of the specific qualifications standard at issue."

Another defense attorney said the ruling in Bates v. UPS, 06 C.D.O.S. 9546, is an example of the pitfalls of a sweeping company policy related to disabled workers.

"It's dangerous to have an across-the-board policy," Winston & Strawn partner Tyler Paetkau said. "For employers, it's risky to treat applicants as a group."

UPS maintains it does not discriminate on the basis of disability.

"UPS has employees with disabilities -- including hearing impairments -- in a wide range of positions throughout the company's nationwide workforce," spokeswoman Robinson said.

South Dakota's Stark Abortion Choice (CSM)

By Amanda Paulson

The Christian Science Monitor, October 12, 2006

SIOUX FALLS, S.D.

An unlikely state could reset the tone of the country's abortion debate this November.

South Dakota voters are poised to weigh in on a landmark bill, passed by the legislature in March and referred to the ballot by a petition drive, that would outlaw all abortions except to save a mother's life. While the law, if approved, will almost certainly be challenged in court, the campaign is under scrutiny by those on all sides of the national debate eager to see whether voters in a conservative, largely antiabortion state are ready to approve an all-out ban on abortion.

If the ban is voted down, it will indicate even abortion opponents aren't willing to rein in all rights, and it will diminish the chances that other states will pass similar bans. If it's approved, observers expect other states to follow, and it's possible a court challenge could reach the Supreme Court.

It's a decision many residents of South Dakota are wrestling with.

DOJ_NMG_0079733

"It's really tough for us," Dick Ronken tells an antiabortion canvasser. "We're against abortion, but I think they haven't gone far enough to provide for all cases. It should be between a woman and her God and her doctor, without the government interfering."

Mr. Ronken's views aren't unusual in a state where many oppose abortion but look at it in personal terms - and often oppose government intrusion in their lives. In fact, some abortion-rights advocates say the soul-searching debate this vote has forced is one they welcome, hopeful it will lead to a decision to overturn the ban.

"In the case of abortion, we have long said that people in this country may accept restrictions, but will never accept a total ban on abortion - this debate really lays that bare," says Sarah Stoesz, the president of Planned Parenthood in Minnesota, South Dakota, and North Dakota, which runs the only abortion-providing clinic in South Dakota.

Opponents of the ban hold a small lead in polls - 47 percent to 44 percent in a recent Zogby International poll - but that lead has narrowed. If the ban allowed exceptions in cases of rape and incest, polls show a sizeable majority would support it.

Perhaps for that reason the arguments on both sides have been atypical for an issue that rarely veers from rhetoric pitting a "protect unborn children" slogan against "protect a woman's right to choose." Those opposed to the ban have shied away from promoting access to abortion, focusing instead on the bill's strictness, which doesn't include exceptions for rape, incest, or the mother's health but would allow an abortion to save her life.

"Honor and protect human life, reduce the number of abortions," says one TV ad sponsored by the South Dakota Campaign for Healthy Families, the coalition opposing the ban. "But should a woman who's the victim of rape or incest be left with no option?... Referred Law 6 makes no exception for these tragic circumstances. ... It just goes too far."

Similarly, proponents of the ban have eschewed slogans about saving babies' lives and photos of aborted fetuses in favor of a more feminist message about protecting women who, they say, are the ones victimized by abortion-rights advocates.

"For the last 33 years, women who have had abortions have been exploited," says Leslee Unruh, campaign manager for VoteYesForLife.com, who brought the bill to the legislature. Ms. Unruh had an abortion many years ago and has regretted her decision. Too often, she says, women aren't informed about the physical and emotional consequences of abortion.

"I've asked women to continue to be at the forefront, and to have it continue to be about women," Unruh says.

When she proposed the bill, legislators convened a task force to study the issue and concluded with a highly controversial report that triggered members of the task force to walk out in protest. Women like Unruh who had abortions they regretted testified before the task force and were a big reason the legislature decided to go ahead with the bill, says Rep. Roger Hunt, the Republican who sponsored it.

"It's very compelling evidence," says Representative Hunt, noting that the task force also determined that life begins at conception.

He and Unruh quibble with the portrayal of the bill as having no exceptions for rape or incest, pointing to one section that guarantees women access to emergency contraception, which helps prevent pregnancy if taken within 72 hours after sex. But opponents of the ban say that doesn't help many women who may not immediately report a rape, and they note that South Dakota recently passed legislation allowing pharmacists to refuse to fill an emergency contraception prescription.

Of the 800 or so abortions performed in the state each year, only a few are due to rape or incest, but for many voters those are the instances they keep coming back to.

"People are saying, are you telling me if my granddaughter was raped she'd have to go to term?" says David Volk, a former state treasurer and secretary of commerce and regulation who considers himself a staunchly "pro-life" Republican. He is opposed to the ban. "It's the wrong case at the wrong time."

In addition to seeing it as too extreme, Mr. Volk objects to the money that will be needed for the state to defend the bill in court - especially since he thinks it has no chance of overturning Roe v. Wade. And many national antiabortion groups seem to agree with him. The National Right to Life Committee barely mentions the case on its Web site, and Americans United for Life, a legal support group in Chicago, says it's unlikely the Supreme Court would revisit Roe through a ban like this.

"It's going to be a very tall hill to climb for that to happen," says David McConchie, the group's executive director. "But if it's a ban of something people support, they should vote for that."

National abortion-rights groups, meanwhile, are watching the vote closely in part because they're concerned about other states - like Ohio, Louisiana, and Texas - following South Dakota and about the changing makeup of the Supreme Court.

"There's this climate that they feel [Roe] could be overturned, and that's what they're doing with the South Dakota ban," says Nancy Keenan, president of NARAL Pro-Choice America. But the chilly reception the ban has gotten in a antiabortion state may be an indication that more extreme abortion opponents are overreaching, she says. "Their true agenda is now uncloaked. ... And American people are saying enough is enough."

DOJ_NMG_0079734

At the state's only abortion clinic - already a five-hour drive for people in the western part of South Dakota - protesters wave signs outside on a day when a doctor has flown in. With no doctors in the state willing to perform abortions, the four doctors who work at the clinic have to fly in from Minnesota.

"Women who don't want to be pregnant will go to extreme measures," says Miriam McCreary, a semi-retired obstetrician from St. Paul explaining why she makes the trip one to three times a week. "Abortion should be safe, legal, and available as a backup if contraception fails."

But while the ban is controversial - especially in a state that, while antiabortion, also has many libertarian tendencies - not all South Dakotans struggle with it. Lawns in Sioux City are dotted with pink-and-blue "Vote Yes on 6" signs. Some voters are enthusiastic about the law. As Justin Huck and Katie Kjelden go door-to-door in a neighborhood of small houses to campaign against the ban, they get varied responses.

"You're talking to the wrong person - I very much believe in the sanctity of human life," a blond woman with two small dogs tells Mr. Huck. Judy Alvine, on the other hand, gives Ms. Kjelden a warm reception when she answers the door.

"They make it sound like if you were Christian you would be for it," she says with frustration. "We have a doctor in the family, and he feels very strongly it should be a medical thing."

"It's refreshing to have people you can actually talk with," says Kjelden, a high school sophomore volunteering for the campaign, as she leaves the house. "And she and her husband are both registered Republicans!"

Report: 5 U.S. States Use Dogs To Control Inmates In Cells (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, October 12, 2006

(AP) - NEW YORK-Five U.S. state prison systems allow the use of trained attack dogs to control inmates - a practice that until now has been kept secret in American prisons - according to a Human Rights Watch report released Wednesday.

"The entire world has seen the photo of an Abu Ghraib detainee crouched in terror before a snarling dog, but the use of attack dogs against prisoners here in the U.S. has been a well-kept secret," said Jamie Fellner, U.S. director of Human Rights Watch. "Longtime corrections professionals were appalled when we told them that guards in some states use dogs on prisoners."

The report, "Cruel and Degrading: The use of dogs for cell extractions in U.S. prisons," says policies exist in Connecticut, Delaware, Iowa, South Dakota and Utah that allow guards to use "aggressive, unmuzzled" dogs to order inmates out of their cells when they refuse to leave. Dogs are ordered to bite prisoners if they resist.

"Human Rights Watch knows of no other country in the world that authorizes the use of dogs to attack prisoners who will not voluntarily leave their cells," the report said. The group does not object to the use of dogs to patrol prison grounds.

The report notes that in South Dakota, Utah and Delaware, dogs are rarely used in cells, if at all. In Connecticut, dogs were used in 20 cases in 2005, and in Iowa in 63 cases between March 2005 and March 2006.

Human Rights Watch interviewed prison officials in Connecticut and Iowa who said using dogs to remove prisoners from cells reduces injuries to guards and keeps prisons safer.

But Kathleen Dennehy, Commissioner of the Massachusetts Department of Correction, said her state stopped using dogs in cells this year because there are other effective alternatives.

"There are other ways to compel inmates to cuff up than sending in an animal to rip his flesh," she told Human Rights Watch.

Arizona also dropped its dog in cells policy this year.

"We welcome these decisions and urge the corrections departments of Connecticut, Delaware, Iowa, South Dakota and Utah to follow suit," the report said.

ANTITRUST:

Justice Department Criticized For Approving Big AT&T Deal (WSJ)

By Amy Schatz And Siobhan Hughes

The Wall Street Journal, October 12, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Justice Department's unconditional approval of AT&T Inc.'s $67 billion buyout of BellSouth Corp. drew criticism from consumer advocates and lawmakers, raising the possibility that the deal could face delays at the Federal Communications Commission.

Hours before the Justice Department's decision was announced yesterday, FCC Chairman Kevin Martin changed course and proposed limited divestitures to protect big-business users of high-speed data lines in 32 office buildings, lawyers who have seen the proposal said. The FCC was scheduled to approve the deal as early as today, but cancelled the vote last night, rescheduling it for tomorrow.

DOJ_NMG_0079735

The Justice Department approved AT&T's purchase of BellSouth without any conditions after determining that the combination isn't likely to hurt competition in the telecommunications industries. "After thoroughly investigating AT&T's proposed acquisition of BellSouth, the Antitrust Division determined that the proposed transaction is not likely to reduce competition substantially," Justice Department antitrust chief Thomas Barnett said. "The division investigated all areas in which the two companies currently compete."

The clearance triggered an outcry from smaller phone-company rivals, Democrats on Capitol Hill and the FCC as well as consumer groups. Opponents of the acquisition complained that the nation's top antitrust regulator had abdicated its responsibility to scrutinize whether the new company, which would control local phone lines from California to Florida, would be so big that it would lessen competition. AT&T also would have sole control of Cingular Wireless, the nation's largest cellular carrier by number of subscribers.

"The Justice Department has packed its bags and walked out on consumers and small businesses by refusing to impose even a single condition in the largest telecom merger the nation has ever seen," Democratic FCC Commissioner Michael Copps complained. The FCC's other Democrat, Jonathan Adelstein, agreed: "By failing to issue a complaint, consent decree, or condition, it appears [the Department of Justice] took a dive on one of the largest mergers in history just to avoid further court scrutiny."

Although Mr. Martin, a Republican, has been pushing hard to wrap up the agency's review, it isn't clear that he has the three votes necessary to approve the acquisition. Republican FCC Commissioner Robert McDowell has so far indicated that he might be recused from voting because he formerly worked for a group that opposes the transaction. In addition to Mr. Copps, Mr. Adelstein has expressed concern about approving the acquisition without conditions. That would leave Mr. Martin without a majority on the five-person commission.

AT&T, San Antonio, said it was elated with the quick Justice Department approval of the merger. "This unequivocal and unconditional approval underscores the competitive nature of our industry and the pro-competitive benefits of this merger," General Counsel James Ellis said.

The BellSouth takeover was valued at $67 billion when it was announced in March. Since then, BellSouth's stock price has risen and based on yesterday's 4 p.m. price, the deal is valued at $78.8 billion, BellSouth said. AT&T shares rose 19 cents to $32.96 in New York Stock Exchange 4 p.m. composite trading, while BellSouth shares were up 24 cents to $43.44, also on the Big Board.

--Mark H. Anderson contributed to this article.

Write to Amy Schatz at Amy.Schatz@wsj.com1 and Siobhan Hughes at siobhan.hughes@dowjones.com2

AT& T Deal Wins A Key Go-Ahead (WP)

By Alan Sipress

The Washington Post, October 12, 2006

The Justice Department yesterday endorsed AT&T Inc.'s proposed $78.5 billion purchase of BellSouth Corp., clearing the way for the Federal Communications Commission to approve as early as this week the creation of a corporate giant that would be the country's largest provider of telephone, wireless and broadband services.

But the outcome of the FCC consideration, scheduled for tomorrow morning, remains in doubt because the prospective swing vote on the five-member board has maintained since summer that he is sitting out the case to avoid a possible conflict of interest.

The merger, proposed in March, would reunite two major parts of the old AT&T telecommunications empire that was broken up by the federal government in 1984. The deal would also give AT&T complete control over Cingular Wireless, the country's largest cellular telephone provider, now owned jointly by AT&T and BellSouth.

The deal, originally valued at $67 billion, is now worth substantially more because of increases in stock prices.

While consumer advocates say the merger would lead to higher prices for a range of telecommunications services, the companies have argued it would foster greater innovation.

If the FCC's newest commissioner, Robert M. McDowell, is ultimately recused, this could leave the board split along party lines and deny the merger the majority required for approval. That would put pressure on Chairman Kevin J. Martin, a Republican, to offer some concessions on consumer protection and competition that the panel's two Democratic members have sought but he has been reluctant to make. Martin has previously urged that the deal be approved without conditions.

Though a Republican appointee, McDowell has already shown an independent streak and said he is recusing himself because he previously worked as senior vice president for Comptel, an association that has lobbied on behalf of companies competing with AT&T and BellSouth. A spokeswoman in his office said yesterday that McDowell has continued to act as if he is recused.

But the final decision on whether he will participate could rest with the FCC's general counsel, raising the prospect that McDowell could be called on to decide the matter, even though he has said he has intentionally steered clear even of reviewing written submissions in the case. McDowell has never said publicly how he would vote if forced to participate, but industry analysts speculate he would likely side with his fellow Republicans.

Martin, saying little in public about the standoff, has signaled only that it remains unresolved.

Late yesterday, the commission announced that formal consideration of the merger, originally scheduled for today, would be delayed until Friday. Though no explanation was given, sources close to the FCC said negotiations between the two sides on the commission had only begun in recent days, leaving it unprepared to take up the matter as quickly as first envisioned. The sources spoke on condition of anonymity because they are not authorized to speak publicly on the matter.

By approving the merger, a step industry analysts expected, the Justice Department gave additional ammunition to advocates of the deal. The department concluded that there are enough other corporate competitors and emerging technologies to ensure that consumers are protected, and it placed no conditions on the approval.

"After thoroughly investigating AT&T's proposed acquisition of BellSouth, the antitrust division determined that the proposed transaction is not likely to reduce competition substantially," said Assistant Attorney General Thomas O. Barnett. The ruling came after the antitrust division examined the areas in which AT&T and BellSouth now compete, including local and long-distance telephone service and Internet service for homes and businesses, he said. The impact on future competition in wireless Internet service was also considered.

Both AT&T and BellSouth hailed the ruling and said they looked forward to a swift FCC endorsement.

"This unequivocal and unconditional approval underscores the competitive nature of our industry and the pro-competitive benefits of this merger," said AT&T General Counsel James D. Ellis. "AT&T is focused on bringing more video choices and next-generation broadband services to as many consumers and possible, and our merger with BellSouth will help deliver these benefits to more consumers, more quickly."

By issuing approval without any of the conditions it imposed on prior mergers, the Justice Department made it more likely that some FCC members will try to impose restrictions, said Rebecca Arbogast, a telecommunications analyst with Stifel, Nicolaus & Co. In other recent mergers, the department called for the divestiture of special access lines -- which carry data from buildings to the phone companies -- so competitors would have the chance to handle this business.

Hours after the Justice Department ruling, Democratic Commissioner Jonathan S. Adelstein vowed to press for consumer safeguards. "Since Justice dropped the ball, it's incumbent on us to do their job as well as our own," he said.

Last year, with the FCC split evenly among Republicans and Democrats, the commission imposed modest conditions in approving a pair of high-profile mergers -- AT&T with SBC Communications Inc. and Verizon Communications Inc. with MCI Inc. Among them were requirements that the rates for special access lines be temporarily frozen, that DSL connections be sold separate from telephone service and that the companies temporarily abide by "net neutrality" principles allowing customers to use their broadband for any application they want.

Arbogast suggested the commissioners would be hard-pressed to break with this precedent in approving AT&T's purchase of BellSouth.

"The most likely outcome is that the FCC ultimately ends up imposing conditions on this merger that are similar to the conditions imposed in earlier ones," she said. "The question is how long it takes the two Democrats and the two Republicans to come to some agreement." She predicted that the two sides would work out a compromise without McDowell having to participate against his will.

Consumer advocates, who sharply criticized the Justice Department decision, warned that AT&T's purchase of BellSouth would inflate prices while suffocating innovation by setting up a single company that dominates regional markets and faces only token opposition from potential competitors.

"Justice has thoroughly abandoned the theory of promoting maximum telecommunications competition," said Gene Kimmelman, senior vice president of the Consumers Union. Though he acknowledged that the merger would likely move ahead, he urged the FCC to require the companies to divest enough of their airwave spectrum to allow competitors to offer wireless broadband services.

BellSouth Deal Faces FCC Fight (USAT)

By Paul Davidson

USA Today, October 12, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0079737

Democrats on the Federal Communications Commission said Wednesday that they would push for significant conditions on AT&T's purchase of BellSouth after the Justice Department cleared the deal with no requirements.

The FCC is scheduled to consider the $78.5 billion deal Friday, but the vote could be delayed if the agency's two Democrats and two Republicans cannot reach a consensus. Republican Chairman Kevin Martin has recommended approval of the merger with no conditions.

“The Justice Department has packed its bags and walked out on consumers and small businesses,” says FCC Democratic Commissioner Michael Copps. He added, “It's all the more important for the FCC to ensure that consumer interests have a seat at the table.”

A third Republican commissioner, Robert McDowell, has said he will recuse himself from voting because he formerly worked for a group that opposed the deal. But Martin could still ask him to vote if he deems it in the public interest to break the stalemate.

Justice antitrust chief Thomas Barnett said the deal was approved with no divestitures because it's “not likely to reduce competition substantially.” Justice has cited the emergence of cable companies' Internet-based phone services and wireless among the new low-cost rivals to the big phone companies.

But Gene Kimmelman of Consumers Union says such services have limitations, adding that AT&T and BellSouth could have competed with each other.

Justice's “rubber stamp on this merger suggests (it) has thrown in the towel on competition between the Bell phone companies,” Kimmelman says.

The merger, he says, dashes hopes that BellSouth would use spectrum it owns to offer wireless broadband services that might compete against AT&T in its region. Among other conditions, FCC Democrats could press AT&T-BellSouth to sell BellSouth's spectrum.

The FCC also could require the new company to sell or lease lines in about 30 buildings in which both AT&T and BellSouth are the only providers serving big businesses. Justice imposed a similar requirement in the SBC-AT&T and Verizon-MCI mergers because of duplicate facilities in several hundred buildings.

A federal judge is reviewing the settlements Justice reached with the companies in those mergers after suggesting the requirements did not go far enough.

FCC Democrat Jonathan Adelstein says it appears Justice did not impose such conditions on the AT&T-BellSouth merger “to avoid further court scrutiny.”

Barnett said Justice's review was based on an extensive investigation of the impact of the deal.

Justice Department Approves AT&T-BellSouth Merger Plan (AP)

By By John Dunbar, Associated Press

AP, October 12, 2006

The Justice Department gave its unconditional approval to AT&T Inc.'s buyout of BellSouth Corp. on Wednesday, a coast-to-coast behemoth that would be the largest U.S. provider of telephone, wireless and broadband Internet services.

The decision cheered company executives but outraged consumer advocates and two members of the Federal Communications Commission. At first the FCC scheduled a vote for Thursday on whether the $78.5 billion deal should go forward, but late Wednesday the agency pulled the item from the agenda and scheduled a commission meeting for Friday for a possible vote on the deal.

The FCC did not say why it was delaying a vote. "We are committed to evaluating merger applications fairly and in a manner consistent with the public interest," agency spokesman Clyde Ensslin said in a statement. "We are continuing to work to complete our AT&T and BellSouth merger review in a timely manner."

Despite the scale of the purchase, the Justice Department found no potentially adverse effects on competition.

The decision was immediately criticized by FCC member Jonathan S. Adelstein, a Democrat who called it "a reckless abandonment of DoJ's responsibility to protect competition and consumers."

Michael Copps, the commission's other Democrat, said the "Justice Department has packed its bags and walked out on consumers and small businesses by refusing to impose even a single condition in the largest telecom merger the nation has ever seen."

If the deal wins final government approval, the merger would give San Antonio-based AT&T Inc. total control over the nation's largest cellular provider, Cingular Wireless, a joint venture of the two companies that serves 57.3 million customers.

"After thoroughly investigating AT&T's proposed acquisition of BellSouth, the antitrust division determined that the proposed transaction is not likely to reduce competition substantially," said Assistant Attorney General Thomas O. Barnett. He heads the section that examines proposed mergers.

DOJ_NMG_0079738

The department's approval "underscores the competitive nature of our industry and the pro-competitive benefits of this merger," AT&T General Counsel James D. Ellis said in a statement.

"AT&T is focused on bringing more video choices and next-generation broadband services to as many consumers as possible, and our merger with BellSouth will help deliver these benefits to more consumers, more quickly," Ellis said.

BellSouth said in a statement that it looks forward to FCC approval "in the very near future."

Consumer advocates and some lawmakers claim the government is well on its way to reconstituting the old Ma Bell monopoly, which was broken up in 1984 after a lengthy court battle.

House Judiciary Committee Chairman Rep. James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis., and other members of Congress had asked that the deal be held up until a federal judge decided whether two previous telecommunications company mergers, which were challenged by the Justice Department, were in the public interest.

A message left at Sensenbrenner's office was not immediately returned on Wednesday.

When Verizon Communications Inc. bought MCI Inc. and SBC Communications Inc. bought the old incarnation of AT&T, which kept the name, the Justice Department sued to block the mergers, but entered settlement agreements with the companies the same day.

The agreements, called consent decrees, required the companies to sell off some of their assets in certain regions. A federal judge is mulling whether the decrees are in the best interest of the public.

In the AT&T-BellSouth merger, the department avoided judicial review altogether. The FCC's Adelstein said by taking that course, "it appears DoJ took a dive on one of the largest mergers in history just to avoid further court scrutiny."

A coalition of consumer groups said the approval was "a move likely to leave consumers with fewer choices and inflated prices for a host of services."

Barnett said Justice Department lawyers looked at all areas where AT&T and BellSouth currently compete, including local and long-distance phone and Internet service for residential and business customers. The department also examined the merger's impact on future competition for wireless broadband service.

He said the lawyers cited competition in the marketplace, changing regulatory rules and emerging technology in finding that the merger was unlikely to hurt consumers.

Instead, it "would likely result in cost savings and other efficiencies that should benefit consumers," Barnett said.

With the action moving to the FCC, a number of scenarios may play out. The FCC's chairman, Republican Kevin Martin, has circulated an order recommending approval. He probably will get support from commissioner Deborah Taylor Tate, also a Republican.

With Adelstein and Copps so critical of the merger, all eyes will be on Robert McDowell, the third Republican on the commission.

McDowell's last job was as vice president and assistant general counsel for a trade association that has fought legislative and regulatory battles with AT&T and other major carriers.

McDowell's office reaffirmed Wednesday that he continues to proceed under the assumption that he will not participate in the vote. McDowell could be urged to vote on the deal if he were cleared to do so by the FCC's general counsel, Sam Feder. Feder declined comment.

FCC spokesman David Fiske said he is not aware whether an opinion on McDowell's withdrawal has been requested or filed.

In addition to the merger item, the FCC also moved to Friday a vote that would begin an agency inquiry into broadband industry practices. The session is expected to deal with whether Internet service providers should be forced to provide equal treatment to all traffic on their networks, a controversial issue called "network neutrality."

Complicating matters is a planned trip by Martin to China beginning next week.

Despite the strong language from Adelstein and Copps, there may be a way to come up with conditions to win their support for the merger.

The combination of San Antonio-based AT&T and Atlanta-based BellSouth would have operations in 22 states. AT&T estimates that about 10,000 jobs would be phased out over three years.

Combined, the companies generate $117 billion in revenue and operate 68.7 million local phone lines stretching coast to coast across the southern United States and up through the Midwest. The merged company would employ 309,000 people before any job cuts.

The deal would further the reunification of the Baby Bells. The seven regional telephone operating companies and one long-distance provider were spun off from the national AT&T monopoly under a federal court order designed to introduce competition.

DOJ_NMG_0079739

Including BellSouth, the new AT&T would consist of four former Baby Bells and the long-distance business, which was acquired by the company late last year. The other two companies created from Bells are Verizon Communications Inc., which dominates the eastern United States, and Qwest Communications International Inc., the phone company for most of the Rocky Mountain and Northwest regions.

AT&T shares rose 19 cents, or 0.6 percent, to close Wednesday at $32.96 on the New York Stock Exchange. BellSouth shares rose 24 cents, or 0.6 percent, to $43.44.

___

Associated Press writers Lara Jakes Jordan in Washington, Bruce Meyerson in New York and Harry Weber in Atlanta contributed to this report.

BellSouth's Final Call; AT&T Set To Take Over (AJC)

By Matt Kempner, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, October 12, 2006

The last hurdle could be cleared this week for a massive combination of AT&T and BellSouth, spelling the end of Atlanta-based BellSouth as an independent in a fast-consolidating industry.

The Federal Communications Commission was slated to vote on the deal Friday, following the U.S. Justice Department's decision Wednesday to approve the nation's biggest telecommunications combination without conditions.

Justice said the deal would not substantially reduce competition or hurt consumers, despite complaints from consumer groups.

BellSouth could disappear as a stand-alone company and be rolled under the AT&T name with a shuffle of paperwork within hours should the FCC give its blessing. But a true melding of the businesses would be farther off, including eliminating 10,000 overlapping jobs in the coming months and changing BellSouth signs and advertising to AT&T.

Plenty of questions important to the metro Atlanta economy remain, including where the combined company will cut jobs, which of its 6.4 million square feet of office space it might vacate as it consolidates operations and how much of a role it will retain in the community.

It could take three years for the new company to smooth out its networks so that all its customers have access to identical services, said Jan Dawson, a vice president with Ovum, a Boston-based firm that consults for telecommunications companies and some of their biggest customers.

"It's going to be a long time before all the benefits of the merger really filter through to consumers and businesses," he said.

The deal also would give AT&T full ownership of Cingular Wireless, the cellular service provider it owns jointly with BellSouth.

Metro area impact

Locally, some of the job cuts will undoubtedly target certain corporate jobs here rather than blue-collar ones. The companies have said many of the reductions will come through attrition, and that such changes won't come until early next year.

AT&T has said since announcing the merger that its headquarters would stay in San Antonio, while Cingular would keep its home office in Atlanta. Atlanta will remain the hub for AT&T's Southeast regional telephone operations.

Gov. Sonny Perdue suggested in March he would consider leading a mission to Texas to possibly offer AT&T incentives to relocate the combined company's headquarters here. Atlanta Mayor Shirley Franklin said she was willing to go with the governor.

Instead, Perdue hosted a private dinner April 20 at the governor's mansion with Ed Whitacre, AT&T's chairman and chief executive, said Heather Hedrick, a Perdue spokesman.

Hedrick would not say whether Perdue offered AT&T any incentives to move here or keep operations in Georgia, but the governor believes the state and the company "enjoy a great relationship for the future," she said.

Back to the future?

Nationally, an AT&T/BellSouth combination resurrects much of Ma Bell that the Justice Department helped break apart in 1984 over antitrust concerns.

But Dawson, the industry consultant, said the competitive landscape is far different than it was 22 years ago. He cited the rise of cellphones, the Internet, aggressive cable company expansion and phone service over the Internet. "There are all kinds of other forms of competition which are opening up the markets much wider than just the established phone companies in 1984," he said.

Consumer advocates see a worrisome consolidation of telecommunications power, though. They criticized Justice officials for not limiting the risks and predicted the combination will hurt consumers.

"The Justice Department has abdicated responsibility to promote the competition it promised when it broke up AT&T 20 years ago," said Gene Kimmelman, senior vice president for Consumers Union.

DOJ_NMG_0079740

"In the end, the majority of consumers will end up paying inflated prices that result when Bell companies merge and dominate local, long distance, wireless and Internet services in their territories."

EarthLink, the Atlanta-based Internet service provider, said Justice "abandoned consumers and small businesses by refusing to require even those modest protections" it put in place last year on two smaller combinations: AT&T/SBC Communications and Verizon Communications/MCI.

In a statement released Wednesday, Thomas Barnett, the assistant attorney general in charge of Justice's antitrust division, issued a statement saying, "the proposed transaction is not likely to reduce competition substantially."

"The presence of other competitors, changing regulatory requirements and the emergence of new technologies in markets for residential local and long distance service indicate that this transaction is not likely to harm consumer welfare," Justice said.

Both BellSouth and AT&T praised the decision and voiced hopes for quick approval from the FCC.

Justice is charged with looking at antitrust issues, a narrower view than the mandate before the FCC to consider public interest.

Even critics believe the FCC will approve the AT&T/BellSouth combination. The real question is what, if any, conditions the FCC might set to ease concerns about having so much market power in the hands of one company.

Among the possibilities: requiring that consumers be allowed to buy DSL service even if they don't have phone service with the company; stiffening mandates for the company to lease some lines to local phone and data service providers; and barring AT&T from someday charging higher rates to online content providers who want particularly big pipelines to Internet users.

Republicans hold three of the five seats on the FCC and chairman Kevin Martin has circulated a plan to OK the deal without restrictions. But with expectations that one Republican will bow out to avoid a potential conflict of interest, Martin may offer conditions to placate Democrat commissioners and avoid a tie vote.

The FCC was originally expected to vote Thursday but late Wednesday announced a one-day delay, likely to allow further negotiations over the conditions.

Staff writers Walter Woods and Scott Leith contributed to this article.

AT&T-BellSouth Deal Delayed As FCC Postpones Vote (Update1) (BLOOM)

By Molly Peterson

Bloomberg, October 12, 2006

Oct. 11 (Bloomberg) -- AT&T Inc.'s $79 billion purchase of BellSouth Corp. hit a regulatory snag as the U.S. Federal Communications Commission postponed a vote on the deal scheduled for tomorrow.

The FCC will hold a hearing on the merger a day later on Oct. 13, the agency said today in an e-mailed statement.

The delay may signal Chairman Kevin Martin and fellow Republican Commissioner Deborah Tate need to make concessions to Democrat members Michael Copps and Jonathan Adelstein to get the deal approved. Both criticized today's backing of the purchase by the Justice Department. The fifth commissioner, Republican Robert McDowell, recused himself from the vote.

``We are committed to evaluating merger applications fairly and in a manner consistent with the public interest," FCC spokesman Clyde Ensslin said in the statement. ``We are continuing to work to complete our AT&T and BellSouth merger review in a timely manner."

Justice Department Clears AT&T Takeover Of BellSouth (AFP-Y)

AFP, October 12, 2006

The Justice Department approved AT&T's proposal to take over BellSouth, clearing one of the last hurdles in a deal that would create the largest US telecommunications firm.

The department's antitrust chief, Thomas Barnett, said it had concluded that the deal is "not likely to reduce competition substantially" because of emerging technologies changing the competitive landscape.

To the contrary, Barnett said the merger "would likely result in cost savings and other efficiencies that should benefit consumers."

The 67-billion-dollar merger announced earlier this year, which still needs approval by the Federal Communications Commission (FCC), would create the country's largest telecom group and put back together much of the "Ma Bell" empire broken up in the 1980s.

The combined company would serve 70 million phone customers and 10 million high-speed Internet users. It would also have about 315,000 employees -- though that number would surely fall after the merger -- and combined revenue of an estimated 121 billion dollars.

DOJ_NMG_0079741

The deal would give AT&T full control of Cingular Wireless, the largest US mobile operator, which it currently owns jointly with BellSouth.

The merger has sparked criticism from consumer advocates who argue that consolidation in the telecom industry means fewer choices for most people.

Yet others point out that despite the dwindling number of telecom firms, there is increasing competition among companies that had been in cable television and other services but are now offering "bundles" that include Internet access, television and a variety of telephone options.

The planned deal comes after AT&T's recent merger with SBC Communications, which like BellSouth is another of the regional "Baby Bells" created by the breakup of the phone monopoly in the 1980s.

SBC clinched that 16-billion-dollar deal last year, but chose to adopt the storied American Telephone and Telegraph name for the newly merged company.

The merger is on the agenda of the FCC for Thursday, but members of Congress and others have urged the agency to postpone approval until all the competitive elements can be evaluated.

Several lawmakers sent letters to the FCC and to the Department of Justice urging delay on AT&T's case until a decision is returned in a federal court case that is reviewing last year's mega-mergers that combined AT&T with SBC and a separate deal that merged Verizon Communications with MCI.

Some activist groups have also sought to block the merger that they say would create the largest telecom group in the world.

"If you aren't scared about the merger of AT&T and BellSouth, you should be," says the website of the Competition Coalition, a group that includes consumer organizations.

"This merger will create the largest telecommunications company in the world and will create a nationwide monopoly, stretching from California to Florida, controlling the largest local and long distance phone company, the largest wireless company, the largest broadband company, and the largest Internet company in the nation ... Chances are, you will be at the mercy of AT&T."

Will Approved AT&T-BellSouth Deal Help Company Against Cable Providers? (AP)

By Harry R. Weber, Associated Press

AP, October 12, 2006

ATLANTA – AT&T's $78.9 billion purchase of BellSouth, approved by the Justice Department Wednesday, would better position AT&T to increase its share of big business customers by creating more of a one-stop shop for clients with far-flung operations.

But analysts question whether the deal will serve as much of a weapon in the growing battle with cable TV providers targeting consumers and small business segments. The phasing out of the BellSouth brand and the name of the two companies' wireless venture, Cingular, also poses significant challenges.

“They are going to be dominant in a certain segment, but that's not going to make up for the weakness or the competition in other segments,” said Patrick Comack, a telecom analyst in Miami.

Major corporations that are used to getting their local phone and Internet service from Atlanta-based BellSouth Corp. would get it from San Antonio-based AT&T Inc., and the company could use that leverage and the power that comes with owning the infrastructure to increase its share of big business customers.

Officials at several big businesses in BellSouth's hometown of Atlanta, including Coca-Cola, Delta and The Home Depot, either declined to comment on the pending changeover to AT&T or did not immediately return calls seeking comment.

“They will have 60 percent of the wires that go into the buildings of the Fortune 1000,” Comack said of AT&T. “They just will have so much last mile to corporate America, it's out of control. They will be overwhelmingly dominant in not just retaining but capturing more market share in the business arena.”

The consumer side is another story.

Cable companies are likely to increase their effort to siphon local and long-distance telephone customers and Internet customers away from traditional telephone companies like AT&T. The cable companies also have an advantage with such customers because of the providers' in-house television and video-on-demand offerings.

There are still opportunities for AT&T in the consumer and small business segments, however.

Rich Nespola, chief executive of consulting firm TMNG Inc., said the addition of BellSouth's local phone service area offers AT&T a big opportunity to sell advanced services to consumer and small business customers in the battle against cable players.

“It's always easier to sell to an existing customer rather than a new customer. That's right out of Marketing 101, and it still holds true. They trust you,” he said.

DOJ_NMG_0079742

Meanwhile, Atlanta-based Cingular Wireless LLC, the nation's largest cell phone provider, has spent a significant amount of money building up its brand, particularly after buying the old AT&T Wireless for $41 billion in 2004 and eliminating that brand's name. But the Cingular name will be eliminated early next year assuming the AT&T-BellSouth deal is completed. Federal Communications Commission approval of the deal, which could come as early as Thursday, is all that remains. The BellSouth name will be phased out over the next several months, spokesman Jeff Battcher said.

"There are Cingular billboards everywhere," Comack said. "And AT&T Wireless blew up and their brand got dragged through the mud. I would think if AT&T were smart, they'd call it AT&T or AT&T Mobile. That might be a decent idea. They certainly don't want to call it AT&T Wireless."

AT&T spokesman Dave Pacholczyk said only that there has been no decision on the exact name or variation of AT&T it will pick for its wireless brand. He would not discuss the impact on customers who currently call Cingular home.

"As soon as the merger closes, we'll be talking to them a lot," Pacholczyk said. He declined to say what AT&T will tell customers.

Branding decisions can be difficult after a merger, particularly if both companies' products are well established with consumers. By choosing to get rid of the BellSouth and Cingular names, in which billions of marketing dollars have been invested, AT&T is betting that there's greater long-term benefit in having one unified brand. The company, formerly known as SBC Communications, chose the very same strategy late last year when it acquired AT&T Corp., adopting the long-distance carrier's name in place of its regionally familiar SBC brand.

AT&T's approach contrasts sharply with that last year by Sprint when it acquired Nextel, renaming the company Sprint Nextel Corp. and keeping alive both cellular brands. Sprint Nextel has struggled in the aftermath of that deal, reporting a sharp earnings drop and troubles winning and keeping customers. The latest sign of those problems came Monday when former Nextel CEO Tim Donahue announced his resignation as Sprint Nextel chairman.

"They're biting the bullet and actually doing the right thing," Comack said of AT&T. "It's going to be a bundling war out there. They can't make it messy with having another brand in there. They just want to call it AT&T and say, 'You can get everything from AT&T.'"

Wednesday's anticipated Justice Department decision came just seven months after AT&T announced its intentions on March 5 to buy BellSouth. The deal, originally worth $67 billion, has climbed nearly 18 percent in value as AT&T shares have risen in that time. The shares closed at $32.96 in trading Wednesday on the New York Stock Exchange. Under the agreement, AT&T is also assuming $22 billion in BellSouth debt.

AT&T is already the largest telecommunications company in the United States, reporting $62 billion in revenue in 2005 and serving customers in Texas, California and the Midwest. BellSouth provides service to nine states in the Southeast and reported $34 billion in revenue in 2005.

Both companies say the combination would help eliminate challenges they now face in their dual management of Cingular, 60 percent of which is owned by AT&T and the rest by BellSouth.

FTC Ramps Up Actions Against Real Estate (INMAN)

Inman News, October 12, 2006

Agency to discuss 7 law enforcement actions this week

The Federal Trade Commission today announced a "real estate competition sweep" that includes seven law enforcement actions.

Jeff Schmidt, director of the FTC's Competition Bureau, will discuss the actions during a Thursday press conference, according to an announcement at the agency's Web site. The event will be held at the agency's Washington, D.C., headquarters.

The announcement does not specify what types of actions the FTC is taking. Over the past few months, several multiple listing services have announced FTC investigations over MLS restrictions on some types of property listings. And earlier this year the National Association of Realtors announced 14 separate investigations focusing on MLS rules that prevent some property listings from reaching some Web sites.

Several MLSs have changed those policies and announced resolution with the FTC while one MLS, RealComp II Ltd. in Michigan, has announced it is prepared to fight the FTC to keep its policies in place. Also, the FTC -- sometimes acting independently and sometimes with the support of the U.S. Department of Justice -- has opposed some Realtor-backed state measures that seek to set minimum service requirements for real estate licensees.

The Justice Department is engaged in antitrust litigation against the National Association of Realtors over the trade group's policies for the online sharing and display of property listings information, and that agency has also taken action against states that impose restrictions on the ability of real estate companies to offer rebates to consumers.

DOJ_NMG_0079743

Schmidt will discuss the series of FTC law enforcement actions and "put them in the context of previous real estate-related enforcement actions," according to the agency's announcement.

Steve Cook, a spokesman for NAR, today said, "We were not aware of the news conference and plan none of our own."

Most MLSs across the country are affiliated with local Realtor associations that are, in turn, affiliated with the national trade group, which has about 1.3 million members.

Inman News has reported on four MLSs that have changed their policies relating to a specific type of property listing. The New Jersey MLS, the Realtors Association of Northeast Wisconsin MLS, the Northern New England Real Estate Network and the Austin Board of Realtors have lifted restrictions on the display of "exclusive agency listings" at public property-search sites such as Realtor.com and MLS member Web sites that use a data exchange standard to display other members' property listings information.

In an exclusive agency agreement between a home seller and an agent, sellers retain the right to sell their property themselves without paying a commission if the agent is not involved in the sale. The more common listing agreement called "exclusive right to sell" provides that the listing broker is guaranteed a commission.

Realcomp II Ltd., the largest MLS in Michigan, with about 15,000 members, announced that it will fight to keep its MLS policies in place, even if it results in litigation with the FTC. Realcomp's CEO, Karen Kage, told Inman News that exclusive agency listings can facilitate the sale of a home without a Realtor and can therefore fall "outside the scope of what an MLS is."

She said the MLS is designed to "help the public but through the Realtors. An MLS's job is just to service the Realtors. That is our core function."

The Austin Board of Realtors signed an agreement with the FTC to resolve charges over its MLS policies, and the Northern New England Real Estate Network also announced that it had reached an agreement with the FTC.

Healthways To Buy Axia Health For $450M (AP-YBIZ)

AP, October 12, 2006

Healthways to Acquire Axia Health for $450 Million, Sees Deal Adding to Fiscal 2007 Earnings

NASHVILLE, Tenn. (AP) -- Healthways Inc., a provider of diabetes treatment programs for health plans and hospitals, said Wednesday it agreed to purchase Axia Health Management LLC, a provider of preventive health and wellness programs, for $450 million.

The acquisition, which is forecast to add to Healthways' financial results for fiscal 2007, is expected to close before the end of the calendar year, subject to antitrust clearance and other closing conditions.

The transaction will be financed through a combination of cash on hand and committed bank debt.

Healthways first expanded into health support services in 2005, with its acquisition of myhealthIQ, a wellness program that identifies individual health risk factors through an onsite wellness exam, including a full biometric screening with blood draw, and provides each participant with a standardized health risk score.

In addition to services for the commercial market, Axia offers Healthways new products for government and government-sponsored health plans. Axia's cornerstone product, the SilverSneakers Fitness Program, provides an approach to physical activity for nearly three million Medicare-eligible members in 42 states and is available at more than 2,100 fitness centers and class sites.

Together, Healthways and Axia will have more than 120 unique health plan customers whose membership totals more than 165 million. The combined organization will employ approximately 3,500 people. In addition, Axia's QuitNet smoking cessation program has more than 300,000 users.

The company said Ben Lytle, CEO of Axia, will join the Healthways board upon closing. Prior to founding Axia, Lytle was CEO of Anthem, which acquired Wellpoint to become the nation's largest health plan. In addition, other key members of Axia's senior management team will also continue with Healthways.

Healthways shares fell 26 cents to close earlier at $40.55 on the Nasdaq, and were down 15 cents in aftermarket trading on the INET exchange.

Antitrust Law's Delicate Dance (WSJ)

By Nathan Koppel

The Wall Street Journal, October 12, 2006

When does an alliance that is legal cross the line to become a collusion that is illegal?

It is a standard antitrust law question that is now being asked by lawyers who follow the private-equity industry, in the wake of news that the Justice Department is pursuing an inquiry into how private-equity firms conduct their bidding for control of public companies. Antitrust cases are often tough to make. The Justice Department, for instance, battled with Microsoft Corp. for years before reaching a settlement with the software giant in 2002. On Wall Street, these cases can be even tougher, as U.S. officials have discovered more than once.

DOJ_NMG_0079744

Unlike some industries dominated by one or two players, Wall Street is a highly competitive arena, says Keith Shugarman, an antitrust lawyer with Goodwin Procter LLP. Private equity represents only one pool of capital competing for company shares. "There is so much money out there that there is almost unlimited potential competition," says Steven Newborn, a partner at law firm Weil, Gotshal & Manges LLP. "There are so many alternative bidders" for attractive investment targets that it is hard to artificially depress prices, he says.

In the late 1990s, the Justice Department launched an investigation into whether Wall Street firms conspired to fix their commissions at 7% as part of their "underwriting" business -- the lucrative process of helping corporations issue new stock. The investigation followed a 1998 study by University of Florida professors Jay Ritter and Hsuan-Chi Chen, who found that many midmarket companies issuing stock in the mid-1990s paid the exact same fees to banks that underwrote the offerings and that those fees seemed to move in unison. By 2001, however, the Justice Department closed an investigation into whether the Wall Street firms had conspired to fix their commission and no charges were brought. "They were looking for a smoking gun, and they weren't able to find it," says Mr. Ritter.

In the mid-1990s, the government investigated securities firms, including Merrill Lynch & Co. and Goldman Sachs Group Inc., for allegedly conspiring to fix trading costs on Nasdaq Stock Market shares. The Justice Department reached a settlement with the securities firms prohibiting them from colluding in the future, but the firms weren't forced to pay fines and didn't admit or deny wrongdoing. (There was also private litigation and damages were paid.)

In the 1950s, U.S. officials alleged that 17 Wall Street firms monopolized the securities-underwriting business. The case was thrown out of federal court. Federal antitrust law typically involves a delicate dance of identifying when free-market arrangements hamper the market itself. Companies are allowed to band together for business purposes -- moves they ostensibly make to stay competitive. But issues arise when the agreements are seen as stifling competition.

The private-equity inquiry, run by the Justice Department's antitrust unit in New York, is preliminary and like other such matters, may eventually lead in a different direction or nowhere at all. Private-equity firms generally are pools of capital collected usually from wealthy investors and institutions, and used to bid for control of companies. People familiar with the matter say the Justice Department has asked relatively generic questions of a few private-equity firms about how they bid for control of the companies they pursue.

Regulators could have questions about whether private-equity firms' practices when they team up to make bids to take companies private cross the antitrust-law line. Such deals are known in the industry as "club deals." A legal issue would be whether, absent the creation of such teams, there would have been more competition that would have pushed the price of pursued companies higher.

The theory is "a company's shareholders are hurt if they don't have the full panoply of competition" in corporate auctions, says Mr. Newborn, of Weil Gotshal. The Justice Department declines to comment.

Cases typically proceed in one of two fashions, attorneys say. If the government can muster actual evidence -- such as email or witness testimony -- that firms have entered an agreement to limit competition, the government can argue a "per se" violation of the Sherman Antitrust Act, meaning that no proof of harm to shareholders is necessary. "Certain agreements are so obviously harmful to the free-market system that they are automatically condemned," says Todd Henderson, a professor at the University of Chicago School of Law.

Regulators could probe whether firms colluded by agreeing not to compete on every auction: "I'll bid on this case, and you bid on the next one," says Harry First, a professor at New York University School of Law and the former lead antitrust regulator in the New York attorney general's office. "If they find that, it is per se illegal. No fancy analysis is needed."

But antitrust cases rarely work out that way. Without smoking-gun evidence, the government would have a much tougher time. It would have to show actual economic harm, a process that involves economic analysis of prices, and the players' powers in that market.

Some economists say making such a case could be difficult. Steve Kaplan, a University of Chicago economist who follows the private-equity industry, notes that private-equity firms don't have ultimate control over the value of the companies they target. "The seller doesn't have to sell," he says. "The board can always say, 'I'm not going to sell.'"

Mr. Kaplan adds that the large deals that have attracted club bids -- such as recent bidding for companies like Harrah's Entertainment Inc. or Freescale Semiconductor Inc. -- probably wouldn't have occurred without private-equity firms teaming up, because so much capital was required. In the absence of these team bids, he notes, the share prices of target companies might have been lower. In other words, teaming up helped to raise share prices, not lower them.

Transmeta Sues Intel Over Chip Patents (WSJ)

By Don Clark

The Wall Street Journal, October 12, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO -- Transmeta Corp. sued Intel Corp., alleging that some of Intel's most popular chips violate ten Transmeta patents.

The Silicon Valley company, which filed its complaint in federal court in Delaware, says Intel's Pentium III, Pentium 4, Pentium M, Core and Core 2 lines of microprocessor chips infringe patents on feature that include controlling power consumption in computers.

Without specifying dollar figures, Transmeta said it will seek triple the damages it has suffered and an injunction against sale of the Intel products, which Transmeta Chief Executive Arthur Swift estimated had accounted for more than $100 billion in cumulative revenues over the years.

An Intel spokesman declined comment until the company has had a chance to review the complaint.

Transmeta -- based, like Intel, in Santa Clara, Calif. -- was founded in 1995 to develop chips for building portable computers with features that include long battery life and small size. After failing to gain traction for its chips, the company recently shifted its business to licensing intellectual property.

Mr. Swift said Transmeta only opted to sue after extensive licensing negotiations with Intel that failed to result in an agreement. "Discussions reached a point where we felt we really had to seek a judgment in the court," he said.

Citigroup Purchase Rocks Legg Mason (WP/BLOOM)

By Sree Vidya Bhaktavatsalam

The Washington Post, October 12, 2006

Legg Mason Inc.'s stock price tumbled 17 percent, the most ever, after it said that earnings fell short of analysts' estimates for the third straight quarter since its $3.7 billion takeover of Citigroup Inc.'s fund unit.

Legg Mason, run by chairman and chief executive Raymond A. "Chip" Mason, has been hurt by $5 billion in customer withdrawals and rising costs to sell funds since the Citigroup purchase in December. Its flagship fund, managed by William H. Miller III, is having its worst year since 1990.

"There are a lot of skeletons they are working through with the Citigroup integration," said Ryan Caldwell, an analyst at Waddell & Reed Financial Inc. of Overland Park, Kan., which owns 810,000 shares of Legg Mason. "The costs are higher than they thought, and that combined with outflows is making it exceptionally hard" to forecast earnings.

Shares of Legg Mason fell $18.16, to $87.15, the biggest drop since the Baltimore company went public in 1983. The stock price is down 36 percent since reaching $136.40 on Feb. 23, wiping out more than $6 billion in shareholder value.

The decline accelerated after Legg Mason said Tuesday that it would report profit of $138 million to $148 million (96 cents to $1.02 a share) in its fiscal second quarter, which ended Sept. 30. Analysts had estimated that the company would earn $1.16 a share, according to a survey by Thomson Financial.

Legg Mason agreed in June 2005 to swap its stock brokerage for New York-based Citigroup's fund unit, doubling its assets and putting it into the top echelon of money managers with Fidelity Investments and Vanguard Group. Investors were enthusiastic, and the stock price rose more than 50 percent by the end of the following January, a month after the acquisition was completed.

The deal, the company's biggest since Mason took over in 1962, hit turbulence in February after Legg Mason reported fiscal fourth-quarter earnings. Profits were reduced by the costs of consolidating the Citigroup unit and retaining key employees.

The company said results in the second quarter were hurt by "unanticipated" sales expenses of $12 million, which reduced earnings by 4 cents a share. The money was owed to a third-party broker for selling Citigroup funds in past quarters. Mary Athridge, a Legg Mason spokeswoman, would be more specific about the expenses.

Legg Mason is also suffering from poor investment returns by Miller's $18.7 billion Legg Mason Value Trust, its flagship equity fund. Miller's fund is at risk of trailing Standard & Poor's 500-stock index for the first time in 16 years. The fund is down 1.7 percent in 2006, compared with the S&P 500's 10 percent return, including dividends.

Miller's portfolio has been hurt by investments in Internet, health-care and home-building stocks. Four of the fund's 10-largest holdings have fallen this year, led by online retailer Amazon.com Inc., which is down 30 percent. Sprint Nextel Corp., Value Trust's largest holding as of June, is down 17 percent.

Bloomberg staff writers Danielle Kost and Matthew Keenan in Boston contributed to this report.

Firms Sweeten Offer For Harrah's, But Bid May Not Be Rich Enough (WSJ)

By Peter Sanders

The Wall Street Journal, October 12, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0079746

Private-equity bidders sweetened their offer for casino operator Harrah's Entertainment Inc., but the new bid of $83.50 a share may not be rich enough to clinch a deal, said people familiar with the matter.

Earlier this week, the Las Vegas-based company's board rejected an initial $15.1 billion buyout offer from private-equity firms Apollo Management and Texas Pacific Group. The company then received an updated offer of $83.50 a share in cash, or roughly $15.5 billion, from the two firms.

People familiar with the situation and industry observers still think the offer needs to reach $85 a share or more, 28% higher than Harrah's closing price of $66.43 on the Friday before the talks were announced. Officials from Harrah's, Texas Pacific and Apollo declined to comment.

People close to the situation say the new offer provides additional value to Harrah's holders through continuing dividend payments. Under the proposed offer now being reviewed by Harrah's special committee, the world's largest casino company would pay 40-cent-a-share dividends to shareholders five times before the deal's close. Any deal would likely take at least a year to close. People familiar with the equity firms' thinking contend that the firms believe the dividends add $2 a share in value to the bid, boosting it to $85.50. But since the company would be paying the shareholders on a regular dividend schedule, some investors don't see tremendous upside.

People close to the matter don't rule out the possibility that Apollo and Texas Pacific could soon increase the cash offer above $85 a share.

Investors were generally unenthusiastic about the increased offer, which was reported by the New York Times yesterday. Shares were down five cents to $76.34 on the New York Stock Exchange.

The initial buyout offer, disclosed by Harrah's on Oct. 2, was expected by the company. Confidentiality agreements were in place between the potential buyers and Harrah's "well before" a Sept. 15 letter was sent to state gambling regulators by a Las Vegas casino-law attorney. The attorney, Frank Schreck, said he received a waiver from Harrah's to work with the private-equity firms. A person close to the casino operator said, "There was no 'understanding' with management; the bid was unsolicited but not unwelcome."

MAN Buys At Least 5% Of Scania (WSJ)

By Jason Singer

The Wall Street Journal, October 12, 2006

Escalating the tension in an already hostile $12 billion takeover battle in the European truck industry, MAN AG of Germany tried to buy a stake of at least 5% in Scania AB of Sweden in the market, in a move that would give MAN more influence over takeover talks with Scania.

Buying through Citigroup Inc., MAN offered investors 475 Swedish kronor ($64.22) each for Scania's Class A shares. Class A shares have 10 times the voting rights of Class B shares. The price is about 6% higher than the level of MAN's cash-and-stock hostile bid for Scania launched last month. That bid is currently valued at about 448.7 Swedish kronor a share.

The move is a test by MAN to see how Scania shareholders react to an offer of a price higher than its existing takeover bid, which was rejected by Scania's board and its two main shareholders, Volkswagen AG and Swedish holding company Investor AB. The two shareholders control about two-thirds of Scania's shareholder votes.

It's also the latest of a series of moves that have pitted several of Europe's largest industrial companies against one another. MAN's bid for Scania is an effort to form the heavy-vehicle maker with the largest market share in Europe, and the world's third-largest after Volvo AB and DaimlerChrysler AG.

But in the process, the interests of Scania's corporate shareholders have clashed, creating a complex power struggle over the future of a market for commercial vehicles that is growing strongly due to increasing demand from fast-developing Eastern European economies.

If investors agree to sell their Scania shares to MAN in the latest market raid, the German company told investors it would be willing to buy more, up to as much as 16% of the company's Class A shares. The offer, made yesterday after the market closed, was left open to shareholders to consider until early this morning. It wasn't clear how many shares MAN was able to purchase yesterday, but it had achieved the minimum 5% it was seeking.

Investor explained that its rejection of the MAN bid was due to its high hopes for future Scania performance. "We estimate potential synergies in a combination of Scania and MAN to be substantially higher than the €500 million per year indicated by MAN, even when taking execution risks into consideration," Investor said.

Scania reiterated its rejection of MAN's buyout offer, adding that Volkswagen representatives on its board will continue to abstain from participating in decisions regarding MAN. Representatives of MAN couldn't be reached to comment.

DOJ_NMG_0079747

MAN has already agreed to buy a 5% stake in Scania from French car maker Renault SA, announced when MAN's hostile bid for Scania was launched. If MAN's share-buying is successful, and it forges a deal with Volkswagen, the two companies could together hold more than 50% of Scania's votes.

A Volkswagen spokeswoman declined to comment.

ENVIRONMENT:

Lawyer In BP Case Ordered To Turn Over Evidence (HC)

By Anne Belli

Houston Chronicle, October 12, 2006

Suggesting that the criminal probe into BP is gaining momentum, federal prosecutors this week issued a wide-ranging subpoena to a lawyer representing a woman whose parents died in the 2005 blast at the company's Texas City refinery, the lawyer said today.

Brent Coon of Beaumont said the U.S. attorney's office in Houston has ordered him to turn over all of the evidence he has gathered so far — dozens of depositions and hundreds of thousands of documents — in preparation for a November trial in state court.

``We have been subpoenaed to turn over all of our underlying documents," he said.

Included in those, he added, are the applications and other documents related to permits BP received from the Texas Commision on Environmental Quality to operate the equipment that ultimately exploded, killing 15 and injuring scores more.

Coon has said that those documents contain evidence that BP misled the state agency in order to win permits to operate the blowdown drum and vent stack associated with the refinery's isomerization unit.

A spokesman with the U.S. attorney's office here declined to comment, saying the agency does not confirm or deny the existence of federal probes.

``I can't comment on the purported statements of others," said John Yembrick, a spokesman for the agency.

BP spokesman Neil Chapman said the company continues to cooperate with all authorities who have been investigating the March 23, 2005, explosion.

The Justice Department began its investigation after the Occupational Safety and Health Administration in September levied a record $21.3 million fine against BP and slapped it with more than 300 violations.

Local FBI agents and investigators with the Environmental Protection Agency's environmental crimes division also are said to be heavily involved in the federal probe.

Coon represents Eva Rowe, the daughter of James and Linda Rowe, who died in the blast. Hers is the only case involving a fatality that has not settled out of court.

BP in the past 18 months has settled more than 1,000 claims against the company, Chapman said. The company has set aside $1.2 billion to pay for those claims.

Also today, Coon told state District Judge Susan Criss that BP has not turned over a critical diagram that should have been attached to one of its permit applications in 2003.

That diagram is crucial, Coon said, because BP had indicated to the TCEQ that it has installed a flare on the blowdown drum when it had not.

Federal accident investigators have said that had the equipment included a flare, the hydrocarbons that ignited and caused the fatal blast likely would have safely burned away and lives would not have been lost.

BP lawyer Jim Galbraith told Criss that BP did not have the diagram, saying: ``They have alleged we misled the state agency. We have not."

But Criss ordered the company to produce the missing diagram anyway, and to pay Coon's costs for trying to track it down.

Coon said he has spent ``hundreds of thousands of dollars" trying to obtain documents regarding BP's permiting applications.

But, more valuable than that, he said, was the judge's ruling that the jury can hold the missing document against BP at trial in November. That could be enough evidence to allow the jury to consider awarding punitive damages beyond the state-mandated cap of $750,000 plus twice actual damages, he said.

Also today, Criss ordered BP chief executive John Browne to give a deposition in the case, set to go to trial Nov. 8.

BP's Chapman said the company will appeal that ruling.

anne.belli@chron.com

DOJ_NMG_0079748

BP CEO Ordered To Give Deposition (AP)

By Juan A. Lozano, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 12, 2006

BP Chief Executive Ordered to Give Deposition Regarding Plant Explosion

GALVESTON, Texas (AP) -- BP PLC's chief executive must give a sworn deposition in a lawsuit against the company brought by a woman whose parents were among 15 people killed in the 2005 Texas City refinery explosion, a judge ruled Wednesday.

State District Judge Susan Criss said John Browne must give a deposition to attorneys representing Eva Rowe, whose parents were working inside trailers that were leveled by the blast. The case, the only one involving a fatality not settled out of court, is set to go to trial Nov. 8. Rowe's attorneys are asking for $1.2 billion in damages. BP has said it has settled 950 lawsuits related to the blast.

"We want to know what (Browne) knew about budget cuts and problems in respect to process safety management," said Arturo Gonzalez, one of Rowe's attorneys.

Criss said Browne's recent media interviews and statements to BP employees indicate he has "unique and superior" knowledge about factors that could have contributed to the explosion.

"We've got statements that were beyond the company line," Criss said in reference to Browne's remarks. "I'm not convinced he doesn't want to come here and tell the world."

A deposition is a sworn statement, often videotaped, based on an extensive interview with attorneys in a case.

Company attorney Jim Galbraith argued there was no new information in Browne's recent interviews and that statements he made during town hall meetings were intended only for BP employees. Galbraith also said the request violated an agreement between the company and Rowe's attorneys in which the CEO was only to be questioned if another BP executive referred questions to Browne.

BP spokeswoman Sarah Howell said the company would appeal the ruling.

The explosion occurred when faulty sensors did not warn of gathering vapors near the isomerization unit, which boosts the level of octane in gasoline. The vapors ignited as the unit was starting up. The blast in Texas City, about 40 miles southeast of Houston, also injured 170 people.

The U.S. Chemical Safety and Hazard Investigation Board, one of several agencies investigating the blast, concluded the unit had a history of problems and was not hooked up to a flare system that burns off vapor and could have prevented or minimized the accident

Also during Wednesday's hearing, Rowe's attorneys alleged BP misled the Texas Commission on Environmental Quality by indicating in a 2003 permit renewal application that the isomerization unit had a flare system.

Brent Coon, one of Rowe's attorneys, said the application indicated the company had a diagram of the unit that showed a flare system was attached. He said BP did not turn over the diagram.

BP's attorneys said Monday that the application was mislabeled and the document with the diagram never existed. But Wednesday they told Criss they had found a draft copy of the diagram that had never been turned over to BP or the TCEQ.

"They have alleged we misled the state agency. We have not," Galbraith said. "There is evidence we never had" the diagram.

Two BP employees, Danny White and Ruben Herrera, testified Wednesday the company never tried to misrepresent the fact that the unit had a flare system. Herrera, who used to work for the TCEQ, said he never used influence with his former employer to get the permit approved.

Criss ordered BP to produce the missing diagram and pay for costs Rowe's attorneys incurred in searching for the document. Criss also issued a sanction against BP in which the jury could hold the missing document against the company.

Howell said BP would review the ruling on the missing document and decide whether to appeal.

Rowe's lawyers also said the U.S. Attorney's Office has issued them a subpoena asking for all documents gathered in their lawsuit. The Justice Department is not commenting on its investigation.

Renewable Energy Meeting Kicks Off With Ethanol Criticism (DJ)

By Maya Jackson Randall

Dow Jones Newswire, October 11, 2006

WASHINGTON (Dow Jones)--A national renewable energy conference has just gotten underway and already one renewable fuel is being criticized.

DOJ_NMG_0079749

Most speakers at the government-sponsored conference in St. Louis this week will likely have positive things to say about E-85, a biofuel made up mostly (85%) of ethanol, which can be produced from crops like corn.

Only 15% of E-85 is traditional gasoline produced from crude oil, which is why the fuel is seen as a way to help reduce U.S. oil consumption and the country's dependence on foreign energy.

But the head of large oil and natural gas industry group American Petroleum Institute, or API, criticized E-85 in a speech Wednesday morning, calling it costly and inefficient, and urged federal and state policy-makers against using mandates to promote its use.

Speaking at the St. Louis conference, co-hosted by the U.S. Department of Energy and the U.S. Department of Agriculture, API President Red Cavaney's E-85 swipes come just as federal and state lawmakers have touted the biofuel as a way to boost rural America, where corn for ethanol is largely grown.

Senate Finance Committee Chairman Richard Lugar recently suggested a need for all new cars sold in the U.S. to be be able to run on E-85. Arguing that oil companies are refusing to install E-85 pumps that will give consumers greater access to the alternative fuel, the Indiana Republican also suggested the need for legislation that would force oil firms to spend some of their profits on installing E-85 pumps in at least 25% of the nation's gasoline stations within 10 years.

Meanwhile, President George W. Bush, who is scheduled to speak at the renewable energy conference later this week, recently told the Wall Street Journal that he wants to spend the remainder of his term focusing on ways to address ethanol-related transportation issues. The president has said the U.S. is addicted to oil and that using ethanol is one way to ease that dependence.

Arguments Over Value

Cavaney painted a dismal picture of E-85, arguing that regular gasoline, which already contains up to 10% ethanol, is better for consumers than E-85.

"It seems obvious that ethanol is a better value for most consumers as a gasoline additive than as E-85," he said, arguing that ethanol prices on a volume basis have been higher than gasoline prices for the better part of the last two-and-a-half years.

Cavaney warned state lawmakers against adopting regulations that would require a set amount of ethanol to be blended in gasoline, saying E-85 has serious downsides for consumers. Because ethanol cannot be shipped by pipeline, mandates that vary by state could lead to volatile prices and make it harder for areas to get adequate motor fuel supplies during disasters or times of abnormally high demand, he said.

"A national emphasis on increasing ethanol volumes through E-85 can prove unnecessarily expensive and risky," said Cavaney. "If we are to encourage more long-term use of ethanol, we need to avoid surprising consumers with unanticipated problems."

Consumers will go farther on a gallon of regular gasoline than on a gallon of E-85, the API president said. Pointing to findings in a recent Consumer Reports article, Cavaney said cars that can run on E-85 incur a 25% to 30% fuel mileage penalty.

"Interested consumers need to be aware of these facts before they make their purchase decisions," he said. He added that vehicles that can run on E-85 comprise only 2.6% of the U.S. light-duty vehicle fleet. That number is likely to jump only to 6.5% in about two decades, he said.

Cavaney said the oil industry is not opposed to ethanol and supports the Renewable Fuels Standard that Congress passed last year. The standard requires 4 billion gallons of ethanol to be blended into gasoline in 2006 to produce a cleaner-burning fuel.

The St. Louis energy conference, "Advancing Renewable Energy: An American Rural Renaissance," which runs Wednesday and Thursday, focuses on ways to promote President Bush's renewable energy goals. The conference follows the president's State of the Union pledge to replace more than 75% of Middle East oil imports by 2025 through greater use of clean coal and hydrogen technologies, as well as ethanol, and wind and solar power.

Execs Tout Renewable Fuels At Conference (AP)

By Cheryl Wittenauer

AP, October 12, 2006

ST. LOUIS (AP) -- A century ago, Henry Ford's Model T was the first flexible-fuel vehicle, running on gas, ethanol or both, and the automaker foretold the future when he said fuel could be gotten from fruit, weeds, sawdust or anything else that could be fermented.

The story, as told by Archer Daniels Midland's CEO Patricia Woertz, resonated with her audience at a national renewable energy conference here Wednesday.

Woertz, formerly head of refining at Chevron, now heads the Decatur, Ill.,-based agricultural company that is also the biggest ethanol producer in the U.S.

Count her among the converted.

DOJ_NMG_0079750

"We believe we are just at the start of this new era of bioenergy," she said, acknowledging ADM began building toward that start 30 years ago. "We believe the market can and should grow larger."

Woertz was among dozens of speakers representing business, financing, government and research at the conference co-hosted by the U.S. departments of energy and agriculture. President Bush is scheduled to address the conference Thursday.

One speaker after another touted renewable fuels as the new frontier, a revolution in the making that will wean the U.S. from its foreign oil addiction, create a new economy for rural America, and decrease greenhouse gas emissions.

Ethanol, a clear, colorless fuel made from corn, is what most often comes to mind when considering alternative fuels.

Six years ago, 54 ethanol plants produced 2 billion gallons a year. Today, 100 plants produce 5 billion gallons a year, and 44 plants are on the way, Agriculture Secretary Mike Johanns said.

Biodiesel made from animal fat and vegetable oil also has caught on. National Biodiesel Board chief executive officer Joseph Jobe said the industry is doubling or tripling production every day. Quality fuel, that is, not French fry oil right out of the restaurant fryer, he said.

DaimlerChrysler announced Tuesday that 2007 Dodge Rams made in St. Louis will be "factory filled" with B5 biodiesel, or 5 percent biodiesel fuel, to help stimulate the market.

Jobe said his board recently launched a toll-free number truckers may call to get the name and location of the nearest biodiesel truck stop. Truckers, a "patriotic lot," also support family farms, Jobe said.

Ten biodiesel plants in 2000 have grown to 86 today, with 78 on line.

Robert Lane, chairman and chief executive officer of Deere & Co., based in Moline, Ill., said the company has formed the John Deere Wind Energy Group to help farmers harvest wind. Deere has wind energy projects in Missouri, Texas, Minnesota and is looking at other states. It provides the capital and the glue to get the projects off the ground.

"Our goal," Lane said, "is to foster competitive renewable energy businesses. The U.S. can be a leader. It has reliable wind sources, capital and entrepreneurial spirit."

Johanns said the potential for renewable fuels has never been greater and predicted the day when biomass such as wood chips, pecan shells, corn stalks, switchgrass and animal waste would replace petroleum products as America's fuel source.

"We want to buy our energy by the bushel, not the barrel," he said.

Johanns and Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman on Wednesday announced nearly $17.5 million for 17 biomass research, development and demonstration projects.

Bodman said the Energy Department sponsors research at two bioenergy research centers, which are trying to crack the technical barriers to biofuels. They are looking to convert inedible agricultural plants into ethanol and convert sunlight into fuel.

"There are lots of fresh ideas out there, and we're excited about all of them," he said.

The American Petroleum Institute's president, Red Cavaney, said it's not true that renewable fuels are a thorn in the side of the petroleum industry.

"We're experiencing demand in the global energy market," he said. "As we look forward to the next 20 to 30 years, we're going to need all the energy we can use that is economically viable. Ethanol, crude oil, biodiesel. It all has a bright future."

Talkin' Energy At The Energy Conference (SLPD)

By Jeffrey Tomich

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, October 12, 2006

When conceived earlier this year, the goal of the first national renewable energy conference was clear: Government officials, corporate executives and investors would assemble under a single roof and discuss ways to advance development of an emerging industry.

The first day of the two-day conference in St. Louis seemed to accomplish that. Yet comments from two of the most colorful speakers also highlighted the sharp divide over E85, the corn-based gasoline substitute that proponents think could curb America's "oil addiction."

Vinod Khosla, the co-founder of Sun Microsystems Inc. who now runs a Silicon Valley-based firm that invests in renewable energy, said big oil is spending millions of dollars to spread "misinformation" about ethanol to stunt the growth of biofuels.

"Their considerable clout is directed at making sure this doesn't happen as quickly or doesn't happen at all," Khosla said later at a news conference.

Khosla is co-chairing a ballot initiative in California to establish an oil extraction tax, an effort to raise $4 billion to fund alternative energy and efficiency initiatives. The oil industry has spent $57 million to defeat it, he said.

The criticism came just minutes after Red Cavaney, head of the American Petroleum Institute , told the same audience that the oil industry "isn't opposed to ethanol" or trying to discourage its use.

DOJ_NMG_0079751

"Ethanol is here to stay and it is a very important part of our gasoline supply pool," Cavaney told a packed hall at America's Center. But, "we believe in allowing market forces and consumer preferences to determine where and how ethanol is consumed."

Rushing E85 to the mass market too quickly is risky, especially for independent gas station owners faced with investing thousands of dollars to convert pumps to sell the fuel, Cavaney said. And missteps could sour consumers on ethanol in the same way that automakers soured a generation of Americans on diesel-powered cars, he said.

Cavaney warned that a patchwork of state ethanol mandates could lead to more volatility in ethanol prices and spot shortages.

Khosla, meanwhile, said he envisions a time within three years that every Wal-Mart store in the U.S. sells E85 for less than $2 a gallon.

Appropriate policy changes and signals they would send to investors, Khosla said, make it possible for the U.S. to replace all of the oil it imports for gasoline with ethanol, a move that could put a state like South Dakota on par with Iran and Saudi Arabia as a transportation fuel supplier.

Other government and industry officials, including Archer Daniels Midland Co. Chief Executive Patricia Woertz and Agriculture Secretary Mike Johanns, were less outspoken. Still, they spoke passionately about the need for renewable fuels.

Energy Secretary Samuel W. Bodman said federal funding for renewable energy research appropriated in last year's energy bill and subsidies in place to encourage ethanol production are doing what they were intended, helping attract millions of dollars in investment.

"There is no doubt that there are plenty of incentives in place right now," Bodman said in an interview with the Post-Dispatch. The secretary would like to see automakers continue to produce more cars, trucks and SUVs capable of running on E85, but said the government doesn't mandate it.

Bodman said development of so-called cellulosic ethanol -- fuel made from wood chips, corn stalks or switch grass -- is probably "several years off," and could only be viable when production costs, now about $2.20 a gallon, are cut in half to match the costs of making corn ethanol.

"The goal is to have a relatively large number of small ethanol producers operating all over the country and therefore reduce the issue of production and distribution," he said.

Big Oil Fine With Ethanol As Additive (FWST)

By Dan Piller

The Fort Worth Star-Telegram, October 12, 2006

ST. LOUIS — Big Oil supports corn-based ethanol as a gasoline additive but opposes efforts to mandate greater use of ethanol through so-called E85 motor fuel, the head of a trade group representing major oil and gas producers said Wednesday.

“Some industry critics erroneously claim that our industry is opposed to ethanol and is doing all it can to discourage its use. Nothing is further from the truth,” Red Cavaney, president of the American Petroleum Institute, told a conference on renewable fuels co-sponsored by the U.S. Agriculture and Energy departments.

But Cavaney, whose organization includes heavyweights like Exxon Mobil, Chevron and ConocoPhillips, said new fuel sources should not be pushed at the expense of others.

“We do not have the luxury of limiting ourselves to only a few sources of energy supply to the exclusion of others,” he said. “Nor should our leading sources of energy, oil and natural gas be written off before we have found cost-competitive and readily available alternatives.”

He reiterated figures from the Energy Information Agency that highlight America’s dependence on foreign energy sources.

“Oil and natural gas will provide nearly two-thirds of U.S. energy consumption to the year 2030, including more than 90 percent of motor-fuel consumption,” Cavaney said.

He said political efforts by some ethanol-producing Midwestern states to mandate use of E85, an 85 percent ethanol gasoline blend, “can prove unnecessarily expensive and risky.”

He pointed to recent government reports that ethanol has only about 70 percent of the fuel power of gasoline and that relatively few U.S. motor vehicles can use E85.

“If we are to encourage more long-term use of ethanol, we need to avoid surprising consumers with unanticipated problems,” Cavaney said.

Corn-based ethanol has emerged as the renewable fuel of choice this year, primarily because of a government-ordered switch away from MTBE — now discredited because of its toxicity — as an environmentally friendly extender.

Ethanol consumption will amount to about 4.6 billion gallons this year, compared with 140 billion gallons of gasoline.

But ethanol, blended mostly at 10 percent a gallon, is now part of 46 percent of all gasoline sold in the United States.

DOJ_NMG_0079752

The surge in ethanol demand has led to the construction of more than 100 processing plants in Nebraska, Iowa, Illinois, Minnesota and the Dakotas. To allay fears that the rising demand for corn will put pressure on food prices, scientists are working on ways to convert so-called cellulosic biomass — primarily cornstalks and switch grass, as well as wood chips, into fuel.

"The time for renewable energy clearly has come," U.S. Agriculture Secretary Mike Johanns told the crowd gathered at the St. Louis convention center. "We are looking toward the day when the U.S. buys fuel not by the gallon but by the bushel."

Johanns said that ethanol will remain economically competitive as long as crude-oil prices stay above $30 a barrel, roughly half of where it has traded in recent weeks. He also said ethanol is profitable even without the 51-cent per gallon federal tax subsidy in place through 2010.

Johanns and U.S. Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman spoke Wednesday as part of the Bush administration's effort to associate itself with politically popular renewable fuels.

The president, who kicked off much of the interest in renewable fuels when he lambasted America's "addiction" to oil in his State of the Union address in January, will visit the two-day meeting for a luncheon speech today.

The profit potential for renewable fuels isn't lost on some of the mainstay industries in the Corn Belt. Speakers Wednesday included the chief executives of Illinois-based Archer Daniels Midland Co., a leading grain processor and ethanol producer, and of the venerable farm-implement maker Deere & Co.

"There is still a nagging fear that the current interest in renewable fuels is a product of the recent rise in the price of gasoline or just the political power of the Midwest," said Robert Lane, Deere's chief executive. "We must build sustainable, profitable businesses in renewable energy."

Archer Daniels Midland CEO Patricia Woertz said: "We must not let cynics dim our vision."

Emboldened States Take Charge Of Energy Issues (WSJ)

By Rebecca Smith

The Wall Street Journal, October 12, 2006

State officials are asserting more control over their energy destinies, intervening to block or delay utility mergers that don't promise enough consumer benefit and challenging the electricity deregulation that has been fostered by the federal government in recent years.

In some states, these efforts could result in smaller electricity bill increases, at least in the short run. Some costs simply would be deferred to future years. The efforts also could prolong supply-and-demand imbalances and burden the nation's electricity system with different rules and market practices, making it more complicated and less efficient.

Touching on parts of the energy business once seen as beyond state reach, the heightened state activism is especially pronounced where important pocketbook or environmental issues are at stake. State officials are especially fearful of political fallout stemming from high electricity rates and disenchantment over the unmet promises of electric-industry deregulation.

"The states are the ones in charge of the process now," says Richard Kelly, chairman and chief executive of Xcel Energy Inc., a Minneapolis energy company. Mr. Kelly says his company, which owns utilities in eight states, doesn't expect to grow through utility acquisitions in part because "it's hard to conceive of a merger we can get through all eight states."

In New Jersey, state officials last month effectively blocked Chicago-based Exelon Corp.'s proposed $17.7 billion purchase of Public Service Enterprise Group Inc. amid fears the combination could increase Exelon's market power and harm New Jersey consumers. In Maryland, public opposition to a pending rate increase at Baltimore Gas & Electric has threatened to unhinge the $11 billion purchase of parent company Constellation Energy Group Inc. by FPL Group Inc. Speaking to investors recently, FPL Chairman Lewis Hay III said he has "limited patience" left and implied he may walk away from the deal.

Duke Energy Corp. acquired Cinergy Corp. after garnering approvals from five states in about five months. But "people have to earn the right to do deals," says James E. Rogers, chief executive of Duke Energy. He cautions that if a utility already is facing rising rates, "it's probably a bad time" to propose a transaction.

California, meanwhile, has methodically regained control of its energy destiny. It permits utilities to build new plants and it drastically has reduced the volume of business conducted through federally administered electricity markets. Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger signed a law in late September to cut carbon-dioxide emissions to 1990 levels by 2010, a reaction to federal inaction on that front.

Sensing the states' increased activism, federal energy officials are expressing more sensitivity to states' rights than in the past. Joseph Kelliher, chairman of the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission, says working with states "isn't just a matter of good manners but is necessary" since authority is divided between federal and state bodies. Still, he argues that there always have been federal-state dustups.

Much of the current commotion is caused by the fact wholesale electricity markets haven't developed the way people expected. Deep, liquid wholesale markets -- overseen by federal regulators -- were expected to give big suppliers good places to shop by attracting numerous power providers. Retail customers, it was thought, would buy juice from those big suppliers, bypassing their local utilities. Instead, wholesale markets contracted after 2001 and millions of consumers remained customers of their local utilities because they didn't have good alternatives.

DOJ_NMG_0079753

More than 99% of residential and small-business consumers in the Boston area, for example, still get their electricity from Nstar -- the utility formerly known as Boston Edison -- because they have no other choice. Prices have risen 78% since 2002, to 11.4 cents a kilowatt hour from 6.4 cents, but the increase hasn't caused political fallout because it has been gradual.

States are left to create new ways for utilities to obtain power since many have sold their plants or transferred them to affiliates. Illinois state officials conducted their own electricity auction in early September that will result in rate increases of 22% to 55% early next year at its biggest utilities, unless increases are postponed. Elected officials now are talking about freezing electricity rates for three years at Ameren Corp.'s three utilities and Exelon's Commonwealth Edison unit in Chicago. In a reference to the 1773 Boston Tea Party, Lt. Gov. Pat Quinn, who is up for re-election with Gov. Rod Blagojevich, is urging consumers to send tea bags or email look-alikes, in effect blaming them for higher prices. The utilities have their own proposals, which would allow small increases and protect their creditworthiness.

US Pandemic Flu Plan: Hole Up At Home (AP)

By Marilynn Marchione

AP, October 12, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO -- Could you work from home for weeks at a time? How long could you hole up without needing to go to the grocery or drugstore? Would you be willing to wear a face mask and isolate yourself from others?

Harvard researchers are surveying Americans on questions like these as the government wraps up work on a plan to use primitive infection-control measures to deal with a killer flu outbreak until drugs and vaccine become available.

The federal Centers for Disease Control and Prevention is pitching the plan at medical meetings and aims to send it out for review by the end of the year. State and local governments have asked for unusually detailed and specific advice on such matters as closing schools and canceling public events, one CDC official said.

This week, CDC awarded $5.2 million in grants related to the plan, including research on whether to recommend face masks to the public. CDC also asked the Institute of Medicine, a group of scientific advisers, to meet on these measures later this month.

"We can't afford to neglect some of the traditional approaches to contagion control because we very well may find ourselves in a situation where that's all we've got for a period of time," said CDC's quarantine chief, Dr. Marty Cetron.

However, skeptics say parts of the plan amount to wishful thinking with little evidence they would work.

"A lot of these things sound good but they lack practical application," said Michael Osterholm, a University of Minnesota health expert involved in the planning.

Advising people in big office buildings to avoid elevators and stay 6 feet away from each other is impractical, and people can't stay in their homes for weeks or months without needing insulin and other medications, he noted.

The nationwide survey by the Harvard School of Public Health is an attempt to get a handle on how Americans would follow such advice.

As for hygiene tips like sneezing into your sleeve, "we have no data that that makes any difference" in controlling a pandemic, Osterholm said.

The bird flu that has ravaged poultry in Asia and killed at least 140 people is "still smoldering" as a human threat, showing no signs yet of morphing into one that spreads easily among people, said Dr. Anthony Fauci, director of the National Institute of Allergy and Infectious Diseases.

If it does, severe travel restrictions would delay its spread in the United States by only a week or two and at extreme cost, the CDC's Dr. David Bell said at a recent meeting of public health and disease experts in San Francisco.

Thermal scanning to try to detect people with fevers during the SARS outbreak turned up no cases and caused many false alarms. But voluntary quarantine, voluntary isolation of infected people and hygiene measures like hand washing, "cough etiquette" and face masks did help and might for flu, too, Bell said.

Dr. Frederick Hayden, a University of Virginia virologist currently working on global flu planning for the World Health Organization, agreed.

"The classic public health measures did work in SARS," he said. They won't be enough to stop a flu pandemic but could prolong and spread out its impact to prevent hospitals from being swamped and running out of respirators to keep the sickest alive.

The CDC plan will list multiple scenarios for pandemics that range in severity or attack certain age groups like children or college students, and recommend corresponding control measures.

DOJ_NMG_0079754

These will include voluntary isolation of sick people, voluntary quarantine for those exposed to the germ but are not ill, and protective sequestration to separate healthy people or communities from a source of infection.

"Quarantine has gotten a very bad name and for very good reason. It has been abused in the past. It works best when we obtain and maintain the public trust," Bell said.

However, Osterholm said there's not enough science to recommend some measures, like "keep your distance" campaigns. Scientists know flu spreads through hand contact and big droplets when people cough or sneeze, but they don't know how far tiny particles remain in the air, or how important that is for spreading the germ.

In fact, experts know surprisingly little about what enables a flu germ to spread.

Health officials need to give advice but should be honest about the limits of what is known "and not oversell it, which there is a tendency to do in times of crisis," Osterholm said.

If that happens, "we will lose credibility quickly," he said.

Mulch Madness (opinion) (NYT)

By Steve Fleischli

The New York Times, October 12, 2006

TOWERING cypress once covered much of southern Louisiana — 1,000-year-old trees darkened ancient, moss-laden, water-saturated forests. These wetlands not only gave the bayou its flavor, its culture and its mystery, they also acted as critical natural “speed bumps” for major storms.

It’s been estimated that every 2.7 square miles of wetlands reduces storm surge by a foot, and yet over the last century Louisiana has stripped away 1,900 square miles of swamp, an area the size of Delaware. Evidence shows that such improper land management, reducing the cypress-tupelo swamps to a small fraction of their original grandeur, worsened flooding in New Orleans during Hurricanes Katrina and Rita.

Yet at a time when the nation should be investing billions to restore the Gulf Coast’s wetlands for protection against future storms, these cypress swamps continue to face many challenges, including development, saltwater flowing in and rising water levels. The most dangerous threat of all, however, may be garden mulch — the stuff that gardeners usually use to protect their plants.

As they exhaust the cypress forests along Florida’s coast, mulch companies are moving into Louisiana with shady operators among them grinding up entire cypress forests, 70 percent to 80 percent of which will never grow back. This is hurricane protection lost forever — habitat and flood control converted to quick cash, one bag of mulch at a time.

The Environmental Protection Agency has finally begun to require permits for logging in southern Louisiana, which has still not stopped the wholesale clear-cutting of cypress forests.

The situation was further exacerbated by a Supreme Court ruling this summer ordering government agencies and lower courts to undertake a painstaking, case-by-case analysis of waterways, with only those wetlands determined to be of special significance afforded federal protection. It’s a move that could effectively stymie preservation efforts.

So in the meantime, the safety of our nation’s already depleted wetlands comes down to sellers and consumers of cypress mulch.

Big mulch retailers — like Lowe’s, Home Depot and Wal-Mart — have been slow to take real action about the mulch in their stores. But all three companies should put into place formal, meaningful policies that guarantee their cypress mulch comes from sustainable sources rather than the imperiled swamps of the Gulf Coast. Many retailers have done so with lumber and they can do it for cypress mulch.

Until then, consumers would do best to avoid cypress mulch altogether, switching instead to mulches made from pine bark, pine needles or straw. These work just as well and do not have the same environmental impact.

Already, several Florida municipalities, after witnessing the destruction of their wetlands, have banned the use of cypress mulches. In Louisiana, Gov. Kathleen Blanco is exploring her authority to carry out a broader moratorium.

Consumers need to remember that their mulch purchases may be leaving New Orleans and other coastal communities vulnerable. Every bag of cypress mulch for you could mean another sandbag for someone else.

Maryland's Environment (WP)

The Washington Post, October 12, 2006

AS A CANDIDATE four years ago, Maryland Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. made no bones about his pro-business tilt, which led plenty of environmentalists to fear the worst from his Republican administration. In fact Mr. Ehrlich's record on the environment is a mixed bag -- good on the Chesapeake Bay, poor on land conservation and so-so on air pollution.

DOJ_NMG_0079755

Mr. Ehrlich deserves unalloyed credit for the creative Chesapeake Bay Restoration Act of 2004. The law -- by means of a $30 annual fee charged to households for sewer and septic use -- finances sewage plant upgrades to dramatically reduce harmful nutrients discharged into waterways. It's smart policy that over time should sharply reduce nitrogen pollution in the bay.

Mr. Ehrlich's record on land conservation is more checkered. For decades Maryland has set aside a dedicated funding source (a portion of the real estate transfer tax) to pay for the purchase of pristine tracts. From the outset, Mr. Ehrlich was unenthusiastic. Faced with a daunting budget shortfall, he raided the state's land-buying kitty, in effect converting money set aside for conservation into general fund revenue. Previous governors had done the same, but not to this extent. Mr. Ehrlich added to the impression that he cared little for land conservation with his abortive attempt two years ago to sell off more than 800 acres of forested, state-owned land to a politically well-connected developer in St. Mary's County; media exposure killed that deal. He has pledged to keep his hands off the land conservation fund if he is reelected.

On air pollution, Maryland is probably better off today than when the governor took office. This year he signed the Healthy Air Act, which will force the state's largest coal-fired power plants to cut toxic emissions. But Mr. Ehrlich had to be dragged into doing the right thing, having helped kill a similar measure in the legislature last year. In the end, it was probably the exigencies of electoral politics and federal standards that led him to sign the 2006 version of the bill -- especially after lawmakers defied him by adding modest limits on carbon dioxide emissions, which scientists consider a major cause of global warming and rising sea levels.

Mr. Ehrlich's Democratic rival, Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley, must be judged more by his words than his deeds, having faced a comparatively narrow range of environmental issues. He says he would fully fund land conservation, commit himself to the clean air bill signed by Mr. Ehrlich and strictly monitor progress in cleaning up the Chesapeake Bay. He seems less ambivalent about protecting the state's natural resources than Mr. Ehrlich does, but there's not much of a track record by which to predict his actions in the governor's office.

Foolish Vaccine Exemptions (NYT)

The New York Times, October 12, 2006

States that make it easy for parents to opt out of vaccinating their children are suffering increased disease rates as a consequence, according to an article published yesterday in The Journal of the American Medical Association. The findings should be a warning to all parents and state officials who think they can let their guards down on immunizations that are needed to protect both the children and the communities in which they live.

We saw what happened in Indiana last year when measles broke out among children who had been schooled at home and thus avoided the compulsory shots required of those who attend public schools. At least 34 people became ill, of whom three were hospitalized, one with life-threatening complications. Their families had succumbed to fears that the vaccine was dangerous, forgetting that the disease itself was the real danger.

Now the new article by researchers at Johns Hopkins University, the University of Florida and the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention has taken a broad look at the rates of whooping cough in the 48 states that allow people to be exempted from required shots for various nonmedical reasons. All 48 of the states allow exemptions based on religious objections, but 19 of them also allow exemptions based on philosophical or other personal beliefs. Some states make it easy for parents to claim an exemption by simply signing a prewritten statement on the school immunization form. Others make it harder by requiring a signature from a local health official, a personally written letter, notarization or annual renewal.

Sadly, states that readily grant exemptions or allow personal belief exemptions have about 50 percent higher rates of whooping cough, or pertussis, compared with stricter states, after adjusting for demographics. This is disturbing given that pertussis, which can cause severe illness and death in young children, has been on the rise in recent decades.

The pendulum has swung too far toward letting parents opt out. States need to work harder at educating parents about the value of vaccination and should get tougher in granting exemptions.

Bad Salad (WP)

The Washington Post, October 12, 2006

LAST MONTH'S spinach scare has been followed by a string of recalls and warnings about produce contaminated with E. coli bacteria. Just last week, a lettuce company announced a recall of its product after it found high levels of E. coli in irrigation water. Yet government regulators and the companies that grew the produce still don't know how the bacteria got to the crops. In fact, according to the Food and Drug Administration, no one has pinpointed a source for any of the 20 or so known cases of E. coli contamination in produce since 1995.

About half of those cases, including the latest spinach scare, were traced to California's Salinas Valley. But Caroline Smith DeWaal, director of food safety at the Center for Science in the Public Interest, says investigators have no fewer than three theories about where the E. coli came from: manure used during planting, floodwater contaminated with waste from livestock or aquifers containing treated sewage.

DOJ_NMG_0079756

If regulators don't know how the E. coli contamination occurred, what can they do to make salad safe? First, Congress should provide money to increase inspection staffing at the FDA, which regulates spinach, lettuce and other produce but inspects farms and packaging plants infrequently. Next, lawmakers should require the FDA and other agencies responsible for food safety to institute a tracing system for food produced in the United States -- so that containing the next outbreak will take a few days, not two weeks. Congress should also consider giving the FDA the power to issue mandatory recalls of tainted produce, which would introduce a more powerful incentive for growers and packers to conform to safety standards.

Sen. Richard Durbin (D-Ill.) and Rep. Rosa L. DeLauro (D-Conn.) have introduced legislation to require food producers to code their products for tracing purposes before sending them to market. The bill also calls for the creation of a federal agency with responsibility for monitoring the safety of all foods, a non-starter in the current Congress and a less valuable reform than other, more modest measures. For now, Congress should focus on giving existing agencies the resources and authority they need.

Doubting Inhofe (NYT)

The New York Times, October 12, 2006

In a recent speech in the Senate, James Inhofe of Oklahoma called himself "the senator who has spent more time educating about the actual facts about global warming." Too bad he is not the senator who has spent more time educating himself.

His speech, one in a series on global warming, was a brisk survey of the way the news media have covered climatic predictions over the past century. Cooling, warming — we never get it right. Naturally, Mr. Inhofe dismisses what he calls media "hysteria," which is also a way of dismissing not just Al Gore but the consensus among mainstream scientists and the governments of nearly every industrialized nation concerning manmade climate change.

Mr. Inhofe is particularly hard on James Hansen, whom he calls a "NASA scientist and alarmist." Mr. Hansen is a timely target, since he is co-author of a new climatological report in The Proceedings of the National Academy of Sciences. The report concludes that because of rapid warming in the past 30 years, the earth is approaching and will soon surpass the warmest temperatures in the past 12,000 years — since the end of the last ice age, in other words. And, as the study notes, recent warming "has brought global temperature to a level within about one degree Celsius of the maximum temperature of the past million years." The shift in temperature isn't uniform. Higher latitudes are warming faster, as are the Indian and western Pacific Oceans.

We do not expect Mr. Inhofe to see the light — or feel the heat — any time soon. He and his staff are serious collectors of opposition research. But the essence of his strategy is to seize upon a mistaken or overblown story to try to undermine the broad consensus. If that fails, he can always question his opponents' politics and motives, as with his insinuations that environmentalists dreamed the whole thing up to scare people and raise money.

Mr. Inhofe has buttressed himself with a small jury of scientists who argue that climate change is only natural. But he has really buttressed himself with the will to disbelieve. He accuses scientists and the media of hysteria. But if there is such a thing as a hysteria of doubt, then Mr. Inhofe is its master.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Ex-ATF Chief Had Staff Give Homework Aid (AP-Y)

By Lara Jakes Jordan

AP-Yahoo, October 12, 2006

The man who recently departed as director of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives ordered his staff to help with his nephew's high school homework, wasting the agency's time and violating ethics rules, an inquiry found Wednesday.

The nephew's project — a documentary about the ATF that took 10 months to complete — was one of a half-dozen examples of lapses in judgment Carl J. Truscott committed before he resigned in August, says the report by Justice Department Inspector General Glenn A. Fine.

The report found that only the high school project demonstrated mismanagement by Truscott, whose employees accused him of wasting federal funds, taking costly trips and creating a hostile work environment.

Still, investigators described themselves as troubled by Truscott's leadership, hiring practices and financial decisions, including his plan to spend $100,000 on gym equipment for the ATF's new headquarters.

DOJ_NMG_0079757

The most damning conclusions were saved for the homework episode.

"Significant ATF resources were used to assist Truscott's nephew on a high school project," the report found. "By directing and authorizing the use of ATF resources in his nephew's high school class project, we believe that Truscott violated several ethical regulations."

An estimated 20 ATF employees were pulled in to help with the documentary, spending dozens of hours on research, pulling film footage from the agency's library and setting up interviews with Truscott and other officials in Washington and Philadelphia.

The nephew received an 'A' on the project, the report noted.

Moreover, the report found, Truscott "failed to fully accept responsibility for the project by minimizing the extent of ATF resources that were committed to it" and tried to justify his staff's help as a form of community outreach.

Truscott could not be reached for comment Wednesday. But in a Sept. 25 letter to Fine, responding to a draft copy of the report, Truscott acknowledged that he should have placed appropriate limits on the resources that could be used in support of the project."

In his letter, Truscott also lashed back at the critical report, which he called negative in tone and based on allegations from anonymous sources who second-guessed his judgment.

Fine opened the investigation after he and Special Counsel Scott J. Bloch received an anonymous letter dated Jan. 20, 2006.

It contended that Truscott had horribly mismanaged federal dollars in a variety of ways, including demanding a larger security detail than needed, making unnecessary upgrades to the new ATF headquarters building project, and taking expensive trips to London, New York City, Boston, and Ottawa on the agency's bill. The letter also complained that Truscott created a hostile work environment by directing two staffers to serve lunch to him and his guests.

Fine's investigation substantiated the charges and chided Truscott for poor judgment, but it added, "We did not find that these financial decisions constituted misconduct."

A person close to the investigation, who spoke on condition of anonymity, said Wednesday the allegations may have been made by Truscott's top deputies, who were facing reassignment as part of an agency reorganization.

E-mails dated Jan. 15 — five days before the anonymous letter was sent to Fine — show Truscott telling ATF Deputy Director Edgar Domenech the changes would come "as early as this week."

Fine received another anonymous letter Sept. 22 from a group that described itself as concerned ATF employees. The group argued that three ATF assistant directors also were mismanaging agency funds by commuting to work in government-owned cars, promoting relatives and arranging weeklong conferences for employees at resorts like the Hard Rock Casino in Los Vegas.

It was not immediately clear whether Fine's office was investigating the newest allegations.

Audit Critical Of Former ATF Director's Expenditures (USAT)

By Kevin Johnson

USA Today, October 12, 2006

WASHINGTON — As director of the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms and Explosives, Carl Truscott ordered lavish upgrades to the agency's new headquarters and had about 20 bureau employees help his nephew complete a high school video, according to a Justice Department audit released Wednesday.

The 150-page review by the department's Office of Inspector General offered a critical account of Truscott's two-year tenure, which ended when he resigned in August amid questions about his spending of agency funds. The report concluded that the former director contributed to a “drain” of manpower and funds at ATF.

It noted that Truscott, a former assistant director of the U.S. Secret Service, often traveled with an entourage that included an excessive number of ATF employees and a personal medic.

The report found Truscott ordered extravagant woodwork and other “unnecessary amenities” for the director's suite in the ATF's new building in Northeast Washington, which is still under construction and several million dollars over its $120 million budget.

The report also said the 10-month video project that ATF workers helped Truscott's nephew complete required “substantial employee time.” The report concluded that by authorizing the use of ATF resources for the video, Truscott violated “various ethics regulations.” The nephew received an “A” on the project.

Auditors also indicated that Truscott would not take responsibility for his budget decisions.

DOJ_NMG_0079758

"From relatively minor issues, such as decisions on how to furnish the director's suite in the new headquarters building, to major policy directives … Truscott attempted to deflect responsibility to his subordinates, misrepresented the amount of involvement he had in the actions or otherwise sought to distance himself from his own decisions," the report said.

"We found several instances where Truscott's statements to us about his conduct were contradicted by numerous other witnesses, and in some instances, by documents as well."

In a strongly worded rebuttal, Truscott said the inspector general was unable to substantiate "a single allegation relating to administrative misconduct."

He rejected the findings as "negative in tone" and said the report "impugns my character and integrity without basis."

The review of Truscott was triggered by allegations contained in an anonymous letter to the Justice Department's inspector general that was dated Jan. 20.

According to Wednesday's report, the complaint alleged that the director had participated in "egregious acts of gross mismanagement of public funds and failures of leadership."

Truscott dismissed the allegations as accusations from unidentified sources who "likely were resistant to my status as an outsider from another rival federal law enforcement agency and my efforts at necessary change."

Wednesday's report said that auditors had "substantiated various allegations" raised in the letter.

It said that although Truscott had "exercised poor fiscal judgment in many cases," his financial decisions did not amount to official misconduct.

Report Criticizes Ex-ATF Chief (WP)

By Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, October 12, 2006

The former director of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives violated ethics rules by requiring 20 employees to help his teenage nephew prepare a high school video project, part of a wide-ranging pattern of questionable expenditures on a new ATF headquarters, personal security and other items, according to a report issued yesterday.

Carl J. Truscott, who previously served as head of President Bush's security detail at the Secret Service, also took several trips with excessive numbers of ATF agents, including a $37,000 journey to London in September 2005 with eight other employees, according to the report.

The report by Justice Department Inspector General Glenn A. Fine also finds fault with Truscott's treatment of some female employees, saying that he ordered two female administrative staff members to prepare meals for guests on several occasions. One of the employees was allegedly required to announce, "Lunch is served."

These and other findings follow Truscott's abrupt resignation in August amid growing questions about his conduct. The Washington Post reported in February that Truscott had allegedly authorized or proposed hundreds of thousands of dollars' worth of unnecessary plan changes and upgrades to ATF's new 438,000-square-foot headquarters, which is behind schedule and millions of dollars over budget.

Fine's 157-page report confirms these allegations and many more, concluding that Truscott frequently broke regulations or exercised poor judgment in making decisions that had a serious impact on the ATF's operational budget when the agency was cutting back on vehicle maintenance, bulletproof vests and other basics.

The report also says that Justice investigators were "troubled by Truscott's lack of acceptance of responsibility" for his actions and their repercussions.

"From relatively minor issues, such as decisions on how to furnish the Director's Suite in the new Headquarters building, to major policy directives, such as how many new employees to hire, Truscott attempted to deflect responsibility to his subordinates, misrepresented the amount of involvement he had in the actions, or otherwise sought to distance himself from his own decisions," the report says. "We found several instances where Truscott's statements to us about his conduct were contradicted by numerous other witnesses, and in some instances, by documents as well."

Truscott said in a Sept. 25 letter in response to the findings that the report "is negative in tone" and "impugns my character and integrity without basis."

"Your Draft Report also fails to put the allegations made into context, to make mention of the significant progress ATF made during my stewardship and under difficult circumstances, or balance the allegations made against my unblemished professional career," Truscott said.

He said it was important to be involved in the details of the new headquarters to ensure that the building was designed and constructed properly. Truscott conceded that he should have limited the assistance given to his nephew.

Truscott's Washington attorney, Sheldon Krantz, was traveling outside the country yesterday and could not be reached to comment.

DOJ_NMG_0079759

Truscott was briefly replaced by the ATF's career deputy director, Edgar A. Domenech, who reversed a decision to include a costly engraved quotation from Bush's post-9/11 speech to Congress at the new headquarters entrance. U.S. Attorney Michael J. Sullivan of Boston has since been named acting head of the ATF; no permanent replacement has been nominated.

The ATF building, under construction in Northeast Washington, is at least $19 million over its original $120 million budget and its opening has been delayed until next year.

Truscott was particularly fixated on adding "unnecessary amenities" to the director's suite and the building's gymnasium, the inspector general's report said, including millwork estimated at $283,000. Agency e-mails show that Truscott requested for his office a 42-inch flat-screen television set that could be hidden when not in use. He wanted his personal bathroom to include a "[t]elephone, TV flat panel and radio speakers to listen/view news," a quartzite tile floor to match the floor in the building atrium, a bench with a water-resistant wood seat, a tile wall "in horizontal straight stacked layout vs brick," and sconces.

Truscott also suggested buying $100,000 in new equipment for the building's gym, and pushed to build a $156,000 garage to house a single truck owned by the ATF's National Response Team at Fort A.P. Hill.

"Truscott devoted an excessive amount of time to the redesign and upgrading of his suite and the gym, immersing himself in details at a level that we would not expect of the Director of a major law enforcement agency," the report said.

Furthermore, after being warned by congressional staff members to stop spending operational money on the building project, other ATF managers took the lead in scaling back many of the changes Truscott ordered, the report says. "Without those modifications Truscott's design changes would have had a substantially more severe impact on ATF's operational budget," the report says.

Some of Fine's harshest conclusions come in connection with an ATF school documentary by Truscott's nephew, who lives in the Philadelphia area and is described by his uncle as "a young man who is passionate about everything he does -- particularly as it related to his personal interests of videography and his career aspirations of following in my footsteps as a career public servant in the field of law enforcement."

The report said that over 10 months, Truscott's nephew peppered ATF employees in Philadelphia and Washington with e-mails and time-consuming requests, obtaining copies of stock ATF video footage, interviewing ATF officials -- including his uncle -- and using agency video equipment. "Significant ATF resources were used to assist Truscott's nephew on a high school project," the report says.

The nephew submitted his project to his teacher in April 2005, and included the credit, "Thank you for giving me this amazing opportunity Uncle Carl."

The report says he received an A.

Ex-ATF Director Blamed For Unnecessary Upgrades (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, October 12, 2006

The former head of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives was responsible for costly design changes at the ATF's new Washington headquarters and ordered hundreds of thousands of dollars in unnecessary upgrades to his personal suite, a report said yesterday.

The Justice Department's Office of Inspector General said Carl J. Truscott, who resigned in August, "encouraged and approved" changes at the Northeast Washington headquarters that were "related more to appearance ... than to functionality" and proposed structural changes to the gym that included the purchase of $100,000 in new equipment.

The report said Mr. Truscott immersed himself "in details at a level that we would not expect of the director of a major law enforcement agency" shortly after his arrival at the agency in 2004 -- after construction had begun.

It said senior ATF managers took the lead in scaling back the project and canceling many upgrades requested or authorized by Mr. Truscott.

Inspector General Glenn A. Fine said investigators identified several "overarching concerns" with respect to Mr. Truscott's leadership and management, and said he "attempted to deflect responsibility to his subordinates, misrepresented the amount of involvement he had in the actions, or otherwise sought to distance himself from his own decisions."

Mr. Truscott, in a letter to Mr. Fine, said investigators found no evidence substantiating "a single allegation relating to administrative misconduct" but released a report that was negative in tone and impugned his character and integrity.

He said the report "second-guesses my professional judgment, discretionary decisions and management style based upon criticisms from unidentified sources."

"I believe strongly in the inspector general concept, but inspectors general, given their awesome powers, have an obligation to be impartial and fair, to, make judgments based upon legal norms and a careful review of the facts, and to operate within their statutory mandates," he said. "Nothing in the Inspector General Act gives you the license to second-guess professional discretionary judgments."

The report also questioned:

·Mr. Truscott's hiring policy that resulted in 950 new agents and other personnel but contributed to a $21 million decrease in the agency's operating budget. The report said the policy went forward despite repeated warnings by senior officials and was a major reason ATF could not buy necessary investigative equipment, including bulletproof vests for its agents.

·The number of ATF employees Mr. Truscott took with him on trips, including a September 2005 visit in London with members of London's Metropolitan Police Service. The report said eight ATF officials accompanied Mr. Truscott, costing the agency $37,000, including four security personnel, although London police had provided protection for him and the meeting place was secure.

·Mr. Truscott's order to ATF employees to assist his nephew in making a video for a high school project. The report said Mr. Truscott improperly allowed government property and official time of ATF personnel to be used in connection with the project.

·An order by Mr. Truscott to two female administrative staffers to assist in preparing for and serving lunches to him and his guests -- telling them how he wanted the meals prepared and served. It said ATF employees confirmed that on at least one occasion, Mr. Truscott directed one of the staff members to announce, "Lunch is served."

The ATF headquarters building had been budgeted in 2004 at $119.7 million, but is expected to cost more than $140 million when it is completed this year.

Federal Cases Land Four In Jail _ Foil Murder Plot (AP)

AP, October 12, 2006

NEW ORLEANS -- Federal and St. John the Baptist Parish law officers interrupted an investigation of a drug network to arrest two men they learned were planning a double murder.

Louis Johnson, 27, of Edgard and Trevor Jeffery, 31, of Vacherie, were charged with possession and intent to distribute crack cocaine and powdered cocaine worth more than $150,000.

At a news conference Wednesday, federal authorities said agents had tapped the telephones of Johnson and Jeffery, identified as high ranking members of a drug network operating between New Orleans and Baton Rouge. One of the conversations involved the planning of the kidnapping and murder of two men they believed had robbed them. Because full details of the plan, including the identities of the men, were not known, officials said they moved quickly to get arrest warrants.

Because the investigation is continuing, agents could not discuss the drug network, said William J. Renton Jr., of the Drug Enforcement Administration.

Johnson and Jeffery will probably face other charges, U.S. Attorney Jim Letten said.

In another case two New Orleans men plead guilty to drug and gun charges.

Matthew L. Carter and Darryl Cavalier were arrested by Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives agents and New Orleans police working under the Project Safe Neighborhood.

They were prosecuted on federal charges which results in serving longer sentences, Letten said.

"Federal sentences are hard time," Letten said. "There's no early release."

The pair face a minimum of five years in prison and a maximum of 40 years, plus fines.

Arrests Foil Murder Plot, Feds Say (NOTP)

By Susan Finch, Staff Writer

New Orleans Times-Picayune, October 12, 2006

Wiretap heard River Parishes pair planning to kidnap, kill enemies

Two River Parishes men, under federal investigation since December as suspected cocaine dealers, were arrested over the weekend after investigators monitoring their phone conversations heard them making plans to kidnap and murder two men they thought robbed them of drug profits in Baton Rouge last week.

U.S. Attorney Jim Letten said Wednesday that prosecutors moved quickly in the middle of the night to get arrest warrants for Louis Johnson, 27, of Edgard, and Trevor Jeffery, 31, of Vacherie, in order to prevent the murders. The men were arrested early Saturday morning.

Authorities say both men were "high-ranking" members of a drug organization that distributed drugs between New Orleans and Baton Rouge.

A search of their residences turned up firearms and more than 1.5 kilograms of cocaine powder and crack cocaine. They are both charged with conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute both forms of the drug.

DOJ_NMG_0079761

Authorities were tightlipped about most aspects of the case, including whether there are plans to charge the two men with planning a kidnapping and murder.

Both men are being held without bond in Orleans Parish Prison and are due before a federal magistrate today to decide whether they will be allowed bail. Prosecutors say they will ask that bail be denied on grounds that the men are a danger to the community.

Authorities said the information that launched the investigation came from slain St. John the Baptist Parish narcotics investigator Capt. Octavio "Ox" Gonzalez.

Gonzalez, a 14-year veteran of the Sheriff's Office who headed the sheriff's narcotics division, was shot and killed in June. Authorities say he was lured from his unmarked vehicle by a woman pretending to be a stranded motorist and was shot from behind by her accomplice. The couple then stole his vehicle, authorities say.

William Renton, special agent in charge of the Drug Enforcement Administration's New Orleans field office, said the current case is "special" because of Gonzalez's role.

"This case was initiated by him; he provided the first information . . . This is probably the last case we'll be able to say we worked with officer Gonzalez."

Renton said the investigation of Johnson's cocaine network is continuing.

Maj. Mike Tregre, spokesman for the St. John the Baptist Parish Sheriff's Office, said Johnson recently served time in jail, but would not offer specifics. He said additional details about the investigation would be released today by St. John Sheriff Wayne Jones. Investigators from the St. John sheriff's narcotics office assisted DEA agents with the arrests, he said.

Federal authorities say they had been investigating Johnson and his cocaine distribution organization since December 2005.

During the investigation, in which agents listened to wiretapped conversations of Johnson and Jeffery, they discovered that the two had been robbed during a drug transaction involving four kilograms of cocaine in Baton Rouge on Oct. 4, authorities said.

Shortly after, agents overheard the two making plans to kidnap and murder the two men they believed had robbed them.

Warrants were obtained Friday and served early Saturday morning, authorities said.

In a search of Johnson's Edgard home, authorities say agents recovered a .45-caliber Highpoint pistol, an AK-47 assault rifle, 1 1/2 kilograms of cocaine hydrochloride, about 300 grams of crack and $18,210 in cash.

From Jeffery's Vacherie home, authorities say they recovered 133 grams of crack, $1,300 in cash, a Smith and Wesson 9 mm semiautomatic handgun, scales, bags and other material used for repackaging drugs.

Prosecutors say they will ask a federal grand jury to return indictments against both men.

Hearing Set On Suit Over Plants Destroyed As Marijuana (AP)

AP, October 12, 2006

GULFPORT — A federal court in New Orleans will hear arguments next month in a property owner's appeal of the dismissal of his lawsuit against Harrison County Sheriff George H. Payne Jr.

U.S. District Judge Louis Guirola Jr. in May 2005 dismissed Marion Waltman's civil lawsuit against Payne. Waltman had claimed the sheriff violated his rights by destroying more than 500 kenaf plants grown as deer food.

Payne said it was an honest mistake when he and other law officers destroyed what they thought were marijuana plants.

Waltman appealed Guirola's ruling to the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, which has set arguments for Nov. 7.

Waltman sought $225,000 in damages from the Sept. 8, 2003, raid on land leased for the Boarhog Hunting Club. Waltman, who had planted the kenaf, claimed he was watching a television news report when he saw inmate workers chopping down plants and heard the sheriff say the plants appeared to be marijuana.

Guirola determined that Payne was acting within his official capacity and within the scope of discretionary authority. Qualified immunity shields Payne from liability because his conduct was "objectively reasonable," the judge said.

Court records show an informant reported the crop as marijuana to state narcotics agents and U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration officers. The plants were scattered among other plants, a technique common among marijuana growers, authorities said.

A field test on a sample plant did not identify it as marijuana. Payne ordered the plants seized and sent samples to the state Crime Lab.

Africans grew kenaf as early as 6000 B.C., and within the last century it has been grown in India, Asia, Africa, the Near East and Latin America. U.S. farmers devoted about 12,000 acres to kenaf in recent years, mostly in Texas, Mississippi and Georgia.

Kenaf comes in two varieties: One with leaves that resemble marijuana, the other with heart-shaped leaves similar to the hibiscus plant, a kenaf cousin.

DOJ_NMG_0079762

Waltman said the kenaf plant has seven leaves at the top and okra-looking leaves at the bottom. He said marijuana has only five leaves.

Kenaf stalks, which reach heights of 12 to 14 feet, have two types of fiber. The long, stringy outer fiber can be twisted into cords and ropes. The shorter inner fibers can be used to make paper, or blended with plastic to make molded or extruded products.

Inside The Beltway (WT)

By John McCaslin

The Washington Times, October 12, 2006

Second fiddle

"I know she was your first choice for this fundraiser."

--President Bush, addressing a Mac Collins for Congress reception this week in Macon, Ga., referring to the always-popular first lady Laura Bush, who unfortunately had a previous commitment.

Still had enough?

Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean is all but unfazed by the dismal primary voting turnout for the otherwise vital midterm elections, continuing to insist that "people have had enough."

"We're poised to win historic victories up and down the ballot -- but only if we follow through and make it happen," said Mr. Dean, who is concerned enough about voter numbers of recent weeks to ask every Democrat who can do so to take the day off from work on Election Day.

Curtis Gans, director of American University's Center for the Study of the American Electorate (CSAE), announced this week that U.S. voter turnout for the 2006 statewide midterm election primaries hit the lowest number ever recorded -- despite it being a year when Democrats contend that Americans are fed up with their elected officials and demand change.

Turnout in the recent primaries fell 17 percent from midterm levels in 2002, with barely 15 percent of the eligible electorate going to the polls.

Fool's prize

A more popular definition for patsy is a "chump: a person who is gullible and easy to take advantage of." Others describe a "fool," a "sucker."

"I thought you'd like to know the names of the officials the Center for Military Readiness has selected as the finalists for our inaugural CMR 'Patsy' Award," says CMR President Elaine Donnelly, referring to this evening's 11th annual CMR awards gala at the Hall of States.

The honor, she hints, will go to "an official whom feminists have used to impose their policies on the men and women of the military."

Mrs. Donnelly argues that the U.S. military is no longer a conservative institution, rather "it is on the cutting edge of liberal social change."

Without further ado, the "Patsy" finalists include Undersecretary of Defense for Personnel and Readiness David S.C. Chu, Army Secretary Francis J. Harvey, Navy Vice Adm. Rodney P. Rempt, and the entire English Department of West Point.

Disingenuous buzz

Under the headline "Exhale," we quoted White House Drug Control Policy Director John P. Walters as saying don't hold your breath if you think the Bush administration would one day consider legalizing marijuana.

"Of the roughly 7 million people we have as an estimate that need treatment because of dependence or abuse of illegal drugs, roughly 60 percent are dependent on marijuana," Mr. Walters told C-SPAN's "Newsmakers" on Sunday, insisting more teens are "dependent on marijuana than all other illegal drugs combined."

Which comes as news to Bruce Mirken, director of communications for the Marijuana Policy Project on Capitol Hill. (How does one land that gig?)

Mr. Mirken tells Inside the Beltway that Mr. Walters is "deliberately and rather brazenly disingenuous," and calls our attention to a federal government report titled the "Treatment Episode Data Set" (TEDS).

"What Mr. Walters didn't mention is that the majority of these treatment admissions were referred by the criminal justice system -- i.e., kids were arrested and offered treatment instead of jail," he explains. "Virtually all of the supposedly alarming growth in marijuana treatment admissions has been driven by arrests.

"Another nugget buried in the TEDS stats: Of those admitted to treatment for alleged 'marijuana dependence,' over one-third did not use marijuana at all in the month prior to admission, and half used it three times or less.

DOJ_NMG_0079763

"These are addicts? Give me a break," says Mr. Mirken. "Bottom line: We arrest people for smoking marijuana, force them into treatment and then use those treatment admissions as 'proof' marijuana is dangerously addictive. Somewhere, George Orwell is smiling."

Disgusted dad

Mark Foley, the Florida Republican who recently resigned from Congress after it was revealed he had sent sexually explicit e-mail messages to former congressional pages, would be denied his federal pension under legislation proposed by Rep. Rick Renzi, Arizona Republican.

Under current rules, the 52-year-old Mr. Foley will be eligible to receive an annual pension of $32,000 once he turns 62.

"As a father of 12, I am disgusted," says Mr. Renzi.

Doctor Will Remain In Prison Until Retrial (WP)

By Jerry Markon

The Washington Post, October 12, 2006

Former Northern Virginia pain-management doctor William E. Hurwitz, whose conviction on drug-trafficking charges was overturned, will not be released from prison until his retrial, a federal judge ruled yesterday.

U.S. District Judge Leonard D. Wexler said he was concerned that Hurwitz might flee after a federal jury in Alexandria convicted him in 2004 of running a drug conspiracy out of his McLean office and trafficking in narcotics. Hurwitz is perhaps the most prominent doctor to be targeted in a federal crackdown on what authorities call the over-prescribing of OxyContin and other painkillers.

"Things have changed with respect to flight," Wexler said as he rejected a motion from Hurwitz's attorneys to free him on bond. "A jury has found him guilty of 50 counts . . . I think there is a risk of flight."

The case has generated strong emotions, with Hurwitz becoming a symbol in a nationwide debate over whether licensed doctors who prescribe legal medication to patients in chronic pain should be prosecuted if their patients abuse or sell the drugs. About 10 family members and supporters were in court yesterday, and Hurwitz's brother said afterward that the judge's concerns were "laughable."

"He's not going to run away," said Kenneth Hurwitz, who is a senior associate for Human Rights First in New York. "He believes he's innocent. This is a guy who went to law school and medical school. He cares about his reputation. He's not someone who wants to live as a fugitive who knows where."

William Hurwitz, dressed in a green prison jumpsuit, sat quietly during the hearing, then glanced at family members and glumly shook his head as he was escorted out. He had been free on $2 million bond during his first trial.

In August, a federal appeals court overturned Hurwitz's conviction and granted him a new trial, which is scheduled for March. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the 4th Circuit ruled that Wexler improperly instructed jurors that they could not consider whether Hurwitz acted in "good faith" when he prescribed large amounts of OxyContin and other painkillers -- for one patient, 1,600 pills a day. The "good faith" argument was central to Hurwitz's defense, his attorneys have said, because he believed he was helping his patients.

The appeals court noted that prosecutors presented "powerful" evidence at Hurwitz's trial that showed he was "acting outside the bounds of accepted medical practice." Wexler also cited that finding in declining to release Hurwitz yesterday.

Jurors convicted Hurwitz of trafficking that is alleged to have caused the death of one patient and seriously injured two others. They found him guilty on 50 counts, acquitted him on nine and deadlocked on three. Hurwitz, then 59, was sentenced to 25 years in prison.

The likelihood of a long prison term if he is convicted again gives Hurwitz reason to run away, prosecutors said yesterday as they urged Wexler to keep him in prison. "At least one jury found him guilty 50 times over," said Assistant U.S. Attorney Gene Rossi. "He's about 60 years old, and the sentence that was imposed, 25 years, is essentially a life sentence. That is a strong incentive."

Hurwitz's attorneys said he has a good chance of winning the retrial and didn't flee when he had the chance before. "He faithfully abided by every condition of his release," said defense attorney Lawrence Robbins.

U.S. Cuts Economic Aid For Colombia Area (AP)

By Joshua Goodman

AP, October 11, 2006

The United States is quietly cutting back economic aid in a region where cocaine production is surging, a strategy critics say hurts Washington's $4 billion effort to try to wean Colombia off the illegal drug trade.

DOJ_NMG_0079764

In an internal memo obtained by The Associated Press, the U.S. Agency for International Development blames unacceptable security risks for its workers and a lack of private investment partners for its pullout from Caqueta, a former rebel stronghold in impoverished southern Colombia.

Six years and more than $4 billion in American tax dollars after Plan Colombia was launched in Caqueta, Colombia's army is still fighting rebels here, and coca, the raw ingredient of cocaine, is still the region's No. 1 cash crop.

But the alternative development programs meant to provide farmers with a profitable alternative to growing coca are vanishing in the state _ a symptom, critics say, of how Plan Colombia has failed to persuade enough coca growers to switch to legal crops even as coca production reaches volumes unseen in years.

Washington spends $70 million annually on development projects in drug-producing areas of Colombia. While such projects win praise, the United Nations and development groups lament their limited scope.

Caqueta and neighboring Putumayo state produced 24 percent of the 356,000 acres of coca detected by the most recent U.S. survey _ contributing to a 26 percent surge last year nationwide. Yet Caqueta has seen only a trickle of U.S. development aid _ $5.6 million since 2000.

And now even that is drying up.

As part of the U.S. strategy to win over coca growers, almost 20 percent of annual assistance is devoted to nonmilitary social programs and development projects. Managing this "soft side" of diplomacy is USAID, whose mission in Colombia is its biggest in the hemisphere.

But under the agency's new five-year $350 million plan for development projects, Caqueta and four other Amazonian states where coca production is rising won't receive a penny.

"It's a complete contradiction of Plan Colombia," said Luis Fernando Almario, a congressman from Caqueta who supports President Alvaro Uribe's aerial eradication drive. "Instead of investing generously to eliminate dependency on the illegal drug trade, we're being shunned."

A USAID official at the U.S. Embassy in Bogota said resources from Caqueta would be channeled to other areas with a greater likelihood of sustaining development long-term. He spoke on condition of anonymity because he is not authorized to comment publicly on the issue.

But critics say that by writing off the south, the U.S. and Colombian governments are leaving the region with little alternative to coca.

Despite USAID's pessimism about the region's economic prospects, at least some foreign investors are still committed: the multinational Nestle SA, with aid from the United Nations, plans to double the capacity of a dairy plant in Caqueta.

"It makes no sense for residents of a historical guerrilla stronghold to be subjected to a strategy of all stick and no carrot _ combats, mass arrests, searches and fumigation, but no aid," said Adam Isacson, an analyst at the Washington-based Center for International Policy.

The drying up of development aid is in contrast with the tens of millions spent on aerial eradication efforts that have barely curtailed coca cultivation in the region.

Some 400 coca farmers gathered here recently for a coca-growers' congress. In sweltering heat, normally tight-lipped peasants railed for hours against the lack of government aid even as a U.S.-supplied crop duster dumped clouds of the herbicide glyphosate on nearby fields.

Since June, when the latest round of spraying began, six peasants in the area have been arrested for having coca on their land.

"All the government ever does is fumigate and fumigate _ it's their own fault we grow coca because they never show their face to offer alternatives," said Juan Carlos Mazabel, one of the organizers.

Instead of more spraying, Caqueta's 450,000 residents want financial support, their representatives say.

The war on drugs was expanded in 2001 to target rebels who profit from the cocaine trade. A legion of U.S. soldiers and contractors have since passed through Caqueta to train and assist 20,000 counterinsurgency troops.

The rebels have largely retreated into the mountains, restoring a dose of safety to cities and roads. But that hasn't led to new jobs for impoverished residents.

The U.S. Embassy says security constraints and limited private interest are also thwarting its work in Putumayo, at $65 million the top recipient of Plan Colombia economic aid among Colombia's 32 states.

Some projects already have faltered. In the town of Orito, an animal-food concentrates plant has been idle for nearly a year, its machinery rusting since the U.S. abandoned the project.

"We're worried," says Putumayo congressman Orlando Guerra, "because we have no idea what is going to happen."

County Offers Reward In Accokeek Arson Inquiry (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0079765

By Joshua Partlow

The Washington Post, October 12, 2006

In the world of arson victims, Jim Underwood comes across as one of the least aggrieved.

"I was mad in a way, but I was going, 'Man, too bad it didn't burn all the way to the ground,' you know. And they left the barn. They did forgot to light the barn up," he said. "It saved me money. Really, I mean, you know it was all going to get tore down eventually anyway."

Understand, Underwood was planning to get a permit to allow the fire department to burn the vacant house he owned along rural Livingston Road in southern Prince George's County, to clear the way for a nine-house subdivision.

But the flames leaping from the house Saturday still dismayed him and other property owners in Accokeek, primarily because the fire was the latest in a string of unsolved arsons in the neighborhood.

Prince George's fire officials announced a $15,000 reward yesterday for information leading to the arrest and conviction of those responsible. They also launched an investigative team to focus on the cases, in partnership with the Maryland state fire marshal and the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives.

Between March 2004 and the burning of Underwood's house Saturday, there have been 12 arsons in the neighborhood, including nine along Livingston Road, fire officials said. There have been seven this year. Investigators have linked the arsons because they are in the same small area and involved unoccupied structures with some connection to construction.

The targets were all "either new homes under construction, houses that are scheduled for demolition to make way for new construction or construction equipment to be used to build . . . new structures," said Scott K. Hoglander, Prince George's fire investigations battalion chief.

Although the fires have not injured anyone, they have caused a "couple million" dollars in property damage, Prince George's Fire Chief Lawrence H. Sedgwick Jr. said at a news conference. The case is baffling investigators.

"We're at a point where we need some help," said Hoglander, as he and other fire officials asked the public to watch for suspicious behavior and call or e-mail authorities with any tips.

Investigators did not go into detail about how the Accokeek fires were ignited, but Hoglander said that aside from locations and links to construction, there are "not many similarities between the various incidents."

The Accokeek cases have led investigators to review the files of the 2004 mass arson in the Charles County subdivision of Hunters Brooke, which is within 10 miles of Accokeek. In those fires, which destroyed or damaged 27 new, unoccupied houses, five white men were convicted and prosecutors alleged that some of the men were angry because many of Hunters Brooke's new homeowners were black.

Sedgwick said yesterday that no motive had been identified in Accokeek.

Maryland Fire Marshal William E. Barnard said that his office has reviewed the Charles fires within the past year to see whether there might be a connection with Accokeek.

"We can find no connection at this point. That's not saying that the next incident that occurs may not be connected," Barnard said.

In Accokeek yesterday, Nazim Khan, 42, stood with Underwood, 45, and other friends around a pickup truck recounting their arson stories. They were at the site where Khan's new auto-body shop is being built. He said he planned to use surveillance cameras and watchdogs to guard the place.

"Me and him," Khan said, motioning at Underwood, "we got houses we're building around here, and I'm running scared every day."

Firefighters ask anyone with information about the Accokeek arsons to call 301-77-ARSON or e-mail77arson@co.pg.md.us.

Proposal Urges Citizens To Arm For City Growth (NYT)

By William Yardley

The New York Times, October 12, 2006

GREENLEAF, Idaho — Say an earthquake snaps a dam and the full force of the Boise River floods the Treasure Valley, driving untold thousands toward high ground.

Or maybe the subdivisions spreading west from Boise finally push big-box, subwoofer, exit-ramp America right up to this plateau of mint and alfalfa fields, where rural lives have passed in peace since Quakers settled a century ago.

However humanity's rush may arrive, a town must prepare. Greenleaf, population 862, is not taking the task lightly. Thus the proposed language for Section 2, Chapter 6, Subsection 2 of the Greenleaf City Code.

"Heads of households to maintain firearms," the heading announces.

DOJ_NMG_0079766

"In order to provide for the emergency management of the city, and further in order to provide for and protect the safety, security and general welfare of the city and its inhabitants," the proposal says, "it is recommended that every head of household residing in the city limits maintain a firearm, together with ammunition therefore, and obtain appropriate training relating to proper, safe and lawful handling of firearms."

News of the proposal spread quickly, bringing that rush of humanity even sooner than expected, if only in search of amusement. Jay Leno, the late-night comedian, needled Greenleaf in his monologue two nights in September. Journalists from Italy sought interviews. Jon Stewart? His people called, too.

Sure, said Steven G. Jett, the city councilman who wrote the proposed ordinance, he gets it: the notion of Idaho isolationists with itchy trigger fingers is an easy punch line. But that misses the point, Mr. Jett said, emphasizing that this was about public safety, and, after all, the proposal did not mandate gun ownership. He said he saw "recommended" as the crucial word.

"Leno said 'require,' " Mr. Jett said. "We're not requiring."

If that clarification does not stop the jokes, it may at least put people like Gene Cox at ease.

"I think it's a stupid idea," said Mr. Cox, 68, who bales hay part time, as he sat in his pickup truck next to a patch of sugar beets. "We already have a right to bear arms, so we don't need anything messing that up. We don't need any changes. And monitoring it is going to be a problem. You're going to be invading people's houses to see if they've got a gun or not."

Again, Mr. Jett said, a misunderstanding.

"We all hate government — councilmen, too," said Mr. Jett, who is also director of the Southwest Idaho Juvenile Detention Center. "We are not for heavy-handed government at all. That's why I backed off the 'required' wording early on, before I even had this printed up. The government does not want to step into your home and say: 'Where is it? What do you have?' "

Mr. Jett said his idea for the ordinance, which must be voted on by the City Council, was inspired by the chaos he saw on television after Hurricane Katrina and by the fact that a subdivision with 240 houses on 105 acres had been platted and could double the population of the city.

He also has a model. Kennesaw, Ga., passed a law in 1982 requiring residents to arm themselves. The law has proved to be unenforceable, but, as Mr. Jett noted, crime in Kennesaw declined after the law took effect even as the population grew.

"That's the kind of message I want to send," he said. " 'We're not sitting ducks.' We don't have any crime, and that's the way I want to keep it."

For all the fuss, the practical effect of the ordinance could be minimal.

"Firearms exist in significant numbers here," Mayor Brad Holton said. Mr. Holton estimated that guns, whether a relic rifle brought West on a wagon or a shotgun used for hunting elk up north, were already present in at least 80 percent of the city's households.

One gun owner is Alan Weinacht, a Quaker who is pastor of Greenleaf Friends Church. Mr. Weinacht hunts, but he opposes the gun ordinance. He noted Quakers' peace-loving roots and cited local public opinion.

"It simply doesn't resonate with a felt need," Mr. Weinacht said, predicting that the ordinance would not survive a series of public meetings this fall. "Nobody's scared of anything. This is not exactly crime central."

He did not disparage Mr. Jett for the idea, however.

"It's a fair question: How do we adequately prepare for an emergency?" Mr. Weinacht said. "I think the inherent contradiction is how do you say we're for community, and at the same time, the guns are cocked?"

Mayor Holton, however, said the ordinance could be read as promoting responsibility for gun owners, and as recognizing that many residents had weapons and that it would be in everyone's interest to be trained to use them properly.

The proposal does not include money for training. One idea is to ask hunting instructors to teach classes in the meeting room at City Hall.

The mayor said he owned about 25 rifles and handguns and stored them in a safe.

"I keep all of them there but one," he said, "and you don't want to run into that one at night."

IMMIGRATION:

President Bush Reaffirms Support For A Fence On The Mexican Border (MCT)

By Dave Montgomery

McClatchy Newspapers, October 12, 2006

WASHINGTON - President Bush said Wednesday that his administration is committed to building more than 700 miles of fencing along the Southwest border, dispelling questions about whether the barrier will actually be constructed.

DOJ_NMG_0079767

Bush expressed strong support for the multi-state fence approved by Congress late last month as well as an accompanying "virtual wall" of high-tech gadgetry such as sensors, cameras, radar and unmanned surveillance aircraft.

"We're going to do both," Bush said at a news conference in the White House Rose Garden. "You can't fence the entire border. But . . . you can use a combination of fencing and technology to make it easier for the Border Patrol to enforce the border."

Legislation that cleared Congress on Sept. 29, just before the start of an election-season recess, would require reinforced fencing and barriers along porous sections of the border in California, Arizona, New Mexico and Texas.

The proposed fence has ignited diplomatic protests from Mexico as well as vigorous opposition from many U.S. border communities, escalating speculation that it may never be built.

Congress has approved $1.2 billion for border fencing but the barrier envisioned by lawmakers is expected to cost at least $2.2 billion and possibly more than $6 billion. The Department of Homeland Security has also sent mixed signals about its commitment to building the fence.

In response to a reporter's question, however, Bush left little doubt that his administration intends to carry out the congressional mandate to build double-layered fencing - two parallel rows of fencing - and adjacent patrol roads in sections of the border with heavy concentrations of smuggling and illegal immigrant traffic.

The fencing, he said, would be erected in areas "where there is a high vulnerability for people being able to sneak in," he said. In remote, less-populous areas, he said, high-tech enforcement may prove to be the better approach.

"It's a combination of fencing and technologies," said the former Texas governor. "It's hard to enforce that border. You got some rugged country . . . stretches of territory where you don't even know where the border is."

He said fencing "makes sense" in high-density urban corridors such as Southern California, El Paso and sections of Arizona, where illegal immigrants often "rush across the border into a little subdivision," with all but a few eluding the Border Patrol.

The bill awaiting Bush's signature calls for five sections of fencing totaling more than 700 miles, but Senate and House leaders assured border state lawmakers that local communities would have a say in exactly where the barriers would be located.

While Bush said several weeks ago that he planned to sign the bill, he used Wednesday's press conference to again urge Congress to enact a comprehensive immigration plan that would include a guest worker program and legal protections for more than 11 million illegal immigrants now in the country.

Lawmakers shelved the guest worker plan and concentrated on passing border security measures such as the fence before leaving town to campaign for the Nov. 7 elections. Supporters of Bush's proposed comprehensive overhaul hope to resurrect the issue when lawmakers return for a brief post-election work session in November.

Bush Vows To Build Fence (WT)

By Stephen Dinan And Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, October 12, 2006

President Bush yesterday pledged to follow through on building 698 miles of wall along the U.S.-Mexico border but said that the Department of Homeland Security will decide where and that he wants sensors and cameras to watch the border.

"We're going to do both," Mr. Bush said at a press conference yesterday. "We're just going to make sure that we build it in a spot where it works."

Some fence advocates and members of Congress have questioned Mr. Bush's commitment to fencing. The president yesterday said it is a part of his broader border-security strategy.

"You can't fence the entire border, but what you can do is you can use a combination of fencing and technology to make it easier for the Border Patrol to enforce our border," he said.

Mr. Bush said any solution on the border will also require a guest-worker program, which he said would funnel workers through legal points of entry.

Mr. Bush last week signed the homeland-security spending bill, which includes $1.2 billion for fencing and other infrastructure, such as cameras, vehicle barriers and ground-based radar.

He has also promised to sign the Secure Fence Act, which Congress passed last month and which authorizes 698 miles of wall along the border. That bill passed 283-138 in the House and 80-19 in the Senate.

As of Tuesday, the bill had not been transmitted to the White House for the president to sign, and groups that advocate for rights for illegal aliens are urging Mr. Bush to veto it.

Yesterday, the Catholic Church joined that call in a letter from Bishop William Skylstad, president of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops.

DOJ_NMG_0079768

He said that fencing could cause the death of illegal aliens trying to sneak into the country and that it "would send the wrong signal to our peaceful neighbor to the south, Mexico, as well as the international community."

Mr. Bush's pledge of support for the fence bill drew praise from House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, Illinois Republican, who said illegal immigration is "a clear threat to our safety."

House Republicans consider passage of the fence bill a major victory in their push for an enforcement-first policy and are campaigning across the country on the accomplishment.

"It should concern the American people that 131 Democrats voted against creating this security fence along our southern border," Mr. Hastert said yesterday. "They don't want border security; instead, they would rather jeopardize our national security and put Americans at risk."

By contrast, Mr. Bush has been silent about immigration as he campaigns and raises funds for Republican candidates.

There is no official cost estimate for all 698 miles of wall. Sen. Jon Kyl, Arizona Republican, has estimated that this year's funding bill will cover about 150 miles.

In a last-minute deal, congressional leaders did grant the administration discretion in places where they determine a fence is not practical or the best use of resources.

Mr. Hastert and Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, Tennessee Republican, said they will revisit the issue in a lame-duck legislative session later this year.

Some fence advocates have feared that the administration won't follow through on the construction.

Last week, after a report in The Washington Post indicated that the Department of Homeland Security would not commit to building all 700 miles of fence, Rep. Duncan Hunter, California Republican and chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, wrote a letter to Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff telling him that building the fence is not optional.

A report accompanying the fence bill says Congress will withhold $950 million until it approves an administration plan for how it will spend the $1.2 billion included in the bill for infrastructure. Mr. Bush said last week that such a move violates the separation of powers and that he will consider that a request rather than a mandate.

Meanwhile, Mexican government officials have sent a diplomatic note to Washington protesting the fence and have said they may complain to the United Nations.

Mr. Bush yesterday said he will follow through in "implementing that which Congress has funded, in a way that says to folks, the American people, we'll enforce the border."

But he also said a guest-worker program is critical.

"If somebody is not trying to sneak in to work, in other words, coming through in a way where they're showing a temporary-worker pass, where they're not using coyotes to smuggle across, where they're not going through tunnels, it's going to make it much easier for us to do our job," he said.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Proclaims Deficit Halved, Three Years Early (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, October 12, 2006

President Bush yesterday claimed victory on his promise to cut the 2004 budget deficit in half, announcing he has reached that goal three years ahead of his self-imposed 2009 deadline.

The Treasury Department said the federal government ran a $247.7 billion deficit for fiscal 2006, which ended Sept. 30.

It is the seventh-highest deficit ever in dollar terms, but measured as a portion of the economy as determined by the gross domestic product, it is 1.9 percent -- smaller than in 18 of the past 25 years. It is also less than half of the $521 billion deficit the president projected for 2004, leaving Mr. Bush crowing in both a morning press conference and an afternoon speech.

"We have now achieved our goal of cutting the federal budget deficit in half and we've done it three years ahead of schedule," the president said, crediting his 2001 and 2003 tax cuts with spurring economic growth and thus more tax revenue.

"The reduction of the deficit I've announced today is no accident. It is the result of the hard work of the American people, and because of sound fiscal policies here in Washington," Mr. Bush said.

Democrats said the president's tax cuts have ruined the federal budget in the past five years, and turned record surpluses into deficits.

"No amount of Republican Party spin can obscure the bottom line: The Bush administration and congressional Republicans inherited a projected 10-year budget surplus of $5.6 trillion in 2001, and in just 70 months turned that surplus into a projected deficit of $4 trillion," said House Minority Whip Steny H. Hoyer, Maryland Democrat.

DOJ_NMG_0079769

Rep. John M. Spratt Jr. of South Carolina, the top Democrat on the House Budget Committee, said the projection for 2006 when Mr. Bush took office was for a $305 billion surplus, and he blamed spending increases and tax cuts for the deficit.

He said the administration is including in its calculations money supposedly dedicated to Social Security. Excluding that money, the deficit for 2006 would be more than $425 billion, Mr. Spratt said.

Federal spending hit a record high in 2006, at $2.654 trillion. That is a $182 billion increase over fiscal 2005.

Tax revenues grew by $253 billion, far outstripping the increased spending.

Mr. Bush was able to gloat about the deficit numbers because Democrats had been on the record doubting the president would achieve his deficit-cutting goal.

"When the president says he's going to cut the deficit in half over the next five years, I don't believe it," Sen. Kent Conrad, North Dakota Democrat, said in 2004.

He has accused Mr. Bush of inflating the early deficit projections in order to claim better progress later on. Administration officials dismissed that charge as bad politics because it would mean eight months of criticism for the higher numbers earlier in the year.

The president has been highlighting tax cuts as he campaigns for next month's congressional elections. When fully enacted, he said, they will amount to $1.1 trillion back in taxpayers' pockets.

Many of the cuts are due to expire 10 years after enactment, and Mr. Bush said a Democrat-controlled Congress will guarantee those taxes will go back up.

Each party blames the other for blocking tax cuts in the waning days of last month's legislative session. Democrats supported extending the tax cuts for college tuition and for state and local sales tax deductions, but opposed making the estate tax cut permanent. Republicans insisted on passing them all as a package, and the two sides ended in a stalemate.

Federal Deficit Now Lowest In 4 Years (AP-Y)

By Deb Riechmann

AP-Yahoo, October 12, 2006

The federal deficit fell to a four-year low in the budget year that just ended, a result President Bush pointed to Wednesday in claiming Republicans are better stewards of the economy than are Democrats.

The administration said the deficit dropped to $247.7 billion — welcome news for Republicans struggling to keep control of Congress. Bush boasted he had made good on a 2004 campaign promise to cut the deficit in half over five years.

"These budget numbers are proof that pro-growth economic policies work," Bush said.

Democrats said the improvement in the 2006 federal deficit was a temporary blip. They predicted rising deficits for years to come unless policies are changed.

"Only a president with such a historically bad economic record would be this excited about a $248 billion deficit," said Rep. Carolyn Maloney, D-N.Y. "Under his watch ... record surpluses turned into record deficits as far as the eye can see."

Republicans are trying to convince voters that the GOP champions tax cuts while Democrats will raise taxes if they gain control of Congress. Democrats contend the administration's tax cuts have primarily benefited the wealthy.

"There's a difference of opinion in the campaign about taxes," Bush said, predicting that the GOP still will lead the House and Senate after Nov. 7. "I would like to ... make the tax cuts permanent. And the Democrats will raise taxes."

The administration credits its tax cuts for the improving economy, contending they helped the nation withstand the 2001 recession, the terrorist attacks and corporate accounting scandals. The deficit narrowed sharply because revenues climbed by 11.8 percent, outpacing a 7.4 percent increase in spending.

Administration officials said the actual 2006 deficit is down to 1.9 percent of the gross domestic product. They said that is below the 40-year average deficit of about 2.3 percent of the GDP, which measures the value of all U.S. goods and services. This continues a positive trend that comes despite soaring war costs and $50 billion in emergency spending for hurricane relief, they said.

Still, the long-term deficit picture is bleak.

The nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office projects that the deficit for the current budget year will rise to $286 billion. Over the next decade, the office forecasts that the deficit will total $1.76 trillion.

Bush's critics argue that the White House is using sleight of hand when boasting about the deficit.

The president can rightly state that he has fulfilled his 2004 campaign pledge to cut the deficit in half by the time he leaves office. In fact, he can say he has done it three years early. But in making that claim, the president is using the administration's original forecast of what the 2004 deficit was expected to be — not what it actually turned out to be.

DOJ_NMG_0079770

Back when Bush made his promise, the administration was predicting that the 2004 deficit would be $521 billion. That prediction turned out to be off by $100 billion. To achieve the feat of slicing the actual 2004 deficit number in half, the federal deficit Bush was highlighting would have to have dropped to $206 billion, not $247.7 billion.

Democrats say the narrowing of the deficit will be temporary because when 78 million baby boomers retire, the cost of Social Security and the Medicare health care program for the elderly will soar.

"The fact that some are trumpeting this year's deficit number as good news shows just how far we've fallen. Our budget picture is extremely serious by any measure," said Sen. Kent Conrad, the senior Democrat on the Senate Budget Committee.

President Sees Signs Favoring G.O.P. Victory (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, October 12, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 11 — President Bush predicted on Wednesday that Republicans would be victorious in November, declaring that positive economic signs, combined with tough rhetoric against Democrats on national security, would help lift his party on Election Day.

Mr. Bush made his prediction at a news conference in the Rose Garden at which he promoted new figures from the Treasury Department showing that the federal budget deficit had dropped sharply from last year, to its lowest level in four years, on stronger-than-expected revenues. The event gave the president a chance to call attention to his party's election-year message on the economy, which has largely been drowned out by other news this summer and fall.

"We'll have a Republican speaker and a Republican leader of the Senate, and the reason I say that is because I believe the two biggest issues in this campaign are, one, the economy and the economy is growing," Mr. Bush said during the hourlong briefing in the Rose Garden. (The other major campaign issue, he said later, was national security.)

The Treasury Department reported that its preliminary data for the fiscal year 2006, which ended Sept. 30, showed that the federal budget deficit was $248 billion, down from $319 billion in 2005.

Mr. Bush said the new data showed that his administration had succeeded, three years ahead of time, in fulfilling his promise in 2004 to cut the deficit in half by 2009 and underscored the success of his tax cuts. But that promise was based on a projected 2004 deficit of $521 billion; the deficit that year was actually $413 billion.

Democrats continue to press attacks against Mr. Bush and Republicans on the economy, saying Mr. Bush's claim is based on an "artificially inflated" projected deficit and arguing that trouble lies ahead because of Mr. Bush's tax cuts, the cost of the war in Iraq and baby boomer retirements.

Still, the new data provided an opportunity to direct attention to positive economic news — and away from news reports about the Mark Foley scandal involving Congressional pages, casualties in Iraq and declining Republican electoral prospects in November. Administration officials said there was no disputing that they had hit the target deficit of less than $260 billion, three years early.

Officials have complained in recent weeks that they have been unable to draw attention to their arguments on the economy even though gasoline prices have dropped.

Mr. Bush used the occasion of the deficit announcement to pivot against the Democrats, saying that if they were to win control of Congress they would end his tax cuts and economic growth along with them.

"Democrats will raise taxes," he said. "Now, I know they say only on rich people, but that's in my judgment — having been around here long enough to know — it's just code word: They're going to raise them on whoever they can raise them on."

In keeping with a Democratic promise to respond to all Republican attacks, Representative Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland, the Democratic whip, hit back with a statement pointing to the $8.5 trillion national debt and Republican votes to raise the debt ceiling.

"The fact is," Mr. Hoyer said, "this is the most fiscally irresponsible administration in American history."

At his news conference, Mr. Bush said he would welcome such debates, which tend to provide opportunities to go toe to toe over tax cuts. "There's a difference of opinion in the campaign about taxes," he said, "and we will keep them low."

Mr. Bush also used the briefing to repeat his attacks on Democrats for, he said, trying to stand in the way of provisions that would give him more latitude to pursue terrorists.

"The vast majority of Democrats in the House voted against a program that would have institutionalized the capacity of this government to listen to Al Qaeda phone calls or Al Qaeda affiliate phone calls coming from outside the country to inside the country," he said, referring to a bill to give Congressional approval to his program granting wiretaps to the authorities seeking terrorism suspects without warrants.

DOJ_NMG_0079771

Democrats have said that such statements mischaracterize their positions — in this case to make it appear that they oppose efforts to listen to terrorists' phone calls, when what they oppose is trying to do so without warrants that they argue can be obtained quickly.

U.S. Deficit Is Smallest In Four Years (LAT)

By Molly Hennessy-Fiske

The Los Angeles Times, October 12, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush got some welcome news Wednesday as the federal deficit for the last fiscal year shrank to $247.7 billion, the smallest in four years, because of a nearly 12% jump in tax revenue. Bush said the numbers were more evidence that the economy was booming thanks to tax cuts that he wanted to see extended.

At two separate briefings, Bush used the news as an opportunity to reassure voters less than a month before midterm congressional elections that the economy was still in good shape, with more new jobs and investment leading to greater tax revenue.

"Tax relief fuels economic growth and … when the economy grows, more tax revenues come to Washington. And that's what's happened," Bush said at his afternoon news conference, where he was joined by Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr.

Bush said "pro-growth policies" that congressional Democrats had resisted had helped him deliver on a 2004 campaign promise to halve the deficit, and three years ahead of schedule.

The administration has drawn criticism for its deficit projections, and Democrats cried foul again Wednesday. They said the deficit reduction was exaggerated because Bush's 2004 figure was a projection later reduced by $100 billion, meaning the deficit actually shrank 39% from 2004 to 2006.

"Cutting the deficit in half from an intentionally inflated high point is a misleading goal and certainly no measure of success," said the Senate Budget Committee's ranking Democrat, Kent Conrad of North Dakota.

Conrad added that the president also failed to note that he was tapping Social Security revenue to help cover the deficit through off-budget borrowing. Accounting for that, Conrad said, would have added $550 billion to the deficit last fiscal year, money that will have to be repaid as 78 million baby boomers become eligible for Social Security.

Other Democrats said Bush had overstated the strength of the economy and gave too much credit to tax cuts.

"Only a president with such a historically bad economic record would be this excited about a $248-billion deficit," said Rep. Carolyn B. Maloney of New York, ranking Democrat on the Joint Economic Committee. "The large budget deficits run up by President Bush have produced record-low national saving, record-high trade deficits and record-high foreign borrowing."

Though Bush took credit for "restraining spending," federal expenditures rose 7.4% compared with 2005, to a record $2.65 trillion. The biggest spending increases: education, up 28.1%; Medicare, up 12.5%; and interest on the public debt, up 15.2%. Tax revenue also reached an all-time high of $2.41 trillion.

Republicans, many of whom face newly competitive races as a result of the congressional page scandal involving former Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.), quickly celebrated Wednesday's budget figures with a stream of statements about a strong economy.

Among them was House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), who has been a lightning rod for criticism in the Foley scandal.

"Coupled with an improving deficit picture, inflation remains low, unemployment is at historically low levels, family income is up, and gas prices at the pump fell by more than 70 cents per gallon in just a few months," Hastert wrote. He promised that if elected, Republicans would "keep driving down the deficit with responsible fiscal policies." Democrats, he said, "are promising to roll back the Bush tax cuts should they be in the majority next year."

Clouding the sunny outlook offered by the Republicans are warnings issued in recent weeks, including from Federal Reserve Chairman Ben S. Bernanke, that the economy is slowing because of the slumping housing market and tepid job creation.

And many economists believe this year's smaller deficit is just a blip. The nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office predicts the deficit for fiscal 2007 will swell to $286 billion and total $1.76 trillion over the next decade.

The Congressional Budget Office also cast doubt on Bush's assertion that tax cuts would reduce the deficit. Its estimates show that extending the cuts, which are scheduled to expire in 2010, would add $2.2 trillion to the deficit through 2016.

Treasury Department estimates show that the cuts would add 0.7% to economic growth, or $29 billion.

Conservative economists also questioned the connection between tax cuts and growth.

Rudolph G. Penner, Republican-appointed director of the Congressional Budget Office during the 1980s and a senior fellow at the Urban Institute in Washington, said tax cuts in 2001 helped prevent a deeper recession by boosting income at all levels, but could not be credited with delivering broad-based growth now. "Otherwise more of the growth would have showed up in the payrolls," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0079772

Douglas Holtz-Eakin, former director of the Congressional Budget Office under Bush, now with the Council on Foreign Relations, said: "It's tempting to say tax cuts then, good payoff now. But … the tax cuts' effect is more complicated."

He said extending the tax cuts wouldn't produce the huge increases in corporate profit and tax revenue seen last year because he expected overall economic growth to slow to 2.6%.

"That can't go on forever," he said. "I fully expect for this to slow down in the years to come."

GOP Promotes News Of Lower Budget Deficit (USAT)

By Richard Wolf

USA Today, October 12, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush touted a $248 billion budget deficit Wednesday as good news. Compared to forecasts, it was just that.

The reduction in red ink for the fiscal year that ended on Sept. 30, caused by a second consecutive year of soaring tax revenue, is the latest in a series of positive economic signs. It comes on top of a record-high stock market and tumbling gas prices.

That economic news is sure to be used by Republicans as a potential antidote to a bevy of bad news: mounting casualties in Iraq, a nuclear standoff with North Korea and former congressman Mark Foley's improper e-mails to teenage pages. Bush, in fact, predicted Wednesday that economic and security issues will keep Congress in GOP hands.

“The economy is growing,” Bush said at a Rose Garden news conference. “The national unemployment rate is 4.6%. We've just discovered, as the result of analyzing new data, that we added 6.6 million new jobs since August of 2003. Gas prices are down. Tax cuts are working.”

On that last point, opinions differ. Bush says his tax cuts of 2001 and 2003 stimulated the economy, generating more revenue. Rep. John Spratt, D-S.C., and other Democrats say they have increased annual deficits, forcing Congress to raise the national debt limit by $3 trillion since 2002. A recent Congressional Research Service report says the increased debt is probably greater than the added revenue.

The significance of the reduced deficit is a matter of debate:

·The new deficit figure is less than half of the projected $521 billion deficit that Bush faced in February 2004, when he pledged to cut it in half by 2009. Although several private forecasters had similar projections, the actual 2004 deficit came in at $413 billion.

·The $248 billion deficit is a far cry from the $236 billion surplus that existed when Bush was elected in 2000. Republicans note, however, that the economy already was in recession when Bush took office. Today's deficit is just 1.9% of the economy, says White House budget director Rob Portman — smaller than in 18 of the past 25 years.

·Looking ahead, the deficit picture gets worse as the baby boom generation retires, increasing the costs of Medicare and Social Security. Bush acknowledged as much Wednesday in urging action by Congress to tame those entitlement programs.

A recent Congressional Budget Office report shows that over the next decade, the government likely will rack up $3.5 trillion in red ink. That assumes Bush's tax cuts are extended beyond their 2010 expiration, middle-income taxpayers are protected from the alternative minimum tax, and the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan are phased down.

The $248 billion deficit “is a pleasant surprise, but this is as good as it gets,” says Mark Zandi, chief economist of Economy.com.

Even so, look for Republicans to use the latest news in the final four weeks of their campaigns. “There's a terrific economic story to be told,” says former GOP congressman Pat Toomey, president of the conservative Club for Growth.

That won't work, says Rep. Rahm Emanuel, D-Ill., chairman of the House Democrats' campaign committee.

“Voters will think, how out of touch are you?” he says. “For average families, it's a struggle.”

Bush Claims Victory Over Debt Reduction (FT)

By Caroline Daniel

Financial Times, October 12, 2006

The Bush administration on Wednesday said it had reached its goal of cutting the budget deficit in half “three years ahead of schedule”, citing soaring federal tax revenues generated by a policy of tax cuts.

President George W. Bush, who in 2004 set the goal of halving the deficit by 2009, sought to reinvigorate Republican chances of retaining the Senate and House of Representatives in the forthcoming midterm elections by touting the new deficit number of $248bn for 2006, a four-year low.

DOJ_NMG_0079773

"I still stand by my prediction, we'll have a Republican Speaker and a Republican leader of the Senate," he said in an hour-long press conference on Wednesday. He added that the two biggest issues in this campaign were "one, the economy" with national security second.

Mr Bush said the reduced deficit was proof his "pro-growth policies worked", and that his tax cuts should be made permanent. The cuts, starting in 2001, had fuelled 37 quarters of economic growth, he said.

Some economists were sceptical that the tax cuts had generated the economic growth and pointed out that much of the recovery in tax revenues – up by $253bn in 2006 – appeared to be linked to record corporate profits. They warned that 2006 could mark a low in budget deficits before rising next year.

James Horney, senior fellow at the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities, said the new forecast was a "blip in a bleak fiscal outlook" and the administration did not deserve "any credit" for halving the deficit.

He suggested the goal had been set using an inflated figure for the 2004 deficit of $521bn, rather than the lower forecast from the Congressional Budget Office of $477bn, to make it "easier to meet the goal".

Administration officials denied that they manipulated forecasts for political purposes. Ed Lazear, chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers, last week said the forecasts had nothing to do "with strategic behaviour by anybody".

Citing figures from the CBO, Mr Horney warned that if tax cuts were made permanent and relief from the alternative minimum tax extended, deficits could reach "nearly $3.5 trillion over the next 10 years".

Mr Bush said the economy had created 6.6m jobs since 2003. New data issued on Friday showed the biggest revision in a quarter-century.

The administration has struggled to get credit for economic growth, with fiscal conservatives angered by rising government spending and consumers' perception of the economy damped by high petrol prices. An ABC/Washington Post poll this week found that 40 per cent agreed the economy was excellent or good; 60 per cent judged it not good or poor.

Budget Deficit Shrinks On Strong Tax Receipts (WSJ)

By Deborah Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, October 12, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Strong tax receipts from individuals and corporations helped to shrink the U.S. budget deficit for the fiscal year ended Sept. 30 to $248 billion, far narrower than the $423 billion previously projected by the White House.

The deficit, $71 billion slimmer than the previous year's figure, allowed President Bush to declare that he had delivered early on his 2004 pledge to cut the then-projected $521 billion federal deficit in half by 2009. In remarks at the White House, Mr. Bush credited his administration's "pro-growth economic policies" for the "dramatic reduction" in the deficit.

"The budget numbers are proof that pro-growth economic policies work. By restraining spending in Washington and allowing Americans to keep more of what they earn, the economy is creating jobs and reducing the deficit and making our nation a more prosperous nation for all our citizens," Mr. Bush said.

Much of the deficit reduction, however, came not from spending restraint but from surging tax revenue buoyed by a strong economy. Federal spending continued to grow in 2006 to $2.65 trillion, up from $2.47 trillion last year, according to the Treasury Department. Among the biggest expenses were outlays for defense and military spending, interest on the public debt and entitlement programs, such as Medicaid, Medicare and Social Security.

Emergency spending for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan and for Hurricane Katrina relief added to the costs.

While the deficit shrank in fiscal 2006, the White House and many economists expect it to widen again this fiscal year as revenue growth slows and spending continues to increase. The costs of entitlement programs are growing faster than the government's ability to pay for them, and government debt payments, which totaled $406 billion in fiscal 2006, are also rising.

"Spending is rising faster than the growth rate of the economy," said Brian Bethune, U.S. economist at consulting firm Global Insight. He projects the deficit will widen to $285 billion in fiscal 2007, while the White House projects it at $339 billion.

As he has done in the past, Mr. Bush acknowledged the unsustainable growth in entitlement spending, saying the "health of these programs is in serious jeopardy" and pledging to work toward reforming the programs over the next two years. "My hope is, in the last two years of this administration, we can set aside needless politics and focus on what's right for the United States of America and solve these entitlement programs once and for all," Mr. Bush said.

The 2006 deficit narrowed in large part because the growth in spending was offset by surging tax receipts, which reached $2.4 trillion, up 12% from $2.15 trillion, the Treasury said. The biggest surge came from corporate income taxes, which increased 27% to $354 billion as corporate profits skyrocketed. The single biggest chunk of tax revenue came from individual income taxes, up 13% to $1 trillion, largely fueled by wealthy individuals, who benefited from higher salaries, bonuses and stock-market gains.

Mr. Bush and administration officials said spending slowed in areas other than defense and entitlements. Robert Portman, director of the Office of Management and Budget, said while most of the deficit reduction was attributable to strong revenue, about 25% was a result of spending restraint. "What's really significant is that even with entitlement spending and the war on terror we're still showing numbers that are better than what anyone expected," Mr. Portman said.

DOJ_NMG_0079774

Declining Debt (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 12, 2006

It turns out the budget deficit news for fiscal 2006 was even better than we previewed in these columns last week. Thanks to a burst of September revenue, Treasury reported yesterday that the deficit fell to $247.7 billion, or 1.9% of GDP, below our report of $260 billion.

A couple of other notable budget facts: Revenues again rose faster than the economy, so tax receipts have now climbed to 18.4% of GDP. That's higher than in all but 15 years since 1962, according to the Congressional Budget Office. Seven of those years were in the Clinton era, when revenues rose to a postwar high of 20.9% in 2000, thanks in part to the confiscatory tax rates that voters elected to reduce with their Presidential choice that same year. In other words, to the limited extent the deficit remains a problem, it is all about spending, not a lack of revenues.

The incredible shrinking deficit means that the federal government's overall debt has also begun to decline as a share of the economy. The final figures aren't available, but our guess is that debt held by the public (the figure that counts because the feds have to pay it back) will have fallen in 2006 back to 37% of GDP or lower. The debt burden fell to 33% in 2001 but began climbing again as deficits grew in the wake of recession and spending to fund the war on terror. Now it's falling once more.

The Democratic/media criticism that all of this good news is merely "temporary" is beside the point. Of course entitlement spending will rise in the future, but any extra revenues Democrats raised today would be spent today. They surely wouldn't be saved for somebody's future retirement. Democrats who continue to moan about the deficit are really saying that the government should take an even larger tax bite from the economy than its currently hefty 18.4%; in other words, they want to raise taxes.

What Not To Wear In Front Of Bush (LAT)

By Johanna Neuman

The Los Angeles Times, October 12, 2006

WASHINGTON — Even as he talked about North Korea's nuclear ambitions and other weighty matters, President Bush on Wednesday returned to his occasional role as fashion critic to the White House press corps.

"If I might say, that is a beautiful suit…. And I can't see anybody else that even comes close," the president told NBC's Kevin Corke, who was wearing pinstripes, in the course of a Rose Garden news conference that focused on North Korea-related diplomacy and the Iraq war.

Corke responded that he would convey the president's comments to his tailor. "I'll be happy to pass along my tailor's number if you'd like that, sir," he also offered.

Soon after, the president asserted that CNN's Suzanne Malveaux was the "first best-dressed person here."

By the time Bush called on Jim Axelrod of CBS, the reporter felt compelled to start with a defensive comment: "My best suit's in the cleaners," Axelrod explained to the president.

"That's not even a suit," Bush retorted, eyeing Axelrod's sport coat and slacks.

Bush, who has suits made by Georges de Paris, the tailor to presidents since Lyndon Johnson's time, has teased reporters about their appearance in the past. In June, he poked fun at CNN's David Gregory for his loud pocket scarf.

"Gregory, fine-looking scarf — not scarf, what do you call that thing?" said Bush. "It's strong."

In August, while discussing the war in Lebanon, Bush took note of a suit worn by Ken Herman of Cox Newspapers, saying: "By the way, seersucker is coming back." Later in the news conference, Bush again referred to the suit, calling it "that just ridiculous-looking outfit."

Asked about the president's commentary, White House Deputy Press Secretary Dana Perino called Bush "a personable man," saying that "although he's president and that's a serious job, he does like to reach out to others in friendly ways."

Some who study presidential news conferences attached no great meaning to the byplay.

"I think this is probably the way he deals with people in social encounters," said Kathleen Hall Jamieson, director of the Annenberg Public Policy Center at the University of Pennsylvania. "It may make him feel more comfortable."

Herman, the reporter in seersucker, was amused when a media dust-up followed Bush's comments on his suit. "If there's anything reporters know better than math, it's fashion," he joked.

Herman said he considered the banter just part of Bush's social mannerisms. "I've been covering him since 1993 in Texas," Herman said. "That's the way he likes to make connections. He still has some frat boy in him. He likes to tease people."

Tony Snow Knows How To Work More Than One Room (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0079775

By Howard Kurtz

The Washington Post, October 12, 2006

On the morning of Oct. 2, Tony Snow did six back-to-back television interviews from the White House lawn, and one phrase came back to haunt him.

While criticizing Mark Foley, the Republican congressman who resigned over sexually graphic messages he sent to former House pages, Snow told CNN's Soledad O'Brien: "It's not always pretty up there on Capitol Hill, and there have been other scandals, as you know, that have been more than simply naughty e-mails."

Snow also told O'Brien: "You're trying to create problems. What you are trying to do is pick fights here," which she quickly disputed.

There has never been a White House press secretary quite like Snow. He is a combative presence on television and radio, relishes the repartee at daily briefings and, in a first for his position, has hit the fundraising circuit for Republican candidates. Snow brings a flashy, Fox News sensibility to the high-profile podium, which means he is increasingly popping up on newscasts and in the papers.

"Sometimes it does feel like the Tony Snow Show," says Richard Wolffe, Newsweek's White House correspondent. "There are tactics he uses that are straight out of talk radio. The extent to which he personalizes things or comes back with a one-liner, it revs up the base. They love it when he takes us on."

In an interview in his West Wing office, Snow readily acknowledges that "naughty e-mails" did not capture the gravity of Foley's graphic exchanges with teenage boys. "I shouldn't have used the words," Snow says. "I'm not going to defend having used the words." But, he says, "I did six interviews that morning and people picked on one-half of one line."

Snow says his years as host of "Fox News Sunday," and especially as a radio host, were ideal preparation for the daily briefings, because you have to "think on your feet" with callers and guests. When facing reporters, he says, "if you can't roll with the punches and give sensible answers, you're going to get killed." And, he says, "if you try to spin guys, they're going to see through it."

Part of Snow's art -- some might deem it spin -- is to openly proclaim what he is doing. Last week, for instance, after consulting with the office of House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), Snow doggedly refused to field questions on what President Bush thought of Hastert's handling of the Foley mess.

"I will dodge it, and I will tell you exactly why I'm going to dodge it," Snow explained. "Because this is a question that requires knowledge of a lot of details that are not in evidence, certainly not to me, at this point."

In the five months since he succeeded the tightly scripted Scott McClellan, Snow has put his verbal agility and sense of humor to good use, and the White House has clearly given him more running room. Struggling on several fronts, from Iraq to domestic scandals to depressed poll numbers that have put the Republican control of Congress at risk, the president has never been more in need of a slick salesman. Administration officials describe Snow as a major asset.

"He definitely likes the combat," says Martha Raddatz, ABC's White House correspondent. "One of his devices is he stops and smiles at you. The megawatt smile is supposed to punctuate his sentences, but it hasn't worked as well for him lately. It's a pretty tight-lipped administration, and that hasn't changed."

CBS's Jim Axelrod recalls how Snow once issued a press release assailing a story Axelrod had done on Medicare eligibility. "He basically sent out this report calling me a liar, and then showed up at the booth smiling, with a handshake, and we had a half-hour chat. . . . He plays the affability card."

After the president's televised speech on the fifth anniversary of 9/11, Axelrod pressed Snow on why what was billed as a nonpolitical speech had become a vigorous defense of the Iraq war. Snow shot back that if Bush hadn't discussed Iraq, "it would have been seen as dereliction, and you guys would have been out here just clubbing me like a baby seal." Some viewers called Axelrod to say that he had been disrespectful.

Snow, says Axelrod, "has got a talk show host's knack of taking whatever question is asked and steering it into a two- or three-minute response that is a fairly strong defense of the administration's policies. He's probably dealt with angry callers before, and maybe we're nothing more than angry callers to him."

Sometimes the exchanges get heated. When NBC's David Gregory asked why Bush had not acknowledged more shortcomings in an assessment of the battle against terrorism, Snow accused him of expressing "the Democratic point of view." Gregory vigorously objected.

"Let's not let you get away with being rude," Snow said.

"Excuse me, don't point your finger at me," Gregory said. "I'm not being rude."

"Yes, you are," Snow insisted.

DOJ_NMG_0079776

Snow says he "felt bad" about what happened and later called Gregory, saying he could ask as many follow-up questions as he wanted if he let Snow finish the answers. "I wanted to make sure we didn't have any more of those exchanges, because I think he's a good reporter," Snow says.

Sometimes Snow's freewheeling style produces a pratfall. In July, he inflamed the issue of stem cell research by saying that Bush believes the federal government should not "finance something that many people consider murder. He's one of them." Snow had to back off during the ensuing controversy, saying he had "overstated the president's position."

Reporters cut Snow some slack during his shakedown period, when he would sometimes plead ignorance on various issues. "Tony's made some statements he regrets, and he gets a pass on some days because he's new," Raddatz says. "But I think that little honeymoon is over."

Like every press secretary, Snow also must function as a reporter, ferreting out information from within the administration. When Bob Woodward's book "State of Denial" charged that Bush and his team were not being honest about the mess in Iraq, Snow spoke to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, national security adviser Stephen Hadley and Henry Kissinger, among others, which helped him challenge various points in the book. But it was his glib sound bite -- "The book is sort of like cotton candy; it kind of melts on contact" -- that was widely picked up.

Away from the cameras, journalists give Snow mixed grades for providing information. They say he often delegates detailed questions to his deputy, Dana Perino, and other assistants. Snow says he can answer questions "to a certain depth" but that it makes more sense for reporters to deal with staff members who specialize in the subjects.

Others praise Snow for his accessibility. "I have e-mailed him at 6:30 in the morning on a weekend, and I have a response within a half-hour," Axelrod says.

Snow has pushed for the president to grant more interviews -- Bush spoke to every major network during the 9/11 anniversary -- and to continue to hold more news conferences than he did during the first term. As for his own spate of television interviews, Snow says the White House staff thinks he can be helpful, but he is wary of accepting too many bookings.

"You don't want to get overexposed," he says.

Snow initially hesitated to take the job, after enduring surgery and chemotherapy for colon cancer last year, until his doctors gave him a clean bill of health. While Snow begins each day with a 6:30 a.m. staff meeting, he says he has managed to take most weekends off and visit a family retreat on Maryland's Eastern Shore.

But any spokesman's schedule remains unpredictable. After news broke Sunday night that North Korea had tested a nuclear bomb, Snow held a 1:30 a.m. conference call with White House pool reporters to field questions on the incident.

